Seventh Question. What lessons can people learn from an earthquake occurring in a pious region of a predominantly Muslim country? it looks like god was intentionally aiming this earthquake directly at them. Why would god not choose some more irreligious part of the world to inflict with an earthquake?

Said Nursi’s answer is that god sends such natural catastrophes in order to warn people that they should pray and avoid sinful behavior; moreover, god uses these occasions to punish wrongdoing and injustice. Nursi accuses the persecutors of the students of the Risale-i Nur of being responsible for a series of earthquakes which occurred in Turkey:

as is indicated by four severe earthquakes in four years coinciding exactly with the severe aggression against the Risale-i Nur students and their being persecuted, and on each occasion their occurring exactly at the time the students were attacked and their stopping when the attacks ceased, you are responsible for the heavenly and earthly disasters that have occurred on our being convicted![809]

This statement was misinterpreted, and Nursi was accused of claiming that the Risale-i Nur had some kind of magical power so that if it were attacked, natural disasters would occur in a kind of divine retaliation. Nursi denied that he stated this and clarified his point as follows:

The wrong meaning has been given in the indictment, for it has deemed an offence some instances of the Risale-i Nur’s “wonder-working” (kerâmet) which took the form of “slaps.” as though disasters like earthquakes that occur when the Risale-i Nur is attacked are blows dealt by the Risale-i Nur. god forbid! We never said such a thing, nor wrote it. What we said in many places was that like acceptable almsgiving, the Risale-i Nur is a means of repulsing disasters. Whenever it is attacked, it hides itself; then calamities seize the opportunity and assault us … i have formed the conviction that those “coincidences” are a divine bestowal indicating the Risale-i Nur’s acceptability and are a sort of wonder of the Risale-i Nur on account of the Qur’an.[810] on the one hand, earthquakes occur in pious regions because in those places people have not sinned so seriously; consequently, through the natural disaster god is beginning to purify them from their sins. here the question is connected with the mystery of human suffering, which Nursi views as a blessing and opportunity sent by god to grow in patience and trust. elsewhere in the Risale-i Nur he offers twenty-five remedies for “the sick and those struck by disaster,” by which he seeks to show how persevering in faith amidst illnesses and disasters can be a source of blessing and grace for the believer.[811] on the other hand, upright lives can sometimes prevent such disasters: “Through the blessings of the Risale-i Nur, Kastamonu was preserved from the disasters [earthquakes] more than any other province.”[812] however, Nursi hastens to admit that these are mere human speculations and the truth remains hidden with god. he cites a Qur’anic verse which states: “all glory be to you. We have no knowledge except that which you have taught us” (Qur’an 2:32), thereby affirming that natural disasters are among those things about which humans can only conjecture, beyond the basic indications that god has revealed through the prophets.

 Conclusion

I have no doubt that many modern people will find Said Nursi’s explanation of god’s justice in natural disasters unacceptable. his understanding of god’s sending or permitting disasters as a punishment for human sin they will consider simplistic and outdated. his view that god is accustomed to make use of these tragic events to test people and to bring blessings upon his faithful, patient servants they will regard as wishful thinking and an unfeeling response to the reality of human suffering. however, Said Nursi could rightly respond to such criticisms of his faith-based perceptions by challenging non-believers to come up with their own more satisfactory explanation. Nursi has already pointed out the inadequacy of “blaming the instrument,” and charts of architectonic plates, oceanic currents, and volcanic substrata will serve little to give hope to victims or make sense of the disasters that have afflicted human lives. Nursi, while admittedly trying to find the meaning contained in occurrences that surpass our human comprehension, at least provides people with a way to perceive the hand of a just and compassionate god in such events and offers guidance on the way to respond to the disaster so that it can be an occasion of growth and blessing, and not merely meaningless destruction. it is in such efforts to understand the workings of god that true human wisdom can be found.

 16. Justice and Balance in creation: Said Nursi’s analysis

Bilal Kuşpinar

We should like to point out at the very outset that Nursi regards justice (al-‘adālah) as one of the four principal objectives (al-makasid al-arba‘a) and essential teachings of the Qur’an; the other three being tawhid [monotheism], al-nubuwwah [prophethood], and al-Hashr [the resurrection in afterlife].[813] he also believed that these four objectives prevail and penetrate the whole content of the Qur’an; so much so that, if looked at carefully, one can notice their manifestations almost in every chapter and their hints almost in every phrase and word. Moreover, every part of the Qur’an is considered by him as a mirror to the whole of the Qur’an. Because of that, even in the formula of Bismillah, “in the name of god, allMerciful and all-compassionate,” as prefixed to every sura except that of alTawba, these objectives can be discerned. The word al-Rahman [all-Merciful], for instance, is an obvious indication, according to Nursi’s analysis, to the existence of the order and balance of justice (nizām al-‘adālah) in the universe.[814] it is this interesting approach that we aim to explore in this study with its various implications and ramifications as manifested in the Risale-i Nur; an approach which views justice and all its concomitants as originated from god by virtue of his names, such as all-Merciful, all-Wise, and all-Just. again, it is this approach whose genesis Nursi traces in the Qur’an, that he further develops, as we shall see here, into what we may call a metaphysical conception of justice in benefiting at the same time from the ideas of such great Muslim sages as alghazali, ibn al-‘arabi, and Jalal al-din rumi, who all hold the view that justice and balance have been originally implanted by god in all things and beings in the universe. This view Nursi crystallizes by saying that “the universe, as well as all beings therein, testify to the Justice and Wisdom of god.”[815]in what follows, therefore, we attempt to bring to light in a systematic fashion the most salient features of Nursi’s metaphysical conception of justice through a close survey of his Risale. Before embarking upon our survey, however, we should offer some clarification for the meaning of metaphysical conception of justice. By this expression we intend to convey two purposes: one is to distinguish this particular conception from all other ethical, theological, social, and political conceptions of justice. The other, as the phrase itself suggests, is to draw attention to the spiritual and universal dimensions of justice, which Nursi, like his aforementioned predecessors, examines in two realms: that of microcosm, human realm; and that of macrocosm, the realm of the universe. after all, it is the Qur’an that informs of the existence of these two realms, when it states, “We shall show them our signs on the horizons [viz. in the universe] and within themselves [viz. in human bodies and souls].” (41:53). Justice as seen in these two domains is nothing else than an obvious sign of god. The universe with the tongue of order and equilibrium testifies to the wisdom and justice of the All-Just and All-Wise God.[816]

 The Definition of Justice and its Qur’anic Foundation

Nursi, to begin with, seems to adopt the widely-held definition of justice among philosophers as “putting a thing in its proper place” or “a middle path or a moderate action or a mean that lies between two extremes.”[817] To this literal meaning, he also adds his own elaboration by saying that that justice means to give everything its right or due and to give every being its due existence and form in well-balanced measure. it also means to give every being what it deserves in accordance with its aptitude and capacity, in consideration of its whole existence. There are, as we note, several necessary components of this definition: “right” or “due” (hakk), “aptitude” (istidat) and “well-balanced measure” (hassas mizan ve ölçü).[818] as such, it includes virtually all the possible dimensions that are implied in the concept of justice.

Nursi discusses the various implications of the above-cited components of justice in the light of several verses of the Qur’an, some of which are as follows: “such is the artistry of god Who has created everything with due wisdom, balance and perfection.” (al-naml 27:88) “it is he Who has created everything in the best form [or has given the best form to everything he has created.]” (al-sajda 32:7) “it is he Who has given to everything its due creation [that is its true nature and form] and then guided it.” (Ta ha 20:50)

“do they not look at the sky above them? how We made it and adorned it, and there are no flaws in it.” (Qaf 50:6) As has been indicated in this verse, in all beings, says Nursi, there is an observable balance and order, as well as a wellmeasured regularity and well-distributed sustenance, universal wisdom. all of them bear testimony to god’s universal knowledge, wisdom and justice.[819]

“There is not a single thing that does not have its [source and] treasures with Us; We send it down thereof only in accordance with a measure well-defined.” (alhijr 15:21) The explanation of this particular verse occupies considerable space almost in the end of the lem’alar (The Flashes), where we find Nursi furnishing a detailed analysis of god’s name, the all-Just (al-‘Adl). it is worth mentioning that he composed his reflections upon this verse while he was in Eskisehir prison, far away from the external natural environment; yet it is strange enough that most of his interpretation, as we shall see later, seems to have revolved around the vivid descriptions of the natural phenomena as if he was observing them with his physical eyes.

By pondering over all the verses above and other similar ones, Nursi undoubtedly seeks to underline his foremost conviction as well as the conviction of many other religious thinkers like him that in the phenomenal world there is an apparent justice whose origin is god and hence it is called, accordingly, “divine Justice.” in fact, the divine Justice has ever been in operation as a universal law since the very beginning of creation. as such, it has numerous substantial implications for man’s own life and existence in this world as well as in the world to come. in order for man to appreciate the overall importance of this justice in the universe, he should in the first place observe and examine his own creation along with the creation of the physical world around him. in doing so, he will be able to grasp the meaning of this worldly life within the context of the divine Justice and then begin to assume more consciously his individual and collective responsibility in maintaining that justice in the world. From this point of view, therefore, Nursi’s analysis will provide us, among other benefits, with a framework by virtue of which we can better visualize the effects of the divine justice in the phenomenal world and better conceptualize its metaphysical implications within us and outside.

 The Manifestation of the Divine Justice in the Macrocosm

Nursi suggests that man should first adopt a positive attitude towards things around him and look at everything with a penetrative or internal eye (basira) and not just with the physical eyes. only then he becomes aware of the balance of justice pervasive in all creation. For to such a spiritually powerful eye, all the creatures, he proclaims, will appear as an obvious sign of and hence a visible testimony to god’s wisdom, justice, generosity and mercy.[820] in this case, man’s mental state is extremely important in observing things and beings in the phenomenal world, which stands as a locus or a theater for the reflections and manifestations of God’s names, attributes and acts.

By reaffirming this well-known traditional Islamic view of nature, Nursi seeks to emphasize that everything should be seen as purposeful and meaningful, not in themselves, but rather in reference to their originator and creator. after all, “god is named with a thousand names each of which serves as the source of thousands of perfections and the means for thousands of degrees of beauty.”[821] in each of his names, Nursi continues, are hidden thousands of treasuries containing innumerable bounties. naturally, god, as the owner of these names, not only sustains all things in the world but puts them in order and regulates them with perfect wisdom.[822]

The name the all-Just (al-‘Adl) is a greatest name or what Nursi calls “one of the six lights of the greatest name.” The various manifestations of this name keep on occurring on the entire universe, which looks like a huge magnificent palace. In it, let us imagine, there is a city which is in constant processes of demolition and renovation. again, within that city is a country which is disturbed and stirred up because of ongoing war and emigration. still within the country there is a world which is continuously oscillating between death and life. despite all constant transformations and tribulations as such, Nursi proclaims, there is nevertheless an amazing balance, order and equilibrium that is prevalent in all of them, therefore in the palace, city, country and world. and even all the changes, emigrations, and deaths that are taking place in all beings in those places, appear to be wellmeasured and well-balanced on the scales of the absolute one, the all-Just who sees and monitors the whole cosmos. To think otherwise would be tantamount to denying this obvious reality. in other words, had it not been for the justice of god and his overseeing, all this apparent balance and order in the universe would have turned into total chaos, and as a result the world we live in would have suffocated because of such possible disastrous consequences.[823]

The seven heavens and the earth and all that are contained in them [constantly] glorify Him. And there is not a single thing but glorifies Him with praise. (Isra 17:44) Nursi, while interpreting this verse, draws our attention to a significant point: god has invested all beings, heavenly and earthly alike, with numerous meanings of wisdom, each extolling and expressing with its own peculiar tongue the diverse subtleties of god’s creative art and his all-encompassing mercy. each plant and each tree in this sense demonstrate, at various stages of their growth from seedling, shooting, flowering to blossoming, not only the Oneness of their creator but also his wisdom and justice, all of which denote his perfection in creation. Thanks to god’s justice, indicates Nursi, every tree completes its full growth within well-ordered stages of evolvement and well-measured balance. For a discerning eye such perfect wisdom and justice of god, he declares, is visible in all particulars of creation.[824] it is through the manifestation of his name all-Wise that the universe, Nursi declares, has been displayed to us as a grand book in every page of which hundreds of books have been inscribed, and in every line of which hundreds of pages are contained. and in every word of it are included hundreds of lines, and in each letter of it are compacted a hundred words, and in every point of it is inserted a brief index of the book. When we carefully and closely examine this mighty book, we are astonished again at the spectacular balance and order of its content, so much so that even the smallest details of it are harmoniously connected with one another and no slightest disorder is to be seen anywhere. Moreover, such balancing and ordering in the universe, as Nursi affirms in clinging to Ash‘arite position, is ever dynamic and constantly renewed.[825]

This point Nursi further illustrates by offering an analogy between an army of soldiers consisting of four hundred different sections, which are, though intermingled, separated from one another with a different uniform, provision, weapon, and medicine, and an army of plants and animals comprising 400,000 magnificent species, each of which stands in their different tents that are pitched on the face of the earth in springtime. if we observe carefully, he declares, both of these two groups, namely an army of soldiers and that of plants and animals, we can see how the names of god, the Truth, all-Merciful, Provider, all-compassionate and all-generous are manifested on them with order and equilibrium and in accordance with his wisdom and justice and also we can notice how he sustains, regulates and administers them all without confusing and forgetting any of them.

This is because of his all-encompassing justice and wisdom.[826] so, the divine justice as it appears in the universe, for Nursi, is not something arbitrarily imposed; on the contrary, it is inevitable result of god’s wisdom (hikmet) and justice (adalet) which pervades and permeates all things from the tiniest atom to the sun. That is to say, by his very name all-Wise all things become meaningful and purposeful, while by his name all-Just all things receive their due form and creation. Moreover, it is through God’s infinite wisdom and justice that all things as well as all beings—whether be they physical or immaterial, terrestrial or celestial—are arranged in utmost perfect order and regularity.

When we take a glance at the universe, we are struck, Nursi goes on to emphasize, with a universal perfect order existing in all things there. We always see that there is a delicate balance, a precise order and a sensitive equilibrium. Moreover, such an order and balance are continuous all the time and inclusive of all things, even the minutest particles. Behind all of these then there lies but god’s universal wisdom and justice, as well as his universal knowledge.[827] according to that universal knowledge, wisdom and justice, everything is measured in perfect manner and with the finest artistry and in accordance with its innate capacity and put in perfect order in accordance with its most fitting place in the universe. Look at the clothes of the birds, Nursi exemplifies, how beautifully they are dressed! how easily and comfortably they move their feathers and how they use them all the time! all other things appear likewise in their well-balanced bodies and beautiful forms with no waste at all. nothing is in vain there. all of these point to the existence of an all-Wise creator and all-mighty and all-Knowing.[828] as we closely observe, Nursi aims to demonstrate that in the cosmos there is not even slightest room for any chance or any random affair and that there is instead an impeccable order in place. This can only be explained in reference to the operation and manifestation of divine wisdom and justice. To put it more precisely, it is god who plans everything with wisdom and executes every work with justice.[829] likewise, it is on the scales of his wisdom and justice that he measures all things and beings and spread them on the earth.[830] at this juncture, Nursi responds to an implicit theological question: can god act contrary to his wisdom and justice? his reply is of course negative. in no way can god, he asserts, act contrary to his wisdom and justice. For, since his wisdom and justice are absolute and perfect, all that stems from him must be wise and just, too. or as he articulates, “from the absolute good (Hayr-i Mutlak) emanates nothing but good and from the absolute Beauty (Cemil-i Mutlak) proceeds nothing but beauty. nothing absurd can ever come out from the absolute Wise (Hakim-i Mutlak).”[831] Man, however, who has a short life in this world, as Nursi states, can neither attain nor experience such a real justice as god exhibits in this ephemeral world. That is why so many things are being postponed to the grand Tribunal.[832]

Be that as it may, it is an undeniable truth for Nursi as for many other great spiritual masters that the world of creation depends for its existence on the infinite generosity and compassion (rahma) of god, just as its order and shape, and hence its perfection, depends on His infinite wisdom (hikmet) and justice (adalet). it is on account of his wisdom and justice that god gives everything its own right and measure in accordance with its natural aptitude (istidat) or according to what its primordial disposition requires. Whatever a thing needs and demands in its own nature, in terms of the necessities for its existence and survival, god grants them in the most fitting manner to it. In other words, God always responds wisely and justly to every being which poses to him its needs either by the tongue of its aptitude (istidat) or by that of its primordial disposition (fitrat) or by the tongue of its necessity (iztirar).[833] as we have mentioned earlier, god's justice, according to Nursi, is universal and encompassing all things and all beings, plants, animals, mankind and jinn. Because of his love of all, says Nursi, god manifests on them his names, including allWise and all-Just. on this particular point he fully agrees with the view of the great Muslim mystics of the past and emphatically stresses again the importance of god's name al-Wadud [The loving one], while citing the anonymous saying of those mystics as follows:

love is the very leaven (or substance) of the universe. it is through love that all existing beings are in motion. it is again from love that emerge the laws of attraction, affinity, and ecstasy present in all beings.[834]

so, Nursi links god's wisdom and justice with his love, so much so that he firmly asserts that everything receives from the manifestation of Divine love and hence is intoxicated with it in accordance with its natural aptitude.[835] The apparent justice and orderliness in all beings in fact emanates from his names the Just and the Wise but because of His love of them. here it must be noted that Nursi characterizes such a wondrous balance and order pervading the entire universe and all beings as compassionate (rahimane), as it springs forth from the allcompassionate (Al-Rahim). That is to say, the justice of god is at the same time a mercy for all beings.[836] hence his justice is identical with his mercy. if this is the case, then how can one explain the existence of evil in the world? To this crucial question Nursi affords a response, as expected, in connection with his metaphysical conception of justice, or say it more concisely, in terms of the divine Justice. in the existence of satan, he proclaims, there are numerous purposes. First of all man's attainment of perfection and happiness is possible through his struggle against the temptations of satan. Within man are lodged and deposited numerous potentialities and abilities, whose development depends on his action, which in turn occurs through his striving in the face of evil spirits and harmful things. Were it not for his striving, man would have been just like the angels. But it is already self-evident that man with his will and intelligence is distinguished from all other beings. This being the case, then, "divine mercy, wisdom, and justice," Nursi concludes, "have permitted the existence of satan, and allowed him to molest men."[837] as has been noted, the very creation of satan, according to Nursi, is for the moral progress and spiritual perfection of man and therefore its creation in this particular respect is not only good and just but beautiful, too.[838] The same brief rationale he furnishes for the existence of such phenomena as extinction (fena), disappearance (zeval) and death (mawt). But when he comes to grips with one of the most complicated questions of both philosophy and theology, he extends his discourse to a considerable degree of elaboration. "how is it that god, allInfinitely Good, Absolutely Beautiful, Absolutely Compassionate and Absolutely Just, inflicts calamities (musibet), evil (şerr), and ugliness (çirkinlik) on certain individuals?" Being entirely aware of the profound complexity of this question, Nursi suggests, though implicitly but for the sake of clarity, a practical distinction between that which emanates directly from the treasury of God's mercy and beauty and that which results occasionally from his universal laws, which are termed 'âdât Allâh and which are subjected to his Will (irade). The former comprises all that is good and beautiful, which god freely bestows out of his compassion and generosity for all, whereas the latter includes particular evils and calamities, which he creates them occasionally out of his Will in order to preserve and maintain the universal laws all of which in fact serve for universal purposes and benefits. In the face of such calamities, God responds to the cries of those inflicted individuals with his merciful help and favor. after all, he, as the creator and sustainer of all, acts as he wills.[839]

you should know that no one has the right to complain about and raise objection to the Maker of the universe. For, in the order of the creation [of the universe], there are thousands of wisdom which are contrary to the whims of the complainer and which may therefore be sacrificed [and lost] if the complainer is to be satisfied. As the Qur'an testifies to it: "If the truth were in accord with their own likes and dislikes, the heavens and the earth would surely have fallen into ruin ..." (al-Mu'minun 23:71). o complainer! how dare you object and make your particular whims a tool to engineer the universal [principles] of the universe? how dare you set your spoiled taste as the yardstick to determine the degrees of [his] bounties? how do you know? [Who knows] what you see as a suffering may be the very blessing? how dare you change the motion of the wheels of the universe and the turning of the celestial spheres in order to gratify your desires which do not even amount to the wing of a gnat on a scale and nor yet fill the seed of a fig? Nevertheless, you can present your complaints to Him, but not about him, for what is allocated for you from the heaps [of wheat] is just a grain. Besides, he who is owned cannot own. in this case, you should know your limit and you should never go beyond your boundary.

[Again,] you should know that one who exercises control over a particular cell of the body should first conceive the body [as a whole] and then apply to it one's operation. This is so because the particular [cell] is connected with and related to the [minutest] details and the condition of the whole [body]. This being the case, then, to exercise control over a cell falls under the command of the creator of all, indeed.[840]

Nursi goes on to deliberate further on the manifestations of god's justice in the world and this time he prefers to express his firm conviction with more precise terms as follows:

everything from the cells of an animate body, the red and white corpuscles in the blood, the transformations of minute particles, and the mutual proportion and relation of the body's organs, to the incomings and outgoings of the seas, the income and expenditure of springs under the earth, the birth and death of animals and plants, the destruction of autumn and the reconstruction of spring, the duties and motions of the elements and the stars, and the alterations, struggles and clashes of death and life, light and darkness, and heat and cold, are ordered and weighed with so sensitive a balance, so fine a measure, that the human mind can nowhere see any waste or futility, just as human science and philosophy see everywhere and point out the most perfect order and beautiful symmetry. indeed, human science and philosophy are a manifestation and interpreter of that order and symmetry.[841]

let us again consider the balance and order that exist within the system of the sun as well as in its twelve planets. Each one is reflecting as a mirror the justice of God. To be more specific, let us think, Nursi goes on with his illustration, of the speed of our globe, the earth and how it travels, like a ship, an orbit of 24,000 years in one year, without shaking or scattering any of the things stored therein. if its speed had been slightly changed, reduced or increased, then the outcome would have been unimaginably severe; it would have thrown off all its dwellers into the atmosphere and scattered them all through space. To put in a nutshell, if the just balance and equilibrium god has originally placed in the operation of the planets were to be changed a little or destroyed for a second, the whole universe would fall into ruin, like a doomsday.[842]

 The Manifestation of the Divine Justice in the Microcosm

in Nursi’s view, the phrase al-sirat al-mustaqim [the straight path] in the first chapter of the Qur’an signifies justice which consists of three major virtues; wisdom, chastity, and courage, all of which in turn represent the mean or the middle way among the three groups of human faculties or powers. The first group comprising sensual and bestial faculties attracts all that is beneficial for man. The second group consisting of the faculties pertaining to anger and passion repulses all that is harmful and destructive. The last group which includes rational and angelic faculties distinguishes between what is beneficial and what is harmful.

since god placed all of these faculties and powers in man without any limit, they may cause disequilibrium and imbalance in man’s actions, unless they are regulated and balanced by the divine law, which always enjoins the principle of moderation and the middle path (al-wasat) and forbids “excess” (ifrāt) and “deficiency” (tafrīt). if no limitation has ever been imposed on these aforementioned powers and faculties, man’s behavior, Nursi warns, would be unjust towards himself and others. in other words, in the employment of these faculties by man, Nursi further elaborates, there arise three possible situations; the first is deficiency or insufficient use of these faculties which results in negligence; the second one is unlimited use of the faculties which results in excess and extremism; and the third possibility is their moderate employment which yields justice. Any deficiency in the rational faculty or its inefficient employment, Nursi exemplifies, causes stupidity and foolishness on the part of man. on the other hand, any excess in that faculty or its unreserved use may lead to “erroneous results” and “deceptions” or “over-meticulousness in trivialities.” But its balanced employment yields justice and wisdom. That is why the Qur’an, the primary source of the divine law, never tires of reminding man of being moderate in all of his actions. “Pursue the middle path as you have been commanded” (hud 11:112) is one of these frequent reminders, as Nursi cites it on several places.[843] as it is seen, the manifestation of divine justice in the microcosmic world, therefore in the realm of human body, means, for Nursi, the equilibrium and harmony that man establishes within his faculties and powers through the assistance of the divine law. he also understands justice in this sense as following the middle path and moderation in all human actions.

 Maintenance of the Divine Justice

Nursi, towards the end of his exposition of god’s justice in creation, adopts, in today’s nomenclature, an environmentalist attitude, as if foreshadowing some of the genuine ecological concerns and challenges that humanity is presently facing.

He at first vehemently criticizes those who, being somehow oblivious of this extraordinary justice implanted by god in the world, act irresponsibly and show no respect for it and even violate it either inadvertently or knowingly.

he therefore warns man in the strongest term possible that he should not do injustice to all beings and all natural resources with his greedy and ambitious behavior. let us lend our ears to some of his admonitions on this important matter:

O profligate, extravagant, wrongful, unjust, polluted, impure, miserable man! Because you have not behaved in accordance with moderation, hygiene, and justice, all of which are principles governing the whole world and all beings, you have become the object of their wrath and hatred. on what ground [and how dare] do you incur the anger of all beings through your wrongdoing, imbalanced acts, wastefulness, and pollution? yes, the all-encompassing wisdom of the universe, resulting from the greatest manifestation of the name all-Wise (al-Hakim), operates within the realm of moderation and rejects waste, while commanding frugality (iktisad). likewise, the perfect justice in the universe, emanating from the greatest manifestation of the name all-Just (al-‘Adl), governs the balance and equilibrium of all things. as such, it enjoins justice on man.[844] as is seen, Nursi connects in a rather subtle manner the metaphysical divine justice that is observable in the nature with the ethical human justice that is expected to be effective in human behavior. he conceives the former as god’s bestowal of due balance and justice in the nature of all things out of his two great names, allWise and All-Just and also His subjecting them in the service and for the benefit of all human beings, whereas he formulates the latter as man’s full conformity with the requirements of the divine justice in adopting a conscious-moderate attitude towards all these justly created beings and things in the universe. That is to say, the divine justice first teaches man that in the original creation of everything there is no absurdity, futility, and wastefulness at all[845] and that everything is created in a well-balanced order, and then guides him, even if it does not compel him, as to how to conduct himself in order to maintain this original creation and balance as is. if man ever wastes, Nursi cautions, all of these freely given natural bounties of god and violates the principle of moderation which is in fact one of the most fundamental teachings of the divine wisdom and justice, he would not only act in a way entirely contrary to the reality of his life but also cause disequilibrium and corruption in the world. The Qur’an, therefore, never tires of reminding man to be moderate at all the time, as this verse alone sufficiently conveys it: “Eat and drink, but never waste.” (a‘raf 7:31)

Another significant yet mysterious aspect of the divine justice or eternal justice[846] is that in order to preserve all creatures and particularly living beings from the microscopic organisms to the largest animal god grants them what Nursi calls “the conditions for life” (şerait-i hayatiye), also well known as “the rights of life” (hukuk-u hayat). it means that god out of his compassion equips and empowers them with the necessary faculties and abilities but all “with perfect balance” and “within a mutual proportion and equilibrium” and with the aim at protecting the weak from the evil of the powerful. in one sense, the divine justice is universal; for it naturally covers all living beings, yet, in another sense it is partial, since it excludes wrongdoers.[847] again, because of such universal and eternal justice, good things always yield good results and bad things, always bad results.[848]

Be that as it may, for Nursi no one can escape from being captivated to such attractive wondrous beauty and immaculate balance as pervading the whole creation. even there is, he stresses further, a beauty within a beauty, a balance within a balance, and an order within an order. hence, all creatures from the most minuscule in size to the most gigantic in appearance stand shoulder to shoulder before the balance of justice. “if they were to lose their balance even for a split second, it would destroy the equilibrium of the world and doomsday would occur.”[849] in crystallizing his view, Nursi faithfully articulates the celebrated metaphysical doctrine of the Hujjat al-Islam al-Ghazali, which is briefly known as “most noble or most wonderful possibility” (al-imkan al-ashraf or al-abda‘) and which postulates explicitly the principle that “the world that actually exists is the most perfect of all possible worlds” and that “there is nothing in possibility more beautiful and more wonderful than what actually exists.” a doctrine as such has not only engendered serious debates in islamic philosophy and theology[850] but also inspired and influenced the theosophical views of many thinkers like Nursi who seems to have incorporated it into his current conception of “justice and balance” in creation. in fact, al-ghazali’s maxim just mentioned serves for him as an eloquent and rigorous translation of his conviction that the all-encompassing balance, the heart-captivating beauty, as well as the all-pervasive harmony within the existing world, are much brighter than even the light of the sun at noon.[851]

Because of its supreme importance, Nursi goes on to elaborate, god makes mention of the word “balance of justice” (mizan) four times in chapter 15 of the Qur’an, al-rahman: “and he has raised the skies high, and has he set up [for all things] the balance of justice, so that you [o men,] may not transgress that balance. so weigh, therefore, [your acts] with justice and fall not short in the balance of justice.” (al-rahman 55:7–9) What appears quite clear to Nursi from this verse is that everything in creation, whether big or small, concrete or abstract, tangible or immaterial, follows the principle of justice. There is neither excess nor deficiency in any of beings. nor yet is there injustice or imbalance in them at all. This is one of the truths that has been repeatedly underlined throughout the Qur’an and to which god has constantly drawn the attention of his servants, while reminding them to be more heedful of it and adopt it in their individual and collective lives. Moreover, it is impossible, according to Nursi, to destroy all of these truths, just as it not possible to destroy the universe.

Therefore, man, instead of interfering with the balance of justice in the world and attempting to manipulate it by his imbalanced and unrestrained acts, should exert his utmost effort in preserving it. For the lives of many creatures, including those of human beings, as well as their sound and healthy growth depend on the preservation of this godly given justice, which is, as remarked above, a mercy for all, and man’s compliance with it all the time. it is no one but man alone who, equipped by god with unlimited potentials and faculties, can destroy, because of his unconstrained greed and uncontrolled ambition, this extraordinary justice in the world, and turn it from a mercy and blessing into a misery and suffering. in fact, Nursi, being fully aware of the possible consequences of such irresponsible human behavior, persistently reminds us of our dignified position on this planet as the vicegerent of god (khalifa), inviting all of us to assume our duties and responsibilities as diligently as possible in accordance with the requirements of that noble post. By his overemphasis on the preservation of the god-given natural justice in the universe, Nursi somehow intimates that the accurate comprehension of all other forms of justice, ethical, social and political, as well as their adequate implementation depends on the acknowledgement of the former justice. if god’s all-encompassing justice in creation is given as a mercy for all beings, then man’s active participation in it would be equally a mercy for his own life and the lives of all others. in this sense, Nursi’s vision of justice is not only holistic but pragmatic, too, as it appeals man to be just and fair in his dealings with all and also urges him to take part in sustaining and maintaining the balance and justice in the world as god has originally invested in the natures of all as part of his mercy.

 17. Nursi’s compassion and Kant’s categorical imperative: Justice and ethics in Building a Better World

Ian Kaplow

Justice is an incredibly complex concept. Before i discuss ways in which justice may play a part in building a better world, it seems sensible to first understand what we mean by “justice.” i will sketch only a brief outline of the history of this concept in the course of the chapter. as a correlate, it would also be wise to discuss what we mean by “building a better world” – but this will breach the scope of this chapter. some of the questions, however, that need to be asked include: What does “better” mean? should “better” be understood as a property which we can attribute to the world (and what exactly do we mean by that?) in which the bounties of nature are sustained for all generations? in which the bounties of nature, but also the fruit of human production (from goods to capital) are distributed in such a way that everyone has what she requires and none must live below or beyond her means? or in which individual differences are not levelled for the sake of the “common good” but in which all people have equal starting conditions and chances for attaining what they want or need? in which every person may practice and follow her individual beliefs and tastes? in which the peoples and nations of the world live in peace with their neighbors?

even these relatively simple questions lead us back to concepts of justice. Justice is intertwined with the concept of a better world. To the questions above, most people would answer by making recourse to intergenerational justice, distributive justice, justice of equal chances, libertarian justice, or international institutional justice. It is difficult to understand how one can begin to conceptually distinguish what she means by “better world” without recourse to a form of justice.

The concept of Justice is probably as old as human language. We all know the feeling of the sense of injustice – this sense, many scientists in different disciplines have documented, is found in all cultures known to mankind, at least in its rudimentary, unreflected state.[852] The cry: “That’s not fair!” presupposes for its condition of utterance at the very least a sense (be it intuitive or otherwise unreflected) of justice. yet as common as the sense of injustice is, so also is its variance: even amongst one culture, individual conceptions of what is just or unjust differ vastly. When a person claims that some event or state is unjust, but another person claims that she is wrong, how do we know whom to believe?

attempts to answer these questions are as ancient as mankind itself. They are documented in our most treasured canons, such as the confucian analects, the Holy Qu’ran or the Bible. Yet quite obviously, the wisdom we find on the topic of justice here is neither systematic nor analytical; as a revealed text of holy scripture, the discourse on justice must be treated differently.[853]

Today, the concept of justice belongs to one of the most controversial and mostdiscussed topics in philosophy. its scope ranges from classical political rights theory (such as the debate on ius ad bellum and ius in bello) to social ethics (such as the debate on how to help those in need without “unjustly” sapping those who are not in need or who consider themselves not in need). having to oversimplify matters here greatly, i think one can say that views on justice tend to polarize around five main camps:

• contractualistic, hobbesian or quasi-utilitarian schools who see justice as a set of rules that rational individuals agree upon to further their own selfinterest.

• Teleological schools (often seen in the Platonic tradition) who see justice as the ordering principle of some final Good or Aim of all mankind.

• Conventionalism, which claims that what is due to an individual is defined by customs of that individual's community.

• Aristotelian or intuitionism, which may see justice as defined by empathic feelings we have for our other fellow human beings.

• Those who see justice as a type of "fairness" which sets a framework in which individuals are free to pursue their own idea of the good.

Let me state as shortly as possible my general stance. While almost all of these five main "schools" of viewing justice have their strengths, I find the last – justice as fairness – to be the most plausible for a number of reasons, some of which i hope will soon become apparent. My denial of contractualism and utilitarianism will soon become clear – here, it can be said that a concept of justice as a regulative moral principle becomes self-defeating if its goal is merely egoism. Teleological arguments all share the difficulty of having to make their own particular concept of the good plausible for all others, and i don't see how this can be done (outside of dogmatic recourse to revealed scripture). Conventionalism runs the risk of defining something as just which an unjust community sees as just – but this community would unjustly treat injustice as justice, which begs the question that we are trying to answer. intuitionism locates traditional recourse to the transcendent or the divine to the human intuition; unfortunately, intuitions are different and may not be universalizable, especially if there is a defect in our feelings.

Fairness, on the other hand, makes explicit reference to universalizable principles – it consists, one could say, of nothing else.[854] This idea of justice avoids the trap of having to formulate a teleological principle of goodness and is thus most adapt at encompassing debates on justice in our pluralistic world, since it explicitly makes tolerance of others' conceptions of the good a stabilizing principle of justice and thus a virtue in itself. it is, on the other hand, a relatively weak principle and its main tool – the so-called "veil of ignorance"[855] – requires much interpretation.

here, however, i will not be arguing for (or against) a particular view of justice, although i do hold a rawlsian position for one of the stronger ones. instead, i want to examine the situation in which justice comes into conflict with other ethically relevant moral principles. What happens, for instance, when in order to bring about a just situation, we feel that certain actions are necessary – but that these actions themselves may be morally reprehensible? is it "better" to forsake justice for the sake of a greater or ethical good?

While the questions were never posed in exactly this way, i think that both Said Nursi and immanuel Kant could give very good, and very similar, answers to them.

 Nursi on Compassion and Justice

The Concept of Compassion

For Said Nursi, compassion is seen as a concept which plays a large role in his teleological conception of the good – and hence, in a way which differs from modern rawlsianism, has direct links to a (teleological) conception of Justice. Nursi writes that in supplication to the compassion and Mercy of the almighty, one can become "a true human being and well-accepted guest of the all-Merciful one."[856]

But instead of following a teleological framework of justice in Nursian thought (which does seem to be apparant – see, for instance, the many passages on mankind’s aim and goal, such as in The Words, p. 368f. and elsewhere), i would like to examine a deontological one. For Nursi, compassion is not only a fundamental principle of islam, but a fundamental category of ethical relevance. Şükran Vahide demonstrates how Nursi “draws moral lessons” from the points he makes about compassion.[857]

Many of these points can be summed up in his feelings about harm done to innocents. This was a central point in Nursi’s life [ibid.]. We can see this in diverse areas of his writings. Nursi writes, “compassion, truth and right, and conscience, the fundamental way of the Risale-i Nur, severely prohibit us from politics and from interfering in government.”[858] By interfering in politics, innocents could be harmed, and this would have an immense impact against compassion, which tells us that innocents may not be harmed – even if this brings about a boon for a vast majority. Nursi says: “it is because of this compassion that i absolutely never interfere in government or disturb public order.”[859] Public order, it appears, is something which must be upheld in order to guarantee the well-being of innocents. This is why he puts great emphasis on “respect, compassion, refraining from what is prohibited, security, and the giving-up of lawlessness ... .”[860] understood in the context of his time, it is clear that Nursi can see no justification in the harming of innocents – compassion forbids us to let them suffer, for whatever particular reasons we may have, even if these seem to be “good” reasons. This – the avoidance of harm to others – is a principle which, it appears at first glance, even forbids us from making changes in the world, traditionally seen as the path to justice.

But what sort of justice would that have been? it is clear what Nursi does not mean. Nursi writes about the “law” he calls “basic to politics:” according to Nursi, it “may be expressed as ‘Individuals may be sacrificed for the good of the nation and for the well-being of the community’.”[861] Compassion vs. Consequentialism in other contexts, Nursi portrays this as a maxim which he attributes to Western philosophy. he is correct in considering its source as one aspect of Western philosophy, the one which has given Western thought a bad name – namely: classical utilitarianism. This form of thought has given rise to the infamous dictum: “The ends justify the means.” as i will be showing, the ends can never justify the means; this form of thought is simply false, and Nursi recognized it very early.

one current within utilitarianism is the doctrine that an action can be rightfully judged as morally satisfactory if its completion brings about more net happiness (or “goodness”) in the world. This simplistic form of consequentializm gives weight to some abstract quantities of happiness, both difficult to measure and absurd to construct. if i can make ten young poor people very happy if i murder a rich old woman and distribute her money amongst the poor and young, is it thus morally right if her death causes less sadness (or harm) than their net happiness (or benefit)? Many utilitarians would probably affirm this question. What if she were so fantastically rich that i could help 100 people – or 1000 or 1,000,000? What if she were terminally ill and had no friends? For the classic utilitarian, the answer seems clear: “More” people are helped by the sacrifice of one, and the value or loss of this one is made out to be small because of certain characteristics she possess, most notably her age and social standing.

Unfortunately, there is no way to quantify “net happiness” or “benefit” – but even if there were, this could not make what is repulsive morally right. as i will show, utilitarianism, at least in this form, is a dead end.

Without explicit reference to hobbes, Mill, Bentham or other traditional “fathers” of utilitarianism and rational egoism, Nursi has grasped that this consequentialistic principle cannot be used to define justice. he writes: “and, without his consent, an innocent person may not be sacrificed, even for the whole of mankind.”[862] Even if all of mankind may benefit, this does not allow the harming of innocents to be morally justifiable.

<right>

Nursi was correct to make philosophy, or at least a small segment of it, responsible for this misguidance. Thus when he writes that:

</right>

according to the principles of philosophy, power is approved. “Might is right” is the norm, even. it says, “all power to the strongest.” “The winner takes all,” and, “in power there is right.”[863]

Might doesn’t make right. Might makes for asymmetries by which rightness is hindered. Justice cannot be brought about by forcing one’s will upon another.

Compassion and Justice

Thus, compassion plays a direct role for Nursian Justice: The world would only seem to be a “better place” if this form of justice were to reign – an “apparent justice” only, as Nursi wrote.[864] it would lack, however, a central moral backbone and hence its richness and supposed happiness would rest on stolen goods – worse, on morally reprehensible goods, namely those taken by harming innocents. This is why Nursi writes: “one of the many other reasons for our avoidance [of political involvement] is one of the four principles of the Risale-i Nur, ‘to be compassionate, and not to act tyrannically nor cause harm.’ […] however, the rights of one innocent person may not be sacrificed because of a hundred criminals.”[865]

here and elsewhere, i think critical light need be thrown on the term “innocent” and what this means for determining who may be harmed under what conditions. yet leaving this aspect aside for the moment, let us conclude this section with the following summary: avoiding harming innocents is an ethical imperative in the Nursian understanding of morality and justice, an imperative which seems to carry the highest normative claim possible – a claim, in fact, which (at least at first glance) may seem to be at odds with claims to justice in building a better world, since our utmost moral imperative forbids us from radically altering the ordering framework of society no matter what supposed “benefits” mankind may reap from this interference.

To this apparent conflict I shall return in the last section of my chapter.

 Nursi and Kant: The Immortal Soul and the Categorical Imperative

Immanuel Kant

No one single thinker has influenced moral philosophy quite so radically as immanuel Kant. it is precisely the cold rationality of the consequentialist doctrine – that individuals may be sacrificed for the good of the whole – which caused Kant to break with the longstanding moral traditions of philosophy up to that point. Nursi seems to have internalized the insight into the moral repugnancy of consequentialism which led Kant on his search for a new ethical system. But how can Kant reach his conclusions without explicit reference to the Nursian concept of compassion?

Kant’s search begins with the dispatching of the old. The dangers of utilitarianism are demonstrated in typical reductio ad absurdum arguments.[866] Kant then asks: What principle can be the cornerstone of a system of ethics – the cornerstone of a system which enables people to judge which actions of theirs are justifiably permissible or forbidden? surely, he indicates [ibid], a principle which judges the ethical correctness of all possible actions must not be particular in nature; any principle which adheres to any particular value whatsoever risks setting this value – be it happiness, utility, love, security, health, a longer life, or what have you – up against all others in a way which may endanger these other values. if any principle may be able to fulfil this role, Kant argues, it must be a formal one – one which takes recourse to the very conditions of morality’s possibility and to these conditions alone. if ethics is to have any meaning whatsoever, if it is not a “mere illusion,”[867] then it must hinge on a principle which (1) has universal validity, so that no one single group or value is privileged and so that no exceptions to its rule can subsist, and that (2) is legitimized by recourse to ethical motivation itself. This principle Kant called the Categorical Imperative, because its validity is universal and it designates a “must,” a duty which is to be followed. in its most famous formulation, the imperative reads: “act in such a way so that the maxim of your action can function as a universal law.”[868] This principle is not hypothetical but universal; it hinges upon the fact that human freedom and rationality is required to make sense of actions as actions (as opposed, say, to mere trophic reflexreactions): We need to be able to choose which action to perform if our actions are to have any moral value (be it honorable or abhorrent), and we need to be able to choose according to laws or principles which we can communicate to others (as opposed, say, to a mere whim, or to being forced, or to a natural predisposition). But as a principle of the highest order, any ethical dictum would be subservient to hypothetical whim itself were it to claim utmost ethical importance – hence the categorical imperative’s recourse to human being’s ability to give laws alone: the categorical imperative makes no claim as to what those individual maxims may be (such as mercy or compassion), but only that human beings give themselves a law to which they must adhere. What law could this be? only this, Kant says: That the law be given from and obey rational freedom. nothing more and nothing less does the categorical imperative claim. This is why Kant’s so-called “second formulation” of the categorical imperative is said to say nothing more than the first, only in different words: “Act so that you treat all of humanity – both in your own self as well as each and every other person – as an end in itself, never merely as a means to an end.”[869] human beings, Kant rightly notes, are the only things on earth which have, in a strict sense, no value – their worth cannot be traded in for something else of “equivalent” value, since there is no other object of equivalent value; human beings are not things.[870] a human being is the only entity on earth which is able to freely choose a law to which it can bind itself out of adherence to duty; this status may not be made subservient to any other principle, “always as an end in itself, never merely as a means.”

Nursi on Innocents and Human Dignity

Nursi’s ideas on compassion seem to correspond strongly to the Kantian intuition. For Nursi, no action could be considered morally acceptable if, by carrying it out, innocents were to be harmed, no matter what other “benefits” were to be gleaned from that action. hence, the highest guiding principle of his rational choices – in other words, the ethical principle which was used to judge the maxims of his actions – entails recourse to a process of universalization according to which the worth of human beings as free entities is considered something which cannot be exchanged for any other value. in other words, Nursi upholds the categorical nature of human dignity represented in Kant’s second formulation of the categorical imperative: human beings are always ends in themselves, never merely means to ends.

Emotivism vs. Rationality?

Before i move on to the interplay of justice and morality and my key theses, i would like to at least mention one problem my comparison of Nursi and Kant must surely raise. in short, the backbone of what i am calling the Nursian ethical principle is compassion, and compassion might best be called a feeling. doesn’t this point to a distinction between the Kantian categorial imperative, whose workings is recognized by reason? Wouldn’t this tend to put Nursi, should his thought be systematized, into the fourth group of thinkers, those in the aristotelian tradition?

despite the connections i am drawing between Nursi and Kant, differences will surely remain. But if the connections i am drawing between them prove valid, then it could shed light on the way that aristotelianism and Kantianism are traditionally seen: Perhaps the recourse to other forms of cognition which Kant himself claimed is necessary in order to understand how the categorical imperative is applied – Kant refers explicitly to empirically tuned judgment, or “durch Erfahrung geschärfte Urteilskraft”[871] – are more important than some Kantians would like to claim, and that emotions, in general, need a more solid founding in universal reason than most aristotelians would like to claim. Perhaps the age-old gap between “feeling” and “rationality” is not quite as large as many make it out to be.

interestingly enough, Nursi seems to support this point as well. in my next section, i will dwell on the section of the Words in which Nursi praises the rational cognitive powers of just rulers such as solomon in establishing virtue as a precondition for Justice;[872] rationality, and not merely “feelings,” are necessary for the virtuous person. But Nursi also makes a different, and perhaps stronger point – and one which both Kant and hegel found to be central in moral upbringing. Nursi writes that in bringing about (negative) justice, “both the spirit, and the intellect, and the conscience, and man’s innate subtle faculties are affected and influenced.”[873] This is why just punishment is so effective, because it does not touch solely upon a wrongdoers “imagination” [ibid.], as do punishments in unjust societies. This shows that understanding virtue as the cornerstone to ethics and the precondition for justice (as i will demonstrate in my next section) can be more than merely emotive, both for aristotle and for Nursi as well as for Kant. i would also like to briefly return to this below.

 Justice and Morality in Building a Better World

Justice and the Pitfalls of Consequentialism

It may seem to be the case that a methodically justifiable system of ethics – such as Kantian ethics is – may be at odds with Justice in building a better world. This may seem to be the case because the concept of Justice often entails redistributing resources (goods, food, education, raw material, or other things) or restructuring society (so as to change political systems or to allow all of its members to have similar statuses) – and these are done, it is often said, according to principles of utility. Making the world a “better place” entails restructuring it in a “better” way. But which way is “better?” one person’s idea of “better” may not necessarily be another person’s idea of “better” – just this is the essence of Kant’s universalistic criticism of particularism. it opens the door to dogmatism, fundamentalism and intolerance.

While this really is a problem in formulating what people can (rightly, justifiably) consider to be “better” in the context of answering the question: “How can we make a better world?”, i do not think it is a cardinal problem of the concept of Justice. This is also not to say that the question, What does “better” mean in the context of making the world a “better place?” is impossible to answer, just that it is very difficult and must be careful to avoid particularism and the pitfalls of dogmatism, fundamentalism and intolerance.

Justice vs. Ethics

At least at first glance, Nursi seems to be saying just this: to live as a morally upright person, it is necessary to follow a categorical principle which forbids engaging in politics, at least in the sense of engaging in political activism which demands radical changes in society – changes, however, which may be necessary for making the world a “better” place, a just place. This may be what Nursi means when he says:

But these last thirty years, for the sake of acting positively and not acting negatively and not interfering in god’s concerns, i have responded with patience and resignation to all the treatment i have received.[874]

it seems that Nursi is indicating that ethics entails forsaking justice in this world for some form of justice in the hereafter. suffering now will be given its “just deserts” in the next world. Nursi says: “governing the injustices and misfortunes you suffer is the justice of divine determining.”[875] Further, he states: “our duty is to serve; its results are almighty god’s concern. We are charged with carrying out our duty, and are obliged to do so.”[876] Nursi seems to be saying that true, or at least affirmative justice can only be carried out by God; humans can be morally responsible subjects, but not active participants in creating affirmative justice. Thus Nursi writes:

[…] justice demands that the rights of subjects be preserved, so that the splendour of the state should not suffer. But here in this land, not a thousandth part of the requirements of such wisdom and justice is fulfilled; for example, empty-headed people such as yourself usually leave this realm unpunished. so again we say, matters are postponed for the consideration of a supreme Tribunal.[877] as i stated above, Nursi writes that the misled doctrine of “might makes right” cannot lead to Justice.[878] The philosophical principles he correctly identifies here are false. Nursi, however, expounds upon this and gives us a corollary truth; he writes:

The principle of prophethood says: “Power is in right; right is not in power.” it thus halts tyranny and ensures justice.[879] in other words, bringing about justice is a demonstration of power indeed. not anyone can be fit to exhibit it. But power alone does not justify anything – let alone justice itself.

Yet Nursi does, at one point, distinguish positive or affirmative justice from negative justice. of the former, he writes:

The positive variety consists in giving the deserving his right. [suum cuique, remark by i.K.] This form of justice exists throughout the world in the most obvious fashion, because, as proven in the Third Truth, it observably bestows, in accordance with special balances and particular criteria, all the objects of desire requested by everything from its glorious creator with the tongue of innate capacity, the language of natural need, the speech of necessity, and all the requirements of life and existence. This variety of justice is, then, as certain as life and existence itself.[880]

This form of justice is exemplified in and demonstrated by the harmonious perfectitude of creation.[881] This type of justice might even be likened to divine justice, since human beings can obviously not bring it about; while they may be honored to be viceregents in creation, they themselves cannot duplicate the almighty’s wonders. it is no wonder that this type of justice is beyond human ken.

negative justice, however, Nursi describes as consisting in “chastising the unjust; it gives wrongdoers their due by way of requital and punishment.”[882] This type of justice would most certainly require power, but not necessarily divine power. For this reason, Nursi can write that negative justice “is not fully manifest in this world,”[883] although we can see signs of it. Wrongdoers are not always punished by god, but sometimes they are, while at the same time wrongdoers may be punished by their fellow humans – and in doing so, these act justly. But this does not always happen, for any number of reasons. yet this type of justice may be something towards which mankind may strive as a type of ideal – to this i would like to return in my last section.

Justice as Secondary to Ethics

This may be one way of interpreting Nursi and/or Kant. it may not, however, be the only way. i think there is more room for interpretation – room in which, i think, Nursi would feel at home. To formulate it positively: Nursi and Kant could be interpreted to mean that justice is a secondary principle, subordinate to the ethical category. according to this interpretation, justice and morality may be distinct, but not necessarily mutually exclusive. Justice, or at least justice amongst fellow human beings living in this world, may be obtained if and only if human beings act in a morally upright fashion with and amongst one another. Morality, living according to the categorical imperative, would hence be a necessary condition without which justice could not be instigated; morality is thus the framework within which a better world, a just world, can begin to be built. according to this interpretation, the answer to the question: “how can we build a better world?” may be a multi-step process. First, we need to ask the questioner: what do you mean by “better?” if you mean “better social conditions, better political systems, better economic framework,” then you must ask yourself At what price? The price cannot entail purchasing this world at the cost of something which, in itself, has a “value” so absolute that it cannot truly be called value (because it has no equivalent price), but rather: absolute worth, or dignity. Building a better world must first be made by ensuring the basic conditions of human interaction, of ensuring the ethical virtues of tolerance, respect and peace. in other words: the world might seem to be better if certain – particular – conceptions of distributive or social justice were to be implemented, but this may be illusory: it would mean nothing if it were to exist in a framework of hatred, war, persecution, and disregard of human dignity and human rights.

i think this can be seen as a valid interpretation of the key importance of the categorical imperative in Kant’s thoughts as well as in modern interpretations of the applicability of justice. i also think it can be seen as a valid interpretation of Nursi’s understanding of justice and compassion. In a way, this is reflected in his statement regarding the type of virtues a just ruler must have:

if you wish to act with pure justice, endeavour to see and understand the face of the earth in all its details, like solomon. For, by rising to the level of being informed whenever he wishes about every part of his realm, a just ruler and king who cherishes his subjects will avoid inequity, and may rule with complete justice.[884] here, Nursi might be interpreted as meaning that a ruler must grasp the manifold interconnectedness of all worldly things in order to judge correctly, wisely and justly (like solomon did, to whom Nursi, following the sources, also attributed great powers which transcend mere physical causality in a way that indicate divine favor, namely: miracles [ibid.]). in other words, a ruler’s justness manifests itself not necessarily in the rectification of all social wrongnesses or in the vain attempt at divine mimicry, but in virtue won through cognitive enlightenment. This may also be an indication that compassion, as a key Nursian virtue, is not totally emotive, but at least in some way connected with rationality.

Justice is hence a feature which may be brought about in the world, but only under certain conditions, namely upon the condition of ethical virtue. ethics as a primary principle and condition upon which Justice may be built is thus virtuebased and, much like solomon’s legendary properties, cognitive. By grasping the nature of the entire world at once, one grasps the very foundation by which all things interact and interdepend upon one another – including reasons. This, perhaps, is why Nursi writes of solomon in this context: solomon’s worldencompassing wisdom allowed him to see past the mere particular and view the universal – much like the claim of Kant.

I would like to elucidate briefly with an anecdote of Nursi’s in the Damascus Sermon, in which Nursi describes how a nomad explains the effectiveness of just punishments in a just society to a foreigner. [885] Nursi correctly demonstrates that mere imagination of punishment is ineffective in curtailing crime, while true internalization of a deed’s wrongness – by the faculties of “the spirit, and the intellect, and the conscience,” as Nursi said, together with “man’s innate subtle faculties” – stop the potential wrongdoer from doing wrong before he completes the evil act. This is exactly how Kant pictured the development of moral behavior in a person who embraces the categorical imperative. Many researchers today make recourse to what they call the “categorical imperative processes” (or simply ciP), by which they mean the various cognitive processes by which a person attempts to determine whether the maxim of their potential action can be universalized as a law.[886] Much like the potential thief in Nursi’s anecdote, the potential wrongdoer in a Kantian society doesn’t confirm to some externally given law by means of his imagination of an external punishment, but rather is “restrained” (Nursi’s words) from acting wrongly because he understands and accepts the true law as just and valid, that is: his emotive inclinations to act wrongly are curtailed by other, higher and stronger cognitive elements, the faculties of which Kant took much time to differentiate. For Nursi, the internal acceptance and holistic cognitive understanding of the just law is central to its effectiveness, but also to its justness; this is exactly so with Kant, with the following difference: Nursi emphasized the source of the cognitive understanding as coming from revealed scripture and manifest in the shari‘ah, while Kant emphasized the autonomous nature of the source – that is, the very freedom to choose an action in accordance with (or conflicting with) the categorical imperative as a just law is called autonomy, the insight into one’s own lawgiving power. autonomy is freedom as self-lawgiving (from “auto” for “self” and “nomos” for law). Kant’s version of internalized cognition thus differs from Nursi’s in this respect.

This view of Justice is my interpretation of choice; I find it the most fitting and appealing. There may, however, be two other interpretations, one of them very close to this one and another somewhat more distinct. Let me first address the very closely related interpretation. Justice as Supervenient on Ethics according to this idea, answering the question: “how can we build a better world?” need not necessarily imply that justice and ethics be brought about in different steps, although they may be different entities. This could be seen as a “congruent” or a “supervenient” interpretation of justice and ethics. in other words, it would imply that “living ethically” or “being a morally upright, responsible agent” is the answer to the question: “how can we build a better world?” Building a better world would be brought about by being an ethically upright person. Justice would thus be equivocal to existing as an ethical agent, following the universal imperative to heed human dignity.

Justice as Free Rational Choice

concepts of justice have also been explicitly formulated in the Kantian tradition. instead of listing a value or set of values in answering the question: “What is just?”, philosophers in the Kantian tradition only take recourse to the conditions of being able to answer the question itself.[887] answering the question “What is just?” must hence entail a process by which human beings can freely choose in which society they would live and freely choose which laws they consider those which guide this society – without recourse to any benefit they may reap in society. This process of choice can only work, if the participants in such a process have no way of knowing which position they will hold in society – they cannot know, for instance, if in the society which they envision they would be masters or servants, oppressors or oppressed – and hence they could not rationally want to live in a society in which oppression exists. hence, participants in such a process would define justice in such a way so that no one would be subjected to the whims of another and so that no individuals be subjected to some abstract, general value which others may consider “good.” Nursi, it seems to me, could readily uphold this concept of justice. it avoids the traps Nursi identified in consequentialism – sacrificing individuals for the sake of the community, utilitarian calculations rather than the dignity of the human being – while allowing for a concept of justice in this world to be formulated. as a concept spawned from universalization and reciprocity, this concept of justice – like all Kantian concepts – shows fundamentalism and intolerance to be inherently reprehensible.[888]

 Closing Remarks

Western philosophy – or at least one of its greatest figures, Immanuel Kant – and Nursian thought are, as i have hoped to show, not as far apart as one might think. Nursi's conception of compassion is implemented in a way that demonstrates the apodictic-assetorical nature of the highest moral principle (of the Kantian system). This has implications for the way that justice needs to be understood in building a better world. Justice, if seen as a complex set of traits a society must have, cannot be established without first erecting the moral framework within which it can flourish; that moral framework is delineated by a single categorical imperative, insight into whose universalism Nursi gained by elucidating his view of compassion.

Justice can only be achieved in a framework of ethics. While my wording is that of Western philosophy, i think Nursi may embrace the thoughts presented within; perhaps, however, he might phrase them like this: The corrective to the common notion of Justice is called by Kant the categorical imperative, but its workings can be experienced as compassion, especially in the epistemological modus of submission. Kant attempted to systematize his understanding of a better world, the ideal of which he described as a "realm of ends;" for Nursi, a similar understanding emerges through revelation. Thus it may be the case that similar conclusions may be reached as to how to guide one's action in a morally upright way, as to what the "greater good" is according to which we judge maxims of action, as to what Justice is and how we must act accordingly to build a better world – similar conclusions, but different paths leading to them.

in other words, there may be different methods of attaining universal truths witnessed by these two great thinkers but, simultaneously, a language by means of which both of these methods may be expressed and made understandable to one another. Kant and Nursi use different words and different methods, but come to similar thoughts.

This, i think, has great impact both on understanding great thinkers as well as on interdisciplinary and inter-faith dialogue.

 Bibliography

abu-rabi‘, i. ed., Islam at the Crossroads (albany: state university of new york Press, 2003).

———, ed., Spiritual Dimensions of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s Risale-i-Nur (albany: state university of new york Press, July 2008).

al-‘azm, s. “islamic Fundamentalism reconsidered: a critical outline of Problems, ideas, and approaches, Part ii.” South Asian Bulletin 13 no. 2 (1993): 73–98.

Al-Ash‘arī, A.H. Kitāb Maqālāt al-Islāmiyyīn, ed. Muh□yiddīn ‘A. al-Ḥamīd (Cairo: Maktaba al-Nahd□a al-Mis□riyya, 1950).

alatas, s.h. Intellectuals in Developing Societies (london: Frank cass, 1977).

———, Kita Dengan Islam (islam and us: growing without Fruiting) (singapore: Pustaka nasional, 1979).

al-ghazali, a.h. Al-Iqtis□ad fī al-‘Itiqād (Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiya, Beirut, 1983).

———, Ihyā ‘Ulūm al-Dīn, Turkish trans. Ahmet Serdaroğlu (Bedir Yayınları, istanbul, 2002).

———, Kitāb al-Arbaīn fī Us□ūl al-Dīn (Dār al-Shāmiya, Beirut, 2002).

Al-Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa’l-Nih□al, eds Emir ‘Ali and ‘Ali Ḥasan (Beirut: Dār al-Mārifa, 1993).

Al-Taftāzānī, S.D. Sharh□ al-‘Aqāid al-Nasafī, ed. Ah□mad H□. Al-Saqā (Cairo: Maktaba al-Kulliyā al-Azhariya, 1988).

———, Sharh□ al-Maqāsid, ed. ‘Abd al-Rah□man Amīra (Beirut: ‘Alam al-Qutub, Beirut, 1989).

———, Sharh□ al-Talwīh□ ‘ala al-Tawd□īh□, ed. Zakariya ‘Amīrāt (Beirut: Dār alKutub al-‘İlmiya, 1996).

Al-T□ūsī, Nās□ir, D. Talkhīs□ al-Muh□assal (Tehran: Dār al-Ad□vā, 1985).

apel, W. Signs of Peace: The Interfaith Letters of Thomas Merton (Maryknoll, ny: orbis Books, 2006).

asin, M. Islam and the Divine Comedy (new delhi, 2002).

Ayd□n, M. “The Problem of Theodicy in the Risale-i Nur” in Abu-Rabi‘, I. (ed.) Islam at the Crossroads: On the life and thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 1996).

ayoub, Mahmoud. “islamic concept of Justice,” Islamic Identity and the Struggle for Justice, eds n.h. Barazangi, M.r. Zaman, o. afzal (gainesville: university Press of Florida, 1996).

Bacigalupo, M. The Formed Trace: The Later Poetry of Ezra Pound (new york, 1980).

Bellah, r.n. Beyond Belief: Essays on Religion in a Post-Traditional World (new york: harper & row, 1970).

Berkes, n. The Development of Secularism in Turkey (Montréal: Mcgill university Press, 1964).

Bowker, J. Problems of Suffering in Religions of the World (cambridge: cambridge university Press, 1970).

Burrell, d. Knowing the Unknowable God: Ibn-Sina, Maimonides, Aquinas (u. notre dame Press, 1986).

Buti, s.r. “Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s experience of serving islam by Means of Politics.” in Third International Symposium on Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 1997).

Çelebi, ilyas, “İvaz”, Diyanet İslam Ansiklopedisi (DİA), (Istanbul, 1996).

chande, a. “suffering” in leaman, o. (ed.) The Qur’an: An Encyclopedia (london: routledge, 2000). chinitz, d.e. T.S. Eliot and the Cultural Divide (chicago: university of chicago Press, 2005). chittick, W.c. “eschatology,” Islamic Spirituality: Foundations I, ed. s.h. nasr (new york: crossroad Publishing company, 1991).

christiaan Beker, J. The Triumph of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990).

Çinar, a. Modernity, Islam, and Secularism in Turkey: Bodies, Places, and Time (Minneapolis: university of Minnesota Press, 2005). darwin, d. The Autobiography of Charles Darwin, ed. nora Barlow (new york: W.W. norton, 1967).

deane, s.n. trans. St. Anselm: Basic Writings (la salle, il: open court classics, 1962). duben, a. and cem Behar. Istanbul Households: Marriage, Family, and Fertility, 1880–1940 (cambridge: cambridge university Press, 1991).

eickelman, dale F., and James Piscatori. “social Theory in the study of Muslim societies.” in Muslim Travellers: Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination, ed. dale F. eickelman and James Piscatori (Berkeley and los angeles: university of california Press, 1990).

eliot, T.s. The Waste Land, in: Collected Poems 1909–1962 (london 1963).

Fitzgerald, a.d., ed., Augustine Through the Ages (grand rapids: eerdmans Publishing, 1999).

Flasch, T. Eva und Adam: Wandlungen eines Mythos (Munchen: Beck, 2004).

Frank, d. and leaman, o. eds, History of Jewish Philosophy (london: routledge, 1996).

Frierson, e.B. “gender, consumption, and Patriotism: The emergence of an ottoman Public sphere.” in Public Islam and the Common Good, ed. armando salvatore and dale F. eickelman (leiden: Brill, 2004).

Fromkin, d. A Peace To End All Peace: The Fall of the Ottoman Empire and the Creation of the Modern Middle East (london 2000).

Fuller, l.l. The Morality of Law, revised edition (new haven: yale university Press, 1969).

Ghazālī, A.H. al-Iḳṭısad fī al-‘Itikād (Beirut: Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiye, 1983).

———, Kitāb al-Arbaīn fī Usūl al-Dīn (Beirut: Dār al-Shāmiya, 2002). goldziher, i. The Zahiris, trans. Wolfgang Behn (leiden: Brill, 1971).

halpern, M. The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa (Princeton: Princeton university Press, 1963).

hick, J. (1989) An Interpretation of Religion (london: Macmillan, 1997). hick, John, “Evil and the God of Love” (new york: harper and row, 1978). huizinga, J. Men and Ideas (new york: harper Torchbooks, 1959).

hume, d. Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, ed. nelson Pike (indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970).

ibn Khaldun. Muqadimmat Ibn Khaldun (Beirut: dar al-Qalam, 1378/1981).

———, The Muqadimah: An Introduction to History. Franz rosenthal, trans.

(london and henley: routledge & Kegan Paul, 1967).

ibn rushd. The Distinguished Jurist’s Primer (reading: garnet, 1996).

Ibn Sīnā, Al-Ilāhiyāt, www. al-mostafa.com.

Jones, a. Early Arabic Poetry: volume two: Select Odes (oxford: ithaca Press, 1996).

Jones, g. Critical Theology: Questions of Truth and Method (cambridge, 1995).

Jurjānī, ‘A.M. Sharh al-Mawāqif (Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiya, Beirut, 1981).

———, Al-Ta‘rifāt, ed. M. ‘Abd al-Hakīm al-Qādī (Cairo: Dar al-Kitab al-Masri, 1991).

Keane, J. “The limits of secularism,” Times Literary Supplement, January 9, 1999.

Khadduri, Majid. The Islamic Conception of Justice (Baltimore: The Johns hopkins university Press, 1984).

Khalidi, T. Classical Arab Islam (Princeton: The darwin Press, 1985).

Kirli, c. “coffeehouses: Public opinion in the nineteenth-century ottoman empire.” in Public Islam and the Common Good, ed. armando salvatore and dale F. eickelman (leiden: Brill, 2004).

Kutluer, İlhan. “Gâiyyet”, Diyanet İslam Ansiklopedisi (DİA), (istanbul, 1996). lerner, d. The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East (new york: Free Press, 1964).

little, d. “The development in the West of the right to Freedom of religion and conscience: a Basis for comparison with islam.” in Human Rights and the Conflict of Cultures: Western and Islamic Perspectives on Religious Liberty, ed. david little, John Kelsay, and abdulaziz a. sachedina (columbia: university of south carolina Press, 1988).

Madan, T.n. “secularism in its Place,” Journal of Asian Studies 6 (1987): 747–59.

Mardin, Ş. Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 1989).

Masud, M. “The scope of Pluralism in islamic Moral Traditions.” in The Many and the One: Religious and Secular Perspectives on Ethical Pluralism in the Modern World, ed. richard Madsen and Tracey B. strong (Princeton: Princeton university Press, 2003).

Masud, M.K. Shatibi’s Philosophy of Islamic Law (islamabad: islamic research institute, 1995).

Mcauliffe, J.d., ed. Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an (leiden: Brill, 2002).

Mcdonald, r.r. The Burial Places of Memory: Epic Underworlds in Virgil, Dante, and Milton (amherst, 1987).

Mcgrath, alister e. An Introduction to Christianity (oxford: Blackwell, 1997).

Mermer, yamina B., The hermeneutical Dimension of Science, international symposium (4), (istanbul, 1998).

Merton, T. No Man is an Island (london: hollis and carter, 1951).

———, Life and Holiness (new york: doubleday, 1963).

———, Contemplation in a World of Action (london: allen and unwin, 1971).

———, Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander, second edn (london: sheldon, 1977).

———, Thoughts in Solitude (Boston: shambala Publications, 1993).

———, Ascent to Truth (london: Burns & oates, 1994).

———, Thoughts on the East (new york: new directions, 1995).

———, Life and Holiness (new york: doubleday, 1996).

Metzger, B.M. and Michael d. coogan, eds, The Oxford Companion to the Bible, ed. Bruce M. Metzger and Michael d. coogan (new york: oxford university Press, 1993).

Michel, T. “Muslim-christian dialogue and cooperation in the Thought of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi,” Muslim World 86: 3–4 (July–october, 1999).

Moltmann, J. Theology of Hope: On the Ground and the Implications of a Christian Eschatology, trans. James W. leitch (new york: harper & row, 1967, 1975).

———, The Crucified God: The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, trans. from the second german, ed. r.a. Wilson and John Bowden (1974).

———, God in Creation: A New Theology of Creation and the Spirit of God, The Gifford Lectures 1984–85, trans. Margaret Kohl (san Francisco: harper & row, 1985).

———, The Coming of God: Christian Eschatology, trans. Margaret Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996).

———, In the End—The Beginning: The Life of Hope, trans. Margaret Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2004).

Mosher, l.a. “The Marrow of Worship and the Moral Vision: Said Nursi,” in ibrahim M. abu-rabi (ed.), Islam at the Crossroads. On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany, ny: state university of new york Press, 2003).

Munadjdjid, s.d. Le Concept de Justice Social en Islam (Paris: editions Publisud, 1982).

Murphy, n. “The resurrection Body and Personal identity,” in Resurrection:

Theological and Scientific Assessments (grand rapids: eerdmans, 2002).

Musil, r. The Man Without Qualities (london, 1979).

nasr, s.h. A Young Muslim’s Guide to the Modern World (chicago: KaZi, 1994).

nereid, c. In the Light of Said Nursi: Turkish Nationalism and the Religious Alternative, Bergen studies on the Middle east and africa 4 (Bergen, norway: centre for Middle eastern and islamic studies, 1997).

Nursi, B.Z. al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī al-Nūrī, ed. Ihsan Q. al-Salihi (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 1994).

———, Ishārāt al-I‘jāz fi Mazānn al-Ijāz, ed. Ihsan Q. al-Salihi (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 1994).

———, The Flashes Collection, The Twenty-Eighth Flash (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 1995).

———, Risale-i Nur Kulliyati (istanbul: nesil yayinlari, 1996).

———, Letters 1928–1932, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat Ticaret ve Sanayi A.Ş., 1997).

———, Al-Kalimat (istanbul: sozler, 1419/1998).

———, Epitomes of Light (Mathnawi al-Nuriye): The Essentials of the Risale-i Nur (izmir, Turkey: Kaynak, 1999).

———, The Flashes Collection, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Reyhan Ofset a.s., 2000).

———, Letters 1928–1932, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler, 2001).

———, The Words: On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life and All Things, revised edition (istanbul: sozler Publications, 2002).

———, The Words. On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life, and All Things, translated by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler, 2004).

———, Signs of Miraculousness: The Inimitability of the Qur’an’s Conciseness, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, A.S., 2004).

———, The Flashes Collection, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler, 2004).

———, The Rays Collection, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler, 2004).

———, Al-Mathnawi Al-Nuri: Seedbed of the Light, translated by huseyin akarsu (somerset, new Jersey: The light, 2007). Nursi, Bediuzzaman said. Nature: Cause or Effect? translated from the Turkish by Ümit Şimşek (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yanıları, 1985).

———, Muhākamāt al-‘Aqliyya (in Sayqal al-Islāmiyya), Ninth Muqaddima (Istanbul: Sözler Publication, 1995).

———, The Flashes Collection, From the Risale-i Nur Collection 3 (istanbul: Sözler, 2004).

———, The Words: On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life, and all Things (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 2004).

———, Emirdağ Lahikası (Söz Basım Yayın, Istanbul, 2006).
———, Kastamonu Lahikası (Söz Basım Yayın, Istanbul, 2006).
ormsby, e. Theodicy in Islamic Thought: The Dispute over al-Ghazali’s “Best of All Possible Worlds” (Princeton: Princeton university Press, 1984).

———, “The Taste of Truth: the structure of experience” in al-ghazali’s Munqidh min al-Dalal, in Islamic Studies presented to Charles J. Adams (leiden, 1991).

———, İslam düşüncesinde İlâhî adalet (Teodise) Sorunu (Theodicy in Islamic Thought, The dispute over al-Ghazāli's "Best of All Possible Worlds"), Turkish trans. M. Özdemir (Kitabiyat, ankara, 2001).

———, "Said Nursi's Project of revitalizing contemporary islamic Thought," in ibrahim M. abu-rabi', ed., Islam at the Crossroads (albany: suny Press, 2003).

———, al-ghazali, The Revival of Islam (oxford: oneworld, 2008).

o'shaugnessy, T. Muhammad's Thoughts on Death: A Thematic Study of the Qur'anic Data (leiden: e.J. Brill, 1969).

Paige, d.d., ed., Selected Letters of Ezra Pound (new york, 1971).

Pamuk, o. Istanbul: Memories of a City (london, 2005).

Pegis, anton c., ed. Introduction to St. Thomas Aquinas: The Summa Theologica, The Summa Contra Gentiles (new york: The Modern library, 1945).

Phillips, d.Z. Death and Immortality (london: Macmillan, 1970).

Placher, W.c. A History of Christian Theology: An Introduction (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983).

Polkinghorne, J. Quarks, Chaos & Christianity: Questions to Science and Religion (new york: crossroad, 1994).

———, “eschatology: some Questions and some insights from science,” in Polkinghorne and Welker, eds, The End of the World and the Ends of God (harrisburg, Pa: Trinity Press, 2000).

Qaradawi, y. al-Sabr fi al Qur’an (cairo: Maktaba al-Wahba, 1989).

Qutb, s. Social Justice in Islam (new york: islamic Publications international, 2000). rahman, F. “islam’s origin and ideals,” Islamic Identity and the Struggle for Justice, eds n.h. Barazangi, M.r. Zaman, o. afzal (gainesville: university Press of Florida, 1996).

———, Major Themes of the Qur’an (Minneapolis: Bibliotheca islamica, 1980). ramsey, M. The Christian Priest Today, new revised edition (london: sPcK, 1985).

rumi, J.d. The Mathnawi of Jalau’ddin Rumi, eight vols; ed., and trans. reynold

a. nicholson (london: luzac, 1925–40).

russell, B. “a Free Man’s Worship,” in Mysticism and Logic (london: longman, 1919).

———, “Why i am not a christian.” Taken from the website http://www.positiveatheism.org/hist/russell0.htm

Sayers, D. “Muslim theodicy as reflected in Turkish media reactions to the 1999 earthquake,” Studies in Contemporary Islam, 3,1 (2001).

Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa’l-Nihal, ed., Emir Ali and Ali Hasan (Beirut: Dār alMārifa, 1993). shils, e. The Intellectuals and the Powers (chicago: university of chicago Press, 1972).

sicari, s. Pound’s Epic Ambition: Dante and the Modern World (albany: state university of new york Press, 1991).

smith, J.i. and yvonne yazbeck haddad. The Islamic Understanding of Death and Resurrection (albany: state university of new york Press, 1981).

stowasser, B.F. Women in the Qur’an, Traditions, and Interpretation (new york:

oxford university Press, 1994).

sutherland, s.r. “What happens after death?” Scottish Journal of Theology 22 (1969).

sweetman, J.W. Islam and Christian Theology: A Study of the Interpretation of Theological Ideas in the Two Religions (london: lutterworth Press, 1945). swinburne, r. The Existence of God (oxford: clarendon Press, 1979).

Tabari, a. The History of al-Tabari, vol. I: General Introduction and From the Creation to the Flood, ed. ehsan yar-shater, trans. and annotated by Franz rosenthal (albany: state university of new york Press, 1989).

Taftāzānī, A. Sharh al-‘Akāid al-Nasafī (Cairo: Maktaba al-Kulliyāt al-Azhariya, 1988).

———, Sharh al-Makāsıd (Beirut: ‘alam al-Kutub, 1989).

Tahānawī, M. Kashshāf Istilāhāt al-Funūn, 4 vols (Beirut: Dār al-Kutub al‘ilmiyyah, 1418/1998).

Ünal, ali. The Resurrection and the Afterlife (Virginia: Fountain, 2000).

Vahide, Ş. Bediuzzaman Said Nursi: The Author of the Risale-i Nur, second edn (Istanbul: Sölzer, 1998).

———, trans., A Supplication of the Prophet Muhammad (Peace and blessings be upon him): Al- Jawshān al-Kabīr (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 2003).

———, “a chronology of Said Nursi’s life” in Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, edited with an introduction by ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ (albany: suny Press, 2003).

———, “Toward an intellectual Biography of Said Nursi,” Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzamen Said Nursi, ed. ibrahim abu-rabi’ (albany: state university of new york Press, 2003).

———, Islam in Modern Turkey: An Intellectual Biography of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 2005).

Viladesau, r. and Mark Massa, eds, Foundations of Theological Study: A Sourcebook (new york: Paulist Press, 1991).

Volf, M. “enter into Joy! sin, death, and the life of the World to come,” in John Polkinghorne and Michael Welker, eds, The End of the World and the Ends of God (harrisburg: Trinity Press, 2000).

Watt, M. ed., (Richard) Bell’s Introduction to the Qur’an, second edn (edinburgh university Press, 1970).

White, Jenny B. Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics (seattle: university of Washington Press, 2002).

Zamakhshari, M. Al-Kashshaf ‘an haqa’iq ghawamid al-tanzil (Beirut: dar al-Kitab al-‘arabi, 1966).

 Index

‘Abd al-Qadīr al-Gilānī, 55

‘abduh, Muhammad, ix

‘ad, 223 ‘ali bin abi Talib, 136 abdul razeq,Mustafa, ix abraham, 129, 143, 176, 177 abu-rabi‘, ibrahim, ix, 69, 81, 100 aceh, 219 adam, 15, 176

adam’s Fall from grace, 16 expulsion from paradise, 15 his vicegerent on earth, 16

aeneas, 170–73 al-afghani, Jamal al-din, ix al-ash‘ari, 12, 16, 113n10 Al-Ghazālī, x, 55, 67, 114n15, 119n42, 151, 155, 156, 158, 227, 238 al-hashr (the resurrection in afterlife), 74, 77, 81, 227. See also resurrection in afterlife al-hudhali, abu dhu’ayb, 148, 149, 150,

152, 156

Al-Jurjānī, 53n1, 112n1, 125, 127, 228n5 al-Muhyī (the life-giver), 55, 56, 57, 65 al-Mumīt (the death-causer), 55, 56, 65 al-razi, Fakhr al-din, 12, 43 al-shahid al-Thani, 147, 148n2, 150, al-shatibi, abu ishaq, 144 al-Tabari, abu Ja’far Muhammad ibn Jarir,

151–8

3, 10, 11 al-Tafsir al-kabir, 12 Al-Taftāzānī, 112n2, 113, 114 al-Zamakhshari, Mahmud ibn umar, 11–12, 151 andalusia, 144 angels, 3, 8, 12, 15, 42, 73, 116, 119, 234 existence of angels, 119

animal Pain, 111

in islamic thought, 112–14 in Nursi’s approach, 127–33 ankara, 162, 163

anselm of canterbury, 79 aquinas,Thomas, 79, 80, 85, 165 arabian Peninsula, 178 areopagus, 29 aristotle, 175, 249 Ascent to Truth, 200 atatürk, 22, 25, 99, 101 atheism, 23, 109, 131, 197, 213, 215, 217 augustine, Bishop of hippo, 2, 8, 9, 109 averrhoes, 175 avicenna, 175

Barla, 101, 156, 163, Beker, J. christiaan, 85 belief in life after death, 19, 26 Bellah, robert, 142

Benjamin, Walter, 104

Bible, 1, 2, 6, 10, 37, 102, 107, 242

British, 102, 144 empire, 100 philosophy, 19

Brothers Karamazov, 24, 147 Burrell, david, 85

canetti, ellias, 164n20, 178 caucasia, 144 christ, 8, 9, 79, 87, 92, 96–7, 103–2, 107–9, 110, 171, 176, 177, 197, 201, 205 body of christ, 91, 204 christ’s death, 8 christ’s descent, 171 christ’s redemption, 1, 9 christian theology, 1, 2, 8 adam and eve, 2, 8 christianity, 9, 194, 197

eve, 9 original sin, 8 the resurrection of the dead, 29, 96 christ’s redemption. See christ church of england, 199 creation, 25, 37, 40, 44, 207, 210 the second creation, 44, 73 god’s creation of humanity, 1 in Bible, 6 in Qur’an, 3, 10 in the Works of Nursi, 13–16, 217, 224 purposes in the creation, 116 creator, 22, 23, 51, 224

daedalus, stephen, 178 dante alighieri, i, 162, 166–8, 173, 174, 177, 178 darwin, 21, 27, 130 causes of death, 60 contemplation of death, 65 death, 8, 14, 15, 19, 53–60, 63 day of Judgment, 3, 38, 40, 206 Divine Comedy, 162, 166, 173, 177 divine names and attributes, 13–15, 39, 43, 44, 46–9, 56–9, 62–3, 115, 119,

</right>

122–5, 127, 133, 207, 213 dostoevsky, 147

earthquake, 131, 219–25 egypt, 144, 148 einstein, albert, 102 eliot, T.s., 162–6, 173–8 epicurus, 148 epistle to the hebrews, 37 erzincan, 219 eschatologically, 89 eternal Punishment, 40, 97, 106, 108 eternal reward, 29 eve, 1–3, 6–10, 16. See also hawwa evil, xi, xii, 1, 2, 21 in the Bible, 6–9 in the Qur’an, 3, 5 in the Works of Nursi, 13–16, 24, 27, the acquisition (kasb) of evil, 15

234

evolution, 21

Fall of Man, 8

Final judgment, 29–30, 32–3, 37, 39–40,

105, 221

First World War, 160–62, 165, 178

Fitzgerald, 178

Free Will, 1, 8, 11–12, 15–16, 125–6, 132, 202

Freedom of choice, 1

Fuller, lon l., 137–9

garden of eden, 6 gillman, neil, 87 goethe, 102 gospels, 25, 96 great gathering, 35, 37, 39–40 greek philosophy, 12 gregory the great, 79

Habbah, 72

Hafız Halid Efendi, 154 hawwa, 10–13. See also eve heaven, 14, 58, 96 hell, 9, 14, 25, 48, 94–5, 109–10, 113, 169,

171–2, 187 hereafter, xii, 22–6, 35, 37, 42–9, 51–2,

<right>

54–5, 63, 67, 70–78, 90, 101, 114,

</right>

133–4, 154–5, 182, 187–8, 211,

215, 223, 250 hick, John, 130n111 holocaust, 24, 102 homer, 167–70 horace, 175 hud, the prophet, 221 Hujjat al-Islam, 238 hume, david, 148 Huzun, 159

iblis, 1, 3–4, 10–13. See also satan ibn al-‘arabi, 55, 227 ibn hazm, 152 ibn sina, 41, 156, Ihya’ ’ulum al-din, 151, 155 ijtihad, 184, 193 imam ‘ali, 189 Imam Rabbānī, 55 india, 144 indonesia, 219 interfaith dialogue, 83, 144 intermediate world (barzakh), 55 iqbal, Muhammad, ix islamic theology, ix, 54, 61

medieval, 2, 11

Jabriyya (Predestinationists), 16 Jahiliyya, 148, 154, 158

Jawshān al-Kabīr, 78

|

Jesus christ. See christ

Jewish scripture, 107

Jewish theology, 2

John of damascus, 79

Judaism, 8–9, 111, 172

Justice of god, 1, 230–31, 233, 235

Kafka, 178

Kant, immanuel, i, 243, 246–9, 251–5

Kastamonu, 225

Katre (A Droplet), 163

Khidr, 33, 57–8

Kingdom of heaven, 203

Kurdish, 137, 147n1

Lā Siyyamā (in Particular), 69–72 last day, 29, 33, 77–8 laws, 5, 51, 117 creational laws, 126 dominical laws (kavânîn-i rubûbiyet), 51 universal laws, 117–18, 124, 126, 134,

229, 234, 247 lévi-strauss, claude, 137 lot, the prophet, 221 lucan, 175

Madrasa nuriyya, 147

Mafatih al-ghayb. See al-Tafsir al-kabir

Manifest World (Âlem-i Şehâdet), 43, 90, 157

Mardin, serif, 102, 145–6

Marxist, 24

Mary, the mother of Jesus, 9, 211

Materialism, x, 197, 199, 217

Mathnawi al-Nuriye, 69, 70, 72, 80

Mcgrath, alistair, 81

Mecca, 135, 219

Merton, Thomas, i, 197–98, 202–6, 217–18

Middle east, 135, 140, 178

Modernism, 160, 167, 178,

Modernity, ix, 104, 135–6, 139–46, 164,

171

Moltmann, Jürgen, 87, 93, 99, 103

Morality, 3, 15, 32, 91, 96, 135–9, 141–5,

194, 198, 246, 248–9, 251

Moses, 29, 143, 176

Muhammad, the prophet, xi, 5, 14, 25, 27,

29–30, 38, 42, 44, 51, 66, 70, 72,

106, 133, 143, 182, 190, 194, 210,

212–13

Murphy, nancey, 86, 88, 90

Muslim World, ix, x, 135, 141, 143–4,

191–3, 195

Mustafa Kemal atatürk. See atatürk

Mu’tazilite, 11–12, 113–14, 151–4, 157 Mylae, 66–7

natural disasters, 111, 219–21, 225–6 nature of mankind, 1 nazis, 102 new said, x, 41, 66, 69, 142, 163, 174 new Testament, 8, 9, 107–8 nietzsche, 102, 171 noah, the prophet, 133, 176, 221, 223 Nursi, Bediuzzaman said, i, ix, 2, 10, 12, 16, 19, 22, 27, 30, 33, 41, 52, 69,

80, 147–8, 151, 154, 158, 160, 163,

182–90, 197, 219–26, 243

Odyssey, 167–8 old said, 41, 50, 66, 100, 142 origin of evil, 1, 2, 3, 6–9, 10, 13, 16 original sin, 2, 5, 8 ottoman, x, xi, 99, 100, 140, 161 ovid, 175

Paley, William, 26

Pamuk, orhan, 159–60, 166

Paul, the apostle, 8–9, 15, 90, 96

Perkins, Pheme, 86

Philosophy of religion, 19

Placher, William, 79

Planck, Max, 102 Plato, 174–5, 242

Polkinghorne, John, 78

Pound, ezra, 162, 164, 178

Prayer, 11, 49, 52, 92, 178–9, 188, 198,

200–214, 218

Prophethood (al-nubuwwah) 227 Prophet ilyas, 57

Qarun, 223 Quraysh, 29, 33

rahman, Fazlur, 143 ramsey, Michael, 198 rebellion of iblis, 3 resurrection, 14, 22–3, 25, 29–40, 42–53, 58, 69, 73–4, 76–80, 83–98,

99–107, 108–10, 113–14, 161–3,

169–74, 177–9, 210, 227 resurrection of the dead, 29, 34–9, 40–43, 45–9, 50–52, 99, 101, 103,

104–10, 161, 163, 170–72, 174,

177–9

resurrection of the soul, 33 revelation, 5, 25, 27, 39, 55, 79, 85, 109,

110, 121, 142–3, 197, 255 rida, rashid, ix

Risale-i Nur, ix, 13, 16, 22, 25, 30, 32–4, 38, 41, 42, 44–6, 50–52, 81, 101,

111–12, 116, 120, 135–7, 139,

141–5, 156, 160, 182–3, 198,

218–20, 224–5, 227, 243–5 rorty, richard, 141 rumi, Jalal al-din, 55, 57, 227 russell, Betrand, 19–22 russian prison camp, 163 rustem Pasha, 147

sadiq al-‘azm, 135 salih, 221 satan, 1–5, 7–8, 10, 16, 68, 130, 208, 233–4 second Vatican council, 142, 144 shari‘ah, x, 138–9, 182–4, 186, 188–94 shi’ite, 154–3 shuayb, 221 sicari, stephen, 171, 178 sin, 1–3, 5, 8–9, 11–12, 17, 37, 96, 109, 170, 176, 206, 208, 221–6. See also evil smith, adam, 138 social Justice, 199, 201, 203–9, 252 soul, 84, 79, 84, 87–91, 93, 100, 106, 124,

134, 178–9, 246 suffering, 24, 103, 109, 147, 152, 225 Sufism, 212–14

Sulayman the Magnificent, 147

Summa Theologiae, 79 Sunna, 186, 190 swinburne, richard, 27

Tabari. See al-Tabari

Tawhid (monotheism), 118, 227

Tenth Word, 19, 22, 30, 46, 52, 80, 93, 104,

162, 166, 171–2, 174, 178, 209

Thamud, 187, 223

Theodicy, x, xi, xii, 1, 2, 14, 147–8, 156–8

Theology of hope, 107

Thornton, lionel, 92

Tiflis, 143

Torah, 10, 25, 27

Trinity, 170

Trust (al-amana), 5, 15

Tübingen, 103

Turkestan, 144

Turkey, i, ix, x, xi, 19, 101, 103, 135, 140,

144, 146, 159–62, 198, 224

Turkish republic, 41, 140 Twenty-Fifth Word, 44 universe, xii, 12, 15, 20–22, 30–32, 35,

40, 42, 44, 46–7, 50, 64, 67, 75–7, 79, 89, 92, 109, 116–20, 125–7,

130–31, 185–6, 207, 209–10, 212,

214–16, 224, 227–35, 237, 239

Vahide, sükran, xii, 78, 101, 161, 243

Van, 163

Vatican ii. See second Vatican council

Vicegerent (khalifa), 3, 4, 15–16, 239

Volf, Miroslav, 93

Waste Land, 165, 166–7, 173

Woman’s creational status, 2

Worlds of the unseen (Gayb), 43

Zayn al-din al-‘amili. See al-shahid al-Thani

[1] For a fuller appreciation of Nursi’s life, please consult the following works in english: Şerif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany, 1989); camilla nereid, In the Light of Said Nursi: Turkish Nationalism and the Religious Alternative (Bergen, 1997); Fred a. reed, Anatolia Junction: A Journey Into Hidden Turkey (Burnaby, 1999), and Şükran Vahide, The Author of the Risale-i Nur, Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (Istanbul, 1992); Şükran Vahide’s Islam in Modern Turkey: An Intellectual Biography of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 2005); ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘, Spiritual Dimensions of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s Risale-i-Nur (albany: state university of new york Press, July 2008); and ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘, editor, Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 2003).

[2] Nursi mentions almost every major Muslim mystic in his Risale. For a list of the major Muslim mystics, see annemarie schimmel, Mystical Dimensions of Islam (chapel hill: university of north carolina Press, 1978).

[3] yvonne y. haddad, “ghurba as Paradigm for Muslim life: a Risale-i Nur Worldview.” The Muslim World, volume lXXXiX, no. 3–4, July–october 1999, p. 309.

[4] Massignon thinks this is a hadith qudsi. see louis Massignon, Essay on the Technical Language of Islamic Mysticism, trans. Benjamin clark (notre dame, 1997) p. 165.

[5] Webster’s Third New International Dictionary, 1961, s.v. theodicy.

[6] The segments of this chapter that deal with adam and his wife in the Qur’an and the arabic Tafsir literature are based on my previous work published in Barbara Freyer stowasser, Women in the Qur’an, Traditions, and Interpretation (new york: oxford university Press, 1994), pp. 25–38. The numbers in parantheses after quotations of or references to the Qur’anic text indicate sura and verse.

[7] Was iblis an angel or one of the jinn? in his History of the Apostles and Kings (Tarikh al-rusul wal-muluk), the historian and theologian abu Ja’far Muhammad ibn Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923) assembled a number of hadith (traditions) that identify iblis as an angel, as a jinni, or as the leader of “a tribal group of angels called jinn,” The History of al-Tabari. vol. I: General Introduction and From the Creation to the Flood, ed. ehsan yar-shater, trans. and annotated by Franz rosenthal (albany: state university of new york Press, 1989), pp. 252 ff.

[8] For example, Theodor noldeke’s as analyzed in W. Montgomery Watt, ed. (Richard) Bell’s Introduction to the Qur’an, second edn (edinburgh university Press, 1970), pp. 206–13.

[9] Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, ed. Jane dammen Mcauliffe (leiden: Brill, 2002), vol. 2, p. 337.

[10] all Biblical quotations in this chapter are from The New Oxford Annotated Bible, ed. Bruce M. Metzger and roland e. Murphy (new york: oxford university Press, 1991).

[11] The Oxford Companion to the Bible, ed. Bruce M. Metzger and Michael d. coogan (new york: oxford university Press, 1993), p. 246.

[12] Oxford Companion to the Bible, pp. 10, 338 and 567.

[13] Kurt Flasch, Eva und Adam: Wandlungen eines Mythos (Munchen: Beck, 2004), pp. 30, 51, 82–3.

[14] The Oxford Companion to the Bible, pp. 678–9.

[15] The Oxford Companion to the Bible, p. 208.

[16] The Oxford Companion to the Bible, p. 246. other interpreters of genesis 3 maintain that death itself was the punishment for the primeval rebellion (The Oxford Companion to the Bible, p. 160).

[17] The Oxford Companion to the Bible, p. 223.

[18] Augustine Through the Ages, ed. allan d. Fitzgerald, o.s.a. (grand rapids: eerdmans Publishing, 1999), p. 610.

[19] Augustine Through the Ages, pp. 342, 351.

[20] Augustine Through the Ages, p. 610.

[21] Augustine Through the Ages, p. 611.

[22] Flasch, Eva und Adam, pp. 93–4.

[23] abu Ja’far Muhammad ibn Jarir al-Tabari, Jami’ al-bayan ’an tafsir al-Qur’an, ed. Mahmud and Muhammad shakir and ahmad Muhammad shakir (cairo: dar al-ma’arif, [1950s]–1969), which covers the Qur’anic text through sura 14:27; for the remainder, i have used the edition of Beirut: dar al-Ma'rifa, 1972.

[24] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, p. 532.

[25] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, pp. 513–14.

[26] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, pp. 525, 530.

[27] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, pp. 525–7.

[28] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, p. 528.

[29] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, pp. 529–30.

[30] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, p. 526.

[31] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, pp. 526, 531, and vol. 12, p. 356.

[32] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, p. 529.

[33] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, pp. 526, 530–31, and vol. 12, pp. 356, 358.

[34] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 1, p. 538.

[35] Tabari, Jami’, vol. 12, pp. 356 ff.

[36] Tarif Khalidi, Classical Arab Islam (Princeton: The darwin Press, 1985), pp. 82–6.

[37] Mahmud ibn umar al-Zamakhshari, Al-Kashshaf ’an haqa’iq ghawamid al-tanzil (Beirut: dar al-kitab al-'arabi, 1966), vol. 2, p. 76.

[38] Zamakhshari, Kashshaf, vol. 2, p. 76.

[39] Khalidi, Classical Islam, pp. 86–7.

[40] razi, Tafsir, vol. 3, p. 16.

[41] razi, Tafsir, vol. 14, p. 37.

[42] razi, Tafsir, vol. 14, pp. 46–8.

[43] razi, Tafsir, vol. 3, p. 26.

[44] razi, Tafsir, vol. 3, p. 17.

[45] razi, Tafsir, vol. 23, p. 125.

[46] razi, Tafsir, vol. 9, p. 161.

[47] razi, Tafsir, vol. 3, p. 12.

[48] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words, translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide (istanbul: sozler neşriyat, 2002), p. 806.

[49] Encyclopaedia of the Qur’an, vol. 2, p. 337.

[50] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sozler nesriyat, 2002), pp. 133–42.

[51] Nursi, The Words, pp. 312–13.

[52] Nursi, The Words, pp. 240, 695.

[53] Nursi, The Words, pp. 708–9.

[54] Nursi, The Words, pp. 719–20.

[55] Nursi, The Words, pp. 254, 413.

[56] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, Letters, transl. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sozler Neşriyat, 2001), p. 390, and Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Flashes Collection, transl. Şükran Vahide (istanbul: sozler neşriyat, 2000), p. 226.

[57] Nursi, The Words, pp. 557–61, and Letters, p. 390.

[58] Nursi, The Words, pp. 477–84 (the quote is from p. 480), and Letters, p. 62.

[59] Nursi, Letters, pp. 61–4.

[60] Nursi, The Flashes, p. 104.

[61] , p. 482, and The Flashes, pp. 110–11.

[62] The Flashes, pp. 21–8.

[63] see for example d.Z. Phillips in Death and Immortality (london: Macmillan, 1970) and stewart sutherland in stewart r. sutherland, longman, 1919).

“What happens after death?” Scottish Journal of Theology 22 (1969): 404–16.

[64] Bertrand russell, “Why i am not a christian.” Taken from the website http://www. positiveatheism.org/hist/russell0.htm (accessed 21 october 2006).

[65] Bertrand russell, “a Free Man’s Worship,” in Mysticism and Logic (london:

[66] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words, translated by Şükran Vahide (Sözler Neşriyat, Ticaret ve Sanayi, A.Ş., 1992), The Tenth Word, p. 59.

[67] ibid., p. 103.

[68] bid., p. 103.

[69] ibid., p. 71.

[70] bid., p. 102.

[71] bid., p. 76.

[72] bid., p. 102.

[73] bid., pp. 108–10.

[74] The sophistication of Paley’s argument is often overlooked. he does consider a variety of scenarios including one where he does reflect on the possibility that the watch (his chosen human artifact) is a result of watch reproduction. see especially, Natural Theology: Evidence of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity (1809), chapter 2.

[75] see richard swinburne, The Existence of God (oxford: clarendon Press, 1979).

[76] Said Nursi, The Rays, The ninth ray, p. 205. cf. also, The Fifteenth ray – The shining Proof – First station, p. 578.

[77] Nursi later explains that the heedless companion indicates greedy, selfish human instinct, whereas the responsible friend corresponds to the human heart or conscience. at another level, the self-justifying rationalist indicates the student of human philosophy, while his upright companion is the student of the Qur’an; finally, the misguided individual stands for unbelievers, while the wise, thoughtful companion represents the community of faith. The Words, The Tenth Word, p. 70.

[78] The Words, The Tenth Word, p. 67.

[79] ibid., The Tenth Word, Tenth Truth, p. 102.

[80] ibid., The seventh Word, p. 41.

[81] ibid., The Tenth Word, Fifth Part of the addendum, p. 131.

[82] The Rays, The Fifteenth ray, The shining Proof, second station, p. 627.

[83] The Words, The Tenth Word, seventh Truth, p. 90.

[84] The Rays, The supreme sign, First chapter, p. 164; cf. also The Flashes, The Twenty-sixth Flash, For the elderly, p. 291.

[85] The Damascus Sermon, The seeds of reality, p. 97.

[86] The Words, The Twenty-fifth Word, First Light, Second Ray, p. 412.

[87] The Letters, seeds of reality, p. 542.

[88] The Flashes, seventeenth Flash, Fifteenth note, p. 187.

[89] The Letters, Twentieth letter, second station, p. 297.

[90] , The Fifteenth ray, The shining Proof, second station, p. 629.

[91] The Letters, Twenty-ninth letter, First section, p. 459; cf. also, The Rays, The supreme sign, First chapter, p. 164.

[92] , Twenty-ninth Word, second aim, p. 539.

[93] , The second ray, First station, p. 21.

[94] The Rays, The Third ray, p. 56.

[95] , Twenty-ninth Word, second aim, p. 543.

[96] , The supreme sign, First chapter, p. 193.

[97] The Words, The sixteenth Word, pp. 212–13.

[98] , The Twenty-fourth Word, second Branch, pp. 349–50.

[99] , The Fifteenth ray, The shining Proof, First station, p. 584.

[100] The Words, Tenth Word, ninth Truth, p. 94. cf. also, The Words, Twenty-fifth Word, second light, second Beam, p. 438.

[101] The Rays, The second ray, conclusion, p. 45. cf. also, The Rays, The supreme sign, First chapter, p. 183. “‘The hour shall be but a blinking of the eye, or even closer,’ that is, the bringing about of resurrection and the gathering that follows upon it shall take no longer than the opening and closing of an eye, or even less.” also, The Words, Tenth Word, Third Part of the addendum, p. 125.

[102] The Words, Twenty-fifth Word, Second Light, Second Beam, p. 439. Cf. also, The Words, Tenth Word, Fourth Part of the addendum, p. 129.

[103] The Flashes, The Thirtieth Flash, p. 409.

[104] Nursi, Letters 1928–1932 (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 2001), p. 438.

[105] Nursi, The Words (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 2004), 106. See also, Mehmet S.

Aydın, Din Felsefesi (Ankara: Selçuk Yayınları, 1992), p. 232, for Ibn Sina’s own words.

[106] , p. 491.

[107] see Nursi, The Rays Collection (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 2004), p. 241; The Words, p. 541.

[108] For discussions of this, see Nursi, The Rays, pp. 205–12, 257, 578–9; The Flashes Collection (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 2000), p. 291; Kastamonu Lahikası (istanbul: Envar Neşriyat, 1994), pp. 210–11.

[109] see, for example, Qur’an, 6:73, 59:72.

[110] Nursi, Signs of Miraculousness (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 2004), p. 246.

[111] Nursi, The Words, pp. 574–5.

[112] Nursi, Letters, p. 350.

[113] Nursi, Signs of Miraculousness, p. 215. See also, Bekir Topaloğlu, “Âhiret,” in Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı İslam Ansiklopedisi (Istanbul: Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı, 1988), i, 544.

[114] , p. 106.

[115] see Nursi, The Flashes, p. 434; The Rays, pp. 257, 260–62; The Words, p. 734.

[116] Nursi, The Words, p. 541.

[117] For a lengthy and enlightening discussion of these, see Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 123–35.

[118] see, The Words, pp. 541–4. see also, Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 63–4; “nokta,” in İçtimâî Reçeteler (Istanbul: Tenvir Neşriyat, 1990), pp. i, 124–6.

[119] The Flashes, p. 292.

[120] Nursi, The Words, pp. 437–9.

[121] in sura 78, The great news; see The Words, p. 385.

[122] see, for example, The Words, pp. 92–4, 307–8, 392; The Rays, pp. 135, 164, 192–3, 232 ff.

[123] Nursi, The Rays, p. 135.

[124] , pp. 392–4.

[125] Nursi, The Rays, pp. 45–7.

[126] Nursi, The Words, pp. 549–56.

[127] see The Words, p. 642.

[128] The Rays, p. 257; also, p. 583.

[129] Nursi, Barla Lahikası (Istanbul: Envar Neşriyat, 1994), p. 320.

[130] The Words, p. 77 fn. 9.

[131] For this proof, see Aydın, Din Felsefesi, pp. 26, 68–70. Nursi also sets out his interpretation of it in his earlier work, Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 164–5.

[132] Nursi, The Words, pp. 77–8. For another piece describing the evidence for resurrection and the hereafter of some thirty-two divine names and their manifestations, see The Rays, pp. 230–41.

[133] Nursi, Letters, pp. 291–9. see also, The Words, pp. 103–4; “nokta” in İçtimâî Reçeteler, i, 127–31; Flashes, pp. 416–17.

[134] Nursi, Letters, p. 299.

[135] Nursi, The Words, pp. 545–9.

[136] Nursi, Signs of Miraculousness, p. 25. see also, The Words, pp. 75–6, 540–41; The Rays, pp. 208, 231, 248.

[137] Nursi, The Rays, pp. 247–8.

[138] Nursi, The Words, p. 514.

[139] Nursi, The Words, pp. 106–7; also, 349–50.

[140] Nursi, The Words, p. 555.

[141] see, for instance, 41:53.

[142] Nursi, The Words, p. 313.

[143] ibid., pp. 483–4.

[144] Nursi, Muhâkemat (Istanbul: Sözler Yayınevi, 1977), pp. 151–3; Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 59–65; “nokta” in İçtimâî Reçeteler, i, 121–7; The Words, pp. 538–42.

[145] see, for example, Nursi, The Flashes, p. 291.

[146] Nursi, The Flashes, pp. 538–9.

[147] Nursi, Letters, pp. 344–5.

[148] see, The Flashes, pp. 431–3.

[149] Nursi, Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 243–4.

[150] Nursi, The Rays, pp. 240–41, 578.

[151] Nursi, The Words, pp. 81–4, 248.

[152] Nursi, The Rays, p. 578; The Flashes, p. 403.

[153] We have consulted with two of these dictionaries: ‘Alī ibn Muhammad al-Jurjānī, al-Ta‘rifāt, ed. M. ‘Abd al-Hakīm al-Qādī (Cairo: Dar al-Kitab al-Masri, 1991), pp. 246–7; Muhammmad ‘Alī ibn Muhammad al-Tahānawī, Kashshāf Istilāhāt al-Funūn 4 vols (Beirut: Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiyyah, 1418/1998), v. 4, pp. 106–8.

[154] Most of the Qur’anic verses dealing with death have already been examined in several academic writings in english, some of which can be cited for those who wish to explore further on this subject: Thomas o’shaugnessy, j.r., Muhammad’s Thoughts on Death: A Thematic Study of the Qur’anic Data (leiden: e.J. Brill, 1969); J.i. smith and y.y. haddad, The Islamic Understanding of Death and Resurrection (albany: suny, 1981); William c. chittick, “eschatology,” Islamic Spirituality: Foundations I, ed. s.h. nasr (new york: crossroad Publishing company, 1991), pp. 378–409; ali Ünal, The Resurrection and the Afterlife (Virginia: Fountain, 2000).

[155] Al-Tahānawī, Kashshaf, v. 4, p. 107.

[156] Al-Jurjānī, al-Ta‘rifat, p. 246.

[157] Said Nursi, Sözler, 8, p. 15; cf. The Words, 8, p. 50.

[158] Nursi, Sözler, 10, p. 38; cf. The Words, 10, pp. 98–9.

[159] Nursi, Sözler, 17, p. 77; The Words, 17, p. 220.

[160] Nursi, Sözler, 23, p. 133; The Words, 23.

[161] Nursi, Sözler, 32, p. 290; The Words, 32, p. 664.

[162] The Qur’an, al-Kahf 18:7.

[163] Sözler, 17, p. 77; The Words, 17, p. 220.

[164] The Qur’an, al-an‘am 6:32.

[165] see for deatils, Nursi, Sözler, 17, pp. 77–8; The Words, 17, pp. 220–21.

[166] Nursi, Sözler, 26, p. 209; The Words, 26, pp. 488–9.

[167] Nursi here alludes to the famous Sufi teaching that man from the time of his fleshy stage in the womb to eternity travels a journey towards the ultimate achievable human perfection. rumi, for instance, articulates this teaching in poetic form: “i died to the inorganic state and became endowed with growth, and (then) i died to (vegetable) growth and attained to the animal. / i died from animality and became adam (man): why, then, should i fear? When have i become less by dying? / at the next move i shall die to man, that i may soar and lift up my head amongst the angels …” (Mathnawī iii, 3901 ff. trans. R. Nicholson.) see for a well-written article on rumi’s understanding of death, W. chittick, “rumi’s View of death,” Alserat (1987) Xiii: 30–31.

[168] Nursi, Sözler, 26, p. 209; The Words, 26, p. 489.

[169] Nursi, Sözler, 26, pp. 209–10; The Words, 26, p. 89.

[170] Sözler, 32, p. 293; The Words, 32, p. 672.

[171] Nursi, Mektūbāt 1, pp. 347–8; Letters, 1, pp. 22–3.

[172] Nursi, Sözler, 29, p. 238; The Words, 29, p. 550.

[173] Nursi, Sözler, 29, p. 238; The Words, 29, p. 551.

[174] Nursi, Sözler, 29, p. 233; The Words, 29, p. 539.

[175] The Qur’an, al-Mulk 62:2.

[176] Nursi, Sözler, 33, p. 310; The Words, 33, pp. 706–7.

[177] , 1, p. 348; Letters, 1, pp. 24–5.

[178] Nursi, Mathnawī al-‘Arabī anl-Nūrī, p. 347.

[179] Nursi, Mektūbāt, 20, p. 457; Letters, 20, p. 284.

[180] Nursi, Mektūbāt, 20, p. 458; Letters, 20, p. 248.

[181] Nursi, Mektūbāt, 20, p. 450; Letters, 20, p. 268.

[182] , 20, p. 450; , 20, p. 268.

[183] , 24, p. 480; , 24, p. 337.

[184] , 24, p. 480; , 24, pp. 337–8.

[185] Nursi, Mektūbāt, 24, 48; Letters, 24, p. 340.

[186] , 24, pp. 482–3; Letters, 24, pp. 342–3.

[187] Nursi, Mektūbāt, 24, p. 483; Letters, 24, p. 343.

[188] Nursi, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī al-Nuri, p. 1360.

[189] The Qur’an, al-Baqara 2:156. see also al-Ma‘ida 5:18, al-ra‘d: 13:36.

[190] al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī anl-Nūrī, p. 50; cf. Mesnevi-i Nuriye, pp. 1282, 1399.

[191] Nursi, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī anl-Nūrī, p. 347.

[192] Nursi, Lem’alar, 11, p. 608; Flashes, 11, pp. 82–3.

[193] The Qur’an, al-Baqara 2:156.

[194] Nursi, Lem’alar, 17, pp. 645–6; Flashes, 17, p. 165.

[195] The Qur’an, al-imran 3:185.

[196] The Qur’an, al-Zumar 39:30.

[197] Lem’alar, 21, p. 670; Flashes, 21, p. 217.

[198] Lem’alar, 21, p. 670; Flashes, 21, p. 217.

[199] Lem’alar, 25, p. 699; Flashes, 25, p. 283.

[200] Nursi, Şualar, 1, p. 835.

[201] The Qur’an, al-i imran 3:185.

[202] Nursi, Lem’alar, 26, p. 706; Flashes, 26, p. 297.

[203] Nursi, Lem’alar, 26, p. 707; Flashes, 26, p. 298.

[204] Şualar, 1, p. 835.

[205] Şualar, 2, p. 853; The Rays, 2, p. 25.

[206] Şualar, 2, p. 859; The Rays, 2, p. 39.

[207] Şualar, 2, pp. 859–60; The Rays, 2, p. 40.

[208] Şükran Vahide, “A Chronology of Said Nursi’s Life” in Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, edited with an introduction by ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ (albany: suny Press, 2003), xix. (hereafter: Vahide, Chronology.) some Turkish references to this work spell the title Mesnevî-i Nûriye. all citations of Mathnawi al-Nuriye will refer to the Arabic-language edition: Badī‘uzzamān Sa‘īd al-Nursī, Al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī al-Nūrī (Istanbul: Sözler Yayınevi, 1999)—hereafter, Mathnawi. unless otherwise noted, paraphrasing and translation of Mathnawi al-Nuriye is my own, with much assistance from hashim al-Tawil, Ph.d., of the faculty of henry Ford community college, dearborn, Michigan. Where these paraphrases and translations are felicitous, dr. al-Tawil has my deepest thanks. Where there are errors, they are mine alone.

[209] Şerif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediūzzaman Said Nursi (albany: suny Press, 1989), p. 177.

[210] in order of length, Lama‘āt (no. 1), Shammatun (no. 9), and Nuqtah (no. 12) are 15 pages each; Lā Siyyamā (no. 3) comprises 20 pages (as we have said); Dharratun (no. 8), Rashahāt (no. 2), Shu‘latun (no. 11), Zahratun (no. 7), Habbah (no. 6), Habābun (no. 5), Nūrun (no. 13), Al-Qit‘atu’l-Thalithatu min Shammah (no. 10), and Qatrah (no. 4) are 21, 26, 33, 35, 41, 43, 47, 51, and 69 pages, respectively in the Sözler Yayınevi (1999) edition used for this project.

[211] Mathnawi, p. 83.

[212] Mathnawi, p. 88.

[213] Mathnawi, p. 101.

[214] see Mathnawi, p. 85, Yā Sīn (36): 82–3; p. 86, al-Zumar (39): 38; p. 97, al-Qiyāmah (75): 36 and al-Nisā’ (4): 87; and p. 99, al-Rum (30): 50.

[215] anthroplogist claude F. Jacobs, Ph.d., director of the center for the study of religion and society at the university of Michigan-dearborn, made this point in a conversation about Nursi’s Mathnawi al-Nuriye with dr. hashim al-Tawil and the author in dearborn, Mi, 27 June 2005.

[216] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words: On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life, and All Things, translated from the Turkish Sözler by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 1992), p. 77, note 9.

[217] Mathnawi, pp. 218, 480, as translated by redha ameur. see redha ameur, translator, “Preface to the Al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī al-Nūrī” in Islam at the Crossroads, op. cit., pp. 336, 337.

[218] Mathnawi, p. 35.

[219] Mathnawi, pp. 86 ff.

[220] Mathnawi, p. 94. literally, al-Thakalān means “Two Weighty Things;” it can refer to the Qur’an and the Prophet’s Family, or (as is probably the case here) to the two categories of creatures: human beings and jinn.

[221] Jane i. smith and yvonne yazbeck haddad, The Islamic Understanding of Death and Resurrection (albany: suny Press, 1981), p. 1.

[222] ibid., p. 6.

[223] J. Windrow sweetman makes this point. see his Islam and Christian Theology: A Study of the Interpretation of Theological Ideas in the Two Religions (london: lutterworth Press, 1945), p. 189.

[224] in addition to smith and haddad, op. cit., see also, for example, Rasā’il Ikhwan as-Safā’, nos 39 and 43.

[225] in ali Ünal’s english translation of Mathnawi al-Nuriye, this treatise is titled, “Particular arguments for the resurrection.” see Said Nursi, Epitomes of Light (Mathnawi al-nuriye): The Essentials of the Risale-i Nur (izmir, Turkey: Kaynak, 1999). When i speak of resurrection as a christian theologian, i have in mind the greek term anastasis [a standing up (again)], which occurs thirty-four times in the new Testament to indicate life after life—not resuscitation, but entry into a new realm of existence. While it can be used in reference to a particular moment (especially when speaking of god’s having raised Jesus christ from the dead), it may also be used to speak overarchingly of a multi-stage process of collection, revivification, and judgment.

[226] see smith and haddad, op. cit., pp. 64–5; see also seyyed hossein nasr, A Young Muslim’s Guide to the Modern World (chicago: KaZi, 1994), p. 41.

[227] Mathnawi, pp. 86, 93, 100, and 101 (where it occurs twice in the same sentence).

[228] Mathnawi, p. 97.

[229] see pp. 86 and 99 (one iteration each); pp. 98 and 100 (two iterations each); p. 97 (three iterations). The noun also appears twice in a footnote on p. 81, and as a vocative verb in the closing supplication.

[230] Mathnawi, pp. 83–6.

[231] Mathnawi, pp. 86–7.

[232] Mathnawi, p. 88.

[233] Mathnawi, pp. 88–9.

[234] Mathnawi, p. 92; translation, Ünal, op. cit., p. 59, modified slightly.

[235] , pp. 94–5; translation adapted from ali Ünal, Epitomes of Light, pp. 62–3.

[236] , p. 96; translation, Ünal, op. cit., p. 63.

[237] , pp. 96f; translation, Ünal, op. cit., pp. 63–4.

[238] Al-Nisā’ [The Women] (4): 87. Mathnawi, p. 97.

[239] Mathnawi, p. 98.

[240] , p. 99.

[241] , pp. 94, 95, 96, 97 respectively.

[242] , p. 100.

[243] Mathnawi, pp. 100–101.

[244] Mathnawi, pp. 93, 100.

[245] Şükran Vahide notes that the Jawshān was readily available to Nursi by virtue of its inclusion in (and his access to) in Al-Majmu‘a al-Ahzab [a collection of litanies], a three-volume anthology of supplications and litanies compiled by Ottoman scholar and Sufi master ahmed Ziyauddin gümüshane (1813–93). see Vahide, Intellectual Biography, 11, 30. Vahide also notes Nursi’s role in popularizing the Jawshān. See the introduction Şükran Vahide, trans., A Supplication of the Prophet Muhammad (Peace and blessings be upon him): Al- Jawshān al-Kabīr (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 2003), 3. This supplication is also available as a small devotional manual in arabic alone, and in arabic with Turkish translation, as well as on the internet in english, arabic, and Turkish. There may be other editions.

[246] Thanks to the rev. W. Mark richardson, Ph.d., Professor of Theology, the general Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, for his own reflections on this section. Where I have used his ideas and turns of phrase to sharpen my argument, i do so with much gratitude.

[247] John Polkinghorne, Quarks, Chaos & Christianity: Questions to Science and Religion (new york: crossroad, 1994), pp. 10, 11.

[248] Thomas aquinas, Summa Theologiae, Part i, Question 2, article 3. Thomas aquinas (c. 1225–74) composed his massive Summa from c. 1265 until 1273. he envisioned it as a handbook for friars, men who had joined the dominican religious order, but were not destined for university.

[249] Thomas aquinas, Summa Theologiae, supplement to Part iii, Question 75, article 1. Part III of Summa Theologiae was not yet finished when Thomas died. The discussion of matters relating to resurrection (Questions 69 through 99) was constructed by one of his companions, who drew the material from Thomas’s commentary on Peter lombard’s Fourth Book of the Sentences.

[250] “even the fool is convinced that something exists in the understanding, at least, than which nothing greater can be conceived,” anselm asserts. “For, when he hears of this, he understands it. and whatever is understood, exists in the understanding. and assuredly that, than which nothing greater can be conceived, cannot exist in the understanding alone. For, suppose it exists in the understanding alone: then it can be conceived to exist in reality; which is greater.”anselm, Proslogion, ii–iii, V; trans. richard Viladesau. see richard Viladesau and Mark Massa, eds, Foundations of Theological Study: A Sourcebook (new york: Paulist Press, 1991), p. 79.

[251] William c. Placher, A History of Christian Theology: An Introduction (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983), p. 142.

[252] Viladesau and Massa, op. cit., p. 78.

[253] Translation by richard Viladesau in Viladesau and Massa, op. cit., p. 79.

[254] Thanks to Mark richardson for help in articulating this.

[255] Mathnawi, p. 83 (shirk), p. 84 (kufrān).

[256] Mathnawi, p. 83.

[257] Mathnawi, p. 87.

[258] Mathnawi, p. 100.

[259] The Words, pp. 71, 94.

[260] alister e. Mcgrath, An Introduction to Christianity (oxford: Blackwell, 1997), p. 180.

[261] The Risale-i Nur makes reference to about half of the items now comprising Mathnawi al-Nuriye. For example, in the seventeenth Flash (1933), Nursi explains that, in 1921, he had written in arabic about divine unity “in such treatises as Zühre, Şu’le, Habbe, Şemme, Zerre, and Katre.” The Thirty-Third Flash consists of a note that it should in fact be understood to be the six arabic essays mentioned in the seventeenth Flash, and their appendices; and, that a Turkish translation of this material has been “included in Mesnevi-yi Nûriye, part of the Risale-i Nur collection, and published.” The seventeenth Flash comprises “Fifteen notes taken from Zühre,” but not the entirety of this treatise. Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Flashes Collection, translated from the Turkish Lem’alar by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat, 1995), pp. 157, 461. Bediuzzaman’s Arabic essays here mentioned were translated into Turkish in the 1950s by Abdülmecid Nursi (his younger brother). See Şükran Vahide, Islam in Modern Turkey: An Intellectual Biography of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, edited and with an introduction by ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ (albany: suny Press, 2005), pp. 166, 323. Şükran Vahide tells us that “When completed [in the mid-1930s], The Flashes numbered thirty treatises.” ibid., p. 212. Thus the Thirty-Third Flash (with its reference to Mathnawi al-Nuriye) seems to be a later appendix to The Flashes Collection.

[262] a note to the Twenty-eighth Word informs us that it “consists of two stations,” the second of which consists of “firm and clear consecutive arguments in Arabic”—that is,

[263] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words: On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life and All Things, revised edition (istanbul: sozler Publications, 2002), p. 76. “... there must therefore be a realm of blessedness appropriate to that generosity and worthy of that mercy. For irrevocable death would transform compassion into disaster, love into affliction, blessing into vengeance, intellect into a tool of misery ... so that the essence of god’s mercy would vanish.”

[264] From The Words, Tenth Word: “it is not possible that the everlasting Maker of the fine but unstable cosmos, should not create another cosmos, permanent and lasting. It is not possible that the Wise, Powerful, and Merciful creator of this world, which is like an exhibition, or a testing-ground, or a field, should not create also a hereafter in which the purposes of this world shall be made manifest.” p. 74.

[265] see, Tenth Word, p. 86. see, also, his argument on pp. 97–9 wherein he asserts, in inverse direction, that we rely on the sense of ultimate meaning just to make sense of this finite world. If the eternal values are not trustworthy we are forced to radically alter our interpretation of experience in this world.

[266] David Burell states, “… the ‘proofs’ must invariably involve a reflexive moment, when one presumes to assess the way we consider whatever we consider, and this move cannot help but render them suspect as ‘proofs’ ... it turns out that we seldom, if ever, reason to god’s existence, but rather retrospectively retrace our tracks to satisfy ourselves of the cogency of the individual steps which cumulatively brought us to where we are.” Burrell, Knowing the Unknowable God: Ibn-Sina, Maimonides, Aquinas (u. notre dame Press, 1986), p. 6.

[267] J. christiaan Beker, The Triumph of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990). see especially chapter 2.

[268] roger haight speaks of language about resurrection appearances as objective but trans-historical, and therefore symbolic. We have no linguistic categories for describing an occurrence which breaks the boundaries of ordinary experience. Whether one sees laws of nature as something discovered (realist), or something invented (instrumentalist), no theory of laws of nature includes the possibility of resurrection within its explanatory frame. as such, only symbolic and picture language can apply.

[269] nancey Murphy, “The resurrection Body and Personal identity,” in Resurrection: Theological and Scientific Assessments (grand rapids: eerdmans, 2002), p. 205. i am fascinated by the imagery of Nursi in The Words, Twenty-ninth Word, p. 524, where he speaks of this transformed body as something illumined and released from the limitations of this kind of world. his depiction is not unlike that narrated in christian gospel of luke regarding Jesus’ resurrected body.

[270] Pheme Perkins, Reading the New Testament: An Introdcution (Berkeley: university of california Press, 1988).

[271] This at first seems quite unlike what is affirmed in Nursi, but maybe it is not.

although Nursi uses the language of rational inference, it bears repeating that his line of argument shows the path of hope in the believers’ minds.

[272] “The death of death”, 262, quoted in Resurrection: Theological and Scientific Assessment, p. 207.

[273] The Words, seventh Truth, Tenth Word, pp. 88–9.

[274] as Nursi sees it, the material may undergo change, but nearly every reference to personal identity includes embodiment, even if a subtle body. identity presupposes embodiment for Nursi, but not necessarily a body as untransformed physical stuff. see The Words, Twenty-ninth Word, pp. 524–6.

[275] see The Words, Tenth Word, ninth Truth, p. 94.

[276] ibid., p. 89.

[277] ibid., see p. 551.

[278] ibid., Twenty-ninth Word, p. 551; Q. 14.48.

[279] lionel Thornton, The Incarnate Lord, 1928.

[280] The Words, Tenth Word, p. 82.

[281] ibid., Tenth Word, p. 92.

[282] ibid., Tenth Word, p. 111.

[283] see John Polkinghorne, “eschatology: some Questions and some insights from science,” in Polkinghorne and Welker, eds, The End of the World and the Ends of God (harrisburg, Pa: Trinity Press, 2000).

[284] The Words, Twenty-ninth Word, p. 551.

[285] ibid., Tenth Word, p. 66.

[286] see p. 67, the Eleventh Aspect.

[287] Miroslav Volf, “enter into Joy! sin, death, and the life of the World to come,” in John Polkinghorne and Michael Welker, eds, The End of the World and the Ends of God (harrisburg: Trinity Press, 2000), pp. 256–78.

[288] First Indication, Tenth Word, p. 72.

[289] ibid., pp. 64, 74.

[290] Philippians 2, colossians 1, ephesians 1, i corinthians 15. in this last, Paul states, “... in christ, all will be made alive.” (vs. 22).

[291] Mark 9.16; Matthew 7.25; luke 16.

[292] Jurgen Moltmann, The Coming of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996) p. 238.

[293] Şükran Vahide, “Toward an Intellectual Biography of Said Nursi,” Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzamen Said Nursi, ed. ibrahim abu-rabi‘ (albany: state university of new york Press, 2003), p. 10.

<right>

[294] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Flashes Collection, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul:

</right>

reyhan ofset a.s., 2000), pp. 81, 82.

[295] Nursi, Flashes, p. 82.

[296] Nursi, Flashes, p. 83.

[297] Nursi, Flashes, p. 83.

[298] Nursi, Flashes, p. 83.

[299] Vahide, p. 10.

[300] on this period of his life, see Şükran Vahide, Islam in Modern Turkey: An Intellectual Biography of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, ed. ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ (albany, ny: state university of new york Press, 2005), pp. 189–213.

[301] On the conflict between Nursi and the Turkish Republic, see Camilla T. Nereid, In the Light of Said Nursi: Turkish Nationalism and the Religious Alternative, Bergen studies on the Middle east and africa 4 (Bergen, norway: centre for Middle eastern and islamic studies, 1997), pp. 55–80.

[302] Şerif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi, suny series in near eastern studies (albany, ny: state university of new york Press, 1989), p. 37.

[303] Mardin, p. 37.

[304] Jürgen Moltmann, In the End—The Beginning: The Life of Hope, trans. Margaret Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2004), p. 33.

[305] Moltmann, In the End, p. 34.

[306] Moltmann, In the End, p. 35.

[307] Moltmann, In the End, p. 35.

<right>

[308] Said Nursi, The Words: On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life, and All Things,

</right>

Risale-I Nur Collection, 1, trans. Şükran Vahide (rev. edn; istanbul: Teyhan ofest, a.s., 2002), pp. 104–6, 111, 112, 127–8. see also Said Nursi, Signs of Miraculousness: The Inimitability of the Qur’an’s Conciseness, trans. Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, A.S., 2004), pp. 245–50.

[309] Mustafa sungur, in sahiner, Aydinlar Konusuyur, 35; quoted by Vahide, Islam in Modern Turkey, p. 194.

[310] Nursi, The Words, p. 63, n. 3.

[311] Nursi, The Words, p. 76.

[312] Nursi, The Words, p. 59.

[313] Nursi, The Words, p. 60.

[314] Nursi, The Words, p. 61.

[315] Nursi, The Words, p. 61.

[316] Nursi, The Words, p. 78.

[317] Nursi, The Words, p. 64.

[318] Nursi, The Words, p. 91.

[319] Nursi, The Words, p. 111.

[320] Nursi, The Words, pp. 112–13.

[321] Jürgen Moltmann, Theology of Hope: On the Ground and the Implications of a Christian Eschatology, trans. James W. leitch (new york: harper & row, 1967, 1975), p. 18.

[322] Moltmann, Theology of Hope, p. 18.

[323] Moltmann, Theology of Hope, p. 18.

[324] Jürgen Moltmann, The Crucified God: The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, trans. from the second german edn r.a. Wilson and John Bowden, 1974), p. 160.

[325] Moltmann, Crucified God, p. 161.

[326] Moltmann, Crucified God, p. 161.

[327] Moltmann, Crucified God, pp. 162, 163.

[328] Jürgen Moltmann, God in Creation: A New Theology of Creation and the Spirit of God, The Gifford Lectures 1984–85, trans. Margaret Kohl (san Francisco: harper & row, 1985), xii.

[329] Moltmann, Crucified God, p. 192.

[330] Moltmann, In the End, p. 162.

[331] early in the nineteenth century, Friedrich schleiermacher revived the hope of origen, arguing that the god of Jesus christ could not allow any human being to be separated forever. Twentieth-century theologians such as Karl Barth, hans urs von Balthasar, and Karl rahner have expressed hope in the salvation of all humans without teaching this as a doctrine.

[332] Jürgen Moltmann, The Coming of God: Christian Eschatology, trans. Margaret Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996), pp. 250–51.

[333] For similar questions look viz. (Al-Jurjānī, Al-Sayyid Sharīf, Sharh al-Mawāqif, alDimyātī, Mahmūd ‘Omar (ed.), Dār al-Qutub al-‘Ilmiya, Beirut, 1198, VIII/221).

[334] Compensation and Retaliation: The Mu‘tazilites believe that allah has created three uses for his creatures, namely, graciousness, compensation, and reward and explain the word “compensation,” which literally means “the thing which is given without any return” as: (a) a kind of reward given in return for the suffering and difficulties experienced unwillingly; (b) “the deserved use” without carrying the senses of exalting and honoring. (c) That which is given to both the responsible and irresponsible. There is controversy whether it is permanent or not in the Hereafter; al-Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa’l-Nih□al, emir ‘Ali and ‘Ali H□asan (ed.), Dār al-Mārifa, Beirut, 1993, p. 57; Qādī ‘Abd al-Jabbar, Us□ūl al-Ḥamsa, Faysal Bedir ‘Avn (ed.) Kuwait, 1998, pp. 69–70, 84; S□a‘d al-Dīn al-Taftāzānī, Sharh□ al-Maqāsid, ‘Abd al-Rah□man Amīra (ed.), ‘Alam al-Qutub, Beirut, 1989, IV/323–8. on the other hand the Mutazilites assert that “compensation” disproofs the claims of the materialists who deny the existence of allah based on the existence of evil in the world. (Çelebi, İlyas, “İvaz,” Diyanet İslam Ansiklopedisi (DİA), Xiii/292–5, istanbul, 1996); by “retaliation” in relation to animal pain or suffering, they mean the animals taking back their rights in return for the evils done to them. Al-Rāzī, Fakhr al-Dīn, Mafātīh□ al-Ghayb (Dār al-Fikr, Beirut, 1981), 31/27).

[335] Al-Taftāzānī, Sharh al-‘Aqāid al-Nasafī, Ah□mad Ḥijāzī al-Saqā (ed.), Maktaba alKulliyā al-Azhariya, Cairo, 1988, p. 66.

[336] Al-Ghazzālī, Kitāb al-Arbaīn fī Us□ūl al-Dīn, Dār al-Shāmiya, Beirut, 2002, pp. 33–4.

[337] Al-Rāzī, Al-Mafātīh□ al-Ghayb, 31/27; Çelebi, “İvaz” DİA, Xiii/292–5.

[338] “observing the best”: according to some Mu’tazilites, “observing the best” for the created both in the affairs of the world and hereafter, is an obligation for allah as a requirement of the Divine Justice. (Al-Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa’l-Nih□al, i/57); ‘abd alH□alīm T□ariq, al-Mutazila bayn al-Qadīm wa’l-Ḥadīth, Dār al-Arqam, 1987, p. 68); as for the Sunni scholars “observing the best” is not an obligation for Allah. (Al-Taftāzānī, Sharh□al-‘Aqāid, p. 66). even though the doctrine of the “observing the best” has been introduced in the context of the Divine Justice (theodicy), it is the first sistematic approach put forward in relation to the notion of purpose in the Science of Kalām. The Mutazilites have put in a teleological framework the thesis that “observing the best” is an obligation for Allah, associating it also with the notions of “providence” and “beneficial aspects.” (Al-Taftāzānī, Sharḥ al-Maqāsid, IV/329–34; Kutluer, İlhan, “Gâiyyet”, DİA, Xiii/293, istanbul, 1996).

[339] “Justice” in the Mutazila: allah never does an ugly job, never orders the ugly, does not transgrass what is obligatory for him, never forbids the beautiful, all of his deeds are beautiful. (Qādī ‘Abd al-Jabbar, Sharḥ al-Usūl al-Ḥamsa, pp. 13, 66); all of the principles of the Mutazilites are combined in the “justice.” (Abd Al-Jabbar, Al-Qādī, ‘Us□ūl al-Ḥamsa, pp. 69, 72).

[340] abd al-Jabbar, Us□ūl al-Ḥamsa, p. 82.

[341] Us□ūl al-Ḥamsa, p. 84.

[342] Al-Taftāzānī, Sharḥ al-Maqāsıd, VI/303, 323–5, 328; Nāsir al-Dīn al-Ţūsī, Talkhīs alMuh□as□s□al, Dār al-Ad□vā, 1985, Tehran, pp. 342–3; Al-Ash‘arī, Abū’l-Ḥasan, Kitāb Maqālāt alIslāmiyyīn, Muh□yiddīn ‘Abd al-H□amīd (ed.), Maktaba al-Nahd□a al-Mis□riyya, 1950, I/293–4.

[343] Musnad, I/72; II/235. For a similar interpretation see Nursī, The Flashes Collection (Sözler Publications, Istanbul, 1995), pp. 339–43.

[344] Nursi, as will be explained later, defends a similar view. See Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī al-Nurī, al-S□alihī, Ih□san Qāsim (ed.), (Sözler Publications, Istanbul, 1994), p. 163.

[345] Al-Taftāzānī, Sharḥ al-Talwīh□ ‘ala al-Tawd□īh□, Zakariya ‘Amīrāt (ed.), Dār al-Kutub al-‘İlmiya, Beirut, 1996, p. II/102.

[346] Al-Ghazzālī, Kitāb al-Arbaīn, pp. 33–4.

[347] Al-Ghazālī, al-Iqtis□ad fī al-‘Itiqād, Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiya, 1983, Beirut, pp. 114–15; Al-Ghazālī, Ihyā ‘Ulūm al-Dīn (Turkish trans. Ahmet Serdaroğlu) Bedir Yayınları, 2002, I/286–7; Eric Lee Ormsby, İslam düşüncesinde İlâhî adalet (Teodise) Sorunu (Theodicy in Islamic Thought, The dispute over al-Ghazāli’s “Best of All Possible Worlds”), (Kitabiyat, Avrasya Yayınları, Ankara, October, 2001), Turkish trans: Metin Özdemir, p. 182.

[348] The concept of “Purposes for the existence of everything” is one of the most important topics in Risale-i Nur. Nursi touches on this topic in some way in dealing with almost every problem. in relation to the concepts of “minor and major aims/goals”: “the duties of life and the necessities of life” see Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī al-Nurī, pp. 311–12, 279, 283, 341, 356, 363, 377, 428, 421, 450–51, 466, 477; Nursī, The Words (Sözler Publications, Istanbul, 1992), pp. 86–7; Nursī, The Rays (Sözler Publications, Istanbul), pp. 273–4. In the history of Islamic Thought this doctrine has been dealt with in the framework of causality, the divine Provision and wisdom, order and the proofs of purpose. in the western philosophy, the idea of purpose has been studied within teleology. on the other hand in the islamic philosophy Farabi binded the notion of giving existence to the divine generosity and imposing order and hierarchy to the existence to the divine Justice. in ibn sina, the divine Purpose consists of the generosity of allah in giving existence. In the time of the first cycle of the Asharites it was expressed that Allah’s actions were far away from following a purpose. (Kutluer, İlhan, “Gâiyyet”, DIA, Xiii/293–5, istanbul, 1996); It can be said that Nursi’s thought is closer to the thought of sufism rather than that of Islamic Kalām and philosophy, which is expressed in the Divine Hadith, “I was a hidden treasure, so I created creation that they might know me” (Al-‘Ajlūnī, Kashf al-Khafā, ii/132; as cited in Nursī, Ishārāt al-I‘jāz, al-Sa□ lihī□ , Ihs□ a□ n Qāsim (ed.), (Dar Sozler, Istanbul, 1994), p. 27; Signs of Miraculousness, trans. Şükran Vahide (Sözler Publications, İstanbul, 2004), p. 24.

[349] For the concept of “Indicative Meaning” (Mānā al-Harfī), see Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 72, 105, 168, 320–21, 328–9, 340–41, 346, 349, 352, 378, 404 vd.

[350] Nursī, The Words, pp. 492–3; Mermer, yamina B., The Hermeneutical Dimension of Science, international symposium (4), september 1998, istanbul, pp. 417–30.

[351] Nursī, The Words, pp. 86–7; see also, Nursī, The Rays, pp. 80–83; For “Universal Purposes for the existence of everything” see Nursī, The Letters, pp. 345–51; Nursī, alMathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 193, 450–51.

[352] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 214, 246, 465.

[353] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 243, 377, 465.

[354] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 450–51.

[355] Nursī, The Words, pp. 132–42, 556–9.

[356] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 243, 465.

[357] about the meaning and importance of “contemplation” in the Risale-i Nur Collection, see, Nursī, The Words, pp. 132–42, 191–2, 338–40, 521–2; For internal and external kinds of “contemplation” see, Nursī, al-

Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 32, 190, 214, 226, 256, 356, 369, 401, 406.

[358] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 284.

[359] Nursī, The Words, pp. 132–42.

[360] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 283.

[361] To Nursī “material causes” are superficial and they have no real influence/effect in he process of creation. They are just apparent curtains covering Divine Power and Dignity (Nursī, The Words, pp. 104, 173, 175, 176, 187, 195, 400, 435–7, 480, 481–2, 565, 569, 696, 704, 709; Nursī, The Rays, pp. 15, 32–4, 163, 173, 194, 281, 574, 617, 619, 625, 627, 629; Nursī, Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 26, 28, 83, 141, 157–9, 164–5, 166–7, 172, 179, 180, 227, 244, 247, 249–50; Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 18–19, 68, 151, 163, 181–3, 184, 233–6, 241–2, 244, 400, 405, 409, 431, 444, 448, amongst others).

[362] For the aspects of “the kingdoms of this world (mulk) and of heaven (malakūt)” see, Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 29.

[363] Nursī, The Rays, p. 22; also Nursi says in the same Treatise:

At one time, due to my excessive feelings of pity, sympathy and kindness, i was exceedingly touched and sorry for living beings, and of them, intelligent beings and man, and particularly the oppressed and disaster-stricken. i exclaimed from my very heart: “neither these monotonous laws which prevail over the world hear the woes of these powerless and weak unfortunates, nor do the overwhelming, deaf elements and events hear them. is there no one who will take pity on their wretched state and intervene in their particular plights?” My spirit was crying out from its very depths. My heart called out with all its strength: “do these fine creatures, these valuable goods, these yearning and grateful friends, have no owner, no master, no true friend who will look to their business, accompany them and protect them?” The satisfying, soothing, and sufficient answer to the cries of my spirit and tumult of my heart was this: through the mystery of the Qur’an and light of belief, and the mystery of divine unity, i perceived the particular favours and special assistance of the all-glorious one, Who is all-Merciful and compassionate, above the law, to those lovable creatures who weep and lament under the pressure of universal laws and the assaults of events; and his particular dominicality towards everything directly; and the facts that he himself directs everything personally and listens to the plaints of all things; and that he is the true owner, protector, and master of everything. I felt an infinite joy in place of that endless despair. Being totally owned by such a glorious owner, and being connected to him, in my view all living beings gained in importance and value a thousand times over. (Nursī, The Rays, pp. 18–19.)

[364] Nursī, The Words, p. 646.

[365] Nursī explains evil and calamities as occasional results out of the many results of the general, universal laws: See Nursī, The Rays, p. 40; But When Nursi says:

allah then in a special way sent to the assistance of individuals crying out at the constraint of those universal laws his names of Most-Merciful and allcompassionate. That is to say, within those universal and general principles he has special succour, special manifestations, so that everything may seek help from him and look to Him at every time for every need (Nursī, The Words, p. 684). he then points out that partial evils, which come to being as results of regular continuation of universal laws are softened and made flexible by such Divine interruptions.

[366] Nursī, The Words, p. 684.

[367] Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 62–3.

[368] Nursī, The Words, pp. 536–7; Nursī, Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 127, 150, 152–3, 161, 170, 185, 263, 274, amongst others.

[369] In relation to objection to “Naturalism” in Nursī, see Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 232–54.

[370] Nursī, The Words, p. 528.

[371] Nursī, The Rays, p. 98; Nursī, The Words, p. 350.

[372] Nursī, The Words, p. 361.

[373] ibid.

[374] Nursī says: “... the Creator of the universe, the Monarch of Pre-Eternity and Posteternity, has made numerous causes and intermediaries a veil to his execution of affairs and has demonstrated the majesty of His Dominicality.” (Nursī, The Words, p. 647) and also, he (allah) creates cause and effect together directly. and in order to demonstrate his wisdom and the manifestation of his names, by establishing an apparent causal relationship and connection through order and sequence, he makes causes and nature a veil to the hand of his power so that the apparent faults, severities and defects in things should be ascribed to them, and in this way his dignity be preserved (Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 244).

in the terminology of Risale-i Nur “the sphere of causes” or “the realm of causality,” consists of the “order” generally dominant in the universe uniformly. This is what is meant in the books of Risale-i Nur, which is sometimes called the divine laws of nature, universal laws, cause-effect relationship, “the two things coming together or being together”, which is called “association” (Iqtirān-Muqāranat). On the other hand according to Nursī it is a requirement of the divine wisdom that the sphere of causes has upper hand over the sphere of belief. Nursī indicates that from the view point of the sphere of causes, mankind has been ordered to obey the order mentioned with their nature, illusion and imagination – since to Nursi, the relationship between cause-and-effect is completely based on illusion and imagination just as it is, to Al-Ghazalī, based on the delusion of feelings. On the other hand, from over the sphere of belief, since causes have no real influence/effect and they have been created as a veil to the affairs of the divine power, mankind must consider this order with their souls and conscience; that is men must understand that the real influence/effect and dominance belong to Allah. (Nursī, Signs of Miraculousness, p. 26; Nursī, al-Mathnawī al‘Arabī, pp. 49, 114, 252, 188–9; Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 182).

[375] Nursī, The Words, p. 362.

[376] Ibid. Additionally see, Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 479.

[377] Since Nursī deals with this issue in many places from different perspectives, it is impossible to cover it within the limits of this article. For example refer to Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 166–9; The Words, pp. 85, 516–17, 578, 361–7, and others.

[378] Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 173.

[379] ibid.

[380] Nursī, The Words, pp. 219–21; Nursī, The Letters, pp. 24–5.

[381] For this concept refer to Nursī, The Words, pp. 86, 219.

[382] Nursī, The Words, p. 220; Nursī, The Letters, p. 25.

[383] Nursī, The Words, p. 362. For two universal reasons of the activity see, Nursī, The Letters, pp. 113–14, 338–40.

[384] The Flashes Collection, pp. 169–71.

[385] (a) The delight in mothers' showing mercy to their children, (b) the enjoyment of male animals' reproducing activity, (c) the enjoyment of transforming from potential to activity, (d) the pleasure felt by some species such as bees in their complying with the divine revelations, and (e) the pleasure of eating, etc., are all similarly considered by Nursi as a sort of "wage" in return for their services, a summary of duties' index and driving force behind activities. (Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-'Arabī, pp. 465–6; Nursī, The Words, pp. 361–7.)

[386] Nursī, The Words, p. 220.

[387] ibid.

[388] Nursī, The Words, p. 578.

[389] The Words, p. 220.

[390] As an example see: Ibn Sīnā, Al-Ilāhiyāt, pp. 72, 116 (www.al-mostafa.com), Access date: 29 January 2008.

[391] Nursī in many of his works mentions “death” and “destruction.” The following sentence is an example:

... the destruction visited upon the beautiful creatures of summer and spring in the autumn is not for the sake of annihilation. instead, it is a form of dismissal after the completion of service. it is also a form of emptying in order to clear a space for the new creation that is to come in the following spring, of preparing the ground and making ready for the beings that are to come and assume their functions. Finally, it is a form of divine warning to conscious beings to awake from the neglect that causes them to forget their duties, from the drunken torpor that causes them to forget their obligation of offering thanks.” (Nursī, The Words, p. 88.)

[392] Nursī, The Letters, p. 336.

[393] Nursī, The Rays, p. 22.

[394] Nursī, The Letters, p. 81.

[395] Nursī, The Words, pp. 59–106.

[396] Nursī, The Words, p. 523.

[397] Nursī, The Rays, p. 65.

[398] To Nursī, creatures living in this material world have different lives in other worlds. This observed world is like a curtain pulled over those unseen worlds. For different spheres of existence see, Nursī, The Letters, pp. 340–41; also, pp. 342–3; Nursī, The Words, pp. 86–8; Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 435–6.

[399] Nursī, on this topic says that:

you will understand that things have been created for eternity, not for annihilation; and as for apparent annihilation, it has the sense of a completion of duty and a release from service, for every transient thing advances to annihilation with one aspect, but remains eternally with numerous other aspects. look, for example, at the flower, a word of God’s power; for a short time it smiles and looks at us, and then hides behind the veil of annihilation. it departs just like a word leaving your mouth. But it does so entrusting thousands of its fellows to men’s ears. it leaves behind meanings in men’s minds as numerous as those minds. The flower, too, expressing its meaning and thus fulfilling its function, goes and departs. But it goes leaving its apparent form in the memory of everything that sees it, its inner essence in every seed. it is as if each memory and seed were a camera to record the adornment of the flower, or a means for its perpetuation. (Nursī, The Words, p. 87.)

[400] For “Preserved Tablet” see, Nursī, The Letters, pp. 55–7.

[401] Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 173.

[402] Nursī, The Words, p. 535.

[403] Nursī, The Letters, p. 340.

[404] For example Nursī says: “Just as the Name of Healer makes it necessary that illness should exist, so too the Name of Provider requires that hunger should exist …” (Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 33);

... throughout the stages of their lives, beings perform numerous varieties of dominical glorifications. They also demonstrate various situations that the Divine names necessitate and require. For example, the name of all-compassionate desires to be compassionate. The name of Provider necessitates the giving of sustenance. The name of gracious requires the granting of favours. and so on; all the divine names require and necessitate something. Thus, in addition to demonstrating the requirements of the names through their lives and existences, all living beings glorify the all-Wise Maker to the number of their members and faculties ... . (Nursī, The Letters, pp. 348–9.)

[405] The Letters, p. 340; “Whether the animals feel pain and whether they will be compansated or not in the hereafter in return for the pain they endured have been discussed in the Western thought. in this context, for instance Origen says that animals’ having soul, makes them ethical beings, therefore they are liable to endure sorrows.” (origen, De principiis, i:viii; iiix). in the nineteenth century John Wesley and in our day Keith Ward, have said that animals’ pains will be compansated in the hereafter by all means (John Wesley, “The General Deliverance,” sermon lX (in Works), 11. ed. (london: John Mason, 1856) Vi, pp. 226–37; Keith Ward, The Concept of God (oxford: Blackwell, 1974, p. 223).

[406] Al-Jurjānī, Sharh al-Mawāqif, i/29.

[407] Nursī, The Words, p. 363.

[408] Nursī says: “The Beauteous All-Merciful One, Who orders the sun and moon, the elements and minerals, plants and animals like the warp and weft of a vast woven tapestry through the rays of His thousand and one Names,and causes them to serve life.” (Nursī, alMathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 46–7; Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 136).

[409] Nursī, The Words, p. 564.

[410] ibid.

[411] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 163; Nursī, The Letters, p. 551 (aphorism no: 86).

[412] Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 341.

[413] For the divine name of “Most holy” (Quddūs) see Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 395–9.

[414] Nursī, The Words, p. 477.

[415] Nursī, The Letters, p. 553 (aphorism no: 106).

[416] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 163.

[417] ibid.

[418] Nursī indicates that the words of the Prophet (PBUH) about “retaliation” (“retaliation shall be made for the hornless sheep on the horned on resurrection day.” The Flashes, p. 341), point out that animals will be rewarded in return for their duties and that their souls will stay immortal even if their bodies have turned to soil. on the other hand Nursi claims that the members of a species may be collected one by one or all together in “a blessed animal”. (Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 408.) Because, according to Nursī, very similar to pure matters such as air, electricity, magnetics, which can share the same place without any problem, the same situation is true for soul (Nursī, The Words, pp. 682–3, 686; Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 244–5).

[419] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 163.

[420] “in any event, calm, repose, idleness, monotony, and arrest from action are forms of non-existence, and harm. Action and change are existence and good.” (Nursī, The Letters, p. 65); see also, “… change and alteration arise from createdness, from being renewed in order to be perfected, from need, from materiality, and from contingency” (Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 454).

[421] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 450–51; Nursī, The Words, p. 241.

[422] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 450–51; Nursī, The Flashes Collection, p. 341.

[423] Al-Jurjānī, Sharh al-Mawāqif, Viii/221.

[424] Nursī, The Words, p. 220.

[425] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 346; For Nursi’s comparisons of animals and men see: Nursī, The Rays, p. 221; Nursī, The Words, pp. 332–6 and so on.

[426] according to Nursi, the limitation of animal feelings by the creation take place not only at the level of pleasure-pain but at every level. This is one of the most stressed topics in the Risale-i Nur Collection. For example look at Nursī, The Words, Twenty-third Word, chapters 1 and 2.

[427] Nursī in this context states that: “For man, even animals with young, receive pleasure at the pleasure and happiness of their relatives, offsring, and friends, and in one respect are happy.” (Nursī, The Rays, p. 249.)

[428] Nursī, The Rays, pp. 76–8; Nursī, The Words, pp. 369–70.

[429] Nursī, The Rays, p. 221.

[430] Nursī, The Rays, p. 374.

[431] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 410, 179.

[432] Nursī, The Rays, p. 374; Nursī, The Words, pp. 159, 334.

[433] Nursī, The Rays, p. 221.

[434] ibid.

[435] ibid.

[436] ibid.

[437] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 231.

[438] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 444.

[439] Nursī, The Letters, p. 24.

[440] Nursī, The Words, p. 240.

[441] ibid.

[442] al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 450–51.

[443] it can be claimed that one of the most serious contributions to the problem of “animal pain” has been made by John Hick. John hick’s famous teodise is based on the concept of “soul-making.” human suffering is explained with a comprehensive divine plan consisting of providing the appropriate environment and conditions, where human beings, in a total freedom, can improve themselves in terms of morality and soul. For hick the problem of animal pain is a part of the background where the man-centered plan is consecuted. Therefore the problem of animal pain is a part of the problem of naturel evil, which is a sort of obligatory evil to keep away human beings at an epistemic distance. This epistemic distance is necessary for human beings to do moral choices and choose allah freely. according to this idea the existence of allah should not be more obvious than it should, nor should it be impossible to believe. This idea is briefly expressed by Nursī as “the door of the intelligence must remain open, and its freedom must not be snatched from its hand.” (Nursī, The Letters, p. 122.) Furtheremore hick believes that “suffering” is something special to human experience, though “pain” is very comon in the nature. suffering requires such a complex cognitive awareness that can not be associated with animals. Therefore pain when compared to suffering corresponds to a simpler level of mind. in short: “one must have certain mental attitudes, beliefs and desires and be able to conceptualize one’s experience.” in this respect pain, to hick must be considered as an “immediate sensory awareness.” hick, John, “evil and the god of love” (new york: harper and row, 1978), p. 313; Peter harrison, another philosopher, assumes that animals do not have a real consciousness, therefore they do not feel pain, harrison, Peter, “Theodicy and animal Pain”, Philosophy 64 (1989) pp. 79–92.

[444] For example, charles darwin claims that the world is full of countless evils and when other sentient beings than humans beings are considered, these evils can not be explained just by moral improvement. see, charles darwin, The Autobiography of Charles Darwin, nora Barlow (ed.), (new york: W.W. norton, p. 90).

[445] Nursī, Muh□ākamāt al-‘Aqliyya (Sözler Publication, Istanbul, 1995), p. 53; Nursī, The Letters, pp. 62–4; Nursī, The Rays, 39–40, 89–90; For example Nursī says:

… inductive reasoning and general experience show and conclude that evil, ugliness, defect, badness and futility are minor in the creation of the universe. They are not the aim; they are dependent and secondary. That is to say, for example, ugliness has not entered the universe for the sake of ugliness, but as a unit of measurement in order to transform a single truth of beauty into many truths. evil, and satan even, have been set to pester man in order to be the means of man’s limitless progress through competition. Minor evils and ugliness like these have been created in the universe in order to be the means of instances of universal beauty and good. Thus, according to inductive reasoning, the true aim and result of creation in the universe proves that good, beauty and being perfected are fundamental and that they are the true aim. (Nursī, The Damascus Sermon, sozler Publications, istanbul, 1989, p. 28).

[446] Ibid.

[447] Nursī, The Words, p. 28; Nursī, The Rays, pp. 648–55; for example Nursī says: “... For the country of an utterly just, compassionate, beneficent, powerful, order-loving, and kind king could not be in the way you imagined, nor could a country which demonstrated this number of clear signs of progress and achievement.” (The Words, p. 28) similarly he addresses in another place in that way:

Oh man! you do not own yourself. rather, you are totally owned by one Whose power is infinite, an All-Compassionate One of Glory Whose mercy is infinite. Therefore, do not trouble yourself by shouldering the burden of your life, for it is he Who grants you life and administers it. Furthermore, creatures such as men and animals have not been left to their own devices, rather, they are all officials with specific duties. They are watched over by an All-Wise and Compassionate One. Do not distress your spirit thinking of their pains and afflictions. Do not try to be more sympathetic and kind-hearted than their all-compassionate creator. also, the reins of all those things that are hostile to you, from microbes to plagues, storms, famine and earthquakes, are in the hands of that all-compassionate allWise one. Being all-Wise, he does nothing in vain. Being all-compassionate, his mercy is superabundant. There is a form of grace and favour contained in everything He does (Nursī, The Words, p. 665).

Again touching on the pain and sorrow felt by human beings who witness the evils befalling on animals, Nursī, claims that this sorrow comes from human beings’ empathy with animals and not knowing the reality. To him, if the real situation was understood the compassion felt for animals would turn into “a compassion deserving appreciation.” Nursī even says that, “not those animals but the souls having pity for them should be pitied.” (Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, pp. 450–51).

[448] Nursī, The Words, pp. 240–41.

[449] The Letters, pp. 62–3.

[450] Nursī, The Rays, p. 98.

[451] Nursī, The Words, p. 186.

[452] Nursī, The Words, p. 350.

[453] also John hick defends a similar opinion, see hick, John, Evil and the God of Love, p. 313.

[454] Nursī, al-Mathnawī al-‘Arabī, p. 40; Nursī, The Words, pp. 300–301; since there is the possibility for human mind to fail in seeing those beauties and regard them as ugliness, allah placed causes between those things and human mind, so that human beings should not give ugliness directly to Allah but to those causes, see Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 428–30. Therefore Nursī here directly correlates the problem of evil with “the theory of causes”, causation (Asbāb) and the notion of “unity of god” (Tawh□īd).

[455] Nursī, Emirdağ Lahikası, Söz Basım Yayın, Istanbul, 2005, I/57.

[456] Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 169–73.

[457] Nursī, The Words, p. 188.

[458] Nursī, The Flashes Collection, pp. 105, 118–19.

[459] Nursī, Kastamonu Lahikası, Söz Basım Yayın, İstanbul, 2006, pp. 96–7, 149, 253, 257, 279.

[460] Emirdağ Lahikası, i/57.

[461] halpern, Manfred, The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa (Princeton: Princeton university Press, 1963), p. 129.

[462] lerner, daniel, The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East (new york: Free Press, 1964), p. 405.

[463] al-‘azm, sadik, “islamic Fundamentalism reconsidered: a critical outline of Problems, ideas, and approaches, Part ii.” South Asian Bulletin 13, no. 2: 73–98 (1993): 97.

[464] Nursi, B.Z., Letters, 1928–1932, second edn, translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sölzer Publications, 1997), p. 88.

[465] Nursi, B.Z., The Words, translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sölzer Publications, 1992), p. 265.

[466] Nursi, B.Z., Letters, 1928–1932, second edn, translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sölzer Publications, 1997), p. 74.

[467] ibid., pp. 74–5.

[468] ibid., p. 75.

[469] ibid., p. 547.

[470] Fuller, lon l., The Morality of Law, revised edition (new haven: yale university Press, 1969), pp. 14, 17.

[471] Nursi, B.Z., The Words, translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sölzer Publications, 1992), p. 97.

[472] ibid., p. 695.

[473] Fuller, lon l., The Morality of Law, 5.

[474] ibid., p. 7.

[475] ibid.

[476] ibid., p. 6.

[477] ibid., p. 9.

[478] ibid., pp. 5–6.

[479] Nursi, The Damascus Sermon, second edn, translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sölzer Publications, 1996), p. 68.

[480] Nursi, B.Z., Letters, 1928–1932, pp. 59–60.

[481] ibid., pp. 66–9.

[482] ibid., p. 69.

[483] ibid., p. 70.

[484] Vahide, Şükran, Islam in Modern Turkey: An Intellectual Biography of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 2005), pp. 42–7.

[485] Berkes, niyazi, The Development of Secularism in Turkey (Montréal: Mcgill university Press, 1964), pp. 106–10.

[486] duben, alan, and cem Behar, Istanbul Households: Marriage, Family, and Fertility, 1880–1940 (cambridge: cambridge university Press, 1991).

[487] Kirli, cengiz, “coffeehouses: Public opinion in the nineteenth-century ottoman empire.” in Public Islam and the Common Good, ed. armando salvatore and dale F. eickelman (leiden: Brill, 2004), pp. 75–97.

[488] Frierson, elizabeth B., “gender, consumption, and Patriotism: The emergence of an ottoman Public sphere.” in Public Islam and the Common Good, ed. armando salvatore and dale F. eickelman (leiden: Brill, 2004), pp. 99–125.

[489] Çinar, alev, Modernity, Islam, and Secularism in Turkey: Bodies, Places, and Time (Minneapolis: university of Minnesota Press, 2005), and Jenny White, Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics (seattle: university of Washington Press, 2002).

[490] Keane, John, “The limits of secularism,” Times Literary Supplement, January 9, 1999, p. 12.

[491] Madan, T.n., “secularism in its Place,” Journal of Asian Studies 6 (1987): pp. 747–59.

[492] shils, edward (1972) The Intellectuals and the Powers (chicago: university of chicago Press, 1972), p. 17.

[493] Nursi, The Damascus Sermon, p. 67.

[494] Masud, Muhammad Khalid, “The scope of Pluralism in islamic Moral Traditions.” in The Many and the One: Religious and Secular Perspectives on Ethical Pluralism in the Modern World, ed. richard Madsen and Tracey B. strong (Princeton: Princeton university Press, 2003), pp. 181–5.

[495] Bellah, robert n., Beyond Belief: Essays on Religion in a Post-Traditional World (new york: harper & row, 1970), pp. 150–51.

[496] ibid., p. 151.

[497] little, david, “The development in the West of the right to Freedom of religion and conscience: a Basis for comparison with islam.” in Human Rights and the Conflict of Cultures: Western and Islamic Perspectives on Religious Liberty, ed. david little, John Kelsay, and abdulaziz a. sachedina (columbia: university of south carolina Press, 1988), p. 30.

[498] ibid.

[499] rahman, Fazlur, Major Themes of the Qur’an (Minneapolis: Bibliotheca islamica, 1980), p. 163.

[500] ibid., p. 164.

[501] Michel, Thomas, “Muslim-christian dialogue and cooperation in the Thought of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi,” Muslim World 86: 3–4 (July–october 1999): 325.

[502] Masud, Muhammad Khalid, Shatibi’s Philosophy of Islamic Law (islamabad: islamic research institute).

[503] eickelman, dale F., and James Piscatori, “social Theory in the study of Muslim societies.” in Muslim Travellers: Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination, ed. dale F. eickelman and James Piscatori (Berkeley and los angeles: university of california Press, 1995), pp. 15–18.

[504] Mardin, Şerif (1989) Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediüzzaman Said Nursi (albany: state university of new york Press, 1989), p. 6.

[505] Buti, saïd ramadan al- “Bediuzzaman Said Nursi’s experience of serving islam by Means of Politics.” in Third International Symposium on Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, vol. 1 (Istanbul: Sözler Publications, 1997), pp. 111–21.

[506] Nursi, said, Nature: Cause or Effect? translated from the Turkish by Ümit Şimşek (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yanıları, 1985).

[507] Though of Kurdish origin, Nursi formally adopted Turkish nationality—later dropping the nisbah “al-Kurdi” from his name—and wrote in ottoman Turkish.

[508] For his biography, see e. Kohlberg, “al-shahid al-Thani,” in EI ², vol. 9, pp. 209–10.

[509] His struggles are recounted in the excellent biography by Şükran Vahide entitled Islam in Modern Turkey: an Intellectual Biography of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany:

suny Press, 2005); for a brief account, see Kemal Karpat, EI ², vol. 8, pp. 143–4.

[510] david hume, Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, ed. nelson Pike (indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970), p. 88.

[511] alan Jones, Early Arabic Poetry: volume two: Select Odes (oxford: ithaca Press, 1996), p. 205.

[512] For the arabic text, a literal translation and word-by-word commentary, see Jones, op. cit., pp. 206–34. Jones's rendering of rayb as "mischief," though correct, sounds a bit too mild for the circumstances; lane (3:1198) gives "evil accidents" (of time or fate), which seems more apt.

[513] i cite from the edition printed in najaf 1342 [1923]; cf. Dhari'ah, 21:20 (no. 3747), and GAL ii: 425(3); s ii: 449(3). i am grateful to Mr. Bruce craig for providing me with a photocopy of this rare imprint from the collections of the university of chicago library.

[514] Musakkin, p. 3.

[515] For a discussion, see Vincenzo Poggi, Un classico della spiritualità musulmana: saggio monografico sul "Munqidh" di al-Ġazali. (rome, 1967), pp. 188, 203; and my own "The Taste of Truth: the structure of experience in al-ghazali's Munqidh min al-Dalal, in Islamic Studies presented to Charles J. Adams (leiden, 1991), pp. 129–48; and, for a more recent brief discussion, my Ghazali: The Revival of Islam (oxford: oneworld, 2008), pp. 104–5.

[516] Musakkin, p. 4.

[517] ibid.

[518] on this, and the related problem of the suffering of animals, see my Theodicy in Islamic Thought: The Dispute over al-Ghazali’s “Best of All Possible Worlds” (Princeton, 1984), pp. 244–6.

[519] Al-Fisal fi’l-milal (Beirut, 1975), 3:121; see also, Theodicy, op. cit., p. 220.

[520] Al-Fisal fi’l-milal, cited in i. goldziher, The Zahiris, trans. Wolfgang Behn (leiden: Brill, 1971), pp. 141–2.

[521] Musakkin, p. 14.

[522] Musakkin, p. 9.

[523] ibid.

[524] Musakkin, p. 10.

[525] Musakkin, p. 14.

[526] Musakkin, p. 5.

[527] ibid., pp. 12–22.

[528] ibid., p. 14.

[529] Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, Letters 1928–1932, translated [from the ottoman Turkish] by Şükran Vahide (Istanbul: Sözler Neşriyat Ticaret ve Sanayi A.Ş., 1997), pp. 100 ff.

[530] Letters, p. 100.

[531] Letters, p. 102.

[532] Vahide, p. 5.

[533] ibid., p. 11.

[534] Vahide, pp. 198–9:

I saw myself to be in five exiles of varying hues. The first: due to old age, I was alone and a stranger, far from most of my friends, relatives, and close ones … . Then another sphere of exile opened up within this one: i felt a sad sense of separation and exile at having been left by most of the beings to which i am attached; like last spring, they have departed. and a further sphere of exile opened up within this, which was that i was away from my native land and relatives, and alone … then, too, the lonesomeness of the night and the mountains made me feel another pitiable exile. And finally, I saw my spirit in an overwhelming exile, which had been prepared to journey to eternity both from this exile and from the transitory guesthouse of this world.

[535] The Words (istanbul, 1998; trans. Vahide), p. 248 (nineteenth Word).

[536] see my Theodicy in Islamic Thought (Princeton, 1984), for a discussion of this statement and the controversy it provoked.

[537] Letters, p. 336.

[538] cf. the beautiful passage from The Fruits of Belief (Tenth Topic), quoted in Vahide, p. 268: “after our release from denizli Prison, I was staying on the top floor of the famous Şehir Hotel. The subtle, graceful dancing of the leaves, branches and trunks of the many poplar trees in the fine gardens opposite me, each with a rapturous and ecstatic motion, like a circle of dervishes, pained my heart … i so pitied those graceful poplars and living creatures swaying with perfect joyousness that my eyes filled with tears … .”

[539] Letters, p. 340.

[540] The Rays (trans. Vahide), p. 41.

[541] The Words, p. 219.

[542] cf. Qur’an 2:26 (trans. dawood): “god does not disdain to give a parable about a gnat”; for the gnat and other small creatures in Ghazāli, see my Theodicy in Islamic Thought, pp. 45–6, and Ghazali: The Revival of Islam, p. 111. in The Flashes Collection (Istanbul, 1995), p. 235, Nursi states, “The tiny body of a fly is connected with most of the elements and causes in the universe; indeed, it is a summary of them.”

[543] Musakkin, pp. 34–5.

[544] Qur’an, 30:50.

[545] orhan Pamuk, Istanbul: Memories of a City, london 2005, p. 81.

[546] Ibid. On the general historical background to Nursi’s work at this time, see Şerif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany, 1989). For the broader historical context from a western perspective, see david Fromkin, A Peace To End All Peace: The Fall of the Ottoman Empire and the Creation of the Modern Middle East (london, 2000).

[547] Op. cit., p. 81. On the question of the relationship between Sufism and Nursi’s thought, see Şerif Mardin, “Reflections on Said Nursi’s Life and Thought,” in: Ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘, Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (albany, 2003), pp. 45–50, particularly p. 45.

[548] There are passages in the Risale-i Nur where Nursi demonstrates an awareness of the character of modernist culture and discourse, although his real concern is always to reveal the nature of a more genuinely spiritual understanding of human existence. cf.

Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, The Words (istanbul, 1992) p. 99:

Brief gatherings and dispersions are arranged at great expense merely for the sake of taking pictures that can thereafter be shown in the cinema. so too, one of the reasons for our passage through individual and social life in this life, for a brief time, is to enable pictures to be taken and images formed, to enable the result of our deeds to be registered and recorded, for display on a day of accounting, for being shown to a vast gathering, and to yield the fruit of supreme happiness.

[549] Inevitably this short chapter will focus on this one very specific question and principally one key text from the Risale, the Tenth Word, and i will not, therefore, have the space to go into the fascinating question of the role of the resurrection of the dead in Sufi thought, and the fullest extent of this influence upon Nursi's own thinking on this question.

[550] orhan Pamuk's recent induction as the nobel laureate for literature demonstrates something of the potential that both Turkish and islamic thought and writings have for a profound and positive influence on western cultural identity.

[551] although in retrospect Western christian theologians invest the 1920s with great intellectual and moral significance, most notably because of the publication of Karl Barth's Commentary on Romans in 1919 and the subsequent establishment of dialectical theology, the facts are that the mainstream european churches remained largely committed to a discredited socio-cultural ideology, particularly in germany and england. on this question see gareth Jones, Critical Theology: Questions of Truth and Method (cambridge, 1995), pp. 11–38.

[552] Şükran Vahide, "Towards an Intellectual Biography of Nursi," in: Ibrahim M.

abu-rabi', op. cit., pp. 1–32; p. 10.

[553] i have avoided using the word "eschatology" in relation to Nursi's understanding of the resurrection of the dead because of uncertainty over the appropriateness of this concept in relation to islamic thought, although modern western christian ideas about resurrection are overwhelmingly eschatological. For a more confident view on this question, see Barbara Freyer stowasser, "The apocalypse in the Teachings of Said Nursi," in ibrahim M. abu-rabi', op. cit., pp. 229–36: stowasser draws out several key themes in Nursi's work on this question, though the distinction between apocalyptic – the seeing of heavenly secrets – and eschatology – the seeing of heavenly secrets about the end time – is not entirely apparent. in this respect, it is unclear whether Nursi has any understanding of the seeing of heavenly secrets in the sense of Jewish apocalyptic, with its strongly mystical connotations.

[554] See again Şerif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey, op. cit.

[555] Verses of dante’s poem are cited from c.h. sissons’ translation: The Divine Comedy (oxford, 1993).

[556] Vahide, op. cit., p. 10.

[557] ibid.

[558] ibid., p. 11.

[559] Vahide, op. cit., p. 12. “Perspective” clearly is not the same thing as apocalyptic if the latter is indeed defined as the seeing of heavenly secrets, but similarities and tensions between different monotheistic faiths on this optical question are perhaps not irrelevant and deserve further study.

[560] d.d. Paige (ed.), Selected Letters of Ezra Pound (new york, 1971), p. 323.

[561] something of Nursi’s attitude to this new maps/old maps argument can be detected in a marvellous reference in The Rays, where he has this to say about the fruits of belief:

it shows its favourable effects in every group, particular and universal, and illuminates them. The sociologists and moralists, who are concerned with the social life of mankind, should take special note. if the rest of the thousands of benefits and advantages of belief in the hereafter are compared with the five or six we have alluded to, it will be understood that it is only belief that is the means of happiness in this world and the next, and in the lives of both, The Rays (istanbul, 1998), p. 247.

[562] Work is scarce on this aspect of Pound’s thought, but see Masimo Bacigalupo, The Formed Trace: The Later Poetry of Ezra Pound (new york, 1980).

[563] as with any judgement about modernity, however, Pound’s is fraught with difficulties. While it is true that, for example, Robert Musil’s The Man Without Qualities (london, 1979), and even more so elias canetti’s Auto-da-Fe (london, 1978), echo Pound’s sentiment about modernity, Thomas Mann’s The Magic Mountain (london, 1979) is almost entirely an attempt to find just such a particular understanding – and within a particular landscape, at that – and hermann Broch’s The Death of Virgil (london, 1983) and The Sleepwalkers (london, 1986) are also “grand” narratives in a philosophical sense counter to Pound’s instinct. on this criticism see george steiner, “dante now: The gossip of eternity,” in: On Difficulty and Other Essays (oxford, 1978), pp. 164–85, esp. p. 178: “it is the cunning genius of Pound’s Cantos (in this respect so intimately heir to Browning’s long poems) to quarry the epic convention while staying bitty, idiosyncratic, incomplete and radically egotistical in the modern anti-epic vein.”

[564] on this question in dante’s Divine Comedy, which is the intellectual background to Pound’s comments cited here, see Peter s. hawkins, “crossing over: dante and Pilgrimage,” in: Dante’s Testaments: Essays in Scriptural Imagination (stanford, 1999), pp. 247–64, esp. pp. 247–8.

[565] T.s. eliot, The Waste Land, in: Collected Poems 1909–1962 (london, 1963). The dedication to Pound is on p. 61. The dante reference is from the Purgatorio XXVi, line 117.

[566] eliot, op. cit., p. 65 (lines 60–69).

[567] on this question see david e. chinitz, T.S. Eliot and the Cultural Divide (chicago, 2005), esp. pp. 19–32.

[568] eliot, op. cit., p. 65 (lines 69–70).

[569] i should note at once here that my intellectual and theological interest in this contrast between Nursi, modernism and dante is methodological rather than substantive; i am not attempting to argue that Nursi was a modernist. nor would i seek to defend some of dante's reprehensible comments about the Prophet, comments that, whatever the historical context in which dante was writing, have no place and no defence in contemporary Muslim-christian dialogue. on this question and others, see Miguel asin, Islam and the Divine Comedy (new delhi, 2002). on the somewhat wider question of dante's intellectual relationship with the near east, see Brenda deen schildgen's Dante and the Orient (chicago, 2002), particularly chapter 4 on "dante and the indus: The salvation of Pagans," pp. 92–109. i am not certain that schildgen has entirely seen the theological and religious significance of some of Dante's omissions, but the work as a whole is an incisive analysis of the sources behind his text.

[570] Nursi, The Words, op. cit., p. 59.

[571] Nursi relates the same point directly to the Qur'an later in the Tenth Word: "Verses of the Qur'an, such as the oft-repeated, It will be naught but a single cry, and, The command of the hour of resurrection will be like the glance of the eye, show that the supreme resurrection will take place in a single instant, without the passage of any time. our narrow intellects require some tangible parable to enable us to accept and assent to this infinitely miraculous and unparalleled statement.”

[572] eliot, of course, later became far more concerned with explicitly theological questions, most famously in Four Quartets: see chinitz, op. cit., pp. 153–4.

[573] ezra Pound, A Draft of XXX Cantos, london 1997, p. 7.

[574] see stephen sicari, Pound’s Epic Ambition: Dante and the Modern World (albany, 1991), p. 7: “The epic poem in the modern age with its extraordinary proliferation of detail and data which must be ‘contained’ is the attempt of the rash man who has no map to follow.”

[575] Pound, op. cit., p. 7.

[576] William cookson, A Guide to the Cantos of Ezra Pound (london, 2001), p. 3.

[577] Pound, op cit., pp. 8–9. cf. homer, The Odyssey, trans. e.V. rieu (london, 1946), pp. 174–5.

[578] dante alighieri, op. cit., pp. 158–9.

[579] See John Freccero, “dante’s ulysses: From epic to novel,” in: The Poetics of Conversion (london, 1986), pp. 136–51, particularly p. 138: “as in homer’s epic, so in dante’s story the journey of ulysses stands as an emblem of human time, but the homeric story is glossed from a linear, christian viewpoint, from the perspective of death. it is for this reason that dante’s ulysses ends as a shipwreck rather than at home with Penelope.” Pound’s odysseus also meets his end in a shipwreck, but the viewpoint is anything but christian, and Pound invests death with little of Freccero’s

“linear … perspective;” see sicari, op. cit., p. 21: “[Pound] … needs the homeric wanderer to emphasize that the modern journey to origins is an unmarked, unaided, and isolated endeavor … .”

[580] The key point here centers on a mistranslation in the latin version used by Pound; see carroll F. Terrell, A Companion to the Cantos of Ezra Pound (london, 1980), p. 2: “Pound’s translation of andreas divus’s latin translation of the greek word digonos which was apparently printed in place of the now accepted diogenes in line 92 of Book Xi of the Odyssey. divus was probably using a corrupt renaissance edition of the greek text… . Whereas digonos means twice-born or double, diogenes means ‘spring from Zeus or, in a general sense, ‘noble’ … .”

[581] The Words, op. cit., p. 95.

[582] ibid., p. 70.

[583] ibid., p. 74.

[584] There is also a very interesting sense in which the economy of translation in dante and Pound, from greek to latin to the vernacular, mirrors the economy of salvation as a journey of transposition. For dante, that salvation is christian; for Pound, secular – or perhaps better, poetic. Pound’s explicit citation of the divus translation in the text of canto i points in this direction, though it is impossible to be certain of his exact intention. see here daniel albright, “early cantos i–Xli,” in: The Cambridge Companion to Ezra Pound, pp. 59–91, esp. pp. 60–64.

[585] dante alighieri, op. cit., p. 158. Pound’s attitude towards ulysses’ fate is typically idiosyncratic: “re. punishment of ulysses, no one seems to note the perfectly useless, trifling, unprovoked sack of the Cicones in the Odyssey. Troy was one thing, they were inveigled;” in: T.s. eliot (ed.), The Literary Essays of Ezra Pound (london, 1954), p. 212.

[586] This is not simply a general point. When Virgil reasons, “The human race should be content with the quia” (Purgatorio iii, 37), he makes a moral injunction that introduces an important argument from medieval scholasticism, one that dante knew well and one that is central to his entire anthropology. The argument focuses on the limitations of human reason and thereby knowledge, and informs the mechanics of theological argumentation. it is most clearly reasoned by Johannes scotus in his De divisione naturae, where he writes of god that we cannot know “quid est, sed quia solummodo est” [not … what god is but only the fact that he is] – quia est; De divizione naturae V, col. 919c. Properly understood, the quia est is applied to god’s effects in the world: such things exist because god created the world and perpetually governs it; from created order one understands, analogically, divine order. This reasoning provides the demonstratio quia, most succinctly expressed scholastically by Thomas in the Summa Theologiae:

There are two types of demonstration. one, showing “why,” follows the natural order of things among themselves, arguing from cause to effect; the other, showing “that,” follows the order in which we know things, arguing from effect to cause (for when an effect is more apparent to us than its cause, we come to know the cause through the effect). [Summa Theologiae i.2.a.2 resp.]

There is an absolutely fascinating article on theological method to be written, contrasting Nursi’s use of metaphor with this medieval christian understanding of analogy.

[587] see sicari, op. cit., pp. 1–16. The essential point, however, is hardly new to Pound: the modern sense of humanity’s Promethean ascent to its own absolute is central to hegel’s phenomenology, schelling’s philosophy of revelation, and nietzsche’s entire oeuvre.

[588] For an excellent treatment of this question, see Peter s. hawkins, Descendit ad inferos, in: op. cit., pp. 99–124. one of the many fascinating contrasts here between the Aeneid and the christian tradition is that aeneas descends to hell to be reunited with his father. By contrast, christ’s descent is as a result of doing his Father’s will (see Mark 14.36), and involves their separation rather than reunion (albeit ultimate reunion lies beyond that separation). For the background to Virgil and dante on this question, see ronald r. Mcdonald, The Burial Places of Memory: Epic Underworlds in Virgil, Dante, and Milton (amherst, 1987).

[589] dante’s descent starts (allegorically) from the same place as christ’s; that is, golgotha (see Inferno i, 13).

[590] Nursi, The Words, op. cit., p. 106.

[591] ibid., p. 67.

[592] ibid., p. 64.

[593] ibid., p. 66.

[594] ibid., p. 90.

[595] ibid., p. 71.

[596] By “providence” here i mean the doctrine that god has ordered creation and that humanity has a designated place in such ordering, an expression of god’s will that conditions how one understands questions of humanity’s fate as well as its responsibilities.

[597] op. cit., p. 64.

[598] ibid., p. 75.

[599] ibid., p. 70.

[600] ibid., p. 94.

[601] dante alighieri, op. cit., p. 208.

[602] ibid., p. 61.

[603] ibid.

[604] one should note in passing that not only are these individuals all pagans, but avicenna and averrhoes were Muslims, too – albeit “gente di molto valore” for dante because of their translations of aristotle.

[605] dante alighieri, op. cit., p. 61.

[606] christ, being unknown in hell, is not named by Virgil. The question of the extent to which christ descended into hell; therefore, how “deep,” is a notorious conundrum in christian doctrine. For a different argument to dante’s, see hans urs von Balthasar, Mysterium Paschale (edinburgh, 1990), pp. 168–76.

[607] Thomas aquinas, In Ioan. Evangel. iii, iii, 5; see charles s. singleton (ed.), The Divine Commentary: Inferno 2: Commentary (Princeton, 1970), p. 59.

[608] “a more essential statement of the matter would be that the pagans did not have sanctifying grace or the three theological virtues that attend such grace, and without these ‘Deo cultus debitus’ is impossible;” Singleton op. cit., p. 60.

[609] op. cit., p. 70.

[610] ibid., p. 82.

[611] ibid., p. 87.

[612] From the Risale-i Nur Collection. The Words, On the Nature and Purposes of Man, Life and All Things by Bediuzzaman Said Nursi. Translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide, pp. 251, 460.

[613] From the Risale-i Nur Colection. The Rays Collection by Bediuzzaman Said Nursi. Translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide, pp. 268, 310.

[614] ibid., p. 51.

[615] The Words, pp. 146, 421, 753.

[616] ibid., pp. 128–31.

[617] ibid., p. 112.

[618] The Rays Collection, pp. 267, 268; The Words, pp. 251, 460.

[619] The Damascus Sermon. p. 113; Letters, p. 553.

[620] From the Risale-i Nur Collection. The Flashes Collection by Bediuzzaman Said Nursi. Translated from the Turkish by Şükran Vahide, pp. 63–4.

[621] Letters, pp. 464–5; The Words, pp. 495–500, 738.

[622] ibid., pp. 317–18.

[623] The Flashes Collection, p. 374.

[624] The Words, p. 95.

[625] The Flashes Collection, pp. 400–401.

[626] The Words, p. 77; The Flashes Collection, p. 392.

[627] The Words, p. 78.

[628] The Words, p. 751.

[629] The Flashes Collection, p. 402.

[630] Letters, p. 549.

[631] The Rays Collection, p. 305.

[632] The Words, p. 78.

[633] ibid. p. 98.

[634] The Rays Collection, pp. 232, 250.

[635] The Flashes Collection, p. 363.

[636] The Damascus Sermon, p. 124.

[637] ibid., pp. 68–70.

[638] ibid., p. 103.

[639] Letters, p. 552; The Words, p. 761.

[640] Letters, p. 313; The Damascus Sermon, p. 127.

[641] The Rays Collection, pp. 401–2.

[642] Letters, p. 318.

[643] The Damascus Sermon, p. 70; The Rays Collection, p. 112.

[644] The Rays Collection, p. 372.

[645] The Damascus Sermon, p. 102; The Words, pp. 740, 753.

[646] The Damascus Sermon, pp. 33, 102; Letters, p. 545; The Words, p. 740.

[647] The Words, p. 739.

[648] The Damascus Sermon, p. 100; Letters, p. 544.

[649] The Damascus Sermon, p. 102; Letters, p. 545; The Flashes Collection, p. 225.

[650] The Damascus Sermon, pp. 72–5, 78–9.

[651] The Damascus Sermon, pp. 51, 56–8, 87.

[652] The Flashes Collection, pp. 92–3, 242.

[653] The Damascus Sermon, p. 104.

[654] ibid., p. 105.

[655] The Flashes Collection, p. 160.

[656] The Damascus Sermon, pp. 27, 28, 32, 38, 67–8; The Flashes Collection, p. 169.

[657] William apel, Signs of Peace. The Interfaith Letters of Thomas Merton (Maryknoll, ny, 2006), p. 21. see also Thomas Merton, Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander, second edn (london, 1977), p. 17, where Merton speaks of his having been moved by sura xlii.32.

[658] letter written by Merton to abdul aziz in 1961, quoted in Thomas Merton, Thoughts on the East (new york, 1995), p. 55.

[659] Nursi, Twentieth Flash, second cause, n. 7; The Flashes, pp. 203–4.

[660] lucinde allen Mosher, “The Marrow of Worship and the Moral Vision: Said Nursi,” in ibrahim M. abu-rabi‘ (ed.), Islam at the Crossroads. On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (Albany, NY, 2003), pp. 181–97; 181. See also Şükran Vahide, The Author of the Risale-i Nur: Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, second edn (istanbul, 1998).

[661] Michael ramsey, The Christian Priest Today, new revised edition (london, 1985), p. 14.

[662] see especially Thomas Merton, Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander, Part Two: “Truth and Violence: an interesting era.”

[663] Thomas Merton, Life and Holiness (new york, 1963), p. 46.

[664] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 101.

[665] Merton, Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander, p. 62.

[666] Thomas Merton, Thoughts in Solitude (Boston, 1993), x–xi; cf, Life and Holiness, p. 82.

[667] Thoughts in Solitude, ix.

[668] Thoughts in Solitude, x–xi.

[669] Merton, Thoughts in Solitude, x–xi.

[670] Merton, Thoughts in Solitude, x–xi.

[671] Thomas Merton, Ascent to Truth (london, 1994), p. 3.

[672] Merton, Ascent to Truth, p. 3.

[673] Merton, Ascent to Truth, p. 6.

[674] Thomas Merton, No Man is an Island (london, 1951), p. 37.

[675] , p. 37.

[676] , p. 37.

[677] , p. 37.

[678] , p. 37.

[679] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 37.

[680] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 37.

[681] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 56.

[682] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 56.

[683] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 60.

[684] , p. 20.

[685] , p. 20.

[686] , pp. 20–21, original emphasis.

[687] , p. 21.

[688] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 20.

[689] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 21.

[690] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 21.

[691] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 21.

[692] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 21.

[693] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 22.

[694] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 25.

[695] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 25.

[696] , p. 25.

[697] , p. 25.

[698] , p. 25; original emphasis.

[699] , p. 25; emphasis added.

[700] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 26; emphasis added.

[701] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 35.

[702] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 37.

[703] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 37.

[704] Thomas Merton, Contemplation in a World of Action (london, 1971), p. 162.

[705] Merton, Contemplation in a World of Action, p. 162.

[706] Thomas Merton, Life and Holiness (new york, 1996), p. 7.

[707] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 7.

[708] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 93.

[709] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 8.

[710] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 86.

[711] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 87.

[712] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 8.

[713] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 4.

[714] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 87.

[715] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 8.

[716] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 88.

[717] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 90, original emphasis.

[718] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 90.

[719] Merton, No Man is an Island, p. 4.

[720] Merton, Life and Holiness, pp. 8–9.

[721] Merton, Life and Holiness, p. 9.

[722] Merton, Contemplation in a World of Action, p. 164.

[723] Mosher has commented that, “a Nursi prayer manual would include at least two hundred entries.” a particularly favorite prayer, with which Nursi frequently concludes sections or chapters of his writings, is sura 2.32: “glory be unto you! We have no knowledge save that which you have taught us.” another favorite is 2.286: “our lord! do not take us to task if we forget or unwittingly do wrong.” of prayers from sources outside the Qur’an Nursi was particularly fond of the Jawshan al-Kabīr, which, according to Mosher, it was Nursi’s custom to rise at 3.30 to recite. Nursi also valued the prayers of uvays al-Qarani and frequently cited them in the Risale. see Mosher, “The Marrow of Worship,” pp. 181–2, for a discussion of the frequency of these prayers in Nursi’s writings.

[724] There are prayers of thanksgiving in which Nursi calls on his readers to give thanks to god for the great bounties he has bestowed upon them. There are also numerous prayers of confession and prayers for forgiveness. Nursi was conscious of his own sin and of his need for divine forgiveness: “o god! i wish i had thousands of tongues with which to ask you for forgiveness until the day of Judgment.” Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, Al-Mathnawi Al-Nuri:

Seedbed of the Light, translated by huseyin akarsu (somerset, new Jersey, 2007), ninth Treatise, 280. indeed, so necessary does Nursi feel it to be to confess his sins that he has decided to write them down, so that they can continue to appeal to god’s forgiveness after his death. He writes, “the repentance and regret of my short-lived tongue is insufficient to atone for my numberless sins. The tongue of writing is constant and permanent to an extent, and more effectual” (Nursi, seventeenth Flash, Twelfth note; The Flashes, pp. 176–7).

[725] Nursi, Twentieth letter, second station, eighth Phrase; Letters, pp. 286–7.

[726] Nursi, Twentieth letter, second station, eighth Phrase; Letters, p. 287.

[727] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, First Point; The Words, p. 320.

[728] Nursi, eleventh Word; The Words, p. 141. humanity as the mirror of the divine attributes is a major theme in Nursi’s writings. see: eighteenth letter; Twentieth letter, second station eighth Phrase; Letters, p. 286; Thirtieth Flash, The Flashes, p. 458.

[729] Nursi, Al-Mathnawi, seventh Treatise, quoted in Mosher, “Marrow of Worship,” p. 191.

[730] Nursi, Fourth ray, Fifth degree; Rays, p. 81.

[731] Nursi, Twenty-First Word, First station; The Words, p. 276.

[732] Nursi, Fifth Word; The Words, p. 35.

[733] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fourth Point; The Words, p. 323; cf. Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326; Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 353.

[734] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326; cf. Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 353.

[735] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 353; cf Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326.

[736] Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 353.

[737] Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 354.

[738] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326.

[739] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 354.

[740] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 354. The notion of the whole of creation worshipping god is a prominent theme in Nursi’s theology.

see also Twenty-Fourth Word, Fourth Branch.

[741] Nursi, Tenth Word, Fifth Truth; The Words, p. 82, n. 15.

[742] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326.

[743] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326.

[744] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 354.

[745] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326.

[746] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, pp. 326–7.

[747] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, First Point; Letters, p. 354.

[748] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 327.

[749] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 327.

[750] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 327.

[751] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, second Point; Letters, pp. 354–5.

[752] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, second Point; Letters, p. 355.

[753] Nursi, sixth ray, First Question; The Rays, p. 119.

[754] Nursi, sixth ray, First Question; The Rays, p. 122.

[755] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth etter, First addendum, second Point; Letters, p. 355.

[756] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, second Point; Letters, p. 355.

[757] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, second Point; Letters, p. 356.

[758] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 325.

[759] Nursi, Twenty-Third letter, First Question; Letters, p. 331.

[760] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, Third Point; Letters, p. 356.

[761] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, Third Point; Letters, p. 356.

[762] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 326; cf. Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, second Point; Letters, p. 356.

[763] Nursi, Twenty-Third Word, First chapter, Fifth Point; The Words, p. 325.

[764] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth etter, First addendum, Fourth Point; Letters, p. 356.

[765] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, Fifth Point; Letters, p. 357.

[766] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth letter, First addendum, Fifth Point; Letters, p. 357.

[767] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 518.

[768] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 518.

[769] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 518.

[770] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 519.

[771] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 521.

[772] Nursi, Twenty-eighth etter, ninth section; , p. 522.

[773] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 522.

[774] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 522.

[775] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, pp. 531–3.

[776] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 523.

[777] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 525.

[778] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 526.

[779] Nursi, Twenty-eighth etter, ninth section; , p. 521.

[780] Nursi, Twenty-eighth letter, ninth section; Letters, p. 521.

[781] Nursi, Al Mathnawi, Tenth Treatise, p. 353.

[782] Nursi, Al Mathnawi, Tenth Treatise, pp. 353–4.

[783] Nursi, Twenty-Third etter, First Question; , p. 330.

[784] Al-Nawawī, al-Adhkār 74; al-Hākim, al-Mustadrak i, 517; cited by Nursi in Letters, p. 330.

[785] Qur’an 2:201; cited by Nursi in Twenty-Third letter, First Question; Letters, p. 330.

[786] Nursi, Twenty-Third letter, First Question; Letters, p. 330.

[787] Nursi, Twenty-Third letter, First Question; Letters, p. 331.

[788] Nursi, seventeenth Flash, Fifth note; Flashes, p. 164.

[789] Nursi, seventeenth Flash, Fifth note; Flashes, p. 165.

[790] Nursi, seventeenth Flash, Fifth note; Flashes, p. 165.

[791] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth Word, Fifth Branch, First Fruit; The Words, p. 367.

[792] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth Word, Fifth Branch, First Fruit; The Words, p. 367.

[793] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth Word, Fifth Branch, First Fruit; The Words, p. 368.

[794] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth Word, Fifth Branch, First Fruit; The Words, pp. 368–9.

[795] Nursi, Twenty-Fourth Word, Fifth Branch, Fifth Fruit; The Words, p. 373.

[796] ibid., p. 368.

[797] Thirty-second Word, Third stopping-Place, The second Point of the second Topic, second Point; The Words, p. 670.

[798] see also Thirty-second Word, Third stopping-Place, The second Point of the second Topic, second Point; The Words, pp. 668–71.

[799] see sixteenth Flash, second curious Question; Flashes, pp. 143–4; Thirteenth letter, Third Question; Letters, pp. 68–70.

[800] , the Fourteenth Word, addendum, pp. 184–90.

[801] The Words, Thirty-second Word, Third stopping-Place, p. 665. cf. also, The Words, The eighteenth Word, p. 240: “Beneath the veil of events like storms, earthquakes, and plague, is the unfolding of numerous hidden immaterial flowers. The seeds of many potentialities which have not developed sprout and grow beautiful because of events which are apparently ugly.”

[802] , Twenty-Third Word, chapter 1, p. 322.

[803] , gleams, p. 748. cf. also, Letters, “seeds of reality,” p. 548.

[804] The Flashes, The second Flash, p. 23.

[805] The Flashes, The Thirteenth Flash, pp. 118–19.

[806] The Rays, The Third ray, p. 60.

[807] i am grateful to yunus cengel for his translation of this passage.

[808] i am grateful to Faris Kaya for this explanation.

[809] The Rays, The Twelfth ray, p. 312.

[810] The Rays, The Fourteenth ray, p. 407.

[811] The Flashes, The Twenty-fifth Flash, pp. 266–85. In my article, “For you, Illness is good health: Said Nursi’s spirituality in his approach to Physical illness,” i try to outline the spiritual benefits that, in Nursi’s view, can accrue to the believer in these moments of personal crisis. The paper is published in Turkish as “Hutbe-i Şamiye: Manevî Bir Doktorun, Çağımız Hastalıklarına Reçetesi,” in Bediüzzaman’a Göre Müslümanlık-Hıristiyanlık Münasebetleri, İstanbul: Etkileşim Yayınları, 2006, pp. 115–27.

[812] The Rays, The Twelfth ray, p. 298. cf. also, “so the exact coincidence of the two centres of the Risale-i Nur’s dissemination, isparta and Kastamonu, being preserved from disaster relative to other places … is belief and good works.” The Rays, The Thirteenth ray, p. 348.

[813] Bediuzzaman said al-nursi, Ishārātu’l- I‘jāz, ed. ihsan salih, second edn cairo: sozler nesriyat, 1414/1994, p. 24; Signs of Miraculousness, p. 19.

[814] Nursi deciphers the whole formulas as follows: The imperative “say,” which is implicit in the beginning of the formula, is an indication to [the necessity of] prophethood; “Allah” that comes right after the preposition “bi”, a sign to the oneness of god; “alRahman” (all-Merciful) as a reference to the existence of the order and balance and justice in the universe; “Al-Rahim” (all-compassionate) as an allusion to the reality of resurrection. ibid.

[815] Ishārātu’l- I‘jāz, p. 66.

[816] Sozler, 26, p. 115; The Words, 26, p. 480.

[817] The same definition is found in almost all the classical technical dictionaries of Islam. see for instance, al-Jurjani, al-Ta‘rifat, p. 161. see for a general study of justice in islam, Majid Khadduri, The Islamic Conception of Justice, Baltimore: The Johns hopkins university Press, 1984; Mahmoud ayoub, “islamic concept of Justice,” Islamic Identity and the Struggle for Justice, eds n.h. Barazangi, M.r. Zaman, o. afzal, gainesville: university Press of Florida, 1996, pp. 19–26; salah al-din al-Munadjdjid, Le Concept de Justice Social en Islam, trans. into French by M. hadji sadok, Paris: editions Publisud, 1982; n.h. Barazangi, M.r. Zaman, o. afza, eds, Islamic Identity and the Struggle for Justice, eds n.h. Barazangi, M.r. Zaman, o. afzal, gainesville: university Press of Florida, 1996; sayyid Qutb, Social Justice in Islam, trans. John B. hardie, rev. with introd. by hamid algar, new york: islamic Publications international, 2000.

[818] Sozler, 10, p. 28.

[819] Lem’alar, 29, p. 769; The Flashes, 29, p. 389.

[820] Sozler, 10, p. 37.

[821] Sozler, 32, p. 285; The Words, 32, p. 653.

[822] Sozler, 32, p. 293; The Words, p. 672.

[823] Lem’alar, 30, p. 800.

[824] Sozler, 33, pp. 306–7; The Words, 33, pp. 700–701.

[825] Lem’alar 30, p. 802; The Flashes, 30, pp. 404–5.

[826] Sozler, 32, p. 294; The Words, 32, pp. 672–3.

[827] Mektubat, 21, p. 452; The Letters, 22, pp. 273–4.

[828] This is an approximate rendition of the passage from Sozler, 33, p. 304; cf. The Words, 33, p. 695.

[829] Sozler, 32, p. 276; The Words, 32, p. 634.

[830] Şualar, 9, p. 946; The Words, 10, p. 115.

[831] Sozler, 10, p. 37; cf. The Words, 10, p. 97.

[832] Sozler, 10, p. 28.

[833] Sozler, 10, p. 28; cf. The Words, 10, p. 78.

[834] Sozler, 32, p. 285; The Words, 32, p. 652.

[835] Sozler, 32, p. 285; The Words, 32, p. 653.

[836] Ibid.

[837] Lem’alar, 13, p. 618; The Flashes, 13, pp. 104–5.

[838] Şualar, 2, p. 859; The Rays, 2, p. 40.

[839] Şualar, 2, p. 860; The Rays, 2, p. 40.

[840] Al-Mathnawi al-‘Arabi al-Nuri, transcribed by ceylan caliskan, istanbul: sozler nesriyat, 2003, pp. 483–4.

[841] The Flashes, 30, p. 401; Lem’alar, 30, p. 800.

[842] Lem’alar, 30, p. 800; The Flashes, 30, p. 401.

[843] Ishārātu’l- I‘jāz, p. 32; Signs of Miraculousness, pp. 29–30

[844] Lem’alar, 30, pp. 800–801; The Flashes, 30, p. 402.

[845] Lem’alar, 30, p. 805; The Flashes, 30, p. 410.

[846] Şualar, 11, p. 956.

[847] Lem’alar, 30, p. 824; The Flashes, 30, pp. 452–3.

[848] Şualar, 11, p. 956–7; The Rays, 11, p. 231.

[849] The Rays, 2, p. 38; Şualar, 2, 859.

[850] see for an extensive study of this issue and its various implications in islamic theology, eric l. ormsby, Theodicy in Islamic Thought: The Dispute Over al-Ghazali’s ‘Best of all Possible Worlds’, Princeton: Princeton university, 1984, pp. 35–7.

[851] Şualar, 2, p. 859; The Rays, 2, p. 39.

[852] Here and in the following i refer to my work in German The Sense of Injustice: I. Kaplow, ed., Der Sinn für Ungerechtigkeit, Baden-Baden: nomos, 2005.

[853] It is thus no accident that this symposium has its own section on divine and worldly justice. I will thus limit my discourse to a more philosophical context.

[854] Here and in the following i will be drawing heavily on Rawls’ concept of justice as detailed in what has now become a locus classicus: J. Rawls, A Theory of Justice, Cambridge Ma, 1971. see also J. Rawls, “Justice as Fairness: Political, not metaphysical,” in: Philosophy and Public Affairs 14, 1985.

[855] A Theory of Justice, ibid., p. viii and following.

[856] S. Nursi, The Words, istanbul, 2004, p. 664.

[857] See s. Vahide, “divine Mercy and compassion in the Risale-i Nur: The names of Rahman and Rahim,” paper delivered at the third Said Nursi symposium in Bonn, March, 2007, currently being made ready for publication. i quote here from page 5 of her manuscript.

[858] Nursi, The Rays Collection, istanbul, 2002, p. 372.

[859] ibid., p. 395.

[860] ibid., p. 372.

[861] Nursi, The Damascus Sermon, istanbul, 1996, p. 127.

[862] ibid.

[863] Nursi, The Words, ibid., 557.

[864] Nursi, The Damascus Sermon, First addendum, second Part, 67.

[865] see S. Nursi, Emirdağ Lahikası, i, istanbul, 1992, p. 38; here and in the following i cite an english translation by s. Vahide which is as yet unpublished.

[866] here and in following i will refer to the classic i. Kant, Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten, hamburg, Meiner, 1994. i will use, however, the pagination of the uniform socalled “akademie ausgabe.” all translations into english are mine unless otherwise noted. i will often cite this text as [gMs] with the page number of the akademie ausgabe. For Kant’s repudiation of utilitarianism, see the second Abschnitt of the GMS, as well as the Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, hamburg, Meiner, 1993, p. 31 ff.

[867] Kant calls it a “chimärische idee ohne Wahrheit” [GMS, 445].

[868] GMS, 421: “handle nur nach derjenigen Maxime, durch die du zugleich wollen kannst, dass sie ein allgemeines gesetz werde,” or in a slightly different form: “handle so, dass die Maxime deines Willens jederzeit zugleich als Prinzip einer allgemeinen Gesetzgebung gelten könne:” I. Kant, Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, § 7.

[869] “handle so, daß du die Menschheit, sowohl in deiner Person als in der Person eines jeden anderen, jederzeit zugleich als Zweck, niemals bloß als Mittel brauchst,” GMS, 429.

[870] entities which have a mere “ relativen Wert, als Mittel,” are called “Sachen, dagegen vernünftige Wesen Personen genannt werden, weil ihre natur sie schon als Zwecke an sich selbst ... auszeichnet,” which is “ein gegenstand der achtung ist:” GMS, 428.

[871] see Kant, GMS, 389.

[872] see The Words, p. 265, and section iV iii below.

[873] Nursi, The Damascus Sermon, ibid., p. 67.

[874] S. Nursi, Emirdağ Lahikası, ibid., ii, p. 241.

[875] ibid., p. 183.

[876] ibid., p. 241.

[877] S. Nursi, The Words, ibid., p. 61.

[878] see above, p. 5.

[879] S. Nursi, The Words, ibid., p. 557.

[880] Nursi, The Words, ibid., p. 98, footnote 30.

[881] see here The Words, p. 77: “do you wish for a proof that all things are done with justice and balance? The fact that all things are endowed with being, given shape and put in their appropriate place in accordance with precise equilibrium and in appropriate measure, shows that all matters are done in accordance with infinite justice and balance.”

[882] Nursi, The Words, ibid., p. 98, as above.

[883] ibid.

[884] Nursi, The Words, ibid., p. 265.

[885] here and in the following, see the Damascus Sermon, ibid., p. 67 f.

[886] see, for example, o. o’neill, Acting on Principle, new york, 1975; J. rawls, “Themes in Kant’s Moral Philosophy,” in: E. Förster (Hrsg.), Kant’s Transcendental Deductions, stanford, 1989, or B. herman, The Practice of Moral Judgment, cambridge Ma, 1993.

[887] J. rawls, A Theory of Justice, ibid.

[888] see here the excellent work on tolerance by rainer Forst, Toleranz in Konflikt, Frankfurt am Main, suhrkamp, 2003.

#title The Moral Economy of the Madrasa

#subtitle Islam and education today

#author Keiko Sakurai & Fariba Adelkhah, Dale Eickelman

#date 4 Mar. 2011

#source <[[https://www.routledge.com/The-Moral-Economy-of-the-Madrasa-Islam-and-Education-Today/Sakurai-Adelkhah/p/book/9781138789043] [routledge.com/The-Moral-Economy-of-the-Madrasa-Islam-and-Education-Today/Sakurai-Adelkhah/p/book/9781138789043]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-16T15:50:24

#authors Keiko Sakurai, Fariba Adelkhah, Dale F. Eickelman

#topics

#cover s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-1.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

#isbn 978-0-415-58988-8

 [Front Matter]

 [Synopsis]

The revival of madrasas in the 1980s coincided with the rise of political Islam and soon became associated with the ‘clash of civilizations’ between Islam and the West. This volume examines the rapid expansion of madrasas across Asia and the Middle East and analyses their role in society within their local, national and global context.

Based on anthropological investigations in Afghanistan, Bangladesh, China, Iran, and Pakistan, the chapters take a new approach to the issue, examining the recent phenomenon of women in madrasas; Hui Muslims in China; relations between the Iran’s Shia seminary after the 1979 Islamic revolution and Shia in Pakistan and Afghanistan; and South Asian madrasas. Emphasis is placed on the increased presence of women in these institutions, and the reciprocal interactions between secular and religious schools in those countries. Taking into account social, political and demographic changes within the region, the authors show how madrasas have been successful in responding to the educational demand of the people and how they have modernized their style to cope with a changing environment.

A timely contribution to a subject with great international appeal, this book will be of great interest to students and scholars of international politics, political Islam, Middle East and Asian studies and anthropology.

 [About the Editors]

SAKURAI Keiko is Professor in the School of International Liberal Studies at Waseda University, Tokyo. The author of two books on Iran and a book on the Shia, her major interest lies in the analysis of social change in contemporary Iran, with special focus on the role of education.

Fariba Adelkhah is Senior Research Fellow at SciencesPo in Paris. An anthropologist, her main research interests focus on the relationships and interplay between social changes and political transformations throughout the second half of the twentieth century in Iran. She is the author of Being Modern in Iran, and her current research deals with the Iranian Diaspora.

 [About the Book Series]

New Horizons in Islamic Studies (Second Series)

Series Editor: Professor SATO Tsugitaka

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-2.jpg]]

This second series of ‘New Horizons in Islamic Studies’ presents the abundant results of the National Institutes for the Humanities (NIHU) program for Islamic Area Studies (IAS) carried out in Japan from 2006 to date. This program emphasizes multidisciplinary research on the dynamism of Muslim societies, in both Islamic and non-Islamic areas around the world. By taking a historical approach and adopting regional comparison methods in the study of current issues, the program seeks to build a framework of empirical knowledge on Islam and Islamic Civilization.

Islamic Area Studies is a network comprised of five research centers, at Waseda University, the University of Tokyo, Sophia University, Kyoto University, and the Toyo Bunko (Oriental Library). As of 2008, this network has been brought into the fold of a Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science and Technology (MEXT) program, with the Organization for Islamic Area Studies at Waseda University serving as its central office. As research centers recognized by the MEXT, we aim to promote the development of joint research institutions in the human and social sciences, thereby further developing fruitful joint research achievements.

This publication of the results of our IAS joint research has and will have been made possible through the collaborative efforts of the five IAS centers, and with the financial assistance of the NIHU and the MEXT.

 Previously published in the New Horizons in Islamic Studies series

Persian Documents

Social history of Iran and Turan in the fifteenth–nineteenth centuries

Edited by KONDO Nobuaki

Islamic Area Studies with Geographical Information Systems

Edited by OKABE Atsuyuki

Muslim Societies

Historical and comparative aspects

Edited by SATO Tsugitaka

Intellectuals in the Modern Islamic World

Transmission, transformation and communication

Edited by Stephanie Dudoignon, KOMATSU Hisao and YASUSHI Kosugi

Popular Movements and Democratization in the Islamic World

Edited by KISAICHI Masatoshi

 [Title Page]

The Moral Economy of the Madrasa

Islam and education today

Edited by Sakurai Keikoand Fariba Adelkhah

 [Copyright]

First published 2011 by Routledge 2 Park Square, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN

Simultaneously published in the USA and Canada by Routledge 711 Third Avenue, New York NY 10017

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

© 2011 editorial selection and matter, SAKURAI Keiko and Fariba Adelkhah, individual chapters the contributors

The right of Keiko Sakurai and Fariba Adelkhah to be identified as the authors of the editorial material, and of the authors for their individual chapters, has been asserted in accordance with sections 77 and 78 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilised in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publishers.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data The moral economy of the madrasa : Islam and education today / edited byKeiko Sakurai and Fariba Adelkhah. p. cm. – (New horizons in islamic studies (Second series)) Includes bibliographical references and index. 1. Madrasahs. 2. Islamic education. 3. Islamic religious education. I. Sakurai, Keiko. II. Adelkhah, Fariba.

LC904.M67 20112010033208

371.077--dc22

ISBN 978-0-415-58988-8 (hbk) ISBN 978-0-203-84078-8 (ebk)

 Contents

1. Introduction: the moral economy of the madrasa

FARIBA ADELKHAH AND KEIKO SAKURAI

2. The rise of new madrasas and the decline of tribal leadership within the Federal Administrated Tribal Area (FATA), Pakistan

SO YAMANE

3. Women’s empowerment and Iranian-style seminaries in Iran and Pakistan

KEIKO SAKURAI

4. Contested notions of being ‘Muslim’

HUMAYUN KABIR

5. Islamic education in China

MASUMI MATSUMOTO AND ATSUKO SHIMBO

6. Religious dependency in Afghanistan

FARIBA ADELKHAH

7. Epilogue

DALE F. EICKELMAN

Glossary

References

Index

 Illustrations

* Tables

3.1 Four women’s madrasas in Lahore

3.2 What would you be doing had you not been admitted into the madrasa?

3.3 What do you want to do after graduation? (Multiple choices permitted)

3.4 Is there a madrasa graduate in your family and among your relatives?

4.1 Unfolding the school of thought of madrasas in Sunni Islam in terms of maslaki differentiations in South Asia

4.2 Types of madrasas in Bahmanbaria by management and level of schooling

4.3 Distribution of madrasas and students by management and gender in Brahmanbaria

* Figures

2.1 Map of FATA

3.1 The number and year of establishment of Shia women’s seminaries in Iran

3.2 The women’s seminary system in Iran

3.3 Map of Pakistan’s provinces

3.4 The number and year of establishment of Shia women’s madrasas in Pakistan

4.1 Map of Bangladesh

5.1 Map of China

6.1 Shia places of worship and religious institutions in Kabul

 Contributors

Fariba Adekhah is Senior Research Fellow at SciencesPo/CERI, Paris, France. Major publications: L'Iran, Paris: Le cavalier bleu, collection Idées reçues, 2005; Being Modern in Iran, London: Hurst, 1999 & New York: Columbia University Press, 2000; Etre Moderne en Iran, Paris: Karthala, 1998 (new revised edition in 2006, Turkish translation in 2001). La Révolution sous le Voile: femme Islamique d'Iran, Paris: Karthala, 1991 (translated into Arabic in 1995, into Spanish in 1996). Voyages du Développement. Emigration, Commerce, Exil (with Jean-François Bayart, eds.), Paris: Karthala, 2007; Ramadan et Politique (with François Georgeon, eds), Paris: CNRS Editions, 2000.

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College, USA. Major publications: Public Islam and the Common Good, ed. Armando Salvatore and Dale F. Eickelman (Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 2004). New Media in the Muslim World: the emerging public sphere, co-edited with Jon W. Anderson, 2nd edition (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003). The Middle East and Central Asia: an anthropological approach, 4th edition (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2002). Muslim Politics, co-edited with James Piscatori (Princeton: Princeton University Press; second edition 2003). Muslim Travellers: pilgrimage, migration and the religious imagination, co-edited with James Piscatori (London: Routledge; Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1990). Knowledge and Power in Morocco: the education of a twentieth century notable (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1985).

Humayun Kabir received his PhD from the Graduate School for International Development and Cooperation, Hiroshima University, Hiroshima, Japan. Major publications: ‘Diversity and homogeneity of Islamic education: colonial legacy and state policy towards Madrasas in Bangladesh,’ Journal of Social Studies, Dhaka: Centre for Social Studies, 120: 1–24 (2008). ‘Replicating Deobandi model of Islamic schooling: the case of a Quomi madrasa in a district town of Bangladesh,’ Contemporary South Asia 17(4): 415–428 (December 2009). ‘Exploring disciplinary knowledge of Islam in madrasa schooling in Bangladesh: The allegiance of a Quomi madrasa to Deoband,’ Journal of Social Studies, Dhaka: Centre for Social Studies, 123: 18–38 (2009).

MATSUMOTO Masumi is Professor at Keiwa College, Niigata, Japan. Major publications: ‘Protestant Christian Missions to Muslims in China,’ Annals of Japan Association for Middle East Studies, 21(1): 141–171 (2005). ‘Islamic Reform in Muslim Periodicals in China,’ Etudes Orientales, 21/22: 88–104 (2004). Study of China’s Policy toward Ethnic Minorities (Tokyo: Taga shuppan, 1999, in Japanese) (Chinese version, Zhongguo Minzu Zhengce de Yanjiu, Beijing: Minzu Chubanshe, 2003). ‘Rationalizing Patriotism among Muslim Chinese in Dodoigion,’ in Kosugi and Komatsu (eds) Intellectuals in the Modern Islamic World Transmission, Transformation, Communication (London: Routledge, 2006).

SAKURAI Keiko is Professor at the School of International Liberal Studies, Waseda University, Tokyo, Japan. Major publications: Kakumei Iran no kyokasho media: Islam to nationalism no sokoku [Textbooks Media of Revolutionary Iran: conflict between Islam and nationalism] (Tokyo: Iwanami-shoten, 1999 in Japanese). Gendai Iran: Kami no kuni no henbo [Contemporary Iran: change in the land of God] (Tokyo: Iwanami-shoten, 2001, in Japanese). Nihon no Muslim shakai [Muslim Community in Japan] (Tokyo: Chikuma-shobo, 2003, in Japanese). Shia-ha [Shia Islam] (Tokyo: Chuokoron-shinsha, 2006, in Japanese). ‘University entrance examination and the making of an Islamic society in Iran: a study of the post-revolutionary Iranian approach to Konkur,’ Iranian Studies 37(3): 385–406 (2004). ‘Muslims in contemporary Japan,’ Asian Policy 5: 69–87 (2008). ‘Une construction des immigrants musulmans: la mosquée, un espace des communautés musulmanes au Japon,’ Revue des mondes musulmans et de la Méditerranée 125: 89–110 (2009).

SHIMBO Atsuko is Professor at Waseda University, Tokyo, Japan. Major publications: ‘Educational support in the areas of ethnic minority,’ Gakujutu Kenkyu, Waseda University, 51: 1–14 (2003). ‘Ethnic minority policy under Japanese occupation’, Studies in the History of Education, (Japan Society for the Historical Studies of Education), 47: 205–213 (2004) (in Japanese). ‘Religious policy and education under the Japanese occupation; focusing on Muslim of North District in China,’ Gakujutu Kenkyu, Waseda University, 52: 1–15 (2004) (in Japanese). ‘School education and family school during the period of foundation of public education’, Studies in the History of Education, (Japan Society for the Historical Studies of Education), 51: 104–109 (2008) (in Japanese). ‘Education and empowerment of Hui Muslim women,’ Gakujutu Kenkyu, Waseda University, 57: 1–6 (2009) (in Chinese). Kyouiku wa fubyoudou wo kokuhuku dekiruka Can education overcome inequality (With Shigeto Sonoda),Tokyo:Iwanami Shoten, (2010 in Japanese).

YAMANE So is Professor at the Research Institute for World Languages, Osaka University, Osaka, Japan. Major publications: ‘Saiyid Abu Al-A’la Maududi’s Islamic revivalism and the establishment of “Darul Islam”,’ Bulletin of Asia-Pacific Studies, Osaka, 11: 167–210 (2001) (in Japanese). A History of Afghanistan (Kawade-shobo, 2002, in Japanese). ‘Ghalib’s Delhi as Gleaned from His Urdu Letters,’ Bulletin of the Society for Western and Southern Asiatic Studies, Kyoto University, 56: 61–99 (2002) (in Japanese). ‘Horizon of Islam in South Asia: Iqbal and Maududi,’ in Komatsu and Kosugi (eds) Contemporary Islamic Thoughts and Political Movements (Tokyo: Tokyo University Press, 2003) (in Japanese). Analysis on Contemporary Pakistan (Tokyo: Iwanami-shoten, 2004) (in Japanese). ‘Sounds of Difference: A Study on Urdu Orthography in India in the Beginning of the 19th Century,’ International Journal of South Asian Studies, Delhi, Manohar, 2:59–85(2009).

 Acknowledgements

This book mainly reflects the findings of researches on madrasas in Asia that were undertaken from 2006 to 2009 thanks to the generous support provided by the National Institutes for the Humanities (NIHU) and the involvement of the Organization for Islamic Area Studies, Waseda University. Fieldworks were carried out and two workshops, first in Tokyo and then in Kuala Lumpur (at the occasion of the International Conference ‘New Horizons in Islamic Area Studies: Islamic Scholarship Across Cultures and Continents’ on 22–24 November 2008) allowed the whole research team to discuss its findings. Those feldworks and gatherings were possible thanks again to the funding of the NIHU and the warm support of Professor SATO Tsugitaka (Dean of the Organization for Islamic Area Studies, Waseda University) and Professor YUKAWA Takeshi (Senior Researcher of the Organization for Islamic Area Studies). No words can express our thanks to them for their trust from the beginning and the freedom they gave us to frame this volume in our own way.

Last but not least, they also helped to build this project as a joint venture under an exchange program between SciencesPo, Paris and Waseda University. This was made successful also thanks to Francis Vérillaud (Director of International Affairs Division at SciencesPo, in charge of the exchange program with Waseda) and his counterpart at Waseda University for this exchange program, Professor Yoshiharu Tsuboi, Christian Lequesne (Director of the Centre for International Research and Studies at SciencesPo) and SciencesPo’s Asian Study Centre, which offered warm hospitality that allowed the two editors to prepare the manuscript.

We also acknowledge the patience with which Dale Eickelman provided comments and feedback. He went so far as sometimes re-editing the papers and providing new references. He also participated in our Kuala Lumpur workshop. He shared his professional experience and regularly answered our many e-mails calling for help on the spot. Let’s just say thank you Dale, thank you.

Such a book never would have reached actual publication without the precious help of some very honorable colleagues. We owe them a lot since, although overwhelmed, they never refused to read and comment on a paper and send interesting documents. Among them, we would like to thank Elisabeth Allès (CNRS, EHESS-CECMC), Talal Asad (The City University of New York), Jean-François Bayart (CNRS, SciencesPo), Leila Cherif-Chebbi (OFPRA-CECMC), Gilles Dorronsoro (Sorbonne I, Carnegie), Tatsuya Kusakabe (Hiroshima University), Roland Marchal (CNRS, SciencesPo), Olivier Roy (CNRS, EHESS, European University Institute in Florence), and Masahiko Togawa (Hiroshima University).

Our special thanks go to all institutions and people in charge, who facilitated our researches by understanding our project, by warmly welcoming our questions, by opening their library to us, by giving us their precious time, and by sharing their very experiences.

Let’s not forget to thank Islamic schools and universities throughout our field works, national archives centres, Waqf institutions, ministries of education, etc. in all those countries in which research was carried out.

Last but not least, we would like to warmly thank Miriam Perier and Ryuichi Sugiyama for helping us to put our manuscript to the standards required by Routledge.

 Note on transliterations

This book draws on source materials in Arabic, Persian, Afghan, Urdu, Chinese, Bengali, transliteration conversions preferred by Muslims as well as non-Muslims, writings in English or in French, and colloquial as well as literary uses in these languages. As consistently as possible, we use the system adopted by the International Journal of Middle East Studies, except for proper names, substantives such as titles (ayatollah), institutions (hoseynieh) and places (Karadj). These words are part of our daily usage on the Internet and for the sake of coherence we decided not to modify them. Also we omit diacritics. Although religious terms often derive from Arabic—for example, the Arabic sunna (tradition) becomes sunnat in Persian—we decided not to impose the Arabic where it does not accurately reflect local or regional usage. When appropriate, the common origins of such terms are indicated in the glossary. Likewise, the plural of most foreign terms, especially those derived from Arabic, is indicated by the addition of an ‘s’ to the singular.

 1. Introduction: The moral economy of the madrasa

Fariba Adelkhah and Keiko Sakurai

Learning the sciences and disseminating knowledge are important duties for Muslims, and this is why places of teaching have been given a special status in Islam. Irrespective of the name given (such as madrasa, hawza, maktab, kuttab, and jamia), the places where knowledge is imparted are highly regarded by Muslim communities around the world. In fact, numerous hadiths, or sayings of the Prophet, underline the need for knowledge: ‘Seek knowledge, from the cradle to the grave, even if it is to be found in a place as distant as China,’ although, as Keiko Sakurai rightly reminds us in this book (chapter 3), women were excluded until modern times.[1]

Since knowledge is considered a religious duty, mosques (masjids, literally, places of worship) were the first institution of learning in Islam (Makdisi, 1981: 10). Whether viewed as an institution or simply as a ‘venue of convenience’ (Berkey, 2007: 42), whether viewed as a formal or as an informal institution (Berkey, 1992a),[2] they play an important role in the organization of classes and lectures: two perfect examples are those of the Zeitouna mosque in Tunisia (established on 731) and the Sheikh Ansari mosque (also called Masjid-e torka)[3] in Najaf (Iraq), where Khomeini used to pray and impart his teachings during his long exile (1963–1977). Furthermore, other sites of education have come into existence over the centuries such as khanqah (Sufi hospice), maktab (place for writing) and, of course, madrasa[4] (literally place of teaching, or place for teaching law). Subsequently, larger and more ambitious institutions like universities were also built, such as al-Azhar in Egypt (established in 972), Nizamiyya in Baghdad (established in 1067).[5] This multiplicity of institutions scattered all over the Muslim world has broadened the possibility of religious education and the development of different trends in the understanding and teaching of Islam, as Muslim scholars are traditionally encouraged to move from place to place in order to look for knowledge (Gellens, 1990). The renowned centers of Islamic knowledge have evolved over centuries in places like Kufa, Baghdad, Damascus, Cairo, Tunisia, Cordoba, Najaf, Isfahan, Qom, Delhi, Deoband, Lucknow and, as desired by Afghan Shia quite possibly in the future, Kabul.

Although Islamic knowledge does not build a united umma by itself, it has always been used as an instrument of power. In fact, this is why knowledge has also been a subject of debate, rivalry and conflict among various religious authorities and believers throughout the centuries. To a great extent, this friction explains the variety of schools of fiqh (Islamic law): from the early stages of Islam they included the Hanafi, named after Abu Hanifa al-Numan (d.767); the Maliki, named after Malik ibn Anas (d.795); the Shafii, named after Muhammad ibn Idris al-Shafii (d.820); and the Hanbali, named after Ahmad ibn Hanbal (d.855). The Shia and Ismaili communities follow the Jafari school, named after Imam Jafar Sadiq (d.765). Later the Wahhabi school, named after Muhammad Abd al-Wahhab (d. 1791) and the Bahai school, named after Bahaollah (d.1892), follow the reformist paths of their founders. One should also underline that the strengthening of one of the most prominent educational institutions, the Nizamiyya school in Baghdad, is the consequence of opposition to the divisions of that time, such as the Mutazalites in the eleventh century (Sikand, 2005: 27; Malik, 2008: 4). It worth adding that the term madrasa seems to fall within the scope of this Nizamiyya tradition (Fischer, 1980: 38–39). Besides, conflicts have not only existed between different schools of fiqh but also within each school, as people who were educated in the madrasa could take up positions that are important in any Muslim community: muftis, judges, bureaucrats working in religious institutions (such as waqf, or pious endowments), and others who are supposed to regulate everyday life (weddings, funerals, religious gatherings, pilgrimages, mosque). Moreover, conflicts could also be rooted in the economic power of the learning institutions as they often possess substantial financial resources (Berkey, 1992a: 112–116).

Religious learning institutions and the madrasa, despite being one of the oldest Islamic institutions—some date from the eleventh century—have often been looked on with suspicion by modern states, whether Western or Muslim. More recently, a not-so-interested or even ignorant international (i.e. Western) community also became openly distrustful of them when Islamic extremism was linked to the teaching of the madrasa. While this perception crystallized with the Iranian revolution in 1979 and the terrorist attacks that took place in the subsequent decade in Europe and the Middle East, it was strengthened by the takeover of Kabul in 1996, as the Deobandi madrasa provided the rank and file of the new Afghan regime—the well-known Taliban. The September 11th tragedy further radicalized this belief. The common understanding nowadays is that Islam is both a religion and a political entity, and that in order to control one of its dimensions, one has to control the other.

Numerous authors, many among those we are referring to in this volume, have argued against this view, showing it to be too simplistic and lacking any logical grounding. While sharing their concerns, we intend to change our analytical approach from the available literature on this subject today. Our intention is not to offer a discursive analysis of the syllabus of representative madrasas and how they have changed over time or in various social and political contexts. Our goal is not to illustrate their adaptation, flexibility or even modernity in order to contradict the criticism that views these schools as outdated institutions.[6] We do not deny that a disposition to violence has also been one of the possible outcomes of madrasa education, in the past as well as today, not because of poverty (Saleem, 2008), but because if knowledge means power, it is possible that power could spring from knowledge, including knowledge imparted within or because of these religious institutions. Our primary goal is to assess the activities of institutions dedicated to religious knowledge in the same way we assess other knowledge institutions that are influenced by their environment and try to change it, even though the agenda of madrasas is indeed broader. In other words, we would like to deal with what Dale Eickelman, following and commenting on Pierre Bourdieu, although very critical of his misrecognition of the historical context in which his work is produced, calls ‘the political economy of meaning,’ or ‘the reproduction and transmission of systems of meaning and how these shape and in turn are shaped by configurations of power and economic relations among groups and classes in different societies' (Eickelman, 1979: 386; 2009). In this perspective we look at the inevitable interactions between more traditional (and religious) institutions and the more modern ones in order to grasp the dynamics at play. By illustrating their connections with the past and the scholastic tradition and their enrolment in modernity (Asad 1993), we intend to describe the historical context, during the last three decades, in which Islam contributes to integrating categories that were marginal for different reasons: pluralism, new identities, equality of rights and development. Following Dale Eickelman's seminal comments on the sociology of education, he writes, 'Durkheim in his Evolution of Educational Thought was explicitly concerned with the historical problem of change in dominant ideologies of higher education and how these ideologies were related to the conflicting interests of class and social groups and were manipulated by them' (1979: 392). These conflicts create opportunities that might lead to violent action but also to the improved communication and dialogue essential for creating a shared public space (Eickelman and Salvatore, 2004). We do not want to use dichotomies to analyze madrasas such as good versus bad, liberal versus totalitarian, or tradition versus modernity. One should not deny the continued relevance of these schools, whose impressive development over the last thirty years tells us much about the blind spots of our modern yet Manichæan understanding of religion and tradition (Hefner and Zaman, 2007).

In this perspective, analyzing madrasas necessitates a semantic clarification. These institutions lie at the crossroads between religious and secular realities, between the national and the transnational, or between faith, Islam and its desire to have dialogue with the rest of the world, including the West, as well as lay and secular milieus. Bear in mind that 'laicité,' as the French say, is a 'political choice defining the place of religion in an authoritarian and legal sense,' and that the phenomenon of secularization is first of all a process: 'it is when religion ceases to be the focus of men's lives, even when they still define themselves as believers [that] men's actions and the meaning they give to the world no longer come under the sign of the transcendental or the religious' (Roy, 2005: 19–20).

Madrasas are general training and educational (from elementary to tertiary) institutions, geared towards producing and transmitting knowledge. Are they also institutions devoted to religious education, general instruction, or they are religious institutions devoted simply to religious instruction? Are they run by clerics, or can lay people also take a part in their management?

It will quickly become apparent that the answer is not in fact that simple. After all, a state-run university can offer theology courses, and religious schools can offer secular subjects. The terminology current in Muslim countries reflects this indeterminate state. In Arabic, the word madrasa signifies a teaching institution of various levels. As it happens, teaching and research institutions were religious in ancient Muslim societies, as were the first universities, such as Bologna and the Sorbonne, in Christian Europe. But the identification of the madrasa with the religious educational field is in a sense accidental, even though it is a constant in most South Asian countries. In Iran, for instance, the word madrasa refers generally to state schools, and religious schools are known as maktab or, for the training of clerics, madrasa-i ilmiyya or hawza-i ilmiyya. In this book, we will be dealing solely with contemporary madrasas in the religious sense of the word, as institutions in which students receive religious teaching, which can offer complementary modern teaching as well. The main point to grasp at this stage is that madrasas are geared first and foremost towards producing and transmitting knowledge, starting with reading and writing the language of the sacred book, the Quran. As such, they have a relationship with power. We could refer to them with the concept of ‘power-knowledge’ coined by Foucault, or we could speak of hegemony, citing Gramsci. Either way, madrasas have a role in defining and reproducing epistème, ‘sens commun,’ consensus and domination. This is what George W. Bush understood in his own way when he tried to force Pakistan to reform its madrasas in the wake of September 11th, within the framework of the strategy of ‘democratizing’ the ‘Greater Middle East.’ This will leave some people affirming that madrasas are one of the keys to the ‘clash of civilizations,’ likening them to recruiting offices for potential terrorists (Riaz, 2008: 20–51). It is true that madrasas are one of the issues—or even one of the causes—behind the often-violent clashes between Muslims and the West. But these conflicts initially tore apart Muslim societies themselves, by putting clerics and lay intellectuals at loggerheads with each other, but also by promoting discord among clerics or among lay intellectuals. The antagonisms that agitated madrasas were mainly internal Islamic ones. Some divided religious and secular people with respect to the content and direction of social change. Others carried the seeds of theological, legal, confraternal and sectarian divisions sometimes leading to schisms, at the extreme exclusion and persecution, as with the Bahai in Iran and the Ahmadiyya in South Asia.

Working on knowledge and its production will not lead us to favour the role of ideas, belief or culture. As Paul Veyne (2007: 228–230) demonstrated with respect to ancient Christianity, people's ideas tend to match their practices, not the opposite. Granted, ideas have their own autonomous lives, which often last longer than those of the relevant practices and have their own validity. Knowledge contributes to creating or forming a tangible social situation. It is a speech act or 'speech event' (John Bowen, 1993: 9). From that perspective, madrasas should by their very nature be seen as part of a specific historic and social situation, that they themselves help define. On the one hand, they are not static, as they span the centuries. On the other hand, their course/development is not identical from one country to another. [7] In this book, we speak of the full diversity of contemporary madrasas in five different countries, namely Afghanistan, Bangladesh, China, Iran and Pakistan. This will show that the lowest common denominator is to be found in their relationship with public, state or modern—i.e., non-religious—teaching.

Contemporary madrasas are educational institutions that are not disconnected from the transformation of society itself. So-called 'Muslim' societies have undergone profound change in recent decades: their demographics have changed, they have become more urbanized, state centralization and bureaucratization has progressed, the organization of economic life has changed, international migrations have taken place, and the list goes on.

For instance between 1980 and 2005, the population increased from 13 million to 24 million in Afghanistan, from about 90 million to 150 million in Bangladesh, from 980 million to 1.3 billion in China, from about 39 million to 70 million in Iran and from about 85 million to 159 million in Pakistan.[8] According to the latest data, adult literacy (15 years and over) has increased from 29.2 to 53.5 per cent (1981–2007) in Bangladesh, from 5.5 to 93.3 per cent (1982–2007) in China, from 52.3 to 82.3 per cent (1986–2006) in Iran and from 25.7 to 54.2 per cent (1981–2006) in Pakistan.[9]

The impact of these transformations on madrasas is evident, and madrasas can no more escape them than can state school systems. Moreover madrasas have been evolving by constantly supplying increasing demand for education, which in many cases was neglected by the state. The increase in the number of madrasas since the 1980s is clear evidence of how madrasas have evolved in line with the changing environment. Thus, madrasas are mass educational institutions all facing the economic disorder, and specifically the property speculation sparked by rapid urbanization. They must deal with states that have differing degrees of centralization and bureaucratization, but also with local government and NGOs that are emerging as a potent force in planning and development (Eickelman, 2007: 146). They have had to deal with major political events such as the consolidation of state power by the secularist Communist Party in China, the independence of Bangladesh, the 1979 Iranian Revolution, the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and the ensuing civil war, or the 'fight against terror.' They have reacted to these upheavals or shocks by adapting themselves and innovating, in their organization, their teaching methods or their curricula. We describe diverse situations in this book, and one must bear in mind that contemporary madrasas have tended to adopt the bureaucratic model of modern state education, with the notion of courses and prerequisites, the spatial organization around classrooms, lecture theatres, libraries and IT rooms, the financing of study by means of scholarships granted by the bureaucracy on the basis of academic achievement, standardized and merchandised teaching manuals, the splitting of the school or academic year into semesters and vacations, and, in some cases, social protection akin to that of a Western welfare state.

Like the students of France's most prestigious higher education institutions, such as the Ecole normale supérieure or Polytechnique (Ecole nationale d'administration), the talibs (students of religion) are akin to civil servants, receiving wages, and also enjoying paid leave and other advantages that are no doubt not for nothing in the appeal of their courses. Thus, the teaching of Arabic, which provides access to the Quran, no longer involves the teaching of civilization, but rather the study of a grammar book, purely instrumental and disconnected from history. This makes Arabic a communication tool, a technique, on the same level as calligraphy, which is still widely taught, but as an art, if not a handicraft. The Quran’s supporting material—printed version, CD-Rom, filmed version—is trivialized: the mass reproduction of holy books means that people take less care when handling them, and students can stop or fast-forward a recording or switch from one support to another as they please (Adelkhah, 1999a: 107–108). Religious knowledge becomes a corpus of practical and utilitarian solutions for the problems of modern-day life. Lastly, madrasa administration is increasingly influenced by management science, with accounting and financial rules, bureaucratic procedures, ledgers, human resources management, user-consultation processes. This makes them a competitive and challenging field occupied by players moved by different and varied contemporary motivations.

This means that madrasas are a reflection of the societies in which they have grown, while at the same time they contribute to building these societies. The most important point is that they help make education more widely available, to the point where it is now widely deemed to be essential. They offer access to knowledge that is all the more precious that the state school system cannot provide it, either because the financial resources are lacking or because of its outrageously elitist character, and because state schools, in insufficient numbers, are more often than not concentrated in the larger cities – and often in their center. In any event, madrasas often come across as better adapted to social conditions, and are considered effective because of their flexibility, a bit like hawala and the interest-free loan chests, which are better suited to the needs of the population, in some milieus, than banks. This reasoning goes for the education of the girls and young women sent to madrasas, if only because they represent a non-negligible slice of the school market. This is because madrasas, which help make education more widely available, also help make education a marketable commodity. For education is indeed a market, increasingly occupied by businessmen, often expatriates, or politicians. These people are sometimes looking to make a profit, against the backdrop of the deregulation and privatization of public services (Herrera, 2006: 39–42). Often, they are also looking to move up the social ladder, bearing in mind that the founders and benefactors of madrasas can generally hope to reap social recognition, or even electoral benefits. Thus private madrasas provide a link with globalization. At the very least, they relay the global lingua franca, English, as well as information and communication technologies, including audio, video, IT and the Internet.

As we will see, the development of madrasas is not simply a religious phenomenon in the strict sense of the term. In Pakistan for instance, the government’s goal of cheaply improving national educational statistics and to respect the desiderata of multilateral institutions has prompted it to foster the creation and development of madrasas, which have taken their place in the official teaching system (Saleem, 2009: 105–106). And in numerous least-developed countries, including Afghanistan and Pakistan, as well as a lot of sub-Saharan African countries, Islamic teaching is the only sort available to poor people, and even some members of the middle classes (Rahman, 2004: 91–92). Periods of economic crisis and structural adjustments have reinforced their appeal. However, it would be a big mistake to reduce madrasas to schools for underprivileged people. Just as adherence to Islam is far from being restricted to desperate people and can extend into higher socioeconomic categories, including intellectuals, engineers, doctors and the owners of large stores, madrasas also take in children from the middle and even upper-middle classes, in addition to the fact that they help their promoters move up the social ladder, as we pointed out earlier. As social institutions, they illustrate and support the ascension of the middle class that has gone hand in hand with urbanization.

From this perspective the various chapters in this book will tend to imply that madrasas are not, or not only, the expression of an identity and a lack of openness specific to Muslims. They were open to the world, and vice versa, and some believe that their organization based on waqf provided the model of the university endowment in Oxford (Makdisi, 1981; Gaudiosi, 1988). Hawza in Iran has perpetuated the original scholastic tradition, by accepting the Greek philosophical heritage and the pedagogy of paideia, as demonstrated by Michael Fischer’s (1980) and Roy Mottahedeh’s (1985) impressive studies.[10] In India, at the end of the nineteenth century, madrasas opened up, albeit in a critical and reactionary manner, to Western thoughts (Metcalf, 1982), while in Najaf, in the 1970s, Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, the great theorist of Islamic economics, was not indifferent to the socialist way of thinking, something for which he was often criticized (Mallat, 1993: 142; Walbridge, 2001: 136–137). Madrasas are faced with the social, cultural, religious, and educational pluralism that characterizes contemporary Muslim societies. This interaction is not devoid of difficulties and occasionally degenerates into conflict, if only because of the need for the reciprocal distinction that both systems suppose. Religious or secular radicalism is often the price to pay for this interaction. We do not see this in ecumenical terms. By definition, this interaction involves the antagonism and passion transmitted by difference, the competition for resources or access to power, and increasingly, proximity as religious teaching becomes more bureaucratic and rational. And paradoxically, madrasas, as a framework for teaching, end up by contributing in their own way to a certain secularization: by legitimizing the need for universal education, even for girls or for various ethnic or sectarian minorities; by competing against, complementing and offering synergies with state schools; by adjusting to a constant play between educational supply and demand; and by ‘nationalizing’ themselves and validating the established state framework.

The latter point is of particular interest. On the one hand, madrasas increasingly exist within a national space that bends them into compliance with public policy or ideology. These policies and ideologies in turn help affirm a national form of Islam. The identification of the Islamic Republic of Iran with Shiism and the transformation of Qom into a major holy city are an extreme example of this. Nevertheless, in Afghanistan, Shia madrasas also aspire to making the country a new magnet for Islamic teaching, comparable to Qom or Najaf. And in China, madrasas have appropriated the benefits of Communism, particularly in terms of the emancipation of women, and are in turn ‘nationalizing’ themselves.

On the other hand, madrasas continue to perpetuate the transnational dimension of the umma and to look abroad for models (Noor et al., 2008: 17–18). The al-Azhar in Cairo is legendary, in a positive sense in most Sunni countries, particularly in Southeast Asia, or in a negative sense, by dint of the contestation it inspires, as in Iran (Zaman, 2007: 251–252).

The ambivalent relationship between Shia madrasas in Afghanistan and Iran is also very telling with respect to the interaction between the nation state and the transnational dimension. The creative tension between Islamic teaching and state schools is compounded by tension stemming from the simultaneous desire to move beyond national borders and to reinforce them.

Contrary to what state authorities and some intellectuals contend, the transnational dimension does not necessarily preclude the nation and its state and it can contribute to state formation (Bayart, 2007). Obviously, the synergy between one and the other gives rise to numerous conflicts that in turn help turn madrasas into spaces of secularization.

Madrasa are a meeting place between the holders of state power and other members of civil society, particularly benefactors working to establish and run schools. The two can cooperate, but they can also be in conflict. This is not to say that managers and students of madrasas are particularly active in the political and electoral arena or in social organizations, if the Iranian example is anything to go by. But the status and financing of Islamic education informs a critical debate between the respective roles and responsibilities of state and madrasa, and the virtues of the market and the private sector. The question of schools, including madrasas, cannot be dissociated from the public debate on political economy, and beyond that, globalization. At the same time, madrasas, which are built on confidence—confidence of families vis-à-vis an institution deemed pious and not-for-profit, confidence of the state vis-à-vis an apolitical institution that is helping rebuild the nation's moral fiber in the face of the communist peril and secular materialism—are today faced with the vital need for accountability, not only in the face of the government, from which they must gain recognition and whose regulations must be respected, but also vis-à-vis students, who need to be able to use their education in the job market and who become users—or rather consumers—by virtue of the fact that they pay school fees. In other words the issue of madrasa is related to the concept of the moral economy in the sense it refers to the issue of legitimacy and social justice, their representation, the 'deep emotions' they raise, and their materialization (Thompson, 1963: chapter 3<nowiki>; 1993: 336ff). In fact, by using the concept of the moral economy of the madrasa, we would like to emphasize not only the 'moral' dimension of the economic practices, but also the economic dimension of cultural and religious practices. Here, Islamic education appears to be the ground of interaction between moral and political economy.</nowiki>

Given the prevailing polemical view of madrasas, it may appear surrealistic and naive to emphasize the interaction and complementary nature, albeit rooted in conflict at times, between madrasa and state schooling. Both these systems now rely on each other, in some countries at least, and this interdependence is an opportunity as much as a constraint. It will appear even more surprising that we see in madrasa the possibility of ‘emerging from the minority,’ whether it be for women, ethnic or sectarian minorities, people from rural milieus or underprivileged families; and, from the perspective of the umma and each of the countries that make it up, a way of maintaining rank on the international stage by emphasizing its respectability and identity in the name of the legitimate and universal quest for knowledge.

However, post-revolutionary France has already shown us how outrageously religious teaching, the chief goal of which was to turn the republicans’ own cognitive arms against themselves, ended up by secularizing the very Catholic western provinces, and particularly Brittany (Lagrée, 1992). Comparisons have their limits. But this detour through history and religious sociology allows us to reintroduce the notion of duration. However diverse the social phenomena represented by madrasa, teaching, including Islamic teaching, is now a critical issue in political, social and theological debate in Muslim societies. Now that madrasas are part of mass education in countries where access to knowledge has become a vital need for families, offering a key to the world, they find themselves outside the strict religious and clerical boundaries, at the very heart of public life.

[1] It is by no means underestimating the importance of some rare exceptions such as the one during the Mamluk rule (1250–1517) in Egypt where religious education was never exclusively for the elite but was open to all—including women and the ‘common people.’ See Berkey (1992b).

[2] Jonathan Berkey describes the transmission of religious knowledge as a highly personal process, one dependent on the relationships between individual scholars and students. The great variety of institutional structures, he argues, supported educational efforts without ever becoming essential to them.

[3] We do not know when this mosque was built, but this place is closely associated to Sheikh Mortada Ansari, Ayatollah Khomeini’s most influential mentor, who was born in Iran and buried in Najaf (about 1799–1864). He was also the first marja to develop the theory of Zeynabieh, see Momen (1985: 311).

[4] According to Jamal Malik, darasa, the root of the word madrasa, refers to an institution supporting Muslim scholastic philosophy and law (2008: 4–5, 49). This is a common idea among specialists of India.

[5] For an erudite development on educational institutions in Islam, see George Makdisi (1981).

[6] This period change is strikingly attested by the stance taken by one of the most brilliant scholars, Nikki Keddie, who, although very cautious, actually thought in the 1970s that religious institutions were rooted in the past of Islam and had little future as such, especially in the field of education in the Middle East (1978: 7). On a different note and analysing Islamic education, Dale F. Eickelman recalls the extent to which historians and sociologists have tended to take at face value the ideological claim in Islam of the fixed nature of religious knowledge (1978: 490).

[7] For instance and referring to Ibn Khaldoun, Dale F. Eickelman underscores that the role of memory was stressed more in Morocco than elsewhere in the Islamic Middle East (1978: 490).

[8] United Nations Population Division, World Population Prospects: The 2008 Revision Population Database. <http://esa.un.org/unpp> (accessed 10 January 2010).

[9] UNESCO. <http://stats.uis.unesco.org> (accessed 10 January 2010).

[10] Jonathan Berkey (2003: chapter 21) argues that much that we take as characteristic of Islam is in fact the product of the medieval period.

 2. The rise of new madrasas and the decline of tribal leadership within the Federal Administrated Tribal Area (FATA), Pakistan

So Yamane

In 1996, in a Pakistani village known as ‘T’ within the Federal Administrated Tribal Area (FATA), around fifty Arabs, who wanted to control the area, suddenly entered the village and fought against the tribals who did not want the Arabs to control them. The Arabs were able to enter the area because some tribal youngsters let them in; these Arabs were fighting the internal war in Afghanistan with the Taliban and were looking for a place to hide. As the Arabs entered, they shot at the gate of the tribal chief’s residence killing some tribe members. The angry tribal chief ordered the entire tribe to fight the Arabs. As a result of the severe gunfight, the tribal members succeeded in killing some of the Arabs and got rid of them. According to the tribal chief, since then, neither the Arabs nor the Taliban have attempted to enter this area.

Twelve years later, in the spring of 2008, bombs fell on the jirga meeting in FATA, causing numerous casualties. It is said that those who opposed the traditional tribal system carried out this attack.

According to the tribal chief, the situation in the tribal area has now become unstable. The tribal leadership that had been traditionally held by the elders has been transformed into a newly-emerging religious leadership, and the new leaders are being trained at the newly-established madrasas in the area.

It is common knowledge that the ethnic majority of the Taliban is Pashtun: ‘The tribals of the area are known to be ethnically and ideologically linked to the Taliban and Pashtuns, and South Waziristan—with nearly three hundred kilometres of border with Afghanistan—has become the hub of the Al-Qaeda and Taliban elements’ (Nuri, 2005: 130).[11] Most of these soldiers, who had voluntarily joined, were once Afghani refugees belonging to the madrasas in Pakistan. They were treated as guests by the local traditional society where the traditional tribal code of life—Pashtunwali—has been in effect. However, some of the mullahs and madrasa students opposed the traditional leadership. The above-mentioned cases are examples of such opposition.

The authority of the tribal leaders in FATA has been challenged by the mullas and the students of the newly-established madrasas in two ways. First, the students are not necessarily Pashtun, and they neglect the Pashtun tribal code and seniority system. Second, the students challenge the tribal peoples' understanding of the coexistence of Islam and the tribal code by introducing politicized Islam.

In this chapter, we intend to describe in details this dual challenge to the tribal elders' authority, by analyzing the context in which the madrasas have developed. Of particular relevance is the fact that the primary explanation encompasses political and financial aspects throughout the Soviet Union presence in Afghanistan that was reinforced by migratory dimension and not essentially linked to the resurgence of a trend of political Islam polarized by holy war. This analysis provides therefore a historical background that help us understand that madrasas are not only tools for mobilizing people but also give an opportunity to renew the political or religious hierarchies.[12]

 Pashtun society and FATA

In 1947, Pakistan—a country that comprises different ethnic groups possessing their own language and cultural heritage, such as Panjabis, Pashtuns, Sindhis, Balochis, and Kashmiris—became an independent country. Currently, 96.28 per cent of the total population is Muslim (Population Census of Pakistan, 1998),[13] 75 per cent of the Pakistani Muslims belong to the Sunni sect,[14] 20 per cent are Shiite and the rest are mostly Hindus and Christians.

The North-West Frontier Province (NWFP), which borders Afghanistan, was created by British India under the FCR, Frontier Crimes Regulations, in 1901.

Pashtun is the major ethnic group in this border area. The 2,500 kilometer-long border, called the ‘Durand Line,’ between Pakistan and Afghanistan was set by the British and Afghanistan in 1893. This border was inherited by Pakistan; but when Pakistan became independent, after the ‘Pakistan Movement’, in 1947, the Pashtuns led a movement of their own toward autonomy, and this was called the ‘Pashtunistan Movement,’ which was supported by the government of Afghanistan. This movement rendered Pakistan’s situation extremely fragile. After several political discussions, some of the Pashtuns agreed with the ideology of the Pakistan Movement and decided to join Pakistan, while at the same time remaining autonomous in their tribal area that then became the ‘Federal Administrated Tribal Area’ (FATA; see Figure 2.1). It consists of seven Agencies and six Frontier Regions whose total population amounts to 3,138,000 with a low level of literacy of 29.5 per cent for males and 3 per cent for females (Zaman, 2005: 73).

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-5.jpg][Figure 2.1 Map of FATA]]

According to Article 1 of the Constitution of Pakistan, FATA is treated as a separate entity, and following Article 247, it is administrated by the Federal Government.[15] Therefore, although FATA is part of the NWFP, it is outside its executive authority, and the Governor of the NWFP, in his capacity as an Agent to the President, is in charge of regulating its affairs (Hussain, 2005: 5). Thus, we can say that there exist institutional differences between FATA and the NWFP. For instance, ‘a man who committed murder in broad daylight and in front of witnesses in the Tribal Areas would not be tried according to the laws of the land prevalent in the rest of the British Indian Empire. He would be tried according to the laws of Pashtunwali—the customary and traditional Code of the Pashtuns—as interpreted by the jirga’ (Ahmed, 1986: 135). During the British rule in India, the British left the tribal structure largely untouched (Ahmed, 1986: 135). Tribal structures were allowed to function uninterrupted and undisturbed; their tribal ‘purity’ was thus ensured (Ahmed, 1986: 131).[16] This is why the tribal areas have been called ‘the last free place on earth’ (Ahmed, 1986: 135). Every foreigner who intends to enter this area has to first obtain permission from the government of Pakistan. Even Pakistani governmental officials, including army personnel, cannot move freely inside the area. In contrast, the Pashtuns living in the NWFP can move about freely, as it is regarded as part of ‘Pashtunistan.’ For example, the Salarzai tribe lives across the border in Afghanistan. Until a few decades ago, kinsmen on both sides of the border followed the tradition of cross-migration every few years and used to live in the homes and lands of their cousins across the border. This was of course a tactic that was used to give the Pashtuns the opportunity to take advantage of the economic conditions that prevailed in the valley on the other side of the border (Hussain, 2005: 4).

Although the people in FATA and those living in South Afghanistan seem to share the same history, there are a few differences between them, especially in their degree of acceptance of modernization. People in South Afghanistan, especially those in the towns, enjoyed modern education until the 1970s, since King Amanullah had started to modernize the country in the early 1920s. In contrast, people in FATA were unable to obtain regular education in their area for a long time. This was due to the fact that since the area had been uninterrupted and undisturbed, in other words, since it was rather backward in terms of the social infrastructure, no modern educational system was introduced for a long time. Another difference between these two areas lies in the fact that the presence of Sufi Saints in South Afghanistan was traditionally accepted. This acceptance was demonstrated by the political system, which did not prevent the Sufi leaders from becoming political leaders.

The Pashtun society consists of clans and sub-clans comprising families and maliks, and the tribal chiefs head each sub-clan. The Pashtun are known for their tribal code of life, called Pashtunwali. This is not a written document, but a code of ethics understood by all Pashtun. Pashtunwali consists of the basic concepts of social life, including honor (nang), reciprocity (badal), compromise (nanawatay), hospitality (milmastiya), jirga (council of elders), and so on. In addition, the Pashtuns have a loosely collected set of old customs called riwaj. In the FATA area, both Pashtunwali and riwaj are the basic codes of life.

The federal civil bureaucrats or political agents represent the government in the area. They act as magistrates and are in charge of appointing the members of the jirga. For instance, in South Waziristan of FATA, the political agent is called the ‘King of Waziristan’ (de Waziristan badshah) (Ahmed, 1986: 75). Nevertheless, in spite of his vast authority, he has to pay respect to the tribal code of life. The political agent controls the tribes and keeps a close eye on any particular ebb and flow of the tribal customs. He acts as an executive, a judge, and a revenue collector.[17] He does not often interfere with the domestic affairs of the tribes as these are regulated by a rigid, unwritten code of conduct or ‘code of honor’ (Khan, 2005: 89). Many important matters are decided according to the riwaj in contradistinction with the Islamic law or even the official law implemented by the government (Teepu, 2008: 101). In case of any problem in the society, the jirga examines the issue and presents the verdict before the magistrate. Then the magistrate examines the proceedings of the jirga to determine whether justice has been done as per the riwaj (Hussain, 2005: 5). The jirga, especially the tribal Wulasi Jirga, is strictly dominated by the local riwaj, and the Islamic law is rarely applied during its proceedings.[18] If the verdict seems to be correct, the magistrate announces it as a decision of the court; if not, he remands the case back to the jirga to ensure the correct and just application of the prevalent riwaj and holds a new jirga again. This traditional system of jirga has been paid utmost respect by the government. The government gives the jirga members the title of maliks or lungis and awards them regular allowances called mawajib (Hussain, 2005: 7). The maliks, or tribal chiefs, are paid a hereditary allowance of mawajib, whereas the lungis are given an allowance for services rendered at a particular time, and the allowance ends with the death of the individual concerned (Hussain, 2005: 7). Therefore, the status and authority of the elders of the Pashtun society was protected not only by their tradition but also by the government.[19]

According to Asta Olesen, although it may be argued that Pashtunwali formed the ideological basis of the Afghan state from 1747 to the mid-nineteenth century, this does not imply that Pashtunwali constituted the main ideological frame of reference of the ethnically heterogeneous and divided society (Olesen, 1995: 36). Anthropologists have often pointed out the coexistence of both Islam and the traditional codes of conduct in Pashtun life. Ahmed Akbar goes further and underlines the fact that Islam and Pashtunness coalesce and overlap (Ahmed, 1986: 90). Although there is often a divergence or clash between the riwaj and Islamic law, in some matters, for example, in the case of giving a share of inheritance to the daughter, the edicts of the Islamic law are avoided under the riwaj (Teepu, 2008: 101). In fact, not only was Islam part of the legal and moral basis of society, mediated through and coexisting with the tribal code and local customs, but also, for many centuries, all learning and education in the country took place within an exclusively religious framework.

In the traditional hierarchy, both the elder jirga members and the religious leaders had their own authority. Islamic religious groups that provide leadership in society may be broadly divided into three categories. The first two are defined by their function in society and the third by its genealogical links with holy ancestors. The first, the ulama, is defined by religious and legal learning and includes a mufti, qazi, maulana, and maulvi. The second category, defined by esoteric, sometimes unorthodox practices, includes groups like the Sufis. The third category includes the sharif or sayyid (descended from the Prophet), and the mian (descended from holy men) (Ahmed, 1986: 85). However, one more religious authority—the mullah who appeared at the local level—is, according to Ahmed Akbar, difficult to list in these three categories because these individuals neither possess the sanad (certificate of religious education) nor are they a part of the descendents of holy men, and they can hardly be classified as sufis or esoteric men. This is why, when, in 1997, Mullah Muhammad Umar—the pioneer and leader of the Taliban movement—was nominated as ‘Amir al-Muminin’ or the Caliph of Umma, he was hesitant to accept the title since he was unable to complete his religious education and had no sanad when he joined the jihad of the anti-Soviet war. In other words, although an unclassified category, the mullas enjoy authority in the local areas and exert their influence especially upon the young people, both religiously and politically. In our discussion, we will further elaborate on this special context through which the Taliban, led by Mullah Umar, was able transcend the local border areas and seize power in Afghanistan.

 Madrasas in FATA and its surrounding regions

The formation of madrasas underwent three phases in South Asia. The first phase is the era in which traditional Quranic studies were imparted at privately supervised madrasas.[20] Such madrasas have been seen in many places including the FATA, notably because young girls are allowed to learn only the basic religious principles and practices (Zaman, 2005: 8). The second phase started in the mid-nineteenth century. The modern educational system was introduced in traditional madrasas as part of the Islamic revival movement brought about by the ulama of the Deobandi seminary. Under the British government, Indian Muslims who were influenced by European science and knowledge sought a new manner of Islamic education. Some established modernized colleges; Sar Saiyid Ahmad Khan, who established Aligarh College in 1875, emphasized the merits of modern science. Others established madrasas where traditional Islamic education was imparted through the modernized system. The Dar al-Ulum madrasa in Deoband is the most famous one; it was established by Muhammad Qasim Nanotavi and Rashid Ahmad Gangohi in the village of Deoband, north of Delhi, in 1867 (Metcalf, 1982).

In the mid-nineteenth century, the British government requisitioned the awqaf, on which many madrasas have been financially dependent. Madrasas were then unable to obtain financial assistance from the awqaf without the permission of the British government. This meant that the religious institutions came under the control of non-Muslims. The Deobandi did not comply; they gathered financial assistance from not only the rich Muslims merchants but also common people. This gave the madrasas the ability to maintain their economic and religious independence. At the same time, the Dar al-Ulum madrasa started systematic education not only in Islamic studies but also in modern Western thought and philosophy (Khalid, 2002: 100). They created a council in the administration of madrasas, most of which were run by individuals. After several decades, the Deobandi seminary became popular in South Asia where the ulama and students were deeply involved in the anti-British political movement in the early twentieth century. Some Deobandi scholars started Islamic revival movements such as Jamiat al-Ulama-i Hind, which was established mainly by the Deobandi ulama in 1919, Tablighi Jamaat—a missionary movement started by Maulana Muhammad Ilyas in 1926—or Maulvi Ashraf Ali Thanavi’s religious education for Muslim women through the book of Bihishti Zewar. In 1924, a Jamiat al-Ulama-i Hind committee was established outside Peshawar (Haroon, 2008: 51), and in order to focus on the national political objectives in the NWFP, it announced the establishment of the Jamiat al-Ulama-i Sarhad.

The main discussion in such madrasas was focused on the issue of jihad and its necessity at that time. Members of the Faraizi Movement in Bengal and those of the Deobandi seminary insisted that India was a dar al-harb (land of the war) and that the Indian Muslims should continue to wage jihad against non-believers, as Sayyid Ahmad BareIvi had done against both the Sikhs and the British in the mid-nineteenth century. In 1922, Abul Kalam Azad, a Deobandi scholar and politician of the Indian National Congress, declared a fatwa against the Indian Muslims, stating that India was no more dar al-Islam (land of Islam) but dar al-harb under the British control and that the Muslims should migrate to Afghanistan, which was dar al-Islam and had maintained its independence even after three wars against the British. In view of this order, more than 20,000 Indian Muslims attempted to migrate from India to Afghanistan; however, the Afghani government refused to allow their entry into the country. This incident implies that the Indian Muslims considered Afghanistan a dar al-Islam during the British rule. Muhammad Iqbal, the national poet of Pakistan, too praised the independence of Afghanistan in his poetry as the ‘Thought of Afghani Mihrab Gul.’ Moreover, others, like the members of the Bareli seminary, Sar Saiyid Ahmad Khan’s Aligarh Movement, and other Deobandis, claimed that as far as Muslims could complete their religious duties in a given land, as was the case in India, that land should be considered dar al-Islam. Later on, these independent madrasas made a great contribution to the independence movement by training many Muslim leaders at the beginning of the twentieth century.[21] Jamiat al-Ulama-i Hind played a major role in the independence movement and supported the Indian National Congress, whose assertion was opposed to the independence of Pakistan. In the mid-1940s, most of the Deobandi ulama in the NWFP were pro-Congress, but by 1947, the majority of NWFP ulama supported the Muslim League idea of Pakistan because of the long-standing relations between the Jamiat al-Ulama-i Sarhad and Muslim League (Haroon, 2008: 58). Finally, Jamiat al-Ulama-i Hind was divided into two groups—one stayed in India and the other established Jamiat al-Ulama-i Pakistan after the independence of Pakistan. Even after the independence of Pakistan, some ulama studied in Deoband in India, but they were small in number. Despite making use of the Deobandi name, madrasas in NWFP developed according to the local politics after 1947. In the same manner, in FATA, madrasas began to be established, but most of them were under the control of the local authority—the maliks.

The third phase was the establishment of madrasas for political purposes as bases for mujahidin in the 1980s, which involved the training of religious students who would join the jihad movement of the anti-Soviet war in Afghanistan. Most of the newly-established madrasas in both NWFP and FATA were called ‘Dar al-Ulum,’ which was also the name given to the traditional local madrasas since they also imparted Deobandi-style education. However, the nature of these madrasas differed from the traditional ones as they were established for political purposes and had close links with the Ministry of Interior, the NWFP government, Intelligence, or religious parties that had close links with the government. During the anti-Soviet war, the local maliks were quite satisfied with the support that they got from the western countries through the religious parties and intelligence of Pakistan. However, soon after the anti-Soviet war, with the cessation of support from other countries and the lack of attention paid to the area, social disorder, influenced by the internal war in Afghanistan, became a serious problem in FATA. The maliks were helpless in this situation and were rapidly losing their local authority. Soon, the ulama of the newly-established madrasas, instead of the maliks, began to emerge in the society.

 Towards the increased institutionalization of madrasas

According to an economic survey published in 2001, 1,065,277 students in Pakistan attended 6,761 madrasas, while 6,089,139 students attended 36,096 private schools, and 16,213,438 students attended 199,676 public schools.[22] For public education, the government of Pakistan invested 34,872 million rupees—2.2 per cent of the GNP—in 1993–4 and 72,237 million rupees—2.3 per cent of the GNP—in 2000–1. It is worth mentioning that the registered madrasas received public subsidies from the government. In this manner, they were granted 137,000 million rupees in 1988–9 and 1,654,000 million rupees in 2001–2.

Following independence, fresh attempts were made to reorganize the madrasas, which were the legacy of the ancient religious education system, into five main organizations or boards:

1 The Wafaq al-Madaris al-Arabiya was established in Multan in 1959 and belongs to the Hanafi Deobandi seminary.

2 The Tanzim al-Madaris (ahl-i Sunna) was established in Lahore in 1960 and belongs to the Hanafi Barelvi seminary. All the madrasas that belong to this organization maintain a close relationship with each other and hold examinations at the same time.

3 The Wafaq al-Madaris al-Salafiya was established in Faisalabad in 1955 and belongs to the Sunni Ahl-e Hadith (Salafiya) seminary.

4 The Wafaq al-Madaris al-Shia, established in Lahore in 1959, belongs to Shii Islam.

5 The Rabita al-Madaris al-Islamiya was established in 1983 at Mansura, and its headquarters of Jamaat-i Islami are situated in Lahore. This organization does not belong to any particular branch of the religion.

The restructuring or institutionalizing of the madrasas through the establishment of these five madrasa boards seemed to be a real achievement after the establishment of the foundation of the Deobandi School in the mid-nineteenth century. It might also be considered a challenge to the modern educational system in Pakistan toward which the madrasas reacted.[23]

For instance the Rabita al-Madaris al-Islamiya consists of 531 madrasas in total. Although its headquarters are located at Mansura in Lahore, its biggest madrasas are located in the NWFP and in Sind. Around 36,364 male and 13,190 female students attend these madrasas, while it has 1,754 male and 954 female teachers.[24] While around 27 per cent of the students are women, they compose 35 per cent of the teachers.[25]

It is also worth mentioning that the Rabita al-Madaris al-Islamiya has three committees: Majlis-i Umumi (General Body), Majlis-i Mushawat (Advisory Committee), and Majlis-i Intizamiya (Administrative Committee). The General Body consists of every representative of each madrasa and elects the members of the Advisory Committee, which covers the general activities of the organizations and elects the members of the Administrative Committee every three years. This committee can change the regulations of the organizations if two-thirds of all the members agree. The general meeting of the committee is held once a year. The Administrative Committee operates according to the regulations and discipline dictated by the Advisory Committee.

This organization set the educational curriculum in 1986. In this curriculum, subjects (Quranic study, Hadith Study, Arabic metaphysics and grammar, biography of the Prophet, logics, Islamic jurisprudence, history, etc.) and the titles and authors of textbooks are introduced. These subjects are added up into the number of marks that will be given during the examination. At the same time, some schools such as the Iqra Rozatul Itfal Trust (IRIT) combine government curricula or the elite private curriculum with elements of the formal Islamic-education curriculum (Fair 2008: 8). Algebra, Urdu, and English classes were also added to the curriculum. Urdu class is set according to the public school program, and all the Urdu textbooks are the same as those used in public schools.

On an official note, the government of Pakistan issued the educational policy in 1979, which explicitly recommended, for the first time, the establishment of religious institutions where modern subjects could be taught together with specializations in religious disciplines; the President of Pakistan, Zia al-Haq, appointed a Madrasa Reform Commission (Rahman and Bukhari, 2005: 65). Although the physical structure of the madrasas and their organization have been modernized, the basic curriculum of subjects remains more or less the same despite the discussions with regard to the question of whether or not to add new subjects to the current curriculum. For example, this question arises in the necessity of education in science and English, as well as in the history of Islam and the philosophy of Shah Waliullah (Hashmi, 1987: 201). The need to teach history, geography, politics, Urdu and Persian poetry of Muhammad Iqbal or Akbar Alahabadi (Kakakhel, 1987: 207) and the utilization of computers for Quranic studies were all important issues discussed among madrasas' authorities ('Ali, 1987: 240).

 Financial support for madrasas

Madrasas have various resources, of which the benefits from religious taxes such as zakat and ushr are a part. According to a report by the Ministry of Education in 1988, 935 madrasas (67.4 per cent) received a total of 25,591,200 rupees that year. Although under specific conditions, the government of Pakistan has also been providing financial support to madrasas. For example, in the years between 1985 and 1988, the government created a three-year project of education in English, social studies, and Pakistani studies for madrasas and contributed a sum of 1.9 million rupees to the project. In the same manner, six years later, it created a three-year project (1994 to 1997) for education in English, social studies, and Pakistani studies only for the ninth and tenth grades, which cost 19.95 million rupees. In order to promote the progress of education at madrasas at an intermediate level, the government provided each of the fifty major madrasas with computers and printers from 2000 to 2003, which cost 30.45 million rupees. In fact, it seems that this policy was generalized to other madrasas up to 2004 (Khalid, 2002: 184).

The establishment of the five madrasa boards, as mentioned earlier, was also an opportunity to settle financial difficulties as a result of the establishment of a strong accounts section. According to the Institute of Policy Studies in Islamabad,[26] the reason for the increase in the number of madrasas even after the anti-Soviet war and 11 September is that the newly established madrasas could easily obtain financial support through the section account.

The issue of the provision of subsidies from foreign countries had divided the mujahidin groups during the war. For instance those groups based mainly in the NWFP or FATA received huge support from Western and Middle Eastern countries through Pakistan. For instance, Abud al-Rasul Saiyaf, the head of Ittihad-i Islami bara-i Azadi-i Afghanistan, received financial support only from Middle Eastern countries, on the other hand, Yunus Khalis, the head of Hizb-i Islami, never rejected 'non-Islamic' Western aid through Pakistan, even though he insisted that financial and material support should only come from Islamic countries (Rais, 1994: 185–186). Gulbuddin Hekmatiyar, the head of another sect of Hizb-i Islami, who had separated from the Khalis' party, was openly supported by the government of Pakistan. As we said before, having a great concern about the 'Pashtunistan' issue, Pakistan wanted Hekmatiyar to be an influential pro-Pakistan Pashtun leader in Afghanistan. Jamiat-i Islami's Burhanuddin Rabbani was also not opposed to Western financial and military support via Pakistan but was not willing to get political influence from other countries. He argued that Afghanistan's political independence should be the major concern (Rais, 1994: 182–183).

One should not underestimate the support of the Tribal Areas, which assumed a new and extremely important role during the war where the entire regional administration and organization was subservient to its objectives (Khan, 2005: 38–39). The mujahidin, who were living in FATA and the NWFP, welcomed all financial support. This maintained the financial balance between the traditional leaders and newcomers. The newcomers in the mujahidin began to play a more effective role in the Tribal Areas with the help of outside financial and military support. After the withdrawal of the Soviet troops, some of the members of the mujahidin went back to their own homes, but some remained at the madrasas. Besides, some ex-mujahidin members in the Tribal Areas even became bandits during the internal war in Afghanistan with the help of their weapons. The internal war and brigandage brought about disorder in the Tribal Areas, and the tribal chiefs were unable to restore effective order in their areas. When the Taliban, instead of the local chiefs, established safe conditions in the border areas between Balochistan and Southern Afghanistan in November 1994, merchants at the bazaar in Quetta were asked if they supported the Taliban. The answer was, without any surprise, positive, since the promise of reopening a safe trade route to Central Asia was at stake. All the more, since the members of the Taliban in that area were considered innocent students with pure minds, they were financially and emotionally supported through notable traders' donations to the madrasas.

 Political background of the establishment of new madrasas

In 1973, a pro-Soviet government was established by a coup in Afghanistan. Western countries worried about the situation in Afghanistan and began to train anti-government elements in the country. The students, who had established Islamic study groups and prepared the anti-Soviet movement at Kabul University, escaped arrest by the Afghanistan government and moved to Pakistan. Most of them settled in Peshawar City, the capital of NWFP and the seat of the Pakistani government, led by Dhu al-Fiqar 'Ali Bhutto, who helped them. Nasrullah Khan Babur, who was the governor of NWFP at that time, helped and trained these Afghan refugees. The Western countries offered humanitarian assistance to those Afghani refugees through the Pakistani government, and part of the assistance was used to build madrasas not only in the border areas with Afghanistan but also everywhere else in the country.

For markedly different reasons, Western as well as Muslim countries subsidized the development of madrasas. The anti-Soviet war in Afghanistan was called a 'proxy war of the Cold War.' The issue of 'proxy' had been given a very precise meaning and no foreign country was officially allowed to send weapons and soldiers to Afghanistan. One should keep in mind that the real reason that many Afghans lived in refugee camps and participated in the jihad movement totally differed between Western and jihadist views of the proxy war. The latter was part of the elite crowd and very often either belonged to Kabul University, such as Gulbuddin Hekmatiyar and Ahmad Shah Mas'ud, or were under the influence of Arab professors as some of them had been studying in Egypt, such as Abu al-Saiyaf and Burhanuddin Rabbani. While the leaders were concerned about the establishment of an Islamic state, which was entirely supported by Islamic countries such as Saudi Arabia, the Afghani refugees in camps fought against the Soviet Union because the social revolution initiated under the influence of the Soviet Union had broken the entire traditional social hierarchy based on the feudal system. The jihad movement was even stronger since the new system was advantageous to neither the landowners nor the farmers. Moreover, the sufi leaders and landowners participated in the movement, and both led the resistance. Since jihad was the top priority, everything else was subservient to its objectives; the administration and local resources were geared towards serving jihad (Khan, 2008: 41).

The presence of Afghani refugees became one of Pakistan’s major foreign policy planks (Ahmed, 1986: 166). In addition, the government led by Zia al-Haq promoted Islamization, including the introduction of zakat. The Inter-Service Intelligence (ISI) and Jamaat-i Islami (JI)—the largest and most organized religious party in Pakistan, founded by the Islamic thinker and journalist Abu al-Ala Maududi in 1941—functioned as a gateway for international support from both Western and Arab countries.[27] Once the US began pouring in billions of dollars in order to finance the Afghani jihad movement, Pakistan became a hotbed of religious extremism and their main recruits were the youth, who very often come from deprived socioeconomic backgrounds with no prospect of finding jobs in a stagnant economy (Jalal, 2008: 274–275).

* Newly developed madrasas

At the time of independence, only 245 madrasas were recognized in West Pakistan.[28] In 1960, this number increased to 464 and many of the madrasas were located in the countryside and rural areas (Jalal, 2008: 277).[29] A great increase in the number of madrasas occurred in the 1980s when the number reached 2,056—including 1,012 in Punjab, 426 in NWFP, 318 in Sindh, 1,135 in Balochistan, 29 in Azad Kashmir, 27 in Islamabad, and 47 in Gilgit-Baltistan formerly known as the Northern Areas. Although there is no data concerning the number of madrasas in FATA until 2000, it has been reported that two-thirds of the madrasas in Balochistan are located in FATA.[30] A very interesting report, using data from the 1998 Census, states that the top ten districts, in terms of the madrasa market share, are all situated in the Pashto-speaking belt along the Pakistan–Afghanistan border in Baluchistan and the NWFP.[31]

The number of madrasas doubled from 1988 to 2000 at each level, but the increase rate differed according to the madrasa board to which each madrasa belonged. For instance, the number of madrasas in Wafaq al-Madaris al-Arabiya (Hanafi Deobandi) increased from 840 in 1988 to 1,947 in 2000—an increase of 232 per cent. On the other hand, the madrasas of Tanzim al-Madaris Ahl-i Sunna (Hanafi Bareli) increased from 363 to 717 (198 per cent), while the madrasas of Wafaq al-Madaris Salafiya (Ahl-i Hadith) increased from 161 to 310 (193 per cent); Wafaq al-Madaris Shia increased from 47 to 297 (632 per cent), and the rest increased from 96 to 2,653. The average increase in madrasas in Pakistan during that period was from 2,861 to 6,761 (236 per cent).[32] In this report, the increase in the number of Shia madrasas is remarkable.[33] It may be explained by the fact that in the democratic era, organizations could establish new madrasas more easily than during the marshal law regime (Khalid, 2002: 176).

This remarkable growth in madrasas was closely related to the external and internal politics of Pakistan. During the Cold War period, especially during the anti-Soviet war in Afghanistan, Pakistani president Zia al-Haq supported the establishment of madrasas in the context of Islamization.[34]

 The transformation of tribal leadership in FATA

Many Afghani refugees studied at the madrasas established in Pakistan in the 1970s and 1980s, of which 45 per cent belonged to the Deobandi or Hanafi Schools and were accordingly registered by the Ministry of Interior. [35]

At first, the madrasas and mosques in FATA were built by the local chiefs such as maliks (landowners), were located near their residences and were thus easily accessible to the children.[36] This indicated that the tribal leaders had considerable influence on religious affairs as well as traditional leadership as owners of religious institutions. However, the newly established madrasas for refugees and mujahidin in FATA were built and administrated by others who had no relationship whatsoever with the local authorities, for instance, governmental authorities or foreign NGOs. Therefore, these new madrasas were built far away from the local chiefs' residences. The local chiefs' administration became ineffective under the sudden and huge increase in the population, as a result of the influx of millions of refugees from Afghanistan and fighters from other countries (Khan, 2008: 42).

During the anti-Soviet war, more than three million refugees from Afghanistan entered Pakistan. Those refugees were not only Pashtuns living in neighboring FATA, but also Tajiks, Uzbeks, Hazaras, and Arabs. As a result, the students and teachers of the newly established madrasas mingled with students and professors coming from outside the area from places such as Punjab and were deeply influenced by politicized Islam, which emphasized jihad.[37]

Therefore the Pashtun community in both NWFP and Balochistan, which traditionally welcomed many Pashtuns from Afghanistan, also received many foreigners. If the former refugees—most of whom belonged to their ethnic groups—were Pashtun, they were treated like relatives; yet, the aliens were very different from them. Many of these new students from outside were not necessarily familiar with the Pashtun tribal code. These young students, or mullas, came either from other parts of Pakistan such as Punjab or Kashmir, including university students, or from Afghanistan, Middle Eastern countries such as Saudi Arabia, or Southeast Asian countries such as Malaysia and Indonesia. They, being influenced by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, felt the need for jihad and entered the FATA to join the holy war. After entering the area, they stayed at the newly established madrasas in the refugee camps or in the tribal, rural Pashtun area and studied the newly introduced concept of jihad. Many of them were then recruited as the most favorite by the Student Front, which belonged to traditionalist parties, notably that of Muhammadi.[38] These parties claimed that Islam and justice were not a radical political ideology and that these ideologies together helped unify all these different groups (Rubin, 1995: 140).[39]

However, as these students gradually accomplished their goals and studies and became mullas, they started addressing political issues and justifying the war against the Soviet in the light of Islam. These students went on to become the mujahidin—fighters of a holy war—and alternatively, we may say that the fighters in the battlefield were students of the madrasas. In the name of humanitarian assistance, the ulama and mullas gained access to the huge financial and military help and also received political support from the government of NWFP, the government of Pakistan (Afghan Desk), religious parties such as Jamaat-i Islami or Jamiat al-Ulama-i Islami, and the international community. These mujahidin stayed at madrasas or mosques in FATA near the border of Afghanistan. They began to take leadership not only of the madrasas but also of the community itself.[40]

As mentioned previously, these madrasas and their students were first welcomed by the local community, who respected and supported them, because they were fellow Muslims (Ahmed, 1986:66). However, gradually, the antagonism between the local ulama, supported by the tribal authorities and the mujahidin, came out into the open and the two parties began condemning each other. The former claimed that the mujahidin ignored the value of Islam and disrespected the traditional society and tribal code, and the latter reciprocated and criticized the private and traditional madrasas for depriving the students of the acquisition of political consciousness and modern education.

In other words, as the young mujahidins strengthened their political power, they became critical of the conservative elders of the society. The newcomers and new generations, influenced by their theological education at the madrasas, discovered that the traditional tribal code and Islam were not fully congruent. For the tribal chief, it seemed that there were two kinds of madrasas and students; some were simple and good madrasas where poor children studied the Quran, and the others were madrasas established during and after the war for private benefits and were therefore considered illegal and far from being Islamic. As one might understand, despite the fact that there is no major contradiction between Pashtunness and Muslimness, this conviction has not prevented clashes between the traditional and religious authorities. The history of this area is full of such conflicts, which divided the population whenever there was such a clash.[41]

However, the consequences of the last conflict seemed to have brought about a dramatic change in the organization of the leaderships and the tribal authorities in this area, which led to the rise of the Taliban. Since the refugees became a major part of the total population of FATA,[42] the mullas became the legitimate authorities who could solicit aid for the refugees;

thus, they effectively emerged as new leaders in this area, and the local administration was helpless, especially because the newly emerged leaders (mullas) were heavily armed (Khan, 2008: 45).

The following interview with a tribesman can help understand this situation better. ‘After the so-called religious people arrived in the tribal territories, the routine of the once-peaceful common people of FATA was destabilized. On routes leading to the remote, inaccessible areas of the tribal territory, the Taliban, who are not appreciated by the local people, have established many unauthorized barriers. The people face tremendous difficulties while traveling within the tribal areas, passing through valleys and encountering barriers along roads. They are stopped, spoliated, terrorized, and insulted. Their belongings are checked and the Taliban hold innocent people for long periods under habeas corpus, against their will. The Taliban have never been a threat per se, but the militants are disrupting the organization of everyday life, which is no longer possible for the local tribal people. If Pashtunwali is facing difficulties that’s because the Taliban do not care about the jirga decisions, and they would rather destabilize the old traditional system in order to gain a vested interest in society. The Taliban do not bother to shed the blood of the innocent in order to create terror and intimidate the local community. At present, the jirga is disrupted and manipulated by Taliban militants established in the areas.’[43]

It seems obvious that what was at stake at that time was the elders’ authority and responsibility towards maintaining order in the society. Routine matters were tackled by those who were unaware of the traditional code of conduct of the tribal people. In fact, some local scholars were assassinated because they dared to openly preach against suicide bombing attacks, stating that these were non-Islamic. Some of the newly emerged mullas were not only against the modern school system but were also against the education of girls, and they intended to paralyze the social system.

 The Taliban as a challenge to the tribal order

After the withdrawal of the Soviet army, there was hope for peace and rehabilitation in Afghanistan, but instead, the situation became worse. Despite the establishment of the mujahidin's government in 1992, the rivalry among different political and ethnic groups caused fierce fighting and brought about an era of civil war. The political vacuum led to an escalation in robbery and murder. During the summer of 1994, some of the students at madrasas near and around Quetta and Kandahar planned to establish a group for the recovery and restoration of law and order in the southern part of Afghanistan. It is said that this initiative was supported, if not planned, by the Pakistani ISI. On 1 November 1994, Pakistan's Interior Minister Nasrullah Khan Babur declared that the Pakistani government would reopen the road from Quetta, the provincial capital of Balochistan, to Turkmenistan through the southern area of Afghanistan.[44] The government of Pakistan sent thirty-one trucks full of goods to Turkmenistan, calling them 'a gift for the people of Central Asia.' Soon after their departure, however, these trucks were assaulted at the border town of Spin Bordak in the Kandahar Province of Afghanistan.

Around twenty Afghani students who were put up at madrasas in Pakistan—mainly based in Balochistan and NWFP—roused themselves to prompt action and rescued the aid trucks on 4 November. They executed the bandits in conformity with the Sharia Law. Then the Taliban gathered the weapons from the people and succeeded in demilitarizing the area. They instructed the bandits to obey them by saying that if they surrendered, they would only have to forfeit their arms; however, if they did not do so, the Taliban would impose a 'punishment' on them. During the first stage of their reign, the Taliban did not utilize their weapons very often, which is why the locals welcomed them as 'pure-hearted students.' Furthermore, the merchants supported the Taliban in order to get rid of the bandits who were often responsible for causing trouble in their business. They made donations to the madrasas in the name of Islam because the Taliban eliminated the bandits and assured them of secure trade with Central Asia.

In 1995, many students of the Dar al-Ulum madrasa, located at the corner of a refugee camp in a suburb of Peshawar city, arrived in Afghanistan to join the Taliban movement.[45] Many buses full of students crossed the bother to join the jihad movement. The movement was officially treated as a self-repatriation of refugees. A printed fatwa, signed by more than thirty local mullahs, claimed, endorsed by Quranic verses, that the fight going on inside Afghanistan was against Islam and that the robbers should be executed. The fatwa was the sign of a new movement led by the newly-emerged mullahs who were distinguishable from the traditional leadership. When the Taliban captured the capital city of Kabul in September 1996, they established their own government in Afghanistan and set up the shura, a consultation assembly, which was entirely composed of mullahs. They set up local shuras in major villages for administration. The Taliban's shura system exercised a great influence over the neighboring FATA area, and the tribal leaders in this area claimed that the newly-emerged mullahs and students did not pay any respect to the jirga's decisions, that is, the new mullahs' decisions were not based on the traditional riwaj, which had long dominated the jirga's decisions. They also criticized the mullahs for challenging the traditional authority and social equilibrium.

Although, in 1997, the Taliban controlled almost 90 per cent of Afghanistan, the situation changed dramatically after September 11, 2001. Towards the end of that year, and in the name of anti-terrorism, the Taliban regime was ousted by the US military and a new Afghani government was established. Pakistan's debt was waived and the state even obtained financial assistance for cooperating in the anti-terrorism war; the US provided Pakistan with $700 million for this purpose. When the Pakistani government conducted investigations on the madrasas and launched an anti-terrorism operation against the Taliban in the FATA area,[46] the Taliban retaliated to the attacks both in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Strangely, the students of the newly established madrasas, especially in Pakistan, who had joined the Taliban's jihad movement, were now described as the 'local Taliban.' Despite the heavy pressure on and the attacks against the Taliban, private support for new madrasas and the Taliban is still pouring in. Pakistani army has been continuing a sweeping operation against the Taliban especially in the South Waziristan area where the base of Tahrik-i Taliban Pakistan (TTP) is located. In January 2010, a political agent of South Waziristan called a jirga of about 300 Mehsud tribal elders to hand over 378 wanted militants, including the leader of TTP, to the government. But tribal elders did not promise to do so as according to the elders the issue was so complicated that it may involve a large conflict.

 Conclusion

In brief, the rise of the Taliban movement in FATA might be related, firstly, to the arrival of emigrants and refugees from other regions of Pakistan and from Afghanistan since the 1980s, and, secondly, to the importance of Western and Arab aid in support of the Jihad movement against the former-USSR. This context has revealed and amplified a double rupture between the Taliban movement and the traditional, tribal Pashtuns in the one hand, and moreover, emphasizes their autonomization on one hand, and between the Taliban movement and the traditional religious hierarchy, on the other. The Taliban Movement, far from being the affirmation of the Pashtun tribal fact in FATA, seems to find its origin in the destabilization of the tribal leadership, notably the Pashtun leadership, and in the reconfiguration of what being a Pashtun means. Therefore, it seems that what is at stake, through the development of madness, is hardly Muslimness or Pashtunness, but the flow of merchants and the balance of power in this new context left behind after the war.

[11] NATO accused the people of FATA of providing shelter and support to the Taliban and Al-Qaeda (Gul, 2008: 68). Shinwari (2008: 12) writes ‘Poverty, illiteracy, lack of resources and opportunities and exclusion from the mainstream political process are the factors that provide an ideal scenario for extremism and militancy to take roots in a society.’ Although there are some tribesmen who joined the Taliban (Gul, 2008: 76), we should note the situation of severe fighting between the Taliban and the local tribal leaders in FATA in 2008 and 2009.

[12] Studies on madrasas in Pakistan have focused on their politicization. Rahman discussed how the politicized ulama’s rejection of traditional education of madrasas brought about the existence of militants (Rahman 2008) and Candland refers to the US policy of pouring dollars into madrasas at the time of anti-Soviet war (Candland, 2008: 104). But these articles have not discussed the transformation of tribal leadership we are focusing on in this chapter.

[13] The total population of Pakistan (which includes East Pakistan) was 93.83 million in 1961. The census of 1998 is the last one we have had access to. Moreover, one should mention that a census was conducted in 1980, before the war against the Soviet occupation in Afghanistan, and since 1998 there has been no compiled census. Of course this might help us to better understand the context in which madrasa was developing in Pakistan, as the field which as early as 1980 became a supporting battlefield to the war in Afghanistan.

[14] Sunni Muslims in Pakistan mostly follow the Hanafi School of law, but they belong to different seminaries. Some belong to Deobandi seminary and others to Bareli seminary. There are many Muslims in Pakistan who celebrate the anniversary of Sufi Saints at their tombs. Those Sufi Saints belonged to four major sufi orders: Chishtiya, Nakshbandiya, Suhrawardiya, and Qadriya.

[15] Following the establishment of FATA, and according to Article 246(b), another subdivision was set in its neighboring area, PATA, Provincial Administrated Tribal Areas.

[16] Before the independence of Pakistan, on July 30, 1947, Muhammad ‘Ali Jinnah made it clear that ‘as regards the tribal areas … the government of Pakistan has no desire whatsoever to interfere in any way with the traditional independence of the tribal areas. On the contrary we feel that as a Muslim state we can always count on active support and sympathy of the tribes’ (Bangash, 2005: 48).

[17] This strong role of the Political Agent was set in Sections 40 and 44 of the Frontier Crimes Regulations (FCR), introduced by the British in 1901 and inherited by the Pakistani government. There are some arguments about amendments to FCR, for instance, about the separation of the Political Agent’s judicial and political powers (Shinwari, 2008: 4).

[18] There are three levels of jirgas, that is to say, the local Maraka Jirga, the tribal Ulasi Jirga, and Grand National Assembly Loya Jirga.

[19] At the independence of Pakistan, there were almost two hundred maliks in FATA (Shinwari, 2008: 3).

[20] It is said that madrasa education in South Asia started just after the establishment of Muslim rule, in the era of Qutb al-Din Aibak, who governed Delhi and died in 1210. Sultan Shams al-Din Iltmish (d.1236) established his own madrasas and Muhammad Muiz al-Din Ghori established a madrasa in Ajmer, which is famous for the tomb of Sufi Saint Muin al-Din Chishti. In this way, the number of madrasas increased as Muslim governments developed. Since Sultan Abu al-Qasim Mahmud Ghaznavi (d.1030) belonged to the Shafi school of thought, the madrasas also belonged to this school; later, the Hanafi School of Law became popular in South Asia and this School of Law became dominant in this area. The names of madrasas in South Asia are Jamia, dar al-Ulum, and Madrasa Arabiya (Ahmad 1986: 21). The curriculum of these madrasas has been edited by Allama Nizam al-Din Shahid Sahalvi (d.1747 / 1161H.); it was written in Arabic and consists of an eight- or nine-year course. Since the majority of Sunni Islam in Pakistan belongs to the Hanafi school of thought, it is traditionally led by ulama. These ulama are linked mostly to the Bareli branch of the Hanafi school, which accepted the Sufi network. The ulama regarded this Sufism as truly representative of Islam and the people have followed the sayings of pirs, the spiritual leaders of Sufism. Ulama teach Quranic studies at madrasas in a traditional system of individual tutoring. Most Muslims in Pakistan like to visit dargah or mazar, the tomb of a Sufi Saint, and enjoy the music of qawwali, the sayings of the Saint. People have learned religious teachings either through the qawwali or at madrasas. Olesen considers the madrasa students in rural Afghanistan, pointing out that those students come from poor, landless families with no other prospects in life than to become mullas. This can be seen in Pakistan as well. Thus, this kind of traditional Quranic education has been most active at madrasas in Pakistan.

[21] One of the most famous madrasas of the late Mughal period is Farangi Mahal in Lucknow. Farangi Mahal is highly developed in the study of law, philosophy, and theology and has produced a large number of qazis, judges and muftis. In addition, this institute fixed the religious curriculum systematically, called ‘dars-i Nizami.’ In the same period, Madrasa Khairabad, led by Fazl-e Haq Khairabadi and his son Abd al-Haq Khairabadi, was established in northern India, where many scholars appeared. Thus, the nineteenth century was a very important era for Islamic study in South Asia. In 1893, Nadwat al-Ulama was established in Kanpur, where classic literature was translated and published in order for the people to understand the heritage of Islamic culture of the past. This institution transferred to Lucknow in 1898, where madrasa Dar al-Ulum was built and both Islamic and English education began. In this way, modern education was brought to madrasas through the British governance of India. Later, at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Deobandi madrasas began to issue fatwa for the purpose of emphasizing Islamic teachings, preaching against the governance by the British, or kafir. They stressed the non-cooperation movement against the British. Thus, the Deobandi madrasas sometimes caused the political movements as well. Some famous activists of the Pakistani independence movement belonged to the madrasas of this seminary.

[22] There are 36,096 private schools in Pakistan, which include 28,811 privately owned schools, 2,580 NGO schools, 1,134 trust-based schools, 746 foundation-based schools, and 2,825 others (Economic Survey of Pakistan 2000–2001).

[23] It is unknown what the literacy rate was in Pakistan at the time of its independence, but in 1981, the total literacy rate was 26.2 per cent, within which male literacy was 35.0 per cent and female literacy was 16.0 per cent. In the report from 1998, the literacy rate in FATA was only 17.4 per cent; the rate for males was 29.6 per cent, while the one for females was only 3 per cent (Population Census Report 1998). Such a low rate of literacy is highly disappointing, but even this small degree of literacy can be regarded as progress. When the British left the area and Pakistan became independent in 1947, there was not a single school, dispensary, electric bulb, or government post in the Mohmad Agency (Ahmed, 1986: 121). Among these Agencies and Frontier Regions, the region with the highest literacy is Peshawar, but the total literacy rate is 29.31 per cent, within which the male literacy rate is 52.76 per cent, while the female one is 5.26 per cent. In all of Pakistan the total literacy rate was 45 per cent in 1998: 56.5 per cent for males and 32.6 per cent for females. 72.6 per cent of males and 55.6 per cent of females in urban areas were literate, while 47.4 per cent of males and 20.8 per cent of females in rural areas were. The number of schools in FATA in the year between 2001 and 2002 amounted to 3,184 primary schools (1,931 for boys and 1,253 for girls), 367 middle schools (272 for boys and 95 for girls), and 197 high schools (179 for boys and 18 for girls) (Zaman, 2005: 74). The figure of enrolment at primary schools in FATA for 2001–2002 was 284,264 in total, within which 208,842 were male and 75,422 were female pupils (Bureau of Statistics NWFP). The enrolment in middle and high schools was 41,495 (male 36,903 and female 4,592). School enrolment increased by only 1.3 per cent from 1999–2000 to 2001–2002 (Zaman, 2005: 76). Enrolment is still low, as the rate of students who drop out before completing primary school is still high. This rate in Pakistan between 1998 and 1999 was 16 per cent in total, 11 per cent in urban areas and 18 per cent in rural areas. The most common reason for which 44 per cent of students drop out of primary school is that the students do not want to continue school life—this is true for 41 per cent of students in urban areas and 45 per cent of those in rural areas. The second most common reason is that parents do not allow their children to go to school; this applies to 25 per cent in total, 21 per cent in urban areas and 27 per cent in rural areas (Pakistan Integrated Household Survey 1998–1999). From these figures, it is obvious that the literacy rate is lower in rural areas than in urban areas in Pakistan, and that FATA is a backward area when it comes to education. Zaman (2005: 76–78) quoted Zeba Mehsood's pointed problems on education in FATA, such as staffing positions, unavailability of infrastructure for water, lack of latrines, boundary walls, and residential facilities, which amount to a problem in the quality of education.

[24] A report given by Jamaat-i Islami, Pakistan. This report shows that the organization has 113 madrasas in Punjab, where 8,627 male and 4,399 female students are taught by 387 male and 205 female teachers. The 183 madrasas in NWFP have 9,047 male and 3,504 female students, 431 male and 330 female teachers; the 124 madrasas in Sindh have 11,556 male and 2,703 female students, 584 male and 297 female teachers; the 21 madrasas in Balochistan have 1,355 male and 77 female students, 70 male and 15 female teachers; the 14 madrasas in FATA have 1,360 male and 77 female students, 113 male and 12 female teachers; the 4 madrasas in FANA have 175 male and 113 female students, 6 male and 4 female teachers; the 64 madrasas in Azad and Jammu Kashmir have 3,744 male and 1,702 female students, 143 male and 77 female teachers; and the 8 madrasas in Islamabad have 500 male and 413 female students, 20 male and 14 female teachers.

[25] Jamaat-i Islami has its own education office, namely Nizamat-i Islami, to favorably influence young people toward Jamaat-i Islami ideology. It oversees some 2,000 private schools throughout Pakistan and Jamaat-i Islami members may privately establish schools beyond the purview of the Nizamat-i Islami (Fair, 2009: 21).

[26] IPS was established by Jamaat-i Islami in the mid-1970s.

[27] 'Following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, the Jamaat-i Islami found the opportunity to make a decisive breakthrough in Pakistani politics. By throwing its weight behind the Afghan resistance movement, the organization catapulted itself onto center stage in the American-backed jihad orchestrated with the help of the Pakistani army and its intelligence services' (Jalal, 2008: 274).

[28] 121 in Punjab, 59 in NWFP, 21 in Sindh, 28 in Balochistan, 4 in Azad Kashmir, and 12 in the Northern Areas. Jalal gives another source, as there were only 137 madrasas in 1947. She adds, 'the number rose from 210 in 1950 to 563 in 1971, and during the early 1980s, 893 larger and smaller Pakistani madrasas were in existence, with a total of 3,186 teachers and 32,384 regular students' (Jalal, 2008: 277).

[29] 195 madrasas in Punjab, 87 in NWFP, 87 in Sindh, 70 in Balochistan, 8 in Azad Kashmir, 1 in Islamabad, and 16 in the Northern Areas.

[30] The report shows that the number of boys increased by 211 per cent and girls by 161 per cent. According to the records there are 300 madrasas. Among these, 72 were 'daura-i hadith,' 71 'moquf aliya,' 120 tahtati, 20 'hifz' or 'tajviz,' and 17 'nazira.' The report shows that the number of madrasa students almost doubled between 1988 and 2000: 'nazira' students rose from 296,090 (1988) to 611,165 (2000); 'hifz' madrasa students went from 91,224 to 204,230; 'tajviz' or 'qurat' from 45,719 to 83,015; 'tahtati' from 59,775 to 112,308; 'moquf aliya' from 12,363 to 29,714; and 'daura-i hadith,' from 12,845 to 24,845. On average, the number of madrasa students increased by a factor of 204 per cent over a period of twelve years (Khalid, 2002: 170).

[31] The report is based on the investigation by Andrabi team. These districts are Lasbela, Kharan, Kalta, Kohlu, Loralai, Kila Abdullah, Khob, Pishin, Hangu, Zarak, Lower Dir, Shangla, Buner and Chitral. With the exception of Lasbela, in Balochistan abutting Karachi, all of these high-intensity madrasa districts are along the Afghanistan–Pakistan border. But Andrabi team could not evaluate the important areas of FATA because census data were not available for FATA (Fair, 2009: 36).

[32] Khalid explains that in the census of the year 2000, the number of madrasas belonging to any organization was 4,108 and the number of others was 2,701 (Khalid, 2002: 176).

[33] We do not know whether the increase in the number of Shia madrasas in Pakistan was influenced by the Islamic Revolution of 1979 in Iran.

[34] Jalal also shows that once Pakistan was awash in greenbacks, maulvis rushed to fill the demand for recruits by offering their students for jihad. Since they are a means of establishing political dominance, self-proclaimed religious parties of all sectarian denominations, as well as the Jamaat-i Islami, set up madrasas in places where they saw opportunity to extend their influence (Jalal, 2008: 277).

[35] Most of the financial support was given to the madrasas of the Deobandi school, which upset the sectarian balance. State patronage of Deobandi imams in government-run mosques and the rise of the sect’s militias spurred both the Barelvis and the Ahl-i Hadith into action, and the contempt for secular and rational forms of knowledge transformed madrasas into factories for turning out a lethal kind of religious bigotry (Jalal, 2008: 276–277).

[36] Not only in FATA, but also in other rural areas of Pakistan, the distance between the children's residence and the madrasa has been a problem. In a 1966 report on education in FATA, the distances between the two middle schools or high schools are given as follows: 4 miles in Frontier Region Kohat, 5 miles in Malakand, 40 miles in Dir District, 5 miles in Kurram Agency, 8 miles in South Waziristan, 20 miles in Dera Isma'il Khan, 6 miles in Waziristan (Barelvi, 1980: 218–219).

[37] The concept of jihad was theoretically discussed in Urdu language by Maududi. Maududi justified the right of jihad in his book Al-Jihad fial Islam (Jihad in Islam) in 1930 in order to protect Muslims from the criticism of non-Muslims who said that Islam was related only to violence.

[38] Nabi Muhammadi, a famous Sufi in Southern Afghanistan, led the political party called the Islamic Front of Afghanistan.

[39] Rubin adds an example of one journalist as follows: 'If a reporter asks a Talib what kind of rule he wants in the future, he will answer "Islamic," because that is the only word he knows for the rule of law Afghanistan so sadly lacks. One might also note that Southern Pashtun tribes represented by the Taliban had little if any representation in the leadership of the parties that were involved in the negotiations. Few Qandaharis had attended the modern state educational system, and they were consequently absent from the principal political elites of the mujahidin, the Communists, and even the old regime' (Rubin, 1995: 140).

[40] According to the report of NGO, CAMP (Community Appraisal & Motivation Program) of 2008, in a response to the multiple choice question 'Law and Order in tribal areas can better maintained through … ', 44.7 per cent of respondents favored the Islamic law, while 36.2 per cent believed that jirga can effectively maintain the law and order situation in FATA (Shinwari, 2008: 59).

[41] For instance, in South Waziristan. In the late 1960s, a mulla who migrated from the neighboring Bannu District built a beautiful mosque and a complex of schools and dormitories and began to grow powerful in local politics. A rivalry sprang up between the tribal leaders; both mulla and tribal leaders began to accuse one another, regarding each other as kafir. They even used the word jihad to refer to the tribal fight. At last, the mulla was arrested. Thus, the fact that religious and tribal codes complement each other does not prevent competition and conflict among tribal leaders and religious authorities (Ahmed, 1986: 77–82).

[42] For example, according to Ahmed (1986: 174), about 50,000 refugees were said to be living in South Waziristan Agency. Of these, about 20,000 are officially registered and are thereby entitled to standard measures of official aid. Out of a total population of 300,000 tribesmen, some 50,000 are ‘outsiders.’ A proportion of 1:6 of such outsiders in any total population is a high one to feed and support. The problem is more acute in North Waziristan Agency, where the number of officially registered refugees is almost 120,000 (making the refugee-to-local ratio 1: 2).

[43] Interview with a tribesman.

[44] Babur was the governor of NWFP in the 1970s. He played an important role in supporting Afghan mujahidin based in NWFP. When the Taliban emerged, he said in an interview that ‘the Taliban are my children.’

[45] In the 1990s several Jamiat al-Ulama-i Islami / Deobandi madrasas became notorious for education Taliban leaders and supporting the Taliban in Afghanistan politically, financially, and even militarily (Fair, 2009: 57).

[46] Education Sector Reform, which includes the reform project of madrasas, was launched by Musharraf’s government in January 2002. One of its major objectives was development of a more secular system to stave off the ever-mounting international pressure to counter Islamist extremism (Fair, 2009: 40).

 3. Women’s empowerment and Iranian-style seminaries in Iran and Pakistan

Keiko Sakurai

Although an oft-quoted adage from the hadith states that ‘seeking knowledge is a duty of Muslim males and females,’ the access of Muslim women to education has historically been limited to the maktab (Quranic school) or private tutoring at home, and women have been excluded from attending Islamic seminaries[47] or theological colleges teaching Islamic science, though there were a few exceptional cases.[48] Therefore, female education has lagged far behind male education in Muslim societies such as Iran and Pakistan.

Ironically, the right of Muslim women to learn was officially acknowledged after the introduction of modern schooling, under the growing influence of the West. In Iran, Reza Shah, the founder of the Pahlavi dynasty, introduced state-controlled schooling in order to educate experts and bureaucrats who were loyal to the monarch. Under his reign, women were admitted to elementary and secondary schools, and for the first time in 1935, they were even allowed into institutes of higher learning (Menashri, 1992: 107–110). In Pakistan—a part of colonial India until India’s partition in 1947—a small number of private colleges offered education to Muslim girls, mostly from well-to-do families,[49] but Pakistan’s state-controlled education system has not contributed significantly to the improvement of women’s access to higher education.

In the process of the expansion of state-controlled schooling, the seminary system was marginalized and even stigmatized as out-of-date; however, the seminaries in both Iran and Pakistan, while remaining male-dominated institutions, continued their teaching activities. In Iran, where the majority of the population is Shia, the seminaries successfully evaded state intervention while claiming to be, after Najaf, the seat of higher learning and religious authority for the Shia. On the other hand, in Pakistan, where only about 15 per cent of the population is Shia (Momen, 1985: 282), the Shia seminaries could develop only to a limited extent, and they were obliged to send their students to either Iran or Iraq for higher learning. This situation made Pakistani seminaries dependent on Iranian or Iraqi ones.

Half a century after female students were first admitted to institutes of higher learning under the reign of Reza Shah,[50] Khomeini decided to officially authorize the establishment of women's seminaries. Khomeini, the founder of the Islamic Republic of Iran, was counted as one of the marja-i taqlid (source of emulation), or the highest clerical authority, when he overthrew the government and established a regime based on the principle of vilayat-i faqih (guardianship of the jurisprudent authority) in 1979. Armed with double legitimacies, he simultaneously represented the state and the clerical authority. He emphasized the role of women in society by stressing their three complementary roles of mother (madar), militant (mubariz), and Muslim (musalman) (Adelkhah, 1991: 42–43). It was under Khomeini that the first full-scale women's seminary, Jamiat al-Zahra, was established in 1984. In the 1990s, the concept of women's seminaries became increasingly popular and spread rapidly across Iran as well as to other countries, such as Pakistan. The development of this concept marked the beginning of a new chapter in the Shia history of Islamic studies on various levels.

In this chapter, I would like to analyze this new phenomenon of women's seminaries in order to gain a clear understanding of the extent to which the religious and traditional educational practices at the seminaries could, in fact, open the door to two major complementary innovations. First, through the establishment and development of women's seminaries, the Islamic Republic of Iran seemed to have developed a new seminary model that occasioned the transformation of the seminary—previously considered a stronghold of religious tradition—into a revolutionary agency whose primary role was to train propagandists (muballigh) of vilayat-i faqih both inside and outside the country, such as in Pakistan. As opposed to the men's seminary model, which had a long pre-revolutionary history and had enjoyed autonomy from the state for centuries, the Jamiat al-Zahra and other major women's seminaries in Qom were established under the initiative of the clerical leaders of the state, who were eager to mobilize the support of women in their political cause. This subordination of women's seminaries to the state and the 'étatisation of Islamic education' (Hefner and Zaman, 2007: 13) facilitated the application of bureaucratic management and the adoption of modern school arrangements, such as common examinations, standard curricula, modules, semesters, an academic credit system in the seminaries, and a systematic acceptance of international students with special courses designed for non-Iranian students (tullab-i ghayr-i Irani).[51] These measures minimized the differences between the seminaries and the state-controlled university, reduced the burden of seminary studies, and popularized seminaries among young women as a new option for higher education.

The international students who graduated from the Qom seminaries are currently scattered all over the world, and many of them are actively engaged in activities focusing on education and propagation. Since the 1979 revolution, Pakistani students at the Qom seminaries have outnumbered those from other countries. The role of the Shia women's seminaries in Pakistan, mostly run by Pakistani female graduates from Iranian seminaries, will be subsequently examined in this chapter as an example of how the Iranian seminary model is implemented in places outside Iran, where the Shias are in a minority, in addition to how it functions in a different context.

Second, regardless of the initial reasons for the establishment of the women's seminaries, women's acquisition of the right to study at seminaries opened up new possibilities for them to change the balance of power, not only between men and women at the familial and societal level, and among clerical institutions, but also between women and the state in the context of the Islamic Republic of Iran, through becoming a strong social group.

The growing presence of seminary-educated women in the official religious sphere dominated by revolutionary discourses elevated the position of women in the largely male-dominated clerical hierocracy. Moreover, the active participation of seminary-educated women in the public religious sphere has made 'the women's issue' an important topic for clerical discussion and has initiated debates over Western versus Islamic ideas of women's empowerment.

 Growth of the seminary

Before the 1979 Islamic Revolution, women had no official means of accessing seminary education, which was often limited to some maktab[52] for women, such as the Maktab-i Narjis in Mashhad;[53] the Maktab-i Tawhid,[54] and the women's section of the Dar al-Tabligh[55] in Qom; the Maktab-i Fatimah established in Isfahan[56] and the Maktab-i Zahra in Shiraz[57]—all of which were run privately, with little coordination. Although Ayatollah Qudsi and Hojjatoleslam Shari initiated some efforts towards the institutionalization of women's seminaries before the revolution, the full-scale institutionalization began only under Khomeini's sanction (hukm). Jamiat al-Zahra commenced in the academic year 1985\86, and all the existing maktabs in Qom were merged into it.[58]

Jamiat al-Zahra offers full-time study courses, ranging from secondary high school diplomas to doctorate degrees, for residential as well as non-residential students. Students can also avail of part-time study programs and correspondence courses. The Jamiat al-Zahra's Department of International Affairs manages courses for international students. Students are admitted on the basis of their performance in the entrance examinations, and all the courses, which are taught over two semesters, are modular. According to the 2006–7 brochure of Jamiat al-Zahra, the seminary has over 12,000 students studying in its various departments and over 16,000 students have graduated from Jamiat al-Zahra since its establishment (Jamiat al-Zahra, 2006–7: 5).

The establishment of Jamiat al-Zahra and its resounding popularity prompted the clerics to open other women's seminaries, thus boosting the number of women's seminaries in the 1990s. However, until the establishment of the Management Centre for Women's Seminaries (markaz-i mudiriyat-i hawzaha-i ilmiyya-i khaharan) in 1997, there were no statistics on women's seminaries available to the public. According to the data publicized in 1997, there were 11,255 students and 1,102 (685 female, 417 male) professors at 138 women's seminaries countrywide. In addition, Jamiat al-Zahra itself had approximately 8,000 students and 137 professors.[59] The number of students enrolled at the seminaries under the control of the Management Centre for Women's Seminaries rose to 20,000 in 2002. It seems that Khorasan, the largest province before its division into three provinces, with 15 million pilgrims visiting it annually, enjoys a special status since it is not included in these statistics. In 2002, approximately 8,000 students were studying at 35 seminaries in Khorasan (Shirkhani, 2005: 100). The capacity of all these seminaries still appears to be insufficient, because in every academic year, the seminaries are unable to accept more than 10 per cent of the total applicants.[60]

Figure 3.1 shows the number of women's seminaries under the supervision of the Management Centre for Women's Seminaries by year of establishment. It also reveals that the real boom in women's seminaries began in the 1990s. We must bear in mind that along with the increase in the number of seminaries, female enrolment in government-run higher education institutes increased at a correspondingly rapid pace, to the extent that it exceeded male enrolment in 2003.[61]

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-6.jpg][Figure 3.1 The number and year of establishment of Shia women's seminaries in Iran]]

Source: adapted from http://www.whc.ir/forms/schoollist.php?start=6~267 accessed September 2007.

Unlike the men's seminary, with its long historical precedents, the women's seminary is a new phenomenon with few historical examples. The founders of women's seminaries are usually clerics who are eager to set up their own seminaries in their hometowns in order to reach out to the female population in the area. These seminaries often start out as small classes for imparting religious education and gradually expand in size and organizational scale. According to the directions for administrating women's seminaries issued in 2006, a seminary of the smallest scale comprises 15–30 students, one principal, one teacher, and one administrator.[62] This relative ease in opening women's seminaries provides opportunities for clerics living outside Qom to expand their range of social activities and consolidate their position in local settings.[63]

Women who wish to proceed to post-secondary education face many hurdles. The shortage of seats in universities faced by those with a strong desire to acquire a tertiary degree and the lack of public space to engage in meaningful activities are pressing matters for young women. Under such circumstances, seminaries are regarded not only as another option for those who fail to obtain a seat in a university—since the application of the university-style system to women's seminaries has made seminary education equivalent to secular higher education—but also as a suitable place for those who want to pursue religious knowledge, those who prefer to study in a 'segregated space,'[64] and those who prefer a more intimate study environment than a university.[65] In addition, the high demand for seminary graduates in the fields of education and religious propagation has provided a favorable environment for seminary expansion.

 Towards an Iranian model of the seminary

Although seminaries were marginalized in the process of the expansion of state-controlled schooling that started in the 1920s, they survived as independent institutions falling outside state control and maintaining their own management and teaching style in Iran. In contrast to 'Western Europe's examination-giving and degree-granting universities' (Hefner and Zaman, 2007: 9), the seminary education system in Iran has been characterized by the lack of a defined curriculum or standardized examination and evaluation system. Neither were there any age restrictions on admission into these seminaries nor was the duration of study defined. Before the spread of universal primary education after the Second World War, boys who completed their basic studies at local quranic schools could enter the seminary in Qom at around 12–14 years of age. The first level of study in these seminaries is called 'preliminaries' (muqaddamat), comprising the study of grammar, rhetoric, and logic. The middle level of study is called 'texts' (sutuh), in which students learn theology, law, and jurisprudence, based on the textbooks.

Only a limited number of students are able to proceed to the third and most advanced level of education, called 'beyond texts' (dars-i kharij), wherein they receive training to become a mujtahid, an expert who can issue an authoritative opinion on Islamic law (Mottahedeh, 1998:451–452). When a mentor is satisfied that his student has acquired the ability to issue a competent legal opinion, he issues an ijaza, a certificate authorizing the student as a mujtahid in his own name. Therefore, it is not the institution but an individual mujtahid who issues the certificate (Mottahedeh, 1998: 454).

The highest-ranking clerics were powerful enough to avoid state control and enjoy full independence owing to their independent financial resources, derived from religiously lawful funds such as the zakat, khums, waqf, and donations paid to their office to maintain seminaries and distribute scholarships. However, after Khomeini and his clerical followers seized power, they proclaimed that since an Islamic state had been established, the state would subsidize seminaries in order to meet the increase in the demand for religious experts who could engage in policy-making, deal with socio-economic problems in government organizations, and simultaneously propagate the official ideology of Islam (Shirkhani, 1384: 56–64). They also attempted to control seminary affairs by establishing the Management Council of the Qom Seminaries (shura-i mudiriyat-i hawza-i ilmiyya-i Qum) in 1980.[66] Although the council formulated various proposals for restructuring the management style of seminaries and their curriculum, it failed to occasion substantive changes in the face of resistance from the seminary heads who were circumspect about accepting grants from the state treasury in an effort to retain their autonomy (Shirkhani, 1384: 58).

In 1991, after the death of Khomeini, his successor, Khamenei, established the High Council of Seminaries[67] (shura-i ali-i hawza) and its executive organ, the Management Centre for Seminaries, which was another step towards the institutionalization and rationalization of seminary activities. Khamenei’s intention was to extend the state’s control over seminary affairs, which were still in the hands of senior clerics whose religious rank and prestige were much higher than his own. Backed by overwhelming resources, Khamenei’s policy was successful in unifying the management and applying the university-style education system to many seminaries; however, a few prestigious seminaries such as Ayatollah Golpaygani’s seminary and the Fayziyya va dar al-Shifa seminary continue to remain independent.[68] Moreover, some mujtahids seem to have adopted a middle path and have accepted the centralized management and standardized selection, curriculum, and evaluation up to the intermediate level; however, they have reserved the right to manage the advanced courses and issue the ijaza in an individual’s name. This has resulted in a dual system of management, notably, in the men’s seminaries.

Unlike men’s seminaries, women’s seminaries—a relatively late phenomenon—have generally welcomed centralized management. In February 1997, the High Council of Seminaries established the Management Centre for Women’s Seminaries and gave it the mandate of developing the curriculum, conducting entrance examinations, and consolidating the unified program. Students are admitted in the seminaries on the basis of a combination of their scores in the common entrance examination, which consists of a written examination and an interview, and their high school grades (Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawzaha-i Ilmiyya-i Khaharan, 1383–4\2004–5). The common entrance examination is conducted by the Management Centre for Women’s Seminaries, and applicants are required to take the examination on a particular date at the nearest examination centre, at least one of which is established in each province.[69] Currently, the courses offered at the women’s seminaries have been standardized, as shown in Figure 3.2.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-7.jpg][Figure 3.2 The women’s seminary system in Iran]]

Source: adapted from http://www.kowsarnoor.net//knn/html/moarefi/sakhtar.html accessed 25 April 2007.

The courses include a three-year preparatory course (daura-i pish hawzavi) for junior high school graduates and a one-year course for high school graduates. The four-year general course (daura-i umumi), divided into Levels 1 and 2, is equivalent to an undergraduate course. Level 3 covers the six areas: study of the Quran and hadith, philosophy, tabligh, history, ethics, and Islamic education; this course is equivalent to a master course. After taking this master’s-level course, students can opt for another three-year special course (Level 4) and an even more advanced extra special course comprising ijtihad 1 (Level 5) and ijtihad 2 (Level 6).[70]

The academic year is divided into two semesters, each semester extending over 18 weeks. To pass examinations in each subject, a student has to obtain more than 12 points out of 20, and the acquisition of credits is a requirement for graduation.

An applicant to a seminary is required to have the following qualifications: be loyal to the vilayat-i faqih and the regime, a citizen of the Islamic Republic of Iran, not be ethically corrupt, and be physically and mentally healthy. Apart from these, there is an age restriction. Applicants for the three-year preparatory course should not be over 17 years and should have completed eight years of general education. Similarly, applicants for the one-year preparatory course need to have a higher secondary certificate and not be over 21 years. In the case of applicants who have finished junior college, the maximum age for application is 22; for those who wish to pursue a bachelor’s degree, it is 24; for the master’s degree, it is 26; and for the doctoral degree, it is 28. However, if the applicant is a wife or daughter of a martyr or someone wounded in war, or a sister of a martyr, the age restriction is extended by two years; for married women, it is extended by three years.

According to the application booklet of 2004, 16 seminaries offered a seven-year course to 266 local and 66 non-local applicants who had finished junior high school, while 163 seminaries offered a five-year course to 3,840 local and 394 non-local applicants with high school graduation certificates; the completion of these courses would be equivalent to attaining a bachelor’s degree. Judging from these numbers, the dormitories can accommodate only about 11 per cent of the total number of students, which presents a striking contrast to the men’s seminaries, where the students are mostly boarders. The number of applicants to women’s seminaries is twice the number of applicants to men’s seminaries, and in some provinces, the number of applicants may be as high as 15 times the number of seats. At present, approximately 15 per cent of those who finish Level 2 (equivalent to a bachelor’s degree) proceed to Level 3, or the master’s degree course.[71]

Unlike men who, after a long period of study, assume a clerical role for a living, women are pressured to complete their studies in order to get married and have children. Therefore, a university-style system in which students can obtain a formal degree after the completion of each stage fits their needs. The formal degree also improves the employment prospects for women. Hence, it is not surprising that many of them work as religious teachers at various institutions, including schools, where such degrees are considered to be the basic requirement. Therefore, for graduates of women’s seminaries, a degree that certifies the completion of studies to a certain level is more valuable than the traditional ijaza that guarantees the transfer of knowledge from teacher to student.

* Tabligh: Political mobilization

In the course of the revolutionary movement, the clerics and seminary students were also mobilized along with other social groups such as workers, students, and intellectuals. Although these experiences divided the clerics, they were convinced of the importance of gaining control over social affairs, including education. The Cultural Revolution that began in 1980 was considered as an opportunity to not only expel the anti-revolutionary elements from universities but also restructure the educational institutions in accordance with the official ideology, by controlling students and the contents of textbooks.

Ironically, it was easier for the new Republic to impose the official ideology on schools and universities than on the seminaries, since, at least in theory, the high-ranking clerics who taught at the seminaries were entitled to follow their own interpretations and could not be forced to follow Khomeini’s diktats.

This explains, in part, the necessity of the regime to create new institutions in order to support and disseminate Khomeini’s new Islamic ideology—the philosophy of vilayat-i faqih. For example, Khomeini’s disciples, who were actively engaged in preaching during the revolution, established the Islamic Propagation Office of the Qom Seminaries (daftar-i tablighat-i hawza-i ilmiyya-i Qum) in 1979.[72] In 1984, in order to recruit qualified female preachers, this office opened a women’s section, offering a one-year short training program and a four-year long one.[73] In 1998, this branch, which was called the Women’s Education Centre (markaz-i amuzish-i khaharan), started a course entitled ‘Introduction to Islam and Its Propagation’ (daura-i maarif-i Islami va tabligh).[74] At present, the objectives of the Women’s Education Centre are to enhance women’s knowledge on Islam, and train preachers and dispatch them to various parts of the country. To this end, the centre’s activities include developing propagation programs and encouraging research on Islam. The basic requirements for applying to this centre are: the applicant should have completed high school graduation; should be a resident of Qom; should have passed the written and oral examination; and should have a husband, father, or brother who is a cleric. The motive of training women from clerical families is to dispatch them to places to propagate, along with their husband, father, or brother. The number of religious gatherings organized by the centre steadily increased from 314 in 1979 to 9,127 in 1992. On various occasions, the centre organizes and dispatches female preachers for religious gatherings at schools and other places.[75]

In 1991, in order to improve the training of experts in propagation, the Management Centre for the Qom Seminaries established an education centre specializing in propagation (markaz-i amuzishha-i takhassusi-i tabligh), thereby joining the domain of propagation activities (Shirkhani, 1384: 77). When the Management Centre for Women’s Seminaries was established in 1997, education, research, and propagation were identified as the major educational fields in women’s seminaries. Although the Shia seminaries have a historical presence of over a thousand years, many of the traditionally studied texts and curricula of these seminaries do not suit contemporary needs. Therefore, the women’s seminaries were specially equipped with 90 textbooks customized to suit modern requirements. Every year, approximately 3,000 students graduate from the seminaries, ready to carry out propagation activities; therefore, the development of an efficient curriculum for propagation is a very important issue. In addition to basic seminary studies, such as literature, the Quran,

Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh), principles of jurisprudence (usul al-fiqh), ethics, theology (kalam), and logic (mantiq), seminaries teach subjects such as ‘introduction to the other religions,’ ‘the political system of Islam,’ ‘women in Islam,’ ‘introduction to Western culture,’ ‘Arabic literature,’ and ‘English communication skills.’[76]

Besides the propagation activities organized by the seminary and other organizations, the neighborhood religious gatherings held by traditional women at private homes or in the hoseynieh[77] provide a platform for seminary-graduated women. Traditionally, privately trained ‘freelance female preachers’ have led these gatherings (Adelkhah, 1991: 143–147; 1999a: chapter 3<nowiki>; Torab, 2002: 147). However, since the early 1990s, young seminary graduates with formal training have been gradually taking charge of such gatherings (Adelkhah, 1999a: 109; Kamalkhani, 1998: 63). These seminary graduates reconcile women’s non-formal religious activities with the</nowiki> official Islamic ideology dominated by male clerical authorities, thereby mobilizing women’s participation in the official cause (Torab, 2002: 153). In addition to this, a popular preacher can gain respect in society as well as economic independence (Adelkhah, 1999a: 109–110; Kamalkhani, 1998: 65); this provides women with a good incentive to pursue seminary education.

Besides Iranian women, international seminary students have become an important focus for propagation activities. Before the revolution, the Qom seminaries (hawza-i ilmiyya-i Qum) accepted students from across the border irrespective of nationality. However, after the Islamic revolution, the Qom seminaries became the stronghold for the ‘ export of the revolution’ and represented the foreign policy of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

In this context, students from outside Iran were categorized as ‘non-Iranian students.’ Further, in order to facilitate the training program for potential non-Iranian preachers, the Council for Supervising Non-Iranian Seminary Students (shura-i sarparasti-i tullab-i ghayr-i Irani) was established in 1979.[78] This organization was reorganized as the International Centre for Islamic Studies (markaz-i jahani-i ulum-i Islami)[79] in 1986, and it played a prominent role in developing the seminaries and their curricula, including Persian language training[80] for non-Iranian students, as well as recruiting students from various countries. Though the Qom seminaries are far from monolithic, the International Centre for Islamic Studies has been successful in representing the Qom seminaries in the international arena. The systematic acceptance of non-Iranian students has made these seminaries more accessible and has attracted many of these students. At these seminaries, non-Iranian students are first required to undergo intensive Persian language training, since most of the texts, including the writings of Khomeini and other Islamic revolutionary ideologues, are in Persian. This has inevitably enhanced the position of Persian as ‘the language of the revolution’[81] in the Qom seminaries and at other places, and has promoted the ‘Persianization’ of Shia sciences.[82]

Currently, the International Centre for Islamic Studies supervises more than thirty schools and affiliated educational, cultural, and research-oriented centers. Among them, Bint al-Huda in Qom is the first women’s seminary exclusively for non-Iranian female students. Bint al-Huda was established by a group of clerics under the leadership of Ayatollah Asefi in 1982, and it previously offered courses in Arabic mainly for students from Iraq and the Gulf region. However, it was placed under the supervision of the International Centre for Islamic Studies in 2000 (Markaz-i Jahani-i Ulum-i Islami, 2007: 251), following which it introduced courses in Persian to facilitate the acceptance of students from five continents. In 2006, 235 students of Bint al-Huda, most of them from Iraq, Pakistan, and Afghanistan, graduated from this seminary,[83] and in 2008, 550 students from 25 countries were engaged in studying various courses.[84]

Bint al-Huda offers a two-year post-high school course, undergraduate courses, and a master’s course. A doctoral course began in 2008. In order to obtain credibility abroad, the graduation certificate of Bint al-Huda is issued by the Ministry of Science, Research and Technology.[85] Even before graduation, the students of Bint al-Huda engage in propagation activities within as well as outside Iran.[86]

For example, one of the Pakistani students at Bint al-Huda visited the city of Sukkur in the Sindh province of Pakistan for 12 days during the month of Ramadan for propagation activities. According to her, Shia constitute 25 per cent of the population in Sukkur; however, their knowledge of Shiism is minimal and most of them follow Sunni practices. She says that the men of Sukkur think that women have no right to education. In view of this situation, she organized many classroom-style meetings for the young women of Sukkur and discoursed on topics such as the religious connotations of fasting during the month of Ramadan, Islamic moral codes, and ideal Islamic women such as Khadija and Fatima Zahra.[87]

Another Pakistani student of Bint al-Huda talks about her experience of propagating in her native city of Skardu in Baltistan. Her father is a cleric who studied at Najaf for 14 years; he is a representative of Ayatollah Sistani and Ayatollah Khamenei at Skardu and has founded seminaries for men and women in Skardu.[88] According to the student, people in Skardu have immense respect for those who have studied in Iran. She gives an example: she was appointed to introduce the ‘feast of duty’ (Jashn-i taklif), a ceremony for girls who have reached puberty;[89] this ceremony was initiated and popularized in contemporary Iran. Girls who had recently reached the age of nine years were invited to the ceremony and were offered a headscarf and Khamenei’s canonical guide.[90]

To gain admission in Jamiat al-Zahra, foreign students are required to have completed high school and be aged between 17 and 25 years for residential students and 16 and 35 years for non-residential students; admissions are on the basis of the candidate’s documents and a personal interview. The applicants are required to complete a six-month Persian language program and a four-and-a-half- or five-month foundation studies program before enrolling for the two-year diploma or four-year bachelor’s course. A two-year master’s course is provided to those who are interested in advanced studies. Unmarried students can seek accommodation in the residential halls on campus; however, there are many non-Iranian students living in Qom with their husbands, who themselves study at one of the men’s seminaries in Qom.

According to the undersecretary of the international division of Jamiat al-Zahra, 900 non-Iranian students from 40 countries are currently enrolled in the institution.[91] Graduates from Jamiat al-Zahra have served as teachers or principals in Islamic schools in their respective countries such as Pakistan, India, Bahrain, Lebanon, and Bangladesh.[92]

They belong to various backgrounds; for instance, a woman from Thailand, born in 1980, narrated her story as follows. Her family converted to Shiism when she was seven years old. She entered Jamiat al-Zahra in 1998 and studied there for a while. For the last five years, she has been teaching at al-Mahdi seminary (hawza-i ilmiyya al-mahdí) in Bangkok, which currently boasts 17 female students aged between 17 and 22 years; only local teachers are employed at this seminary, and some of them have graduated from Jamiat al-Zahra. When she was a student at Jamiat al-Zahra, she visited schools in towns such as Babol and Sari during the dah-i fajr-i inqilab,[93] where she, along with other foreign students, talked about the revolution and Islam—which was welcomed by the Iranians. These experiences helped her organize various propagation programs for the al-Mahdi seminary, in which both Shia and Sunni students participated.[94]

Maktab-i Narjis in Mashhad also accepts non-Iranian students. It was established in 1966 by Fatemeh Khamoushi; however, the Pahlavi regime grew suspicious about its activities and even forcibly closed it down for three years. After the revolution, Maktab-i Narjis was free to redouble its activities. Ever since, it has accepted 315 students from 21 countries and regions including Indonesia, Albania, Azerbaijan, Afghanistan, the US, Myanmar, Pakistan, Thailand, Turkmenistan, China, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Kashmir, Congo, Malaysia, India, and various Arab and African countries; of these, 230 students have already graduated. The students of Maktab-i Narjis have been dispatched to various places such as schools, offices, universities, and mosques for carrying out propagation activities. For example, in the 2003 academic year, a total of 2,635 gatherings were organized; these gatherings involved 97 preachers in propagation activities during the month of Ramadan. As many as 1,054 gatherings were organized by 56 students in the months of Muharram and Safar. A total of 680 students were sent to 18 places for youth recreation programs.[95] After graduation, most of the non-Iranian students return to their country of origin and engage in preaching and teaching in their community.[96]

* Implementation of the Iranian model in Pakistan

Pakistan and Iran both have Shia populations; however, in contrast with Iran, where Shia form the majority, they constitute only 15 per cent of the population in Pakistan. The rest mostly comprise Sunnis, but they are divided into sub-sects, namely, Deobandi, Barlevi, Ahl al-Hadith, and Jamaat-i Islami. Each sect and sub-sect has its own madrasa board to recognize and supervise the madrasas belonging to its own sect.[97] Relations between the Islamic seminaries and the state-controlled schooling are different in both countries. In Iran, seminaries are regarded as institutes of tertiary education to which students may be admitted after the completion of compulsory education. However, in Pakistan, seminaries are called madrasas (dini madrasa, pl. dini madaris), and they range from institutes that offer primary- to tertiary-level education; moreover, most of the students attending these madrasas have never received any formal schooling.

At the time of India’s partition in 1947, there were 245 madrasas in Pakistan, of which 7 were Shia. By 1988, the total number of madrasas had risen to 2,861, of which 47 were Shia.[98] By 2002, the number of madrasas in Pakistan had increased to 9,880, with 419 of them belonging to Shia.[99] By 2004, there were 458 Shia madrasas, and 84 of these were for females (Kazmi, 2004; Durrrani, 2002). Pakistan is composed of diverse regions and various ethnicities (see Figure 3.3); the largest Shia population can be found in the Punjab province. In all, 58 per cent of the Shia madrasas for men and 65 per cent of those for women are located in the Punjab province, followed by the Sindh province and the Gilgit-Baltistan of Pakistan.[100]

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-8.jpg][Figure 3.3 Map of Pakistan’s provinces]]

The political situation surrounding the madrasas changed dramatically with the rise of Zia al-Haq, a general who seized power in 1977. Zia Islamized the legal system and implemented interest-free banking and the compulsory deduction of zakat from bank-account holders[101] in order to legitimatize his military rule. However, the Shia regarded Zia’s Islamization, which was based on the Sunni Hanafi school of law, as a threat to their beliefs. They protested against Zia’s Islamization and eventually compelled Zia to exempt the Shia from the compulsory collection of zakat.[102] Zia also attempted to improve the economic conditions of madrasas so as to integrate them into formal schooling through financial assistance; to this end, he decided to distribute the collected zakat money to registered madrasas.[103]</sup> According to Islamic law, it is not permissible to use zakat money for funding madrasas; however, this sponsorship was justified because the majority of the students studying at madrasas came from families in need.[104] In addition, Zia tried to modernize madrasa education by granting formal recognition to the final examination certificates conferred by the madrasas.[105] In 1981, the highest of these certificates, issued by the board of madrasas, was recognized as being equivalent to a BA or MA degree in Islamic studies (Islamiyat) or Arabic, on the condition that the student should pass in the examination of these two subjects.[106]

Zia’s Islamization politicized a religious matter and aggravated sectarian divide and conflict. This situation was intensified by the establishment of a Shia theocratic regime in Iran and the 1979 invasion of Soviet troops in Afghanistan. Due to these events, the Pakistani Shia were emboldened by the success of the anti-US Islamic revolution in Iran and politicized their identities (Nasr, 2000a: 175). On the other hand, the Zia government entered into an alliance with the US in support of the Sunni Afghans and mujahidin fighters who were fighting against Soviet troops in Afghanistan. These ongoing efforts to save their Afghan compatriots provided Pakistani Sunnis with a golden opportunity to augment their power in the religious and political arena.

Under these conditions, the madrasas, especially those of the Deobandi sub-sect, proliferated rapidly.[107] The Shia, whose positions were threatened by the Sunni-oriented Islamization, sought support and guidance from Iran. Many of the Pakistani and Afghani Shia youth, mostly Hazara[108] refugees living in Pakistan, were eager to study at Iranian seminaries; this led to an increase in the number of Pakistani and Afghani students in Qom.[109]

Shia youths in Pakistan usually begin their education at the local madrasa. The Shia madrasas in Pakistan are private organizations run by local clerics. Although the Shia Madrasa Board (Wafaq al-Madaris al-Shia, Pakistan) in Lahore provides the curriculum, examination, and certification of the degree, other decisions, namely those regarding administration, recruitment, collection of alms, financial management, selection of textbooks, level of study, and criteria for the acceptance of students, are left to the discretion of each madrasa.

Shia students who wish to proceed to a higher level of study, which is beyond the capacity of Pakistani clerics, apply for the examination organized by the Shia Madrasa Board. Iranian delegates from the Qom seminaries visit Lahore to conduct interviews with students that have acquired the highest scores in the final examination and choose students on the basis of these interviews to admit into the seminaries at Qom. Many of the successful male students come to Qom along with their wives and daughters and let them study at Jamiat al-Zahra. Female students without a companion are offered rooms in the dormitory attached to the seminary.

The number of female Pakistani students at Jamiat al-Zahra and other Iranian seminaries increased rapidly in the early 1990s, and after returning home, many of them engaged in teaching at the women's madrasas. In many cases, the founders and principals of women's madrasas in Pakistan are male clerics; however, a substantial number of madrasa managers and teachers are graduates from women's madrasas.[110]

As shown in Figure 3.4, the number of madrasas increased in the 1990s, particularly in the mid-1990s; however, according to the directory of Shia madrasas in Pakistan, five women's madrasas were established in the 1980s. Among them, the Madrasa al-Zahra,[111] founded in 1988 by Husayn Najafi in Lahore, grew to be one of the best-organized madrasas in Pakistan. In the beginning, it was a small religious center offering basic teaching three days a week for boys and girls aged 10–12 years. Gradually, it developed into a madrasa with a hostel that could accommodate 12 students. In 1997, this center was named Madrasa al-Zahra, and it subsequently obtained a place within the premises of Jamiat al-Muntazar,[112] the best-organized Shia men's madrasa in Pakistan, in which the Shia Madrasa Board has its office. In 2006, Madrasa al-Zahra obtained a large plot for building classrooms and a hostel in the suburbs of Lahore.[113] Graduates from this madrasa contribute to promoting Islamic education for Shia girls in various parts of Pakistan and have until today opened at least seven madrasas (Kazmi, 2004: 585–587). At present, this madrasa offers a five-year course focusing on religious subjects, and an applicant is required to have completed the tenth grade or preferably the twelfth grade from a government-controlled school.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-9.jpg

][Figure 3.4 The number and year of establishment of Shia women’s madrasas in Pakistan]]

Source: adapted from (Kazmi, 2004)

In addition to the Madrasa al-Zahra, the following three madrasas can be introduced as good examples of well-organized women’s madrasas in Pakistan. Jamia Zainabiyya is a women’s madrasa with a hostel that was established in Lahore in 1998 by Idara Minhaj al-Husayn.[114] It is a Shia organization founded by a Pakistani cleric, Muhammad Husayn Akbar, who studied at a Qom Seminary. His wife, who also studied at a Qom seminary, is the one who actually manages the daily classes at the madrasa. Applicants are required to have the minimum qualification of the completion of ten years of study, and students are accepted after a few months of provisional admission. Students have to appear for examinations twice a year, and one of these examinations is conducted by the Shia Madrasa Board. The madrasa is run using khums, zakat, and local donations.

Jamia Narjisiyya was established in Lahore in 1996. The founder of this madrasa was a Pakistani cleric who had studied at Qom for 12 years, and during that time, his wife studied at Jamiat al-Zahra. When he returned to Pakistan, he sold his property to purchase land in Lahore, where he built his home and a madrasa with a hostel. He has designated this madrasa as a waqf and runs it on khums and local donations.[115] Students receive free education at this madrasa, though they must provide for their own textbooks. The completion of the tenth grade is the basic qualification for applying to this madrasa, and students can study both religious and secular subjects in order to obtain a two-year higher secondary certificate, namely FA.[116] After the completion of four years of study, students have to take an examination conducted by the Shia Madrasa Board to acquire a degree from the madrasa. Every year, 10–12 students graduate from this madrasa.

Sakina bint al-Husayn is a women's madrasa established in Lahore in 2000 by Ghulam Husayn Najafi, who completed his higher education at Najaf after six years of studying at Jamiat al-Muntazar. He returned to Pakistan in 1970, started teaching, and eventually became the vice president of Jamiat al-Muntazar. In addition to teaching, he wrote many books to counter the negative propaganda against the Shia. His daughter serves as a principal of Sakina bint al-Husayn. In April 2005, while travelling in a car along with his daughter,[117] Ghulam Husayn Najafi was shot dead in a sectarian attack that also injured his daughter.[118] However, his daughter, the principal of Sakina bint al- Husayn, coped resolutely with the tragedy, and her courage was widely admired and praised; this made the madrasa extremely popular among the Shia. This madrasa accepts students of all ages, regardless of their educational background, provided they show a strong will to study. The madrasa offers different courses for students in the primary, eighth grade, tenth grade, and BA levels.[119] Since the Shia are in a minority in Pakistan, this madrasa specially focuses on educating Shia women to defend Shiism and provides clear and logical answers on the differences between Shiism and other sects.[120] In order to achieve this goal, students are specially trained to perform the ceremony to mourn the martyrdom of the third Imam, Husayn, in which the tragedy of Karbala is described and re-enacted. The madrasa also provides short-term courses for not only school and college students but also housewives and working women, thus offering a learning opportunity to everybody. The madrasa is financed by local donations such as sadaqa, khums, zakat al-fitr, proceeds from the sale of skins of slaughtered animals, and monetary offerings to the twelfth Imam.[121]

Table 3.1 provides data regarding the four above-mentioned madrasas, collected by means of a questionnaire survey.[122] Except for a few local students, the majority of the students of the four madrasas reside in the respective madrasa hostels.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-10.jpg][Table 3.1 Four women’s madrasas in Lahore]]

Table 3.1 shows that the average level of students’ education before entering the madrasa is higher than the national average,[123] while Table 3.2 reveals that madrasa students have strong educational aspirations. Table 3.3 shows the breakdown of students hoping to serve as religious experts such as religious teachers, preachers, and zakiras,[124] or wishing to start their own madrasa. The reason why fewer students aspire to be zakiras as compared with those who wish to be preachers is partly because the role of a zakira has been traditionally assumed by women with no formal religious education and who have learnt the skill from other senior zakiras, thus leading to the development of views often bordering on heterodoxy (Abou Zahab: 128–129). Therefore, the conflict between the traditional and religiously trained zakiras has reduced the popularity of being a zakira as a career option among students. Several students stated that their goal was to be a scholar, which requires advanced education in Iran. Table 3.4 shows that a considerable number of students have at least one madrasa-educated person in their family or among their relatives.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-11.jpg][Table 3.2 What would you be doing had you not been admitted into the madrasa?]]

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-13.jpg][Table 3.3 What do you want to do after graduation? (Multiple choices permitted)]]

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-14.jpg][Table 3.4 Is there a madrasa graduate in your family and among your relatives?]]

In Pakistan, especially in the rural areas, women’s opportunities for social participation are extraordinarily limited; however, men can hardly find a pretext for restricting women from attending religious gatherings which provide them with a rare opportunity for socialization. Therefore, religious experts are in great demand in such areas, and women have very few culturally relevant options, such as being a preacher, a teacher, or a zakira. In addition, being a religious expert earns a person respect as well as economic benefits, since such women are remunerated for their religious services at women’s gatherings.

It is worth mentioning that these four madrasas are quite unlike the typical Pakistani madrasas. According to the statistics for 2000, 76 per cent of the female students enrolled at the madrasas of all sects attend primary-level courses (grades 1–5) and only 6.3 per cent of the female students pursue higher-level studies (grades 11–16) (Institute of Policy Studies, 2002: 31).

The founders’ educational experience at Qom or Najaf not only influences the educational arrangements of the madrasas but also reflects on the credentials and status of the madrasas they run. For this reason, some madrasas are adorned with pictures of high-ranking marjas such as Khomeini, Khamenei, Khui, or Sistani inside the building to signify their direct or indirect mentorship. However, under the growing influence of anti-Shia Wahhabism in Pakistan, these credentials can become a double-edged sword and inflame sectarianism. In view of this situation, in recent times, even the madrasa founders educated at Qom seminaries have begun to adopt a cautious attitude towards the vilayat-i faqih, so as to protect themselves from the accusation of being a subordinate of Iran or conspiring towards an Iran-inspired revolution.

 Feminization of the seminary

The Islamic revolution transformed the ‘women’s issue’ (masala-i zanan) from being a ‘taboo subject’ to one that is widely discussed in the scholarly works of high-ranking clerics (Mir-Hosseini, 2002: 74). Since the Islamic Revolution, numerous articles and books on gender-based issues have been written from various viewpoints. These publications can be roughly categorized into two groups: works written from an outsider's or secular perspective and those written from an insider's or participant's perspective, which regard Islam as the source of their legitimacy (Ahmadi, 2006: 34). However, this division is too vague to reflect the wide-ranging contemporary debates on gender-based issues in Iran, and it is beyond the scope of this chapter to deal with such details.

The dominant view on gender-based issues within the Qom seminaries is represented by the writings of influential clerics such as Morteza Motahhari, [125] Javadi-Amoli,[126] and Ebrahim Amini.[127] They justify the differences with regard to the rights and obligations of the sexes on the basis of innate gender differences. According to Motahhari, 'Islam does not believe in uniformity between men and women. But at the same time, it does not give preferential treatment to men in the matter of rights' (Mutahheri 1992: 65). Motahhari's assumptions have been widely used as the basis for arguments put forth by the clerical establishment. Khamenei shares this assumption: 'From the viewpoint of the value of human beings, Islam sees men and women as equal. However, from the viewpoint of assigned duties, this is not so. Islam believes in a special duty for women, which is not lighter than that for men' (Banki Purfard 2002: 24–25). On the basis of this assumption, he emphasizes that women should prioritize their roles of being a good wife and mother, even though scientific, economic, and political avenues are open to them (Banki Purfard, 2002: 30–31).

These clerical viewpoints on gender-based issues have been disseminated through various organizations associated with the Qom seminaries. The Islamic Propagation Office of the Qom Seminaries (daftar-i tablighat-i Islami-i Qum) advocates its view on gender-based issues through the Payam-i Zan (women's message), a journal seeking to explore an Islamic solution to women's issues (Mir-Hosseini, 1999: 84). In addition, the Office of Research and Study of Women's Issues (daftar-i mutaliat va tahqiqat-i zanan), which was established as an institution affiliated to the Management Centre of Women's Seminaries, publishes books and magazines.[128] The office has played an important role in advising the government on gender policies. The objective of the office is to present new methods of explicating the characteristics and rights of women from the following perspectives.

1 Equality of women and men in terms of humanity;

2 Equality of the ethical and social values of men and women;

3 Differences in God’s expectations from men and women;

4 Existence of innate differences between men and women;

5 The complementary nature of men and women at the familial and societal levels;

6 Existence of gender values;

7 Essential nature of the masculine and feminine gender roles and people’s obligation to protect the gender roles in that form;

8 Importance of maintaining a balance between rights and duties in a manner that assures the dignity and guarantees the equality of women and men.[129]

Even the clerics who admit the need for change in order to meet the requirements of contemporary society[130] dismiss the idea of gender equality as a Western concept and refute the feminists’ claim for equal rights. The head of the Office of the Research and Study of Women’s Issues, Zibainejad, insists that the ‘acceptance of the innate difference between men and women makes the Muslim view different from that of the feminists’ (Daftar-i Mutaliat va Tahqiqat-i Zanan, 2006: 11).

Although it is the male clerics who justify the differences regarding the sexes in Islamic law on the basis of innate gender differences, these viewpoints are widely accepted among the female seminary students at Jamiat al-Zahra, which is regarded as the stronghold of male-centric Islamic jurisprudence (Mir-Hosseini, 1999: 243).

As mentioned earlier, one of the primary motives for the establishment of women's seminaries was to educate women to become experts in propagation. Hence, female seminary graduates were trained to propagate the concept of women's rights within the Islamic context, as defined by the verses of the Quran and Islamic law, to a female audience. The aphorisms of Khomeini and Khamenei, which uphold the value of the family as a basic social unit and the role of women in the family, are often cited by these graduates; they also dwell on the scholarly works of theologians such as Motahhari, Amoli, and Ebrahim Amini. Accordingly, women's seminary graduates, who themselves constitute a part of the clerical establishment, are trained to defend the male theologians' interpretation of women's rights as being authentic from the religious point of view. The active participation of female religious experts in socio-religious activities is regarded as a success in the implementation of Islamic women's empowerment. For example, in the twenty years of its history, Jamiat al-Zahra has produced many female religious experts who are qualified to teach higher-level courses originally taught by male clerics. As a result, except for the board of trustees, whose members are all male ayatollahs, all the eleven members of the academic board of Jamiat al-Zahra are women who have mostly completed Level 3 of seminary education. Likewise, one-third of the members of the management board are women, and the nine research groups at the institution are all headed by women who have attained Level 3 or even higher degrees of education.[131] Consequently, the major activities of Jamiat al-Zahra are now carried on by women who are highly respected and recognized as religious experts.

However, their high educational achievement and important role in seminaries so far does not seem to be a threat to male dominance in the clerical hierarchy. The majority of female students leave the seminary after completing Level 2, and very few students proceed to Level 3,[132] which is still insufficient to be a mujtahid. Therefore, in spite of the rapid growth in women's seminaries, female mujtahids such as Nosrat Amin[133] and Zohreh Sefati continue to be exceptional figures. Sefati complains about the current scarcity of female scholars who have the ability to issue their own legal opinion. She criticizes the fact that ‘many female scholars see no future in attaining the degree of ijtihad as long as they cannot be a source of emulation;’[134] however, ‘the responsibilities of a mujtahid are not only limited to being a source of emulation’ and ‘mujtahid women can serve society by helping Muslims interpret Islamic principles as well.’[135] Sefati is of the opinion that issues peculiar to women, especially matters pertaining to ‘purification’ (taharat), must be interpreted by female religious experts for their female followers.[136]

Whatever the reasons for this scarcity, the lack of female mujtahid limits women’s influence within the clerical hierarchy, and women’s seminaries continue to serve as platforms for the spread of religiously relevant social participation, which will not, at least for now, weaken the male-centric patriarchal system in contemporary Iran. As a result, so far, the women’s seminaries have served as a bulwark against the growing pressure exerted by secular feminists as well as Islamic feminists—most of them lay intellectuals and activists—who advocate gender equality through the reinterpretation of the sacred text (Ahmadi, 2006; Hoodfar and Sadr, 2009:29–30).

To assess the role played by the Shia women’s madrasas in Pakistan, it is important to take into account the contextual difference between Iran and Pakistan. First, female school enrolment in Pakistan is much lower than that in Iran. For example, the average enrolment rate for females at the ninth and tenth grades is 14 per cent, but this percentage dropped to 8 per cent in rural areas in 2001–02 (Qureshi and Rarieya, 2007: 13).[137] Generally, the lack of schools in the neighborhood or a suitable transport system for female students impedes female enrolment in schools, especially in the rural areas. Moreover, the concept of the parda, which means the seclusion of women from men, is widely observed in Pakistan, and the parda is used as a pretext for restricting women from studying in schools[138] and working outside the home. Therefore, the priority for Pakistani women is to acquire the right to education. Second, there is a deep rift between the Westernized elite and the religious majority in Pakistan. The Westernized elite society follows the Western model of women’s lifestyle and social participation, which is not tolerated by the religious majority.

To sum up, the seminary education is in fact a ‘total social phenomenon,’ since the Pakistani women try to address the social and traditional difficulties they face in their everyday life. Therefore, with regard to women’s claims and aspirations, the seminaries in Pakistan play the same role as the public space in Iran. Curiously, these women are concerned not only about their own rights but also about the difficulties in their society with regard to the implementation of the Islamic ideals and principles. The way they evaluate the current problems faced by the Pakistani society reveals that women are becoming very active with a clear social consciousness and that they are assuming charge of the fate of both Islam and their national identity. With regard to this, one might gather three strong points from the life experiences of such women: first, although they are deeply attached to the traditional practice of parda and very critical of the Western way of life, they try to strike a compromise between Islam and their own traditions in order to prevent their seclusion and segregation; second, they criticize the traditional interpretation of Islam that restricts individual rights; and finally, they underscore the necessity of reforming Islam according to the developments in Iran.

In order to gain a better understanding of this situation, it is worth citing a few cases. In a rural area, a 19-year-old student said, ‘A woman can still study while remaining within the Islamic limitations of the parda. The parda does not stop women from getting an education.’ Another student believes that ‘Islam gives a high status and importance to women, and if that status is fairly and honestly given to her, she would be able to work side-by-side with men in our society.’ A 16-year-old first-year student from a town went further and said, ‘Our society today is in need of another Imam Khomeini. Just as Imam Khomeini declared a fatwa in Iran and ordered everyone to follow the right path, we need the same kind of guidance.’[139]

 Conclusion

The establishment and subsequent rise of the women's seminaries in post-revolutionary Iran have dramatically changed the traditional framework of religious education in Muslim society in general and in Shia areas in particular. Although these seminaries were an outcome of the political ambition of the State in Iran, women's seminaries now seem to be unstoppable. In other words, women were not only at the core of the bureaucratization and rationalization of religious education (Adelkhah, 1999a: Chapter 5), but they extended its scope and reinforced its potential. That might explain, at least partly, the emergence of women's issues as a growing challenge for politicians in Muslim societies that have to deal with both Islamic feminists and the new female mujtahid as incontestable authorities in a male-dominated sphere, that is, the religious seminaries. As previously mentioned, this evolution does not undermine the overall religious hierarchy; however, there is no doubt that it has the capacity to affect and shift the emphasis of current issues. Paradoxically, through the reinforcement of Islamic discourse and religious practices, we are witnessing unprecedented transformations in Islam and these are mainly focused around two complementary observations:

• Religion is becoming a dynamic tool for reinforcing the social and political participation of women in society; this might eventually limit the present clerical domination over women's affairs in general and women's religious affairs in particular.

• The proliferation of the concept of seminary-educated women managing their own space, educating their own students, and mobilizing their own audiences will bring about a 'fragmentation of authority' (Eickelman and Piscatori, 1996: 131) that will reinforce at least pluralism, if not a kind of democratization of the religious sphere, by enlarging the circle and allowing women within it.

• Although we need time to better evaluate the possibilities and limitations of the Iranian religious education model, it appears, notably through the developments in Pakistan, that its consequences can hardly be the monopoly of the State or the leaders that have taken the first initiative.

[47] In Iran, the Shia Islamic seminary—and especially the seminary complex in Qom—is called ‘hawza’ or ‘hawza-i ilmiyya.’ Fischer defines the term as a centre of religious learning, composed usually of a group of madrasas (Fischer, 1980: 290). But in Pakistan, the word ‘madrasa’ is commonly used to refer to the seminary.

[48] For instance, women had access to mosques for higher education in the time of the prophet (Alatiqi, 2009). Another example can be found in the Mamluk era (1250–1517) in Egypt (Berkey, 1992: chapter 6).

[49] The Commission on National Education formulated the first significant educational policy in 1959, in which it recommended compulsory primary education for boys and girls and the provision of equal access to higher education, in general education, as well as professional colleges for women (Qureshi and Rarieya, 2007: 4).

[50] The first-ever admission of women to the Tehran seminary for high school teachers (Daneshsara-i Ali) in 1935 encountered fierce clerical opposition and Tehran University admitted its first female students in 1940–1 (Menashri, 1992: 108).

[51] For example, the Bint al-Huda seminary for non-Iranian female students and the Imam Khomeini seminary for non-Iranian male students were opened in Qom. Jamiat al-Zahra offers special courses for non-Iranian students.

[52] Tabatabai, the head of Jamiat al-Zahra, explained that before the Islamic revolution, the women’s seminary was called a maktab and generally, maktabs were established by unqualified persons and lacked supervision of marja and appropriate educational programs (Namih-i Jamia 1383\2004–5, No. 1). <http:/67.18.3.204\sections\mag\1\index1.htm> (accessed 25 May 2007).

[53] Maktab-i Narjis was established in 1345\1966–7.

[54] Maktab-i Tawhid was established in 1352\1973–4 by Ayatollah Qudsi, the founder of Haqqani seminary in Qom (Gulbarg, no. 32, Murdad, 1381\2002). <http://www.hawzah.net/Hawzah/Magazines/MagArt.aspx?id=46347> (accessed 21 February 2010).

[55] A women's section was established in 1973; two years later, it had 150 students (Fisher, 1980: 84–85).

[56] Maktab-i Fatima was established in 1346\1967 by the first female mujtahid, Nosrat Amin who was born in 1886 and died in 1983 (Huda, 1385\2006–7, 1 (1): 45).

[57] Maktab-i Zahra was established in 1973 (Kamalkhani, 1998: 48).

[58] Payam-i Hawza, no. 14, 1376 \1997. <http://www.hawzah.net/Per/Magazine/PH/014/ph01404.asp> (accessed 21 February 2010).

[59] Ibid. Jamiat al-Zahra is run independently and publicizes its statistics separately from those issued by the Management Centre for Women's Seminaries. The number of non-Iranian students enrolled in Jamiat al-Zahra was 660 in 1377\1998–9. <http://iranwomen.org/zanan/charts/Education/seminary/eh3-1.htm> (accessed 29 July 2007). This number increased to 900 in 1385\2006–7. The students hail from 40 different countries. For details see Ayandi-i Rushan, 17 Ordibehesht 1385 (7 May 2006). <http://www.bfnews.ir/vdch.mn-t23nixftd2.html> (accessed 25 February 2010).

[60] This information is from the home page of the Management Centre of Women's Seminary. News no. 150, 5 Ordibehest 1386 (25 April 2007) <http://www.kowsarnoor.net/> (accessed 10 March 2010).

[61] The total number of students at government universities and higher education institutes in the academic year 1370\1991–2 was 344,045—of which 28.2 per cent were female students. The number of female enrolments reached 549,570 (as compared to the male enrolment figure of 469,410) in the academic year 1383–4 (2004–5), so 53.9 per cent of students were female. In the case of bachelor's degree courses, the percentage of female students in that year was 61.5 per cent. In addition, 529,993 female students and 568,498 male students were studying at the Islamic Azad University, a huge nonprofit university with more than 300 campuses all over the country. These data are provided by the Statistical Centre of Iran (Statistical Centre of Iran 1383\2004–5: 655–656).

[62] 'Dastur al-amal-i ijra-i tasis-i madaras-i ilmiyya-i khaharan,' <http:/www.whc.ir/ index.php?action=article&id=625&artlang=fa > (accessed 27 December 2007). The minimum staff is prescribed based on the number of students. For example, 18 staff members must be appointed for a seminary with 271–300 students.

[63] According to the deputy of the Management Centre, as regards the ownership of the seminary, 84 of the 229 women's seminaries in the entire country are owned by waqf trusts, 55 are part of individual estates, 55 are owed by various institutions and 35 are rented (Rasa news agency, 14 Shahrivar 1386 \ 5 September 2007). See <http://www.rasanews.com/Negaresh_site/fullstory/?id=20511&Title=56> (accessed 18 December 2007).

[64] In Iran, according to government policy, co-education is prohibited from the primary to the higher secondary levels, but colleges and universities are mostly co-educational.

[65] Many seminary students informed me that in the seminaries, students form strong bonds and help each other master the texts, but this kind of co-operation cannot be found at the college and university levels.

[66] The council was composed of nine members, namely, three representatives of Khomeini, three representatives of Gulpaygani, and the remaining three were from the Society for Seminary Teachers (Jamia-i Mudarrisin-i Qum) (Shirkhani, 1384: 44).

[67] Makarem-Shirazi was assigned to the head of the high council of seminaries.

[68] In the directory of the Qom seminary, these independent seminaries are categorized as ‘free schools’ (madares-i azad). On the other hand, the seminaries that have accepted the supervision of the management centre are categorized as ‘official schools’ (madares-i rasmi), pp. 627, 629. Intisharat-i Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum, Rahnama-i Jamia-i Moassasat-i Farhangi-i Ostan-i Qum, 1380 \2001. Ziba Mir-Hosseini writes that ‘the supporters of the old system … fear that reform is bound to result in the loss of independence and freedom of belief and speech in the Hauzeh’ (Mir-Hosseini, 1999: 17).

[69] There are 55 examination centers all over the country, except for the Khorasan province, which is not covered by the Management Centre (Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawzaha-i Ilmiyya-i Khaharan 1383–4 \ 2004–5).

[70] For details, please visit the home page of the Management Centre for Women’s Seminaries: <http://www.kowsarnoor.net>. When Khomeini was asked, ‘Can women attain the position of mujtahid?’ he answered, ‘It is possible for a woman to become a mujtahid; however, she cannot become a marja-i taqlid for others.’ The Institute for Compilation and Publication of Imam Khomeini’s Works, The Position of Women from the Viewpoint of Imam Khomeini, p. 44. <http://www.iranchamber.com/history/rkhomeini/books/women_position_khomeini.pdf> (accessed 13 October 2009).

[71] Payam-i Hawza, 1382\2004, no. 38. <http://www.hawzah.net/Hawzah/Magazines/MagArt.aspx?id=44852> (accessed 30 August 2008).

[72] The forerunner of this organization was called ‘daftar-i tablighat-i imam’ (Sakurai, 2004: 72–73). From 1979 to 1984, the office organized 9,081 women’s religious gatherings and dispatched female preachers to conduct them (source: internal document of the Islamic Propagation Office of the Qom Seminaries).

[73] This branch provided a one-year duration short program and a four-year duration long program. By 1992, 1,550 students were accepted at this branch (source: internal document of the Islamic Propagation Office of the Qom Seminaries).

[74] This course has five majors, namely, the Quran, Islamic history, education, philosophy and Islamic law. Daftar-i Tablighat-i Islami Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum, Mushakhkhasat-i Kolli: barnama va sarfasl-i dorus, 17 Dei 1377 (7 January 1999).

[75] Daftar-i Tablighat-i Islami Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum, Ittilaat-i Pazirish-i Khaharan, 1378–9\ 1999–2000.

[76] Payam-i Hawza, 1382\2004, no. 38. <http://www.hawzah.net/Hawzah/Magazines/MagArt.aspx?id=44852> (accessed 30 August 2008).

[77] These are religious centers dedicated to Hussein, the third Imam of the Shia.

[78] Although the supreme leader Khamenei appoints the head of the centre and its education system and certification are verified by the Ministry of Science, Research and Technology, the centre remains an independent non-government university specializing in the education of non-Iranian students (Shenasan, 2007: 29–30). In order to propagate Shia education outside Iran, the Organization for schools and seminaries outside country (sazman-i madaris-i hawzaha-i kharij az kishvar) was established in 1370\1991 the organization currently supports approximately 150 schools, providing education to about 10,000 students in more than 60 countries (such as Britain, Indonesia, Russia and Ghana) (Ghiasi, 1383: 179).

[79] The International Centre for Islamic Studies was reorganized again as al-Mustafa international university in 2008. For details, see <http://miu.ac.ir/>.

[80] It is obligatory to study the Persian language before starting the study of seminary subjects.

[81] The following is printed on the back cover of all the Persian language textbooks for non-Iranian students issued by the International Centre for Islamic Studies: ‘The Persian language is the most effective medium for conveying the message of revolutionary Islam. The diffusion of the Persian language does not imply Iranian nationalism at all.’

[82] In the early twentieth century, Najaf and Karbala in Iraq were truly the centers of Shiism. In 1937, Najaf had 8,000 students from all over the world, while Qom had only 1,000 students. However, this situation was completely reversed in the 1950s (Nakash, 1994: 259). We cannot overlook the fact that there is a growing antipathy among non-Iranian Shia against the overwhelming influence of Persian-speaking Iranian clerics.

[83] Among the 235 graduates, 112 were from Iraq, 59 were from Pakistan, 20 were from Afghanistan, 6 were from India and rest were from Nigeria, Thailand, Lebanon, Syria, Bangladesh, Myanmar, Tanzania, Mali, Congo, Indonesia, the US, Tajikistan and Iran. Huda, 1385\2006–7, vol. 1, no. 1, p. 56.

[84] Hawzahnews, 8 Ordibehesht 1387 (27 April 2008). <http://www.hawzahnews.com/printpage.aspx?dataid=4950> (accessed 4 June 2008).

[85] Ibid.

[86] According to the account of the principal of the Bint al-Huda, its students organized about 500 propagation programs in 400 cities in the last academic year (source: Hawzahnews, 19 Murdad 1387 (9 August 2008). <http://www.hawzahnews.com/printpage.aspx?dataid=6376> (accessed 14 August 2008).

[87] Huda, 1385\2006–7, vol. 1, no. 1, p. 41.

[88] According to the directory of Shia madrasas in Pakistan, the women's madrasa founded by her father is named Jamiat al-Zahra, and it was established in 1995. Three out of five teachers at this seminary have graduated from major Iranian women's seminaries, namely, Maktab-i Narjis, Bint al-Huda and Jamiat al-Zahra (Kazmi, 2004: 619).

[89] According to the note under Article 1210 of the civil code of Iran, the age of puberty for girls is nine lunar years (Taleghany, 1995). This ceremony was initiated in Iranian society in the early 1990s and was popularized through official channels such as TV and school programs. For details, see Adelkhah (1999a: 120).

[90] Huda, 1386\2007–8, vol. 2, no. 4, p. 61.

[91] Jamiat al-Zahra accepts foreign students not through the International Centre for Islamic Studies but through its own channels (Prospectus for Full- and Part-time Entry for Overseas Students 2006–7: 6).

[92] Ayanda-i Rushan, 17 Ordibehesht 1385 (7 May 2006), op. cit.

[93] These include the days between 12 and 22 Bahman in the Iranian calendar. On 12 Bahman, Khomeini returned to Iran from France after 15 years of absence, and 22 Bahman is the day of victory for the Islamic revolution.

[94] Nama-i Jamia, Ordibehesht 1384\2005, no. 8, <http://67.18.3.204/sections/mag/8/index8.htm> (accessed 25 February 2010).

[95] For details see <http://www.m-narjes.org> (accessed 25 February 2010).

[96] One of the Afghan students I met at Maktab-i Narjis in 1999 told me that she was a war refugee who came to Iran with her family. Due to her inadequate educational record, she could not apply to a government school in Iran; however, the Maktab-i Narjis gave her the opportunity to stay in its dormitory and continue her studies. When I visited a women's madrasa in Lahore in 2007, I found that two of its teachers had graduated from Maktab-i Narjis.

[97] There are four Sunni boards, namely, Wafaq al-Madaris al-Arabia (Hanafi, Deobandi, founded in 1959); Tanzim al-Madaris (Hanafi, Barelvi, founded in 1960); Wafaq al-Madaris al-Salafiya (Ahl al-Hadith, founded in 1955); and Rabita al-Madaris al-Islamiya (Jamaat Islami, founded 1983). The board for Shias is called Wafaq al-Madaris al-Shia and was established in 1959 (Institute of Policy Studies, 2002: 19–20).

[98] Out of the 2,861 madrasas, 1,840 belong to the Deobandi sub-sect; 717 to the Barelvi; 161 to the Ahl al-Hadith; and 96 to the other sects and sub-sects (Institute of Policy Studies, 2002: 26).

[99] From among these 9,880 madrasas, 7,000 were Deobandi, 1,585 were Barelvi, 367 were Ahl-e Hadith and 500 were Jamaat-i Islami (Riaz, 2005: 18).

[100] Among the 84 women's madrasas in 2004, 55 were situated in the Punjab province, 11 were in Sindh, 9 were in Gilgit-Baltistan formerly known as the Northern Areas, 3 were in Kashmir, 2 were in the North-West Frontier Province (NWFP) and 1 was in Islamabad and the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) (Kazmi 2004).

[101] The Zakat and Ushr Regulation was issued in June 1980. Originally, this regulation was intended to allow indiscriminate deductions from any account, including those of the Shias, non-Muslims and non-Pakistanis (Malik, 1998: 102).

[102] The Shia believe that the zakat should be paid on a voluntary basis and that it should be paid to the marja-i taqlid, not to the state (Ahmed, 1987: 281).

[103] To be eligible for receiving zakat, the madrasa had to be registered as a society and present accounts showing an appropriate use of the funds (Malik, 1998: 144).

[104] Although the Shia are exempted from the compulsory collection of zakat, the Ministry of Religious Affairs grants Shia madrasas part of the zakat proceeds (Malik, 1998: 143).

[105] Due to strong resistance from the clerics, the Zia government failed to modernize their curriculum (Malik, 1998: 133–139).

[106] Having a BA or MA degree is the basic requirement for obtaining a post in government organizations (Malik, 1998: 141).

[107] According to the official data for 1995, 2,010 new madrasas have been registered since 1979, and the total number of registered madrasas at present has reached 3,906 (International Crisis Group, 2002: 9).

[108] The Hazaras are mostly Shia, who are believed to have adopted Shiism at the time of Shah Abbas Safavid (1589–1629) (Mousavi, 1998: 73–74).

[109] Before the 1979 revolution, seminaries in Najaf, Iraq were the most popular destinations for Pakistani Shia. Therefore, the elder Pakistani clerics mostly received their advanced study at Najaf.

[110] Since the number of Pakistani students increased in Qom, the seminaries started restricting the entry of Pakistani students in order to secure the diversity of non-Iranian students in Qom. In the case of female students, Iran currently invites about ten female students per year, on the basis of the graduation examination conducted by the Shia Madrasa Board in Lahore. In 2005 and 2006, the selection was finalized through personal interviews conducted with the candidates in Lahore.

[111] Abou Zahab introduced this madrasa as ‘the girls’ section in the Jamiat al-Muntazar’ (Abou Zahab, 2008: 132).

[112] It was founded in 1954 and presently has 31 affiliated madrasas in Pakistan, Iran, the US and England. Madrasa al-Zahra is one of these affiliated madrasas. For details, please visit the madrasa’s home page at <http://www.jmuntazar.org/English.htm> (accessed 22 February 2010).

[113] The properties and buildings of the madrasas and their hostels were originally called ‘Baqiyyat al-Allah,’ owned by two Shia clerics who had studied at Qom. They started the men’s and women’s seminaries after returning to Lahore; however, they were unable to continue their project due to financial difficulties. I obtained this information on visiting Baqiyyat al-Allah and Madrasa al-Zahra in 2005 and 2006.

[114] Idara Minhaj al-Husayn was founded in 1990 and currently runs both men's and women's madrasas. For details, please visit its home page at <http://minhaj-ul-hussain.com> (accessed 22 February 2010).

[115] He explained that he was granted the use of khums for the madrasa by Sistani and other leading mujtahids.

[116] A full-time female teacher with an MA degree (14 years of study) teaches secular subjects to students preparing for the FA (12 years of study) examination at this seminary.

[117] She was still in her 20s when I met her in 2006 and had been educated in Pakistan.

[118] BBC News, 1 April 2005 <http://news.bbc.co.uk> (accessed 22 February 2010).

[119] The qualifications for acceptance into Sakina bin al-Husayn are apparently different from those of the other three madrasas, which follow the Iranian seminary model more directly.

[120] According to Tariq Rahman, the refutation of other sects has always been part of religious education in Pakistan. Therefore, preparing students to defend Shiism is regarded as an important course of study (Rahman, 2008).

[121] From the prospectus of the Sakina bint al-Husayn seminary.

[122] I first visited four madrasas in September 2005 and revisited them in September 2006 to distribute questionnaires and collect them (165 in number) with the consent of the Shia Madrasa Board and the principals of each madrasa.

[123] See <http://stats.uis.unesco.org> (accessed 22 February 2010). In Pakistan, the net enrolment of girls in primary schools was 57 per cent; in secondary schools, 26 per cent; and in tertiary education, 4 per cent in 2000.

[124] One who recites the tragedy of the Karbala at women's gatherings.

[125] Motahhari wrote that Islam 'has observed the principle of equality between man and woman, but it is opposed to the uniformity of their rights.' The English translation of Morteza Motahhari's work, Woman and Her Rights, can be obtained from <http://www.al-islam.org/WomanRights/> (accessed 20 February 2010).

[126] Motahhari's most important text on the gender issue is entitled System of Women's Right in Islam, and Javadi Amoli's book on the same issue is entitled Women in the Mirror of Glory and Beauty (Mir-Hosseini, 1999: 19, 83–84).

[127] The Urdu translation of his book is taught at Shia women's seminaries in Pakistan.

[128] The Office of Research and Study of Women's Issues was established in 1377 (1998–9).

[129] Daftar-i Mutaliat va Tahqiqat-i Zanan, Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Khaharan, Rayhana, p. 1.

[130] For instance, Motahhari argues that ' it is essential that the position of woman should be reviewed, and the abundant rights which Islam has granted her and which throughout history have been denied to her, should be restored to her,' (Mutahheri, 1992:72).

[131] Intisharat-i Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum, Rahnama-i Jamia-i Muassasat-i Farhangi-i Ustan-i Qum, 1380 (2001), pp. 662–663.

[132] Level 3 is offered only at a few seminaries such as Jamiat al-Zahra and Maktab-i Narjis. Maktab-i Narjis started a Level 3 course in 2007. <http://www.hawzahnews.com>27 Bahman 1386 (16 February 2008). <http://www.hawzahnews.com/showdata.aspx?dataid=4113> (accessed 25 February 2010).

[133] Nosrat Amin was born in Isfahan in 1886 and passed away in 1983. She is regarded as the first female mujtahid (Iran Daily, 18 October 2004). Zohreh Sefati was born in Abadan. In 1970, she moved to Qom to study and became a renowned female mujtahid (Iran Daily, 15 January 2007).

[134] According to Sefati, ‘A number of renowned Islamic scholars believe Islam does not ban mujtahid women from growing to be sources of emulation’ (Iran Daily, 15 January 2007).

[135] Iran Daily, 9 October 2006.

[136] Payam-i Hawza 1376\1997, no. 14. op. cit.

[137] Compared to the female enrolment figures for Pakistan and Iran based on the statistics taken by UNESCO, the gross percentage of enrolment into secondary education in Iran is 76 per cent, while that in Pakistan is 26 per cent. < http://stats.uis.unesco.org> (accessed 1 December 2009).

[138] The highest dropout rate for girls occurs at the stages of transition from lower to upper primary (class 3) and from primary to secondary school in Pakistan (Qureshi and Rarieya, 2007: 13).

[139] These women’s voices are all based on their essay written in the last part of the questionnaires distributed in September 2006. For details see, note 76.

 4. Contested notions of being ‘Muslim’

Madrasas, ulama and the authenticity of Islamic schooling in Bangladesh

Humayun Kabir

The theoretical complexity of combining diversified facets of Islam into a ‘single entity called “Islam”’ (Graham, 1993: 495) lies in the challenge of blending the theological and contextual differentiation within Islam (Eickelman, 1982: 1). In that sense, the study of madrasa, the major religious institution playing the guardian’s role in ‘cultural reproduction and identity formation’ in the Muslim world (Metcalf, 2007: 104), faces the same challenge: how particular doctrinal inclinations and differentiation within the realm of the madrasas may be perpetuated in a certain historical and social context and conjoin each other, which would eventually lead to the creation of a wider context for Muslim cultural tradition. This study attempts to decipher the internal worlds of differentiation of the madrasas and the mechanism by which the differentiated worlds of madrasas interplay and connect with the external worlds of social space. Prima facie I try to illuminate the distinct functionality of the madrasas of Bangladesh by situating them in a broader South Asian context and suggest that internal motivations and divisions within Islam have important implications for understanding madrasas and their custodians—ulama, as Zaman (2002) dubbed—in contemporary Bangladesh. I argue that madrasas in Bangladesh are primarily concerned with the construction and reconstruction of Muslim cultural identity; however, the process of formation of such identity is not linear, but marked by a complex ‘web of interlocutors’ in which the madrasas propagate particular interpretative tenets of Islamic precepts, notions and ideas of being Muslim while their custodians contest for their authority by pursuing their own pedagogical methodology and by placing their voices in different madrasa-related religious forums and spheres (Taylor, 1989: 36). Such plural forms of contestations and notions are functional in Bangladesh in relation to the tradition of Islam, a tradition that is inherently ‘discursive.’[140]

Historians and other scholars documented the internal differentiation of madrasas in South Asia in terms of sectarian, ‘quasi-sectarian’[141] or maslaki[142] differentiation (e.g. Metcalf, 1982; Zaman, 1998; Nasr, 2000b; Alam, 2008a, 2008b; Sanyal, 2008). Scholars explicate that the doctrinal differentiation of Islamic precepts leads to the formation of Muslim identity in a contested array of space within madrasas (e.g. Alam, 2008a, 2008b; Sanyal, 2008). However, the contestation is not merely marked by an interpretative differentiation of Islam (maslak), but rather by many other denominations and the forces of modernization. The challenges and forces of modernity certainly severely impinge on the religious institutions and their protagonists (Zaman, 2002: 1); at the same time, however, they facilitate the contestation within their internal and external worlds. Such contestation is also conspicuous in many Islamic forums and movements. Ahmad (2005, 2008) shows us how Jamaat-i Islam and its founder faced the challenges for a ‘total revolutionary reforms’ and moderation of the movement in a changing context of modernity and transnational interactivity. I contend that it is important to view madrasas’ functionality in relation to the changing circumstances in which they are embedded. In this study, I attempt to depict that the contestation involving madrasas and their custodians in Bangladesh is argumentative and discursive in nature, where many facets of modernity pose challenges and in turn facilitate the varied responses to the challenges.[143]

The study of madrasa in Bangladesh has been overlooked in the field of Islamic studies, although such studies are consequential.[144] Madrasas’ specific social and religious role in the Bangladeshi context cannot be properly understood if not situated in the wider social and historical circumstances of South Asia, which Bangladesh simultaneously shares and differs from. Cornell’s (1998) study is herein exemplary with reference to the manner in which he interrogates the specific meaning of Moroccan sainthood in a wider social and historical context which certainly differs from the other realms of Islamic mysticism. ‘The study of sainthood must reconcile both social and doctrinal perspectives if it is to have any lasting value’ (Cornell, 1998: 272). Even though the study of the madrasa cannot be equated with that of sainthood, what Cornell (1998) explicates is useful for our purpose to reveal how both the doctrinal and social aspects of madrasas are operative in relation to the formation and reformation of Muslim cultural identity in a specific social circumstance. The aim of this study, therefore, is not only to elucidate the contestation of madrasas and ulama in terms of their ideological or doctrinal differentiation but also in terms of their contestation for gaining control over religious spheres, pedagogical superiority and religious authority.

The thesis of this chapter is informed by ethnographic fieldwork conducted in several phases in the Brahmanbaria municipal area, on the east-central district town of Bangladesh, a territory of 30.82 square kilometers (see Figure 4.1). My discussion is not based on the analysis of a particular madrasa in this area; rather, it is grounded in the analysis of different madrasas and their custodians, and therefore, I refer to various madrasas at several points in my discussion.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-14.jpg][Figure 4.1 Map of Bangladesh]]

 Muslim selfhood, identity and madrasa

The ‘sources of self’ (Taylor, 1989) for being a proper Muslim lie not in the sources of Islamic tradition but in how such tradition is translated into institutionalized practices in the everyday lives of Muslims in a particular context ‘into which Muslims are inducted as Muslim’ (Asad, 1986: 23; emphasis original).[145] Various institutional sources such as maktab (elementary Islamic schooling), madrasas and mosques provide a primary induction into how to emulate Islamic practices in order to be a proper Muslim in Bangladesh. In that sense, Islamic schooling has a profound role in constructing Muslim selfhood in Bangladesh. Such institutionalizing endeavors are often confounded, however, by the question of which practices are authentically ‘Islamic’ since Islam in Bangladesh is historically configured by two major trends: reformist-revivalist and syncretistic tradition.[146] Because of these contradictory facets of Islamic tradition embedded in the history of Islam which is further intertwined with the contemporary societal changes brought about by modernization,[147]

the Muslim identity in Bangladesh becomes a matter of ambiguity and tensions where many individuals are just culturally Muslims,[148] or where many of them associate their identity with ‘Bengali-ness’ and others with ‘Muslim-ness.’[149] Though madrasas, in a general sense, advocate an identity associated with ‘Muslim-ness’ by indoctrinating Islamic practices and a sense of consciousness of Muslim selfhood, the process of formation of Muslim selfhood is highly debatable and contestable even within madrasas affiliated with different maslaki orientations or interpretative modes of differentiation of Islamic precepts, as I depict in the latter part of this chapter. The conceptualization of Muslim selfhood as envisaged in this chapter is tantamount to Bilgrami’s (1992: 824) contention that Muslims’ selfhood, even devout Muslims’ selfhood, is highly ‘differentiated internally into a number of, in principle, negotiable detailed commitments.’ By the same token I conceptualize that the selfhood produced through madrasa schooling, mostly by the ulama, is differentiated within a negotiable space of interpretation of Islamic commitments and convictions.

Merry’s (2007: 74–75) work also facilitates the understanding of how the madrasa functions for the formation of Muslim cultural identity which ‘is always relational and comparative to others’ in ‘a coherent sense of self within a particular cultural matrix’ (emphasis original). She considers the madrasas’ role in Muslim cultural coherence, in the context of some Western countries where Muslims are immigrant and minor in comparison with dominant Western values and schooling, as a prerequisite for the formation of Muslim cultural identity.

Cultural coherence points to an important aim in the process of passing on deeply held commitments, values, and beliefs that are necessary for sustaining identity formation and psychological health. Cultural coherence can, and often does, encompass religious identity; either way, it does refer to the shaping of one’s identity by a particular group. To speak of cultural coherence, then, is to refer to the shaping of one’s identity by a particular group (Merry, 2007: 77).

However, Merry does not consider how internal tensions and conflict within Islam shape the cultural coherence in relation to Muslim identity and how it is differentiated from one group to another and from one context to another.

Although his analysis provides a primary ground for understanding madrasas in relation to Muslim cultural identity, for the concept of identity, I rely more on the Holland et al. conceptualization (1998: 270): ‘Identity is one way of naming the dense interconnections between the intimate and public venues of social practice’ in which our selves and sets of actions are organized and being organized over the history of personal selfhood and social collectivities.

Identity is a concept that figuratively combines the intimate or personal world with the collective space of cultural forms and social relations. It is a key means through which people care about and care for what is going on around them. They are important bases from which people create new activities, new worlds, and new ways of being (Holland et al., 1998: 5).

The conception of identity allows us to interrogate the Muslim self, which the madrasas pursue in different contexts and different situations. It is seemingly applicable to understanding how the madrasa and the ulama are contesting for a cultural identity that configures with a newly ‘figured world’ in a social terrain in which they face challenges from various corners such as modernization or globalization as well as from different denominations of their own religion. Further such a ‘figured world’ of the ulama is ‘a socially and culturally constructed realm of interpretation in which particular characters and actors are recognized, significance is assigned to certain acts, and particular outcomes are valued over others’ (Holland et al., 1998: 52). To understand how the maslaki differentiation of madrasas engenders a differentiation of interpretation by which particular practices are valued over others for being a ‘proper’ Muslim, we need to consider the broader context of madrasas and their affinity to particular doctrinal interpretations and motivations.

 Internal reasons of differentiation within madrasas: South Asian context

Interpretation is necessitated within Islam since it is a religion that is founded on the scriptural tradition. The ‘ethics of disagreement in Islam’ in terms of juristic methods including the prophetic tradition (hadith) and intellectual reasoning (ijtihad) can be traced back to the early period of Islam (al-Alawi 1935). Such traditions of interpretative differentiation have led to the emergence of sectarian, ‘quasi-sectarian’ and different denominational groups’ (maslaki) orientation among the ulama and madrasas in South Asia (Table 4.1). Interestingly, in the nineteenth century, all the sectarian and maslaki offshoots such as Deoband, Ahl-i Hadith, Barelvi, Nadwah and Ahmadiyya originated in the northern part of India; these later proliferated all over South Asia (Metcalf, 1982: 266). Madrasas in Pakistan and India are divided by such sectarian and maslaki differentiation (Malik, 1999: 124; Alam, 2008a, 2008b).

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-15.jpg][Table 4.1 Unfolding the school of thought of madrasas in Sunni Islam in terms of maslaki differentiations in South Asia]]

Source: Field survey in Brahmanbaria municipality, March 2007

Of all sectarian and maslaki orientation, ‘Deobandi Islam’ gained momentum in South Asian history (Haroon, 2008). Deobandi thought is founded on Ahl-i Sunnat wal-Jamaat,[150] an allegiance to the Sunni Muslims which literally means upholders of Prophetic tradition, and on the jurisprudential method ‘Hanafiat,’[151] and conforms in thought to ‘Wallliullahian’ (Deoband homepage, 2007).[152] Though its teaching of Islamic content largely springs from dars-i nizami, the first structured form of its madrasa curriculum was devised by Mulla Nizam al-din Sahalawi (d.1748) in the eighteenth century;[153] later, its reform initiative underwent transformation of the nizami curriculum towards a greater focus on hadith-based teaching, and a shift from ‘rational sciences’ to ‘reveal sciences.’[154] As historian Robinson (2000: 105) contends, Deoband’s hadith-based, that is, revealed knowledge based reform can be seen as ‘a shift in traditional Islamic knowledge away from the rational towards the revealed sciences, and a more general shift in the sources of inspiration away from the Iranian lands toward the Arab lands.’

In contrast, the Barelvi, which is associated with the notion of its founder, Ahmad Riza Khan (1856–1921) of Barevli, India, and his movement Ahl-i Sunnat wal Jamaat, believes on intercession and prefers a ritualized form of devotion to the prophet and to other holy men of Islam (Zaman, 2002: 11).[155] The Barelvis believe that Muhammad is not a ‘role model’ only; rather, he is a man made of nur (light of Allah) who had no shadow. They also profess Muhammad as a possessor of the knowledge of the unseen (ilm-i ghayb), who is always hazir u nazir (Ar. hadir wa-nazir), a precept that asserts that the Prophet is able to be present at the same time in different places (Sanyal, 1998: 641–642; Alam, 2008a: 12). For the Deobandis, the Prophet is a human being who possesses knowledge to the extent given to him by Allah. For them, considering Muhammad as possessor of the knowledge of the unseen (ilm-i ghayb) is polytheism (shirk) since only Allah is omnipotent and thus able to possess such knowledge.

The Ahl-i Hadith, also a movement of the late nineteenth century, differs on the legitimacy of four classic juristic methods, unlike Deoband. They prefer a direct access to the Quran and the prophetic tradition (hadith) —a view that Deobandi ulama disparaged for the heavy responsibility it places on individual Muslims, which might cause discord over textual interpretations.[156] The Nadwatul Ulama has endeavoured to integrate all variant doctrinal interpretations, though it has failed to do so.[157] Whereas in terms of the sources of religious authority, Jamaat-i Islam shares many aspects of Deoband and Ahl-i Hadith by accepting the Quran and Sunna as sources of Sharia and the four classical mediaeval law schools, its view on implementing Sharia law is unlike that of Deoband and Ahl-i Hadith; these focus mainly on religious reform at the individual level.[158] On the other hand, the entire maslaki group within the Sunni sect and the Shia community are strongly antithetical to the Ahmadi tenets of Islam which deny the finality of Prophethood of Muhammad and accept the prophecy of Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (d.1908) (Zaman, 2002: 11).[159]

 Madrasas in Brahmanbaria, Bangladesh

Brahmanbaria is one of the oldest towns to have received municipal status in 1869 during the British colonial period. At that time, it was under the control of the district of Tripura which is now a part of India. Brahmanbaria became a district in 1984. The district town is situated on the bank of the river Titas. The population of the town is 131,334, out of which the males represent 51.34 per cent of the population and the females, 48.66 per cent. The literacy rate among the towns' people is 52.3 per cent, which suggests that a preponderant number of people still lack access to formal education (Banglapedia, 2003: 273). Probably, 'Brahmanbaria' derives from Brahman, Hindu priests, though this has not been historically authenticated. The proportion of the Hindu religious community in the district is 9.07 per cent as compared with the Muslim population, which constitutes 90.73 per cent, while Buddhists constitute 0.05, Christians, 0.04 and others, 0.11 per cent (Banglapedia, 2003: 273).

* Form and structure of madrasa schooling

The entire madrasa schooling in Bangladesh is broadly categorized in terms of government recognition into two types: Aliya and Quomi (also known as kharizia, and Arabic qawmi) madrasas (see Table 4.2). Aliya madrasas are those that are either fully government or government-registered madrasas operating under the prescription and supervision of the Bangladesh Madrasa Education Board, an autonomous body of the Ministry of Education. These madrasas represent the historical legacy of the British-patronized Aliya madrasa, that is, the Calcutta Aliya Madrasa established in 1780,[160] a portion of which was later shifted to Dhaka in 1947 (Ali, 1983: 160). On the other hand, Quomi madrasas are exclusively private having their funding from the local community, religious alms (zakat) and endowments (waqf), but seldom from expatriate Bangladeshis.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-16.jpg][Table 4.2 Types of madrasas in Bahmanbaria by management and level of schooling]]

The Brahmanbaria municipal area consists of 12 wards and almost every ward has a madrasa.[161]</sup> Maktab, nurani and furqania madrasas provide the pre-primary level of Islamic schooling and the primary objective of these schools is to introduce the rudiments of Islam and to acquaint the children with the sacred Quran. There are 58,124 such institutions in the country and many of these are attached to mosques or higher madrasas (BEPS, 2004: 8). Ebtedayee represents the institutional level of primary schooling both for Aliya and Quomi madrasas. The Aliya madrasas maintain a grade-based system of schooling, and hence, the naming of such madrasas denotes the level of grade or degrees up to which the madrasa imparts instruction such as Dakhil (10th grade), Alim (12th grade), Fazil (14th grade) and Kamil (16th grade).

In contrast, Quomi madrasas follow subject-based rather than grade-based schooling. The naming of Quomi madrasas, therefore, is determined by their level of subject-based schooling and teaching specialization. For instance, Darul Quran and Hafizia madrasas are concerned with the production of scholars who ‘embody’ the Quran through memorization ‘as a point of reference, a compass’ for moral and spiritual guidance (Boyle, 2006: 491–492; 2004: 134). On the other hand, the Qiratia madrasa, the name of which derives from Qiraat, literally meaning the proper reading and recitation method, is named for its specialization in teaching proper Quranic enunciation. The secondary level of Quomi madrasas such as Islamia’ and ‘Ulum’ madrasas focuses on subject-based teaching at varying degrees of schooling periods. These madrasas also use ‘Jamia’ as part of their names, though ‘Jamia’ refers only to those madrasas which impart all the kitabs, the texts at kitabkhana (division of text) up to the highest level of the Quomi madrasas—Daura-i Hadith or Takmil-i Hadith.

In many cases, the ‘ Jamia’ madrasas also interchangeably use the terms ‘ Islamia’ and ‘Ulum’ as part of their names. Suba-i ifta, a department of practical lessons for issuing religious verdicts (fatwa), is often established in these madrasas to cater to the students who obtain the highest degree of the Quomi madrasas. Although these features are characteristics of many Quomi madrasas in Brahmanbaria and all over the country as well, the emergence of a ‘cadet’ madrasa at the secondary level is a recent manifestation of the ulama’s endeavour to orchestrate modern subject knowledge with Islamic religious lessons and sophisticated disciplinary practice for students. The central objective of these madrasas is to attract the guardians of the pupils by asserting that their pedagogical method is tantamount to that of the Cadet Colleges, one of the elitist categories of general schooling maintained by the armed forces.[162]

On the other hand, the emergence of independent girls’ Quomi madrasas in Brahmanbaria is a recent phenomenon. The first Quomi girls’ madrasa, Islamia Balika (Girls’) Madrasa, emerged in 1988, followed by Nadiatul Quran Kendrio Mohila Madrasa in 1993 and Al-Batul Mohila Madrasa in 1997. Out of a total of eight girls’ Quomi madrasas (Table 4.3), six were founded between 2000 and 2008. These madrasas challenge the ‘secondary status of all women’ in Islam where Islamic schooling is predominantly associated with males (Messick, 1988: 647–648).

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-17.jpg][Table 4.3 Distribution of madrasas and students by management and gender in Brahmanbaria]]

Within the scope of this chapter, it suffices to say that the nascent girls’ Quomi madrasas are engendered in a symbiotic social and economic matrix, for which the founders of these madrasas found their motivation in most cases. The ulama establish such madrasas as a way of earning their livelihoods; the learners are taught, housed and provided with meals usually on the same premises as the founder’s home, in exchange for a monthly fee. Because of these institutions’ flexible, loose and open system of student recruitment and shortened course-curriculum, [163] considerable numbers of students—including those who have crossed the standard age limit for or discontinued the study in public schooling—attend these madrasas as a means of securing marriage prospects and gaining empowerment in familial and social space.

* Distribution of madrasa types and students

Until June 2006 there were 15,941 Aliya madrasas in Bangladesh; of these 6,711 were Ebtedayee madrasas, 6,745 Dakhil, 1,246 Alim, 1,062 Fazil and 177 Kamil.[164] In contrast it is not certain how many Quomi madrasas are currently operating in contemporary Bangladesh since no efforts have been made to monitor these madrasas. According to one source, there are more than 20,000 Quomi madrasas across the country and the number of students in these madrasas is not less than three million (Prothom Alo 2006).

The Brahmanbaria municipal area has 13 primary schools, seven high schools, two colleges and two educational institutes.[165] At the same time, there are 36 madrasas, two of which are government registered, that is Aliya, and the remaining 34 are Quomi madrasas at different levels, suggesting that madrasas constitute a substantial part of schooling options in Brahmanbaria. At the national level, Aliya madrasas constitute 27.61 per cent of all post-primary educational institutions in comparison with general educational institutions which constitute 62.98 per cent (BANBEIS, 2006: 25). In terms of enrolment rates, madrasa students (students of Aliya madrasas only) comprise 16.32 per cent of all post-primary general schools at the national level (BANBEIS, 2006: 26). As the case of Brahmanbaria suggests, the contribution of madrasa schooling in the entire education sector in Bangladesh would undoubtedly be higher if the number of Quomi madrasas and their students were statistically considered at official level.

According to the estimation of 30 out of 36 madrasas, the total number of students in Brahmanbaria is 5,880 (Table 4.3). Of these, the Aliya madrasas have 1,135 students while the remainder attend the Quomi madrasas. In contrast, in the Brahmanbaria sub-district (Upazilla), the municipal and its contiguous areas comprising 495.85 sq km, there are 59 post-primary schools and 17 Aliya madrasas in which the total numbers of students studying are 29,373 and 3,597 respectively.[166] Even though the Brahmanbaria municipality is a smaller geographical territory, 30.82 sq km, as noted earlier, the preponderant number of Quomi students suggests the significant contribution of these madrasas in educating the pupils alongside general schools in Brahmanbaria. However, to address the question why these madrasas are gaining desirability as a social choice of educating Muslim pupils in Brahmanbaria we need to consider the aspects of the ulama who, equipped with certain religious techniques and tactics, try to ensure their existence as well as that of their primary institution—the madrasa—in association with which they became ulama. Apart from this, madrasa education might have a positive correlation to the sociology of employment in Bangladesh, which is predicated on an inordinate rate of unemployment, nepotism and politicization of employment. In many cases, the articulation of certain discourses by the ulama—which allege that public schooling is a machinery for the production of immoral values and its pedagogical process is inimical to being a proper ‘Muslim’—also influences many people who deem education as the functional base of moral construction and identity formation; thus, they choose madrasa schooling as an alternative.

 How have madrasas evolved? Authorizing social and religious space

How madrasas evolved even after the introduction of Western-style schooling is a crucial question. Some observers might contend that poverty is a primary cause of the evolvement of Muslim religious education. Some might also argue that the evolvement of madrasas is the result of the failure of public schools to accommodate a mounting number of Muslim pupils. Irrespective of the degree of influence such factors have, on the basis of the Brahmanbaria case, I suggest that the transformation of madrasas is associated with the venture to expand the authorizing social and religious space, where the madrasa functions as a ‘space of authoring’ in which the ulama maintain the discourses of Islam in regard to the changes and challenges they receive.[167] Madrasa as an authorizing social and religious space is created for the ulama, and very often, by the ulama.

* Creating avenues of social and religious space

The expansion of avenues of social and religious space as developed by the ulama is the result of a widened conception of knowledge about Islam (din). Islamic education became devalued in the colonial period because Western-style education was more closely associated with social advancement in the colonial era. The historical legacy in contemporary Bangladesh is such that numerous Islamic scholars, mostly madrasa graduates, find their knowledge to be as less applicable and useful in many arenas of public life. This has led them to recreate their own avenues of social and religious space; the evolvement of the madrasa is one of many such avenues created mostly by madrasa-educated persons or the ulama.

In most cases, the social functions of Islamic-learned persons trained in religious educational institutions are restricted to the religious domain. They earn their livelihood in religiously workable jobs such as preacher, prayer leader at mosques, performer of certain religious rites and madrasa teachers. Their engagement with other arenas of public life is coterminous not only because of their limited adaptability but also because of the limited applicability of Islamic knowledge to public life, where adaptability is achieved through the acquisition of modern disciplinary knowledge. For example, there is no official recognition of the madrasas and their education is not certified. Quomi madrasas and the certification they offer are officially unrecognized, while the degrees at Bachelors and Masters levels of Aliya madrasas are yet to be fully recognized in Bangladesh.[168] The students who pass out from Quomi madrasas are educated Muslims but without formal recognition. Therefore, they are not eligible for any public or even private job regulated by the government rules. As such, the students have very limited options for making a livelihood. The ulama establish madrasas as a way of creating avenues of social and religious space where they can apply their religious knowledge of Islam (din), maintain their livelihood and establish an ongoing social interaction with the community, a space in which their voices can be heard. After my first field visit to Brahmanbaria in 2004, with every consecutive visit in 2005, 2007 and 2008, I found the establishment of new Quomi madrasas, a total of eight madrasas within four years. Most of the founders of the newly established madrasas assert that they establish the madrasa to spread knowledge on Islam (ilm), which they deem as an obligation for them, who bear such knowledge. However my field observation suggests that religious commitment is not the cardinal cause of evolving madrasas. By establishing a madrasa, in reality, they can on the one hand arrange their livelihood and on the other create a space for authoring, a context of identity in which they can negotiate their social identity through continued interaction with the community, sometimes by mastering social and religious networking in the locality and beyond.

* Social and religious networking

In the contemporary Muslim world, networking has significant implications for understanding Muslim history, politics, movements and aspects of ‘mobilized Islam’ (Cooke and Lawrence, 2005; Wickham, 2002; Wiktorowicz, 2004). By the same token, networking is also important in understanding how the ulama create social and religious space. In the realm of a networked world, the ulama invite and communicate with ordinary Muslims, socially and politically influential persons and philanthropists, and hence proceed to founding madrasas, sometimes with new pedagogical methods and ideas. There are plenty of examples in Brahmanbaria where the evolvement of a madrasa is a result of orchestration of such social and religious networking. Consider the following background to the establishment of a girls’ madrasa, Al-Batul Mohila Madrasa, in 1997.

We, some Islamic learned persons [Maulana Abdus Sattar, Maulana Mahfuzul Hasan who is now the director, Hafez Maulana Zalal-ul-Islam], discussed with one another the necessity of a girl’s madrasa in Brahmanbaria town. We also discussed the need for one with a physician [Dr. Zahirul Haq], who is a generous donor. We mentioned that he had some lands at Collegepara and we were planning to establish a girl’s madrasa and therefore we were seeking his opinion. He donated four decimal [a unit of land area approximately equal to 1/100 acre or 40.46 square meters]. We invited Harun Islamabadi [an eminent Islamic learned person from Chittagong district, who is the brother-in-law of Maulana Zalal-ul-Islam], who is also a noble donor, to come here and see the land and its location. He appreciated the location and suggested that we establish a madrasa. He also helped to secure financial support. With his funds, we began to construct the madrasa, beginning with a five-storey building. Initially, we began to build the first floor and launched the madrasa at the house of the physician. The purpose of the initiative was to educate women in Islam, since the very beginning of a child’s education starts with the mother.[169]

Although religious motivation might have some causal effect on the establishment of a madrasa, it is not the foremost reason. Rather, the cause is the social context in which the ulama have limited life choices. All the founder members of Al-Batul Mohila Madrasa are Islamic-educated persons from Quomi madrasas. Their individual networked worlds, both within and beyond their locality, serve as a useful means for founding a madrasa. The contact between the founding members of ulama of Al-Batul Madrasa and Maulana Harun Islamabadi, who was titled ‘Islamabadi’[170] (devotee of Islam) for his continuous economic and moral contribution to Islam—and who is credited and much revered among the Quomi ulama circle in Bangladesh for leading one of the country’s biggest and oldest Quomi madrasas at Patia in Chittagong district—is an example of how individual networking functions beyond a particular locality. The name of Harun Islamabadi, as mentioned on madrasa billboards and in other campaign materials, as the leading founder of the madrasa denotes how the ulama of Al-Batul Madrasa try to get authorization from a religious authority of the Quomi ulama circle in the country. Associating itself with the name of such a religious authority on the one hand increases the status and prestige of a madrasa and on the other facilitates the opportunity to gain pedagogical authenticity and authority from others in the Quomi ulama circle. The networked world of ulama, as the case of Al-Batul Mohila Madrasa demonstrates, is not restricted internally; many ‘Muslim modernists’[171] are included in this circle, such as the physician, who like the ulama, patronized such schooling not merely out of religious commitment but to gain a higher social status in the locality since the giving of donations for educational and religious purposes is hitherto revered and admired.

Occasionally, personal interest and affiliation with particular religious groups could inspire the foundation of madrasas through religious networking, as suggested by the case of Darul Ajkar Giasul Uloom Madrasa in Brahmanbaria. The founder of the madrasa is Sufi Giasuddin Khan of Datiara, Brahmanbaria. He is the district representative of a Sufi clan called furfura pir[172] (spiritual preceptor). On the occasion of a visit of his spiritual guide—furfura pir—in 1990, he arranged a public religious gathering (mahfil). After the gathering, the chief spiritual guide visited his house and encouraged him to establish a mosque in his locality. Inspired by his spiritual preceptor (pir), he decided to donate five decimal lands for building a mosque in his locality. Afterwards, again inspired by his spiritual guide, he established a madrasa in 1991 in the same place where he founded the mosque. The madrasa was named after him. When he established the madrasa, his Sufi master also allowed him to practice different forms of Islamic healing such as amulets (tabiz[173] and maduli[174]) and sacred water (pani-pora[175]) as remedies for those who are sick or affected by evil spirits. His Sufi master suggested that out of the amount of gift (hadia) he earned through this practice he should spend half for maintenance of the madrasa and the other half for maintenance of his family.[176] When I made a follow-up visit on him in 2008, I learnt that he had founded another madrasa in the same locality, a girls' madrasa named the Fatima (R) Mohila madrasa. He explained that the reason for setting up the madrasa was to educate women in din just as males were educated: 'My furfura pir told me that we teach the male students, not the female. If we don't teach the females also we would not be able to make any progress in Islam. So the objective of establishing this girls' madrasa is to teach Islam to the females. We should teach Islam to both the male and female.'[177] The establishment of both these madrasas by Sufi Giasuddin sheds light on how religious networking and individual interest contribute to the evolution of madrasa schooling. Since Sufi Giasuddin was the founder of two madrasas, his identity has been transformed from an ordinary disciple of a spiritual preceptor to that of a promoter of Islamic education.

* Interpretative contestation within madrasas: Who are proper Muslims?

What are the beliefs of a proper Muslim? The answer to the question varies with the internal differentiation of interpretations and with the maslaki orientation of Islam in some madrasas in Brahmanbaria. In this section, I will draw a comparative illustration of two madrasas—the Jamia Islamia Yunusia Madrasa (hereinafter YM), the biggest Quomi madrasa, and the Darus Sunna Kamil Madrasa (hereinafter DSM), the biggest Aliya madrasa in Brahamanbaria—showing how their maslaki orientation of Islam differ on the question of being an 'authentic' Muslim.

YM can be considered emblematic of the local version of Deoband in Bangladesh, which is indoctrinated with 'Deobandi Islam.' The madrasa was established in 1914 by a Deobandi alim (Islamic scholar), Maulana Abu Taher Muhammad Yunus, after whom the madrasa was named. He came from India to dissuade 'Qadiani' confusion (fetna)—a Muslim religious offshoot anathematized by mainstream Muslim for their belief in the prophecy of Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (d.1908) after Muhammad—in Brahmanbaria.[178] All the muhtamims, the directors of the madrasa, were graduates of Deoband. The eligibility and responsibility of the directors (muhtamim) outlined in a booklet of the madrasa notes that the director is the custodian of the madrasa and Islam, and he is required to be a follower of the Hanafi school of law (majhab) and must follow the accord of the Deobandi ulama, depicting YM's concern for sustaining 'Deobandi Islam' down to this day.[179] Being founded and promoted by a number of Deobandi scholars from the early twentieth century, YM became a local version of the Deoband madrasa in Bangladesh which remains committed to its patron—Deoband.

On the other hand, DSM which is located some three kilometers away from YM at Vadugarh in the Brahmanbaria municipal area was established in 1964 by a group of ulama. One of the oldest mosques—Sahi Masjid—founded in 1663 during the Mughal period (1526–1858) is adjacent to the madrasa premises. The khatib (religious leader) of that mosque and the local municipal commissioner were the leading founders of this madrasa. Though it is an Aliya madrasa maintained and supervised by the government, some of the ulama serving as teachers in this madrasa have a close maslaki affiliation with Barelvi. They are indoctrinated with the theological precept of Ahmad Riza Khan (d.1921) of Bareilly and his movement—ahl-i sunnat wal jamaat, which places emphasis on intercession and Muhammad's life in a ritualized form of devotion, a stance which is antithetical to the ulama of YM, as it is to their patron Deoband. Though the ulama of YM, like Deoband, claim that their creed (aqida) is also based on the followers of the people of the prophetic tradition (ahl-i sunnat wal jamaat), the interpretative differentiation on the status of the Prophet markedly differs between the ulama of YM and those of DSM, while each asserts that its understanding of the Prophet is 'authentic' and in accordance with the scriptural guidance of Islam. The following assertion depicts the position of the ulama of DSM who are opposed to the theological precept of YM.

The Deobandi creed (aqida) is based on Muhammad bin Abdul Wahab of Arabia … They are not the true followers of the people of the prophetic tradition (ahl-i sunna wal jamaat) … Our creed is founded on that belief that Rasul’s [the Prophet] position is just after Allah. And so do we believe. There are some other rules of guidance (masla) that differentiate between us and those [Deobandi followers]. For instance, they believe Rasul as a person who is made of mud but we believe he is a man made of light (nur). They negate the concept of spiritual preceptor (pir). They also believe that Allah’s holy men (wali) cannot help us and after their death they don’t have any power. But we believe that even after death we can seek help from them; they can mediate for us with Allah. Rasul is the messenger of gaeb [Ar. ghayib, unseen] … Our creed is Allah teaches Rasul the complete knowledge of the sky (asman) and the earth (jamin). He knows the knowledge of gaeb.[180]

The ulama associated with YM are strongly against such a doctrine. They assert that considering the prophet as a possessor of the knowledge of the unseen is unauthentic, according to the Quran and the prophetic tradition (hadith).

Allah observes what you and I are talking about, thinking and doing. As Muslims we usually believe that. What you bear in your mind and what you are supposed to say a few minutes later is known to Allah. And they (Barelvi) believe that it is known to the Prophet also. This is the difference (between us and them). It is the difference similar to the distance between land and sky … They believe that if we do something in the name of our Prophet he is able to be present with us. Islam does not hold such belief and thought. Concrete evidence from the Quran and the prophetic tradition rules out such belief.[181]

Although the ulama of both madrasas—YM and DSM—assert that their creed (aqida) is based on the Quran, the prophetic tradition, the Hanafi school of jurisprudence and the path of the followers of the prophetic tradition (ahl-i Sunna wal Jamaat),[182] some aspects of doctrinal differentiation lead these ulama to a contesting situation where both sides claim that their doctrinal stances are ‘true.’ The ulama of YM contemplate that it is their religious duty to protect the Muslim from any sinful innovation (bidat). In the preamble of a booklet on Bidati (those responsible for sinful innovation), Maulana Mufti Mobarak Ullah, the deputy Islamic jurist-consultant (naib-i mufti) and scholar of prophetic tradition (muhaddith) of YM stated that a group of people in the country calling themselves devotees of the prophet (asiki rasul) are breaching the ‘true iman (faith on God) and the creed’ of common Muslims and are encouraging common Muslim people to perform polytheism (shirk) by misusing the name of Sunni (Kasemi, 2005). Though Maulana Mubarak Ullah does not refer specifically to those who are breaching the ‘true’ Islam, he certainly points his finger at the Barelvi followers. Citing several Quranic injunctions, prophetic tradition and jurisprudential interpretation, the booklet rules out all the doctrinal tenets of Barelvi followers. Referring to the Deobandi ulama, the booklet nullifies the notion of professing Muhammad as a possessor of the knowledge of unseen and hazir u nazir—the two principle theological precepts of Barelvi tradition. It reasons that the ulama who believe in such theological precepts are engaged in shirk, that is, associating Muhammad as the partner of Allah. This doctrinal interpretative contestation, therefore, is an example of understanding how the Deobandi ulama associated with a particular madrasa, in this case the YM, differentiate themselves from other denominational thought held by other ulama in the same locality by a process of ‘othering’ another doctrinal precept and its followers as if the (other) interpretation is ‘unauthentic.’ For the Barelvi, the same process occurs in reverse. Thus, madrasas are the functional bases for transmitting a group of ulama’s denominational orientation and its creed in which the conceptualization and formation of Muslim identity is always contestable and debatable.

 Contestation for pedagogical and religious authority

The differentiation of madrasas is not only restricted to different denominational orientations but also to diverse pedagogical and institutional approaches. Ulama have their own reasons with regard to ‘positionality’[183] where they have the opportunity to cultivate their religious authority in their own domain of social and religious spaces with a plurality of notions, ideas and pedagogical conceptions of Islamic education.

* Pedagogical contestation within madrasas

The primary pedagogical contestation within madrasas in Bangladesh is the difference between Aliya and Quomi. Each claims that their pedagogical method is the correct one. The Quomi madrasas' ulama argue that the religious education imparted in the Aliya madrasa is heavily burdened with modern disciplinary subjects, and hence is remote from a 'proper' Islamic education. On the other hand, the ulama of Aliya consider Quomi pedagogy as 'inferior' to the Aliya system because of their rigidity in maintaining a 'traditional' Islamic pedagogical learning system. Consider the following assertion of a teacher of the Aliya madrasa.

A Quomi madrasa is not better than an Aliya madrasa since the Quomi madrasa students' learning is one-sided; they know nothing about the other side [i.e. modern general education]. We allow the students who passed grade eight in a Quomi madrasa to be admitted to grade four in the Aliya madrasa. We allow the students who completed Daura-i Hadith in the Quomi system to be admitted to grade eight in the Aliya madrasa. They study the same Arabic text here that they studied before [in Quomi madrasa] but the difference is that they used to study in Urdu while we teach the same in Bengali.[184]

The ulama of the Aliya madrasas differ markedly from the Quomi ulama on the issue of Urdu and Persian lessons in madrasas. They argue that Urdu and Persian lessons are not necessary and should be substituted by Bengali. On the contrary, the Quomi ulama favor Urdu and Persian teaching in addition to Bengali. They contend that since in the past many seminal literary works on various aspects of Islam and its interpretation were written either in Urdu or Persian by many noble Islamic scholars, there is no choice but to study these languages. This pedagogical differentiation leads the ulama of both types of madrasas to a debate; the ulama of Aliya madrasas contend that the Quomi madrasas' ulama claim their pedagogy to be 'perfect' simply because of their inclusion of Urdu and Persian lessons, although there is no significant difference between the Aliya and Quomi madrasas in the teaching of the Quran, the prophetic tradition and fundamental tenets of Islamic knowledge.

But now we don’t need Urdu in Bangladesh and it is applicable in some parts of Pakistan. Persian is needed only if you go to Iran; otherwise nowhere else in the world is Persian necessary. I often suggest to the Quomi ulama that they could change their Urdu and Persian lessons. What is the necessity of these languages? Is Urdu necessary for studying three kitab (texts) to bother the students? We rejected Urdu. It is fully abolished. Persian is also rejected. It is just an optional subject. So far as I know no one studies Persian and in reality it is not necessary. Instead of Persian, one studies political science. Instead of Urdu, we teach social studies, political science, and psychology.[185]

The preference for sustaining the Urdu and Persian languages is intricately intertwined with the question of authorizing space for many Quomi ulama. Neither Urdu nor Persian is taught in any other educational institutions as they are taught from the very beginning of school life in Quomi madrasas in Bangladesh. Many Quomi madrasa ulama are still the bearers of these languages. If lessons in these languages are abolished, the ‘space of authoring’ of such ulama would diminish. In that sense, the preference for Urdu and Persian lessons in the madrasa is the expression of the ulamas’ struggle to maintain their authorizing space where they can cultivate and practice these languages in relation to Islamic knowledge.

* Institutional differentiation of madrasas

The ulama compete within different institutional nexuses of madrasas. They have complex power relations and their ‘positionality.’ The case of the Bangladesh Jamiatul Madarisin, an association for Aliya madrasa teachers, located in the capital city, is here illustrative. The organization was established in 1937 with a view to developing madrasa education and tackling the problems and challenges the madrasas and their ulama face in modern times.[186] Today, it is a government-approved organization with a large complex of mosque and office premises and a network of offices throughout the entire country.[187] Though it is an association of more than 200,000 teachers who work in Aliya madrasas, it also functions as a public religious sphere where the voices of ulama are to be heard regarding the diverse aspects of Islamic subjectivities; an endeavor for reconciliation of differentiation within ulama circles. For instance, in an organizational meeting, the ulama from all over the country made a declaration that recognizes differentiation within the ulama. According to the clauses of the declaration, all the pir-mashayikh (generally referred to as ulama; mashayikh pl. of sheikh, title of Sufi master or Muslim descended from the Companions) should work together with a view to spreading and implementing Islam for the sake of fostering greater interest in Islam; any law that goes against the tenet of the Quran and the role model of the prophet must be defended; Islamic scholars (alim, sing. of ulama) should avoid taking an oppositional stance with each other; and action should be taken against those ulama who brand many Islamic practices, such as observing the night of forgiveness (laylat-ul barat), the night of ascent of the prophet to Allah (laylat-ul miraj), the day of mourning the slaying of the prophet's grandson in Shia Islam (ashura), the birth anniversary of the prophet (id-i miladunnabi), visiting grave-shrines (majar) of the holy men in Islam (wali), as sinful innovation (bidat).[188] The ulama of the organization are also concerned with the 'propagation' of media, which are breaching the 'authentic' creed (aqida) of Islam and hence have argued for the establishment of Islamic TV in aid of the ulama (Inqilab, ud).[189] Even though the organization's primary concern is to unify the ulama, it generated further fissures, with the establishment of the Madrasa Sikhsok Parishad (Association for Madrasa Teachers) in 2006 which opposed the Jamiatul Madarisin on the grounds that it primarily fails to address the original purpose of the organization, that of serving the group's vested interests. The important facet of the newly established organization is that it was formed with the political leaders of Jamaat-i Islami,[190] an action unacceptable to the present ulama of Jamiatul Madrisin who oppose any political influence on their organization.

Our Jamiatul Madarisin is an apolitical organization. Jamaat-i Islam wants to use our teachers politically. We are against it. We, the madrasa teachers, have some differences with regard to the creed in Islam (aqida) with Jamaat-i Islami. In reality Jamaat-i Islami is a cadre-based organization. They operate according to their ideology and their operation is not limited, whether it is an Aliya or a Quomi madrasa. Especially, the ulama of Aliya have been speaking up against Jamaat since the British and Pakistan period. Here, a number of Islamic learned men and scholars differ with some writings of Maududi.[191]

The scope of this section does not allow for the discussion of the complex political differentiation within the ulama, but it is evident enough here to argue that the differentiation associated with Jamiatul Madarisin is the manifestation of how the ulama compete for their influence in the public religious sphere with different techniques of knowledge and power.

On the other hand, the institutional nexus of the Quomi madrasas also have important facets of differentiation. For instance, Bangladesh Befaqul Madarisil Arabia (Bangladesh Quomi Madrasa Education Board), which is known as the ‘Befaq Board,’ and which was founded in 1978 by a group of ulama, is trying to integrate all variants of Quomi madrasas within a common framework of schooling methodology, but they have failed to do so because of disavowal by different factions of the ulama within the Quomi madrasa. Nearly 2,000 madrasas are affiliated with the board, leaving a preponderant number of Quomi madrasas all over the country outside of its jurisdiction.[192] Many ulama prefer an individual authorizing space where they will have the autonomy of their own religious authority, maintaining the distinctiveness of their own madrasa. This position has led to the emergence of several Quomi madrasa boards, often centered on one madrasa founded by a local eminent Islamic scholar.[193] Such individually controlled madrasas assert their distinctiveness that differentiates them from others and, hence, prefer not to conform within a system. To substantiate this assertion the case of the Nurani and Nadiatul Quran system of madrasa schooling, both of which were innovated by an individual Islamic scholar, is illustrative here. Nurani refers to a particular system of primary level Islamic schooling, three years in tenure, which aims to produce ‘proper’ Muslim individuals from childhood by teaching lessons on basic Islamic rituals as well as 65 prophetic traditions (hadith) and 66 Quranic passages. Maulana Qari Belayet Hosan is credited for his innovation of the system. This system of madrasa schooling has since proliferated all over the country. Nearly 10,000 branches have a central board—Nurani Talimul Quran Board—in Dhaka.[194] On the other hand, like Nurani, the aim of Nadiatul Quran madrasa is to spread Quranic lessons into every Muslim house in order to produce ‘proper’ Muslims. Maulana Abdul Ohab, a Deobandi alim of Brahmanbaria, is credited for the proliferation of the Nadia system of madrasa schooling, of which there are nearly 10,000 branches, all over the country. The central board of these madrasas, Nadiatul Quran Board, is situated at the house of Maulana Abdul Ohab at Bhuiyapara in the Brahmanbaria municipal area.[195] Both the Nurani and Nadia madrasas claim their system of madrasa schooling is distinct and righteous for the production of ‘proper’ Muslims and therefore are belligerent in their opposition to submitting to the oversight of the Befaq Board. This difference not only manifests the differentiation of madrasas’ institutions but also suggests how the ulama compete for their influence and authority in their own authorizing space.

 The madrasa as a site for reconstructing Muslim cultural identity?

In many Western societies, the emergence and maintenance of Islamic education are associated with the preference of parents for their children to be attached to their Muslim cultural tradition, by which they can distinguish their identity in the multicultural societies where they live (Merry, 2007). Is the same assumption applicable in the context of Muslim societies, where madrasas function not only to teach Islamic religious knowledge but also to produce a cultural identity of being Muslim? Contemporary Muslim societies in the world are facing rapid changes through the process of globalization, ‘Westernization,’ modern mass education, new communication technologies, and above all, the threatening pressure of global culture. Since the cultural identity of being Muslim is associated with these complex changes, very often compounded, many Muslims consider the madrasa as an alternative way of nurturing their cultural tradition, one that connects them to an ideal past and Islamic role model (Graham, 1993: 522). This process of connection or the process of identification as being Muslim is neither uninventive nor unchanged, as suggested here; rather, it is constantly adaptive within the changing facets of their society and among madrasas and the ulama as well.

Although Islamic education is the doorway to being Muslim, in many cases the ulama also regard modern education as a pathway to compete with the modern world. As the principal of the Brahmanbaria Cadet Madrasa said:

I have two identities. First, I am a human being and then I am a Muslim. To lead life as a human being in the world, I need to acquire necessary knowledge both for myself and for the country. To lead my life as a Muslim, I need Islamic education also … Religion shows the path. No one can define the destiny of life without religion. I am a Muslim and I feel the necessity for both worldly education and education after this world. My Hereafter (akhirat) will depend on how I am leading my life in this world. This world (duniya) is the working field of Hereafter (akhirat) … Thus, without this world Hereafter has no meaning … If Islam is claimed to be the most superior religion, how will the superiority come? Will it come by religion only? No. We have to achieve superiority in religion, science, and in all other fields. Then, we can be considered as one of the best nations in the world.[196]

During my fieldwork, I observed that many madrasas, particularly the Quomi ones, maintain strict discipline among students. Such discipline is closely associated with how madrasas shape the Muslim identity; by encouraging students to follow an Islamic etiquette and manner, that is, adab as well as by teaching them Islamic practice and doctrinal precepts. Maintaining such etiquette by madrasa students, in many cases, is obligatory. For instance, in YM, all the students before their enrolment are required to sign a paper outlining the disciplinary rules. According to this paper, all students should do their everyday activities in accordance with God's command and the role model of the prophet. They are required to abide by maintaining the attire and the haircut of the prophet (Sunnati-dress and Sunnati-haircut), reciting the Quran, performing prayer every day and so on. They are not allowed to smoke and to move around without prior consent.[197] In most cases students of Quomi madrasas follow an Islamic etiquette and manner, and many ulama deem it as the first and foremost identity marker of being a 'proper' Muslim. In contrast, most of the Aliya madrasas are not of the seminary type like their Quomi counterparts where the students attend the school from outside. In that sense, the Aliya madrasas are not able to maintain strict discipline like the Quomi or to impose Islamic etiquette and manners on their students due to which the ulama of the Quomi madrasas claim that their method of teaching is more 'authentic' than that of Aliya madrasas in terms of promoting a sense of Muslim identity among their learners. At the same time, the Aliya madrasa students' conceptualization of Muslim selfhood has been intermingled because of the intense focus on modern education, which leads the ulama of Quomi madrasas to censure the Aliya madrasas as teaching and promoting an 'improper' Islamic identity. In response to such allegations, the ulama of the Aliya madrasas have their own arguments.

It is true that there are some differences regarding Islamic etiquette (akhlakh) between them [Quomi] and us. The reason is that our system is different. After graduation in Dakhil from an Aliya madrasa, students enter college. But the students of Quomi cannot enter any other institution even when they graduate with the highest degree. For students admitted here, the dress and etiquette of the prophet (sunnati lebas) is mandatory. But after graduation we cannot control what they will wear. We advise them to follow the dress and etiquette of the prophet. They [Quomi ulama] try to claim their system is a more righteous Islamic education … The point is they are also spreading Islam and so are we.[198]

Most of the Aliya madrasa ulama also contend that since their students are embracing modern education, they tend to wear ‘modern dress’ which does not necessarily mean that they are not observing the basic religious obligations as individuals. One Islamic scholar exemplifies that his son is studying for an MA in Political Science at Dhaka University after his Kamil graduation from an Aliya madrasa, and he has a daughter pursuing a Master of Business Administration after her Dakhil graduation. Though his son and daughter often wear ‘modern dress,’ they do not leave Islamic practices or stray from religious obligations. In this sense, he argues, Aliya students are also maintaining ‘proper’ Islamic good deeds-etiquette (amal-akhlakh).[199] The ulama’s contesting notions on how madrasas can produce a ‘proper’ Muslim selfhood through Islamic education and training Islamic manner and etiquette (adab), again, suggest that the concept of Muslim identity within the madrasas and within the ulama circle is marked by plural forms of argument and contention—that is refashioning with the changing facets of society.

 Conclusion

In this chapter, I have sought to illuminate how madrasas and their custodians are fraught with competing doctrinal orientations to Islam, ideas, conceptions and contentions. Considering the case of the Brahmanbaria municipality, this study explicates that the madrasas in contemporary Bangladesh share historically the different interpretative traditions, that is, maslaki traditions of Sunni Islam, originating in nineteenth and twentieth century South Asia. In varied circumstances, the contestation among different madrasa systems is not enlivened by the inclination to different Islamic denominational orientations and the manner in which such orientations are accentuated within the realm of madrasas. The contestation is conjoined with the techniques of social contention by which certain theological interpretations of Islam struggle for social legitimization in the sphere of Muslim cultural tradition. In that sense, the madrasas' functionality in Bangladesh is not only delimited to its existence as a social or spiritual entity which provides education with religious morality to the Muslims (Bano, 2007); rather, it is a primary site for facilitating and generating the internal reasoning, debates and contestation within Islam in a discursive manner wherein both religious and social issues intricately interplay in refashioning the larger context of Muslim cultural tradition. What follows from this is that madrasas promotes certain denominational aspects of Islam (such as Deobandi, Barelvi) as a way of guiding Muslim identity. I have shown in the above discussion that for many religious and learned Muslims or in a more generic sense—ulama—madrasas are those places where they can resuscitate the ways of being 'Muslim,' even though being a proper 'Muslim' is equivocal and contentious in terms of doctrinal inclination, social and behavioral etiquette. In equating Islamic religious education with the necessity of forming Muslim selfhood and identity, both the custodians of state-approved (Aliya) and non-state (Quomi) madrasas disparage each other on the question of pedagogical methodology that is germane to the process of constructing virtuous and devout Muslims. What follows from this, as I have argued, is that pedagogical exclusivity is not only associated ineluctably with the process of formation of 'proper' Muslim selfhood. It also seemingly associated to the other techniques of power—such as the ulama's individual fame and scholarly religious authority, social and religious networking and the discursive nature of madrasa-related religious forums. These techniques generate the contestation with regard to the formation of Muslim selfhood and simultaneously function as facilitators for securing the authorizing realm of social and religious space for many madrasa custodians. Through this contestation certain discourses of being 'Muslim' are not only given more weight over others but also permit the madrasa-educated Muslims in Bangladesh to relocate their social existence using their religious dexterity that is undervalued in the public space.

[140] The use of the notion of ‘discursive’ for understanding Islamic tradition in academic scholarship can be traced back to Marshall Hodgson’s seminal work Venture of Islam (1974). Eickelman (1982: 12) also pursued the utility of thinking Islam as discursive: ‘What is “traditional” in Islam is necessarily subject to ongoing debate and interpretation.’Asad (1986: 14) reiterated: ‘An Islamic discursive tradition is simply a tradition of Muslim discourse that addresses itself to conceptions of the Islamic past and future, with reference to a particular Islamic practice in the present.’

[141] The term ‘quasi-sectarian’ refers to the doctrinal differentiation and interpretation of certain Islamic precepts within a Muslim sect such as Sunni. This is used by Metcalf (1982: 264).

[142] Alam (2008a) prefers the use of the word maslaki instead of sectarian commonly to denote such differences. According to Messick (2005), ‘maslak’ can be understood as an ‘interpretative community,’ the interpretation of which is founded on interpretative worlds by ‘othering’ other interpretative communities in Islam (cf. Alam, 2008a: 3, n.5). Like Alam I also prefer maslaki since it rightly denotes the interpretative differentiation even within a particular sect like Sunni or Shia.

[143] Huq’s (2008) explication is illustrative here to understand how the women of the leading female Islamist organization in Bangladesh are facing global cultural challenges as well as other challenges of modernity in their everyday lives and how they are propounded through Quranic reading circles to renew their ‘belief’ with a view to fending off such challenges.

[144] Eaton (1994), Roy (1983), Ahmed (1996/1981), Ahmed (1996), Uddin (2006) are some noted academic works on Islam in Bangladesh.

[145] Asad (1986: 24) defines ‘A practice is Islamic because it is authorized by the discursive traditions of Islam, and is so taught to Muslims—whether by an alim, a khatib, a Sufi shaykh, or an untutored parent.’

[146] For historical account of such trends in Bangladesh see Ahmed (1988) and Roy (1983).

[147] See Eickelman (1992), Eickelman and Anderson (2003/1999) and Robinson (1993) on how mass higher education and modern technology facilitate the transformation of Muslim societies.

[148] By ‘culturally Muslim’ I mean those Muslims in Bangladesh who are not regular in practicing Islamic practices such as daily prayers and Ramadan. These Muslims occasionally perform Friday’s congregational prayer and attend certain Muslim festivals such as id-ul fitr and id-ul-azha.

[149] Raju (2008: 125–126) contends that the identity of Muslims in Bangladesh is imbued with two contradictory facets: a ‘cultural-nationalist’ approach which prioritizes Bengalis’ indigenous cultural practices and considers Islam as alien, and a ‘pro-Islamic’ approach which considers Islam as part of the indigenous culture. According to Raju, within the backdrop of skirmishes the identity of ‘Bengali-ness’ and ‘Muslim-ness’ was always in motion. The notion of ‘Muslim-ness’ was a result of a growing communal consciousness among Bengali Muslim peoples that emerged in the wake of the nineteenth and twentieth century’s Islamic revivalist movement and on the backdrop of the formation of communal ideology between Hindu and Muslim. On the other hand, the notion of ‘Bengali-ness’ rooted with its ethno-linguistic identity had emerged particularly after the Bengali language movement in 1952 in Bangladesh against the Pakistani rulers’ decision to make Urdu a state language for both East (then Bangladesh) and West Pakistan. On the formation of a communal ideology in twentieth-century Bengal, see Datta (1999), and for how a sense of ‘Muslim-ness’ and ‘Bengali-ness’ influence the conflict of Bengali and Bangladeshi nationalism, see Uddin (2006: 117–153)

[150] Ahlus-Sunna wal-Jamaah denotes ‘a highly emotive emic identity marker, which in normative etic discourse means nothing more than a label to denote allegiance to the Sunni or dominant grouping of Muslims' (Geaves 2005: 2).

[151] Hanafiate refers to the Sunni majhab, a system or school of Islamic jurisprudence, ascribed to Abu-Hanifah (699–767 CE) (Hodgson, 1974: 514).

[152] Shah Waliullah (1703–62) was a leading ulama of Delhi who laid emphasis on studying 'transmitted science' (manqulat) rather than 'rational science' (maqulat). He popularized the six canonical texts that are sihah sitta of Prophetic tradition in the Indian subcontinent (Sikand 2005: 48–49). On his life and influence on the Deoband Madrasa, see Metcalf (1982: 35–43) and Faruqi (1963: 135–136).

[153] On dars-i nizami curriculum, see Robinson (2001: 48–51).

[154] From its medieval heritage, Islamic education is bifurcated in manqulat/naqli (transmitted) and maqulat/aqli (rational) sciences. Transmitted or revealed knowledge refers to the knowledge of God and His messenger which is unchangeable such as Quran and the prophetic tradition, whereas rational knowledge denotes those branches of knowledge which are based on human intellect that is changeable. See Metcalf (1982: 19) and Nasr (1987: 126).

[155] For discussion on the life of Ahmad Riza Khan and his movement, see Sanyal (1996, 1998) and Metcalf (1982: 296–314).

[156] There is no significant academic work that illustrates a detailed account of the Ahl-i Hadith movement. See a prima facie discussion in Metcalf (1982: 268–296).

[157] On Nadwatul Ulama, see Metcalf (1982: 335–347) and Hartung (2006: 135–157).

[158] For how Jamaat-i Islami understands Islam, see the writings of its founder Mawdudi (1988); also see Nasr (1994).

[159] Ahmadiyya Muslims consider Prophet Muhammad as a law-bearing prophet (Shariati nabi) while accepting Mirza Ghulam Ahmad as ‘zilli nabi’, i.e. ‘shadow prophet’, who promotes the messages of Muhammad. For fuller discussion, see Friedmann (2003).

[160] For how the British patronized the establishment of Calcutta Aliya madrasa, see the ‘Minute by Warren Hastings, governor-general of Fort William (Calcutta) in Bengal’ in Lynn Zastoupil and Martin Moir (1999: 74–75).

[161] Ward is the smallest administrative unit of a municipality which is composed with several para or moholla, a cluster of homesteads.

[162] Cadet Colleges are considered one of the most important seats of general schooling in terms of their academic performance and sophisticated disciplinary practices of schooling. The prime objectives of these colleges are to produce prospective skilled army officers and hence the colleges are directly maintained by armed forces. The first Cadet College was established in 1958 at Faujdarhat in Chittagong district by the then Pakistan government. At present there are 12 Cadet Colleges in different regions of Bangladesh.

[163] In these madrasas the course duration of Daura-i-Hadith, the highest degree, is for eight years while it is 15–16 years in their counterpart boys’ Quomi madrasas. The custodians of these madrasas contend that if the female students cross their puberty period they could get married and hence would not be able to study further. Thus they shorten the duration of lessons in order to provide the advance religious education to the female students within a short time, particularly before their marriage.

[164] These data were provided by an officer of Madrasa Education Board, Dhaka in February 2007.

[165] According to the lists provided by the municipal office of Brahmanbaria, March 2008.

[166] According to the information provided by the Upazilla office of Brahmanbaria, September 2004.

[167] The term ‘space of authoring’ is one aspect of changing identity of human agency in the sense that Holland et al. (1998) argued. ‘Space of authoring’ refers to the ‘answerability’ of the world where ‘authorship is not a choice—but the form of the answer’ and ‘a matter of orchestration:’ of arranging identifiable social discourses/practices that are one’s resources (which Bakhtin glossed as ‘voices’) in order to craft a response in a time and space defined by others’ standpoints in activity, that is in a social field conceived as the ground of responsiveness (Holland et al. 1998: 272). In concordance with the meaning I view madrasa as a ‘space of authoring’ for ulama where their ‘voices’ are to be heard and where their responses are to be perceptible as form of answer resulting from the social field grounded on multiplied and multifaceted aspects of responsiveness. In that sense the evolvement of madrasa means the creation of social and religious space for ulama and by ulama as ‘ space of authoring.’

[168] Dakhil, equivalent to Secondary School Certificate (SSC) and Alim, equivalent to Higher Secondary School Certificate of general schools, degrees of Aliya madrasa had been recognized officially in 1985 and 1987 respectively. The other two degrees, Fazil as equivalent to Bachelor level and Kamil as equivalent to Master level, are to be recognized as the government promised by amending two necessary laws—Islamic University Act, 1980 (Act XXXVII of 1980) and Madrasah Education Ordinance, 1978 (Ord. No. IX of 1978) (Bangladesh Gazette, 2006a, 2006b). On the other hand, though the government vouched for recognizing the Quomi system of education by establishing a separate board of Quomi madrasa, it is still uncertain.

[169] Interview of Maulana Abdus Sattar, founding member and teacher of Al-Batul Mohila Madrasa, Brahmanbaria, March 25, 2008.

[170] ‘Islamabadi’ as a title usually awarded to show respect to individual alim or even to other individual Muslim by his followers and subordinates or by other ulama or by local people for their donations and other contributions to Islamic institutions like mosque, madrasa, etc.

[171] Zaman (2005: 82) defines ‘Muslim modernist’ as ‘those who have been educated in modern Western (or Westernized) institutions of learning and have sought to rethink or adapt Muslim practices, institutions, and discourses in light both of what they take to be “true” Islam—as opposed to how the Islamic tradition has evolved in history—and of how they see the challenges and opportunities of modernity.’

[172] Furfura is the name of a clan of spiritual preceptors originating from the village of Furfura in Hooghly district in West Bengal, India. The clan is popularly known as furfura sharif, which has networked disciples in almost every district in Bangladesh. They had a central office at Mirpur in Dhaka. Details about furfura are unknown due to the paucity of any academic work on it.

[173] An amulet, which contains some sacred text or incantation for the cure of illness or to scare away evil spirits.

[174] Also a kind of amulet similar to tabiz.

[175] Pani refers to water and pora to utterance. It is a form of Islamic healing where Islamic preceptors utter some sacred passage onto water which is given as remedy for curing illness or evil spirits.

[176] Interview with Sufi Giasuddin Khan, September 2004.

[177] Interview with Sufi Giasuddin Khan, March 24, 2008.

[178] According to the recorded interview of Mufti Nurullah, now the muhtamim, director of the madrasa, September 2004, and conversations with several other ulama in the town.

[179] Nesabnama of YM, a booklet written in Urdu, where curriculum and duties and responsibilities of the directors and teachers are stated.

[180] Recorded interview of Md. Abdul Matin, Vice-Principal, Vadugarh Darus Sunna Kamil Madrasa, March 30, 2008.

[181] Recorded interview of Imam and teacher of YM, March 7, 2007.

[182] Ahl-i Sunnat wal Jamaat, Bangladesh, situated in Dhaka, is the central organization of Barelvi ulama of Bangladesh, though for the Deobandis so far there is no such central organization.

[183] According to Holland et al. (1998: 271) ‘positionality’ is a context of identity which refers to ‘the “hereness” and “thereness” of people; it is inextricably linked to power, status, and rank.’ In the modern era peoples’ identities, as Holland et al. (1998) suggests, are not fixed with particular social and cultural worlds, rather with different contexts of ‘figured worlds’. In that sense ‘positionality’ denotes how the people connect with their changing ‘figured worlds.’ I use the term in a similar sense to denote how the ulama configure their status of religious authority with positing different ‘positionality’ in a ‘figured’ Muslim cultural and social world that is refashioning.

[184] Interview with Md. Jalaluddin, teacher of Brahmanbaria Islamia Dakhil Madrasa, September 2004.

[185] Interview with Maulana Shibbir Ahmad Momtaji, Secretary-General of Jamiatul Madarisin Bangladesh, national association for Aliya Madrasa teachers, Dhaka, March 20, 2008.

[186] For instance, this organization is demanding the official recognition of Fazil (Bachelor) and Kamil (Master) degrees. It is also demanding a fully fledged government facility for all Aliya madrasas like other public schools, and for establishment of an Independent Public Islamic and Arabic University.

[187] The government gives the land on which the organization is situated. The complex of the mosque is funded by the government of Iraq from a religious endowment (waqf) fund of the Sufi master Abdul Quadir Jilani. According to the interview with Maulana Shibbir Ahmad Momtaji, Secretary-General, Bangladesh Jamiatul Madarisin, Dhaka, March 20, 2008.

[188] Laylat-ul barat refers to the auspicious night of 15 Shaban, the Arabic month. This night is observed largely by many pious Muslims in South Asia, though it is alien to many Arabic Muslim people. Some ulama claim that the celebration of this night is bidah (reprehensible innovation). Laylat-ul miraj refers to the night of Ascent, the 27th day of Rajab month of Arabic, when Prophet Muhammad undertook a journey to Allah. Ashura is the 10th day of Muharram, which is commemorated by the Shia as a day of remembering and mourning the martyrdom of the grandson of the Prophet, Husayn ibn Ali. Id-i miladunnabi refers to the day when the Prophet was born and died, 12th Rabiul Awal. Ulama are diverse in their opinion on the authenticity of celebrating the day.

[189] One of the popular daily newspapers in Bangladesh Dainik Inqilab, a pro-Islamic newspaper, is believed to have been established by Jamiatul Madarisin. The founder editor of the daily Maulana, Abdul Mannan, was also the founder member of the organization. His son A.M.M. Bahauddin is the current President of the organization.

[190] For instance, the current President of Madrasa Sikhsak Parishad is Maulana Delwar Hosain Saydee, an Islamic preacher and former parliament member of Jamaat-i Islami, Bangladesh. The Vice-President of the organization is Muhammad Kamaruzzaman, assistant secretary-general of Jamaat.

[191] Interview with Maulana Shibbir Ahmad Momtaji, Secretary-General, Bangladesh Jamiatul Madarisin, Dhaka, March 20, 2008.

[192] Interview with Maulana Abdul Jabbar, Secretary-General, Bangladesh Quomi Madrasa Board, March 24, 2007.

[193] According to estimates there are at least 13 such individual alim controlled boards, which are scattered in different regions of the country (Prothom Alo 2006).

[194] Interview with Maulana Qari Faizullah, director, Nurani Talimul Quran Board, Dhaka, March 31, 2008. The board also supervises annual examination in all the Nurani branches of madrasas. It also provides training to the unemployed madrasa educated students who seek teaching jobs in Nurani madrasas. There are two kinds of training for the prospective teachers—Arabic course training for two months and English course training for one month. During the field visit I found some hundreds of students having their training.

[195] Interview with a teacher of Nadiatul Quran Central Madrasa, Brahmanbaria, March 25, 2008. The founder of the Nadia board also established the Nadia Publishing house in Dhaka which published popular Islamic texts for pre-primary and primary level madrasa pupils such as nadia kayeda, a booklet on introducing Arabic alphabets, nadia ampara, a booklet on selected Quranic verses, the Quran etc.

[196] Interview with Mobarak Hossan Akand, Principal, Brahmanbaria Cadet Madrasa, March 24, 2008.

[197] The conditions required to be followed by the students of Jamia Islamia Yunusia Madrasa, a handout written in Bengali and collected from the madrasa.

[198] Interview with Md. Abu Taher, Super (head teacher), Brahmanbaria Islamia Dakhil Madrasa, March 23, 2008.

[199] Interview with Maulana Shibbir Ahmad Momtaji, Secretary-General, Bangladesh Jamiatul Madarisin, Dhaka, March 20, 2008; the allegation of Quomi ulamas is based on the conversation with different ulama of Quomi madrasas in Brahmanbaria.

 5. Islamic education in China: Triple discrimination and the challenge of Hui women’s madrasas

Masumi Matsumoto and Atsuko Shimbo

No country has experienced changes as dramatic as China has throughout the last three decades. The World Bank predicts that by 2030, China will be the world’s most prosperous country in terms of its gross domestic product (GDP) and foreign currency reserves. These new economic dynamics have deeply affected the lifestyle of China’s Muslims, whose population reached 21 million in 2007. The development of western consumerism, the rise in literacy, and increasing contact with Muslim countries has brought about new ethno-religious consciousness and socio-political claims.

Western scholars who have studied Muslim minorities in China have focused mainly on the Turkish-speaking Uyghur, most of whom are settled in Xinjiang, because of their political grievances and the government’s use of coercion against them. It is not our intention to downplay the State’s repression of any ethnic and religious group in China, but the Uyghurs' plight is not representative of all Chinese Muslim communities. Other Muslim minorities have tried alternative survival tactics to get themselves integrated or recognized in Chinese society; one such group is the Hui.

The Hui, estimated at around 9.8 million in the 2000 census (Zhongguo Renmin Gongheguo Guojia Tongjiju, 2008: 87), comprises almost half of the Chinese Islamic community but a mere 0.75 per cent of the total Chinese population. Religious claims have allowed them to enlarge their social autonomy and address issues such as marginality, inequality, and the acknowledgment of their ethnic identity, while contributing to better national integration. The Hui have been influenced by an Islamic awakening, or revival, the subject of this chapter. We focus especially on the development of Islamic education for Hui women. The expansion of educational opportunities in both Islamic and secular subjects for Hui women has contributed to lessening women's marginalization in both the Hui and Chinese communities in three spheres: economic underdevelopment, ethnic intolerance and neglect, and gender discrimination. Although the struggle against discrimination seems to reinforce religious particularities, it does not necessary lead to a strict and exclusivist Islamization of education. Most often, women simply intend to make strategic use of both their Chinese and Islamic legal statuses for their benefit.

While our respective fieldwork studies have broadly dealt with the marginalization of Hui women in Chinese society, our special focus is Islamic education and the hybridizing process involving the secular and authoritarian state on the one hand and the religious claims involving Islamic identity on the other. This dynamic tension is at the basis Hui distinctiveness and educational dynamics.

 The Hui community and the establishment of an educational system

The most populous of the ten national Muslim groups in China, the Hui claim to be descendants of Central Asian and Middle Eastern Muslim traders, soldiers, bureaucrats, sailors, and engineers. According to historians (Ma Shinian, 1988: 224–227; Qiu Shusen, 1996: 7–31; Li Xinghua et al., 1998: 3–50), the first Muslim traders came to China during the Tang Dynasty (618–907) and settled in the coastal cities and Chang’an, the capital city at that time. The Yuan dynasty (1271–1368), known as the Mongolian era, saw the massive immigration of Muslims from Central Asia who married native Chinese women. Their descendants were the Hui, who were conferred Chinese nationality in 1936. The Hui eventually stopped using their mother tongues—Persian, Turkish, or Arabic—and adopted Chinese for everyday conversations since the Ming era (1368–1644), partly because of their intermarriage with the local Chinese and partly because of the pressure to assimilate into Chinese society. However, they maintained their native languages to teach the Islamic faith up to the end of the Qing era (1911), while upholding their religious faith and observing Islamic practices in their everyday life. Their pious lifestyle remained unchanged even in the wake of the profound modifications wrought by the twentieth century. For instance, 94.7 per cent of the Hui who live in the poor mountainous region of southern Ningxia fast during Ramadan, 69.2 per cent offer daily prayers, and 46.8 per cent (72.7 per cent of the women) are taught religion at home (Wang Zhengming and Tao Hong, 2003: 147).

Hui communities can be found mainly in the impoverished northwestern provinces of China: the Ningxia Hui Autonomous Region, Gansu, Inner Mongolia, and Qinghai (see Figure 5.1). Although the group’s largest concentration is in Ningxia—about 1/3 of the area’s population[200]—significant numbers of Hui live in Gansu, Qinghai, and Xinjiang in China’s northwest; Beijing, Hebei, Henan, and Shandong in the centre; and Yunnan in the southwest.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-18.jpg][Figure 5.1 Map of China]]

Through their involvement in the nationalist movement, Hui religious and ethnic leaders were able to obtain a very special status in 1936: China’s Communist authorities recognized the Hui as a national minority (Matsumoto, 1999: 215–216). As such, they became entitled to religious freedom and equality with other nationalities. However, ethnic discrimination remains deeply entrenched among ordinary Chinese and the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which continues to repress religious leaders and their activities. Up to now, therefore, the two national principles of ethnic equality and religious freedom have remained nominal. The communist regime, which promotes atheistic socialism, discourages people from wearing religiously symbolic attire in public, such as veils or Muslim caps. In particular, party cadres are prohibited from performing any kind of religious practices in public. Moreover, religious associations in China are kept under CCP's surveillance and inspection. All clerics must obtain approval from the CCP and are obliged to preach to their congregations the importance of patriotism and the legitimacy of the Communist party's governance.

Thus the Hui are marginalized both as a religious minority in secular communist China and as an economically disadvantaged people, doomed to live in very impoverished areas. One must add gender discrimination, which has long been forgotten or neglected in the context of the male-dominated Han and Hui societies. Thus, Hui women have been forced to live under strict patriarchal control. The status of rural Hui women resembled that of Han women until about 1949. They were compelled to have their feet bound and were not allowed to study or go out of their homes. Women were valued for hard domestic work, chastity, obedience as daughters-in-law, and good mothers to their sons (Harris, 1947). Even after the revolution in 1949, the Hui in Ningxia lagged in literacy compared with the rest of the Chinese ethnicities, and Hui girls fared worse than Hui boys. Many families could not afford textbooks and other school expenses, which sometimes exceed a quarter of their annual income (Shimbo, 1995). Other serious obstacles included the 'feudal' idea of the predominance of men over women; the lack of female teachers; the secular and Marxist educational system wherein girls and boys were supposed to attend the same class; an early marriage for girls (generally 15–17 years old); and the belief that education would pull girls away from Islam. Until the Compulsory Education Act was promulgated in 1986, the majority of Hui girls, notably those living in Ningxia, remained illiterate.

* Hui modern education in Ningxia during the first half of the twentieth century

Modern western-style education was introduced in China at the end of the Qing Dynasty, but its development in the Ningxia region did not follow the same path as in other regions. Hui education mainly took the form of religious education at madrasas[201] from the early Qing era (1644–1911) until around the beginning of the twentieth century.

During the Republican period (1912–1949), which was characterized by the promotion of modernity, ethno-consciousness, and nationalism, a few male religious and other local leaders in the region began to note the importance of female education in increasing the ethno-religious strength of their community. They established a few female madrasas to promote Arabic literacy and Islamic education. These exceptional female madrasas, located in Gansu, Ningxia, and Yunnan taught not only elementary Arabic but also elementary Chinese writing to Hui girls (Laycock n.d.; Pictures of Pickens Collection 1934–35; Yao Jide, 2005: 96–97). Generally known as nüxues,[202] these female madrasas became the prototypes of women's Islamic schooling in contemporary China. However, in spite of the dramatic efforts of some Muslim intellectuals to promote the education of Hui girls, the number of nüxue remained low because of the lack of funds and the parents' unwillingness to educate their daughters. Thus, there were few educated Muslim girls in the Northwest. Nevertheless, education became the main concern of Muslim ahongs (religious authorities) and local Hui political leaders. They established modern schools that taught both Chinese and Arabic.

For example, Su Le (1868–1950) belonged to the gentry and was a successful entrepreneur at Weizhou in Tongxin County, Ningxia. He studied Chinese classic literature in preparation for the imperial examination and graduated from the Advanced Elementary School, a public school for boys in Pingyuan County, in 1906. Su Le was one of the founders of the Weizhou Islamic Girls School in 1905 as an extension to a mosque. Ahongs were in charge of teaching Arabic at that time. The Weizhou Islamic Girls School changed its name to Weizhou Girls Normal School in 1933. Although this was a public school, the Qur'an and religious doctrine were taught alongside Chinese and mathematics. In 1939, the school's name was once more changed to the Weizhou Girls Junior Elementary School (Li Xinghua, 2008: 73–88; Li Zongdao and Wang Kelin, 2000: 62–64; Tongxinxian jiaoyuzhi bianzuan xiaozu/Tongxinxian jiaoyuju, 1991: 139).

After the revolution of 1949, the government adopted various measures to boost public education in the Ningxia region to promote national integration; the establishment of Hui ethnic elementary schools was one such measure. Hui elementary schools were public schools, and Muslim children obtained scholarships in a government drive to encourage schooling. There were 28 lower Hui primary schools (one was exclusively for girls) and three complete elementary schools in 1954. Although the ratio of girls' enrolment remained very low, the school attendance rate of Hui children gradually increased (Ding Guoyong, 1993: 269–270).

* The paradoxical impact of the cultural revolution

The Anti-Rightist Campaign in 1957, the Anti-Religion Movement triggered by the Tibet Uprising in 1958, and the anti-religious Cultural Revolution (1966—1976) severely crippled the educational conditions in the Ningxia region. All religious activities, including schools and classes run by ahongs, were banned, and countless ahongs and madrasa students were persecuted and exiled to the countryside for compulsory work. Many did not survive the rigors of starvation and violence. Religious books and writings, including the Qur'an and hadiths' collections, were burned or thrown away, and many mosques were destroyed. Some Muslims were even forced to feed pigs—animals that Muslims shun. Men were prohibited from growing beards, and women from wearing veils (Ma Lan, 2001: 29–31). The government banned practically everything related to religion and ethnicity, trampling over Muslim pride and social relations. During this period, private lay and religious schools established and run by local Hui leaders were forced to either close down or transform themselves into secular public schools in which Arabic was no longer taught.

At the end of the Cultural Revolution, the ban on religion was lifted gradually, spurring an unprecedented educational reassertion in Muslim areas. Religious and political Hui leaders not only reopened the girls' madrasas, built exclusively for Islamic education, but also invested in the establishment of girls' public schools. In contrast to madrasas, these new girls' public schools developed both secular and religious curricula and promoted national identity, loyalty to the party, coeducation, and gender equality. The government was also eager to develop public schools in the region in order to promote national integration, and the ahongs had to bear this in mind while promoting their own Islamic agenda. Secular schooling contributed to the integration of Muslim women, raising their visibility and acceptability in the public sphere and giving them access to job opportunities. Simultaneously, this situation contributed to enlarging debates on Hui identity and its stance on modern education and women’s economic autonomy.

 Educational development after the Cultural Revolution

* The expanded role of Hui leaders

Until the end of the 1980s, the number of enrolled Hui girls remained low compared with their male counterparts, but quickly increased afterwards (Ningxia nütong jiaoyu yanjiu ketizu, 1995: 56–95; Ningxia Jiaoyu Kexue Yanjiusuo, 2001; Zhouwei, 1997: 291–292). Ahongs and local Hui leaders exerted notable efforts to improve girls’ school enrolment in Ningxia, building schools and promoting female education. Together with the government, they established public schools to improve the educational standards of Hui while striving to make both secular and religious education coexist in order to preserve religion and ethnic identity. The experience of three secular public schools founded in cooperation with ahongs and local Hui leaders shows how this process worked.

The Weizhou Girls Junior Elementary School in Tongxin County, converted into a co-ed school in 1953, was re-established in 1985. Ma Xinlan, the granddaughter of Su Le (one of the school’s founders, as mentioned earlier), was its new principal (Ding Guoyong, 1992: 134–140). Taking advantage of their social prestige, liberal ahongs and Hui leaders advocated the importance of girls’ education at Islamic festivals and other gatherings (Ma Xinlan, 1995: 18–32). Their zealous persuasion had a powerful impact on the Hui, who had believed that public school education would weaken the girls’ Islamic faith. In order to sweep away parents’ fears, the curriculum was designed to meet the demands of devout Muslims who wished to make their daughters learn basic Arabic greetings and phrases.

Ahongs and teachers compiled a document called ‘Two Hundred Famous Phrases in Arabic,’[203] which was used by female ahongs in teaching students welcoming words and songs in Arabic. The textbook included the Arabic alphabet, Arabic expressions of greeting, time, the four seasons, family, the history of Ningxia, the general characteristics of the Hui ethnic group, religious beliefs, and excerpts from the Qur’an. The appendix contained tape recording of songs to welcome guests. Each lesson introduced particular contents, such as ‘Today’s words of wisdom,’ ‘Seeking knowledge is a Muslim’s mission,’ ‘Seek knowledge even unto China’ (hadith) and ‘Time is money’ (Ningxia jiaokesuo guojia nütong jiaoyu yanjiu ketizu, 1992: 3–42). Parents welcomed these efforts, which emphasized respect for the Islamic culture, and began to send their children to the school willingly. Meanwhile, educators saw to it that what was learned at school was useful for daily life and provided guidance for career choices. Vocational and technical training, such as sewing, embroidery, knitting, vegetable cultivation, and other practical courses, were included in the school’s curriculum.

In the 1990s, several public schools in the most disadvantaged north-western regions received subsidies from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), various non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and other benefactors, as the establishment of gender equality and penetration of secularism was a goal shared by the government and the said international organizations (Li Xiaojiang, 2005; Aaftaab, 2005: 47–51, 57–60). The Weizhou Hui Girls Elementary School was a pilot project of UNESCO, and it affected eight other schools (Ningxia nütong jiaoyu yanjiu ketizu, 1995: 56–95; Xibu sishengqu nütong jiaoyu yanjiu zonghe ketizu, 1999: 29–36, 109), all of which participated in a girls’ education project sponsored by the Ningxia Institute of Educational Science from 1992 to 1995. Under the project, the schools’ curricula were redesigned to value Islamic culture as UNESCO was stressing respect for ethnic minorities.

A second institution, the Shizi-shan-zhuang Elementary School in Xiji County, was established by Ma Jiafu in 1980, at the end of the Cultural Revolution. He had been arrested in 1958 at the age of 23 and was released in 1980. Ma Jiafu, an ahong in the Xiji, used the money he received from the government as compensation for his imprisonment to get the school started. Shizi-shan-zhuang was a public school, and the government shouldered the operating costs. The school also participated in the experimental project of the Ningxia Institute of Educational Science, which included Arabic lessons in the curriculum. The concept, which was very popular among students, increased enrolment.

A third school, the Hairu Girls Junior High School, handles secondary education. It was established in Tongxin County in 1986 by Hong Weizong, the Vice Chairman of the Tongxin County Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) (Mei jie 1999: 268–274). Hong Weizong was a religious leader—a murshid (jiaozhu in Chinese)—of Hongmen Menhuan (Sufi Order), who was banned during the Cultural Revolution. He was well aware of the obstacles encountered by teenage Muslim girls who wanted to continue studying after elementary school. In particular, co-ed boarding schools posed insurmountable problems. To help Hui girls overcome these difficulties, he founded the Hairu Girls Junior High School, an exclusive boarding school for girls. The start of the school's operation was most timely; the rising number of Hui girls graduating from elementary schools increased the demand for secondary education. The school also offered disadvantaged Hui girls the chance to continue studying by providing them grants and free textbooks and exempting them from various required fees.

As a secular public school, the Hairu Girls Junior High School offered no Arabic classes, but the founder made sure that religious education was not completely eliminated. The school taught Islamic wisdom to both Hui and Han students. The school also edited an extracurricular textbook on the history of the Hui and their heroes, such as Zheng He, who had travelled to the Arab countries up to the Somali coast in the Ming era, and Ma Benzhai, who had fought in the Anti-Japanese War. In teaching students the history, culture, and religion of the Hui, the textbook contributed to reinforcing their identity and promoting mutual understanding between the Hui and the Han. Vocational and technical training in sewing, embroidery, knitting, vegetable cultivation, and other practical courses was part of the school's curriculum. Many graduates of Hairu went on to state-founded secular normal schools or vocational schools for teacher training and eventually became secular elementary school teachers. The roster of graduates shows that 92 students entered the school in 1986 and graduated in 1989; 22 became teachers at secular public schools (Hiaru Nüzi Zhongxue, 1996: 1–81).

In this respect and although the girls' schools founded by ahongs and murshids were successful at promoting education—basic literacy as well as Islamic teachings—they encountered a different challenge in the 1990s: the growing number of Hui girls enrolled in secular public schools towards the end of the 1980s.

Faced with the rising popularity of public schools among Hui girls, the schools that had participated in the project sponsored by the Ningxia Institute of Educational Science decided to remove Arabic classes from their curricula. One possible reason for the drastic turnaround was government's pressure to increase the percentage of students proceeding to junior high school. In China, the government runs all schools, even those built by private individuals or NGOs. In other words, even when the private sector supplies large initial investments to build the facilities, the government pays for the teachers' salaries and overhead costs and ultimately, defines the curriculum. As a result, the schools built by religious leaders for promoting education without sacrificing religious identity were eventually transformed into government schools that served its policy: national integration and secularization.

Because of the growing number of elementary school students wanting to enrol in junior high schools, parents welcomed the shift in the schools' curricula. They actually asked for a more ambitious learning agenda instead of basic education and emphasis on Islamic knowledge. Their motivations were pragmatic. For instance, the headmaster of an elementary school that used to teach Arabic told us, 'Studying Arabic takes time away from preparing for the junior high school entrance examinations.' In general, Hui pupils have no one in their families to help them with their studies as most parents are illiterate or semiliterate; therefore, schools play an especially important role in children's education.[204] The Shizi-shan-zhuang Elementary School established by Ma Jiafu ahong does not teach Arabic any more 'because there is no Arabic teacher.'[205] The Weizhou Girls Elementary School still offers Arabic classes, but only as an extracurricular activity.[206] In order to meet the changing demands of the authorities and parents, Arabic classes were abolished and the curriculum was revised to fit in with national curriculum standards. In sum, the schools established by the religious leaders were obliged to spend more time on general subjects at the expense of Islamic teachings.

Adapting to the development of China’s market economy, Hui students also had to compete with their Han peers in school entrance examinations, an equivalent of the Keju test (the imperial examination in ancient China). Because those who couldn’t keep up fell by the wayside, Hui girls were forced to conform to the secular national requirements. Moreover, girls’ schools had to go co-ed in accordance with the government policy of state schooling and gender equality. One of them was the Hairu Girls Junior High School, which went co-ed in 2002. According to government officials, ‘Since there are both men and women in society, it is not good for women’s development to educate girls separately from boys.’ Yet, it seems that the primary purpose of making the Hairu Girls Junior High School co-ed was to increase the admissions to senior high schools and colleges among its graduates (2005 survey).

To sum up, after the Cultural Revolution, ahongs and local Hui leaders were actively involved in founding schools and promoting Hui girls’ education without sacrificing religious identity. However, bowing to the pressure from the government and the Hui community, they gradually converted their schools into secular public schools to raise their educational standards. Eventually, Islamic teaching was dropped from the curriculum and the exclusive girls’ schools became coeducational.

* The expansion of secular schools for Hui girls

In the past, most parents considered girls’ education a waste of time because, once married, a daughter became part of her husband’s family. They also believed that public school education was anti-religious, as it weakened Islamic values. However, when confronted by the new socio-economic demands, parents re-evaluated the economic advantage of secular public school education and changed their attitude towards it. Today, the first choice of most Hui girls and their parents is a public school, even if they know that the values taught at the secular public school are incongruous with Islamic values. The chief reason is economics. Education increases the girls' job options, improves their social mobility, and creates better marriage opportunities.

Teaching has been one of the most popular careers for young educated Hui women. Girls who are successful in their education at public schools are often eager to become teachers. A public school teacher earns a monthly salary and is even allowed to register as an urban resident. More importantly, the teaching profession is not regarded as against Islamic values. In addition, the Hui believe that a female teacher makes a better wife because she is a specialist in children's education. Therefore, becoming a teacher enhances the possibilities for young Hui women to find husbands with respectable social status, such as doctors and government employees.

A change in Hui perceptions of secular education opened the floodgates for public education among Hui girls. However, it was government initiative that produced the most important and influential measures; the Compulsory Education Act of 1986 and the Education Act of 1995 inspired students to attend secular government schools (Cui Xiangsu and Lao Kaisheng, 1995: 20). The Compulsory Education Act requires all children to complete nine years of schooling; Article 8 mandates the separation of education and religion. In 2006, the Compulsory Education Act was amended to eliminate all charges for textbooks and miscellaneous fees, dramatically reducing the dropout rate. Even the poorest Hui girls could now finish elementary and junior high school.

 Faith and career in a secular society

Though some Hui women are aware of certain points of conflict between Islamic values and secular public education—specifically, the ban on religious education— they have nevertheless chosen to teach in public schools. In the past, the shortage of female teachers had been one of the major obstacles to female education in the Hui region. As a result, since the mid-1980s, teacher training for Hui females has been promoted in Ningxia by the government. We conducted a survey of 123 female Muslim students trained as secular public school teachers at the Guyuan Normal School for Nationalities. This school provided upper secondary level education and aimed at training teachers for primary schools in Ningxia in the years 1995, 1996, and 1997. Most of the students were born between 1978 and 1980. It was in 1978 that the Reform and Open Policy started. The life course of those students has been synchronized with the progress of China's market economy. By 2008, almost all of them had become state schoolteachers in the southern region of Ningxia.

The Guyuan Normal School for Nationalities adopts a standard national curriculum that includes politics, Chinese, mathematics, calligraphy, music, speech training for teachers, psychology, painting, physics, chemistry, and basic linguistics. It should be noted that 'politics' includes philosophical education based on Marxism-Leninism and Maoism.

Female Hui teachers impart to their students what they learned at the normal school. What they teach follows the standard national curriculum, wherein anything related to the Han culture is the exemplar. Other regional or ethnic cultures are not taken into consideration. Portraits of Mao Zedong, Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin are hung on the walls of rural elementary schools. Motivated by communist ideology, public education is aimed at cultivating loyalty to the communist regime. It could be said that the Hui are now almost fully integrated into the Han culture.

Some female Hui teachers are members of the Chinese Communist Party. They say, 'I will constantly strive for girls' education because I was educated and developed under the good policy of the Party.' They claim that 'villagers have an old-fashioned mindset' and 'believe that girls will be exposed to bad influences if they go to school.' Thus, these female teachers believe that it is their mission to eliminate these narrow-minded notions and 'sow the seed of love in poor villages.'[207]

Detached from their Islamic traditions, more and more female Hui teachers have achieved professional success. The absence of religious practices in their daily lives has blurred the distinction between them and female Han teachers. The only religious custom Hui teachers have preserved is the Islamic dietary prohibition on eating pork. Female Hui teachers know about Islam but exhibit no interest in it. They do not read the Qur’an or go to mosques, although they attend Islamic events and festivals. They do not pray at home or fast during the month of Ramadan. They show no interest in female madrasas (nüxue) and the students enrolled there. They talk about their fathers’ visits to Mecca but seem to think that religion is for old people only and has nothing to do with them.

In sum, female Hui teachers seem to have lost touch with Islamic traditions, and many of them no longer care about practicing religion in a social context. For example, when summer training workshops were held in Yinchuan for female teachers working in the mountainous areas in South Ningxia in August 2002 and again in August 2004,[208] it was observed that an increasing number of teachers were fashion-conscious and wore accessories like necklaces and earrings. Of the 120 participants in the 2004 training, 64 were married Hui women, only 13 of whom (20 per cent) wore cups—the symbol of Hui women’s marital status. Instead of cups, some donned half-sleeved blouses and skirts with permed hair. Traditionally, Hui women do not express their opinions before a large group of people, but these teachers did so without hesitation in front of government officials. It seems that the Hui have gradually assimilated the Han code of conduct and values. They build their careers on their secular education by concentrating on professional pursuits.

Among the Hui, giving up one’s faith and blending into the host society is not on everyone’s agenda. Nonetheless, some female Hui teachers value their Muslim identity. Dejected about being isolated from their religion, a few teachers decide to shift to other jobs. For example, a Hui woman (Ms. M), who used to work as a Chinese teacher at a junior high school after graduating from Ningxia University, began to feel that she was gradually getting separated from her religious beliefs. Consequently, she quit the post to work as an interpreter at an Arab–Chinese trading company in Yiwu, Zhejiang Province, where her family had moved. Ms. M, wearing a veil, told us, ‘Working as an interpreter is tough, but I am satisfied with the job. All of my colleagues and friends are pious Muslims. It keeps me closer to my religious beliefs.’[209]

After retirement, many Hui cadres make the pilgrimage to Mecca, as did Mr. M, an official who founded the Xingyuan Women's Islamic School (madrasa or nüxue). It is possible, therefore, that female Hui teachers at secular schools will revert to being pious Muslims after retiring.

Far from being a simple case of conflict between Muslim and secular identities, debates on modern education have uncovered deeper concerns of Chinese society: state control versus the autonomy of private institutions, local/ethnic affiliation vs. national acceptance, and eventually, marginalization vs. better social and national integration. In the last part of this chapter, we will discuss the extent to which madrasa development is related to overcoming marginality.

 Nüxue: Women's madrasas in China

* The new female madrasas

State education is exclusively secular, so religious leaders see a need for Islamic teaching. Many devote themselves to running nüxue—private organizations that promote Arabic literacy and Islamic education for women (Jashock and Shui, 2000). These institutions have avoided government control and for this reason their numbers are increasing. Established mainly by ahongs (religious authorities), retired party cadres, or Muslim community leaders in the 1980s and 1990s, nüxue used to pursue a variety of goals, including the elimination of women's illiteracy, bottom-up Islamic education. They also advocated late marriage. Many contemporary nüxue originated in small Arabic study classes for girls and illiterate older women; several of these classes subsequently expanded into schools with high-quality equipment and facilities. The number of such schools and classes is growing yearly, although no official statistics to verify their growth are available.

In general, nüxue curricula include the Arabic language, the Qur'an, hadith, kalam, and morality. For example, Hong Yang, the murshid (religious leader) and son of Hong Weizong that we discussed earlier, is venturing into new nüxue, such as the Beidasi Women’s School and the Haiyuan Women’s School for the training of female ahongs. He shoulders the teachers’ salaries and operational costs, thereby staying independent of governmental control. [210]</sup> Nüxue teachers emphasize the acquisition of religious knowledge and moral values. The curricula also include Chinese literacy, general knowledge (e.g., computer science), and occasionally, crafts (e.g., sewing). In general, a part of the schools’ expenses—teachers’ salaries and school equipment—is covered by endowments and donations from religious leaders and other Muslims, and tuition fees. Nüxue do not receive any government aid, although many students are exempted from paying tuition or are charged minimal tuition. Almost all students and teachers come from the Hui, Uyghur, and Salar ethnicities.[211] Some nüxue also accept a small number of non-Muslim students who wish to learn Arabic. The courses usually span two to four years. However, few students complete the four-year course because of economic difficulties, lack of motivation, and family pressure to get married.

In the 1980s and 1990s, nüxue accepted students who had dropped out from public schools or were home-schooled. For this study, we constituted a sample of female students, girls aged 7 to 12, and teachers from three nüxue in Weizhou (Ningxia) in 1999 (Matsumoto 2001). In Linxia (Gansu), the first nüxue opened as an Arabic class in the early 1980s. Twenty-five years later, the school had developed into the prestigious Linxia Zhong-A Nüxiao (the Linxia Muslim Women’s School) with more than 600 students, and is now nationally renowned (Ma Qiang, 2003). Since Linxia—called the ‘Little Mecca of China’—is the centre of Islamic culture in China, girls who study there are bestowed with prestige. The number of students that the nüxue could accommodate is more than in other areas.[212] The school’s success has far exceeded the expectations of its founders.

Since 2000, due to the rise in enrolment at public elementary schools, the role of nüxue in providing supplemental education has diminished, except in the most deprived regions of China. Most nüxue have become vocational schools for training Arabic interpreters and nüxue teachers, with 60–70 per cent of the students undergoing nine years of compulsory schooling. Some of the students have failed high school or university entrance exams. Nüxue graduates pursue various careers. Most choose to become teachers in nüxue or in Muslim kindergartens, female clerics (nüahong), or Arabic interpreters. Some go abroad for further studies, whereas others work as clerks or senior managers; and a few become housewives.

According to our survey sample, 80 per cent of the students in Ningxia and Gansu and 50 per cent in Yunnan wished to pursue a religion-related career, such as teacher, nüahong, or tabligh (those who engage in the propagation of the faith). Only 3.5 per cent of the students from Ningxia and none from Gansu, Qinghai, and Yunnan wanted to be soldiers or police officers. More than 80 per cent wanted to go abroad on pilgrimage, especially to Mecca and Medina. Some wished to study in Islamic countries such as Malaysia and Pakistan, while others wanted to visit ‘advanced’ countries, such as Singapore, Japan, and Korea. Few girls expressed a wish to go to the US or Europe.

* Strengthening adherence to Islam

The nüxue experience helps women develop self-esteem and enables them to choose a career. Girls who become teachers or nüahong improve their status and gain greater respect from their community. Female interpreters enjoy several economic advantages, as there is considerable demand for Arabic interpreters in the coastal cities (Tsukamoto 2006). For example, there are 20,000–30,000 migrant Muslims from the Northwest who reside in Yiwu and Guangzhou, which are world-famous wholesale trade centers. In these cities, several interpreters have established lucrative trading companies, and the success stories of poor nüxue graduates are well known. In a sense, nüxue help Muslim girls achieve their potential by strengthening their religious moorings, which complements the Maoist emphasis on the importance of careers for women.

Nüxue teachers and students insist that, while pursuing economic independence, the younger generation must resist atheism, materialism, and nihilism—the alleged results of an expanding market-economy. This is evident in their answers to questions regarding the differences between public schools and nüxue. They view secular public schools as places of corruption, competitiveness, individuality, and fear; and nüxue, as places of fairness, cleanness, sisterhood, mutual assistance, and security. Nüxue also teach calmness of mind, politeness, self-reliance, self-control, enrichment of mind, and the woman's way of life.

The 'new' and modern Islamic views on gender held by China's Muslim society highlight the right of women to education, freedom of marriage, to buy and sell assets, and to work. At the same time, these views underscore the perceived biological and psychological differences between men and women, and gender separation. In this context, they draw attention to a mother's supposedly primordial and essential role: an educator. Female education is seen as crucial in the reformation of a polluted and contradictory world. A woman is taught to be a 'wise mother and good wife' in order to assure the equality of the two genders in front of Allah on the premise of the division of gender roles. The catchphrase 'wise wife and good mother' was popular in China during the Republican era—when female education was seen as a pivotal element in a productive nation's rejuvenation, a key to regaining national strength—but seemingly slid into oblivion after 1949.

After 60 years, the catchphrase reappeared in the context of Islamic revival in China's Muslim community. The discourse on the division of the genders was again strongly supported by the newly imported 'modern' theory on Islamic women. Authors like the Egyptian Sayyed Qutub, insist on the inherent biological and psychological difference between men and women. [213] In the 1990s, apparently eager to learn the authentic and popular views on Islam outside China, Muslim women in nüxue expended great efforts to translate the 'new' writings on Islamism from Arabic to Chinese and circulate them among Chinese Muslims.

Some Muslim women, following 'modern' Islamic interpretation, believe that women can realize submission to Allah through marriage (Wadud, 2006: 121, 161). They assert that the woman's role as spiritual educator of her family and female students should be prioritized over social labor and secular self-realization. This leads us to the question of how women in nüxue rationalize the contradictions between such a doctrine, their faith, and future careers.

Today, the young girls' desire to learn Arabic and Islam can be attributed to an increasing awareness of their ethnic identity. A considerable number of the Hui have realized that even though they obtained the status of a specific group of Islamic faith, their religion, history, and traditions will remain neglected and marginalized in the Han-dominated secular public sphere. Thus, ashamed of their lack of Islamic knowledge, they have decided to attend nüxue.

Almost all nüxue students wear veils. According to the sample's survey, 73 per cent of students started to wear veils after their admission to the nüxue. Covering their head and wearing an Islamic dress are new practices for them. Another name for Islam in China is qingzhen or 'pure and true,' which represents the essence of Allah. Wearing a veil, they explain, makes them experience a real spiritual change and leads them from confusion and impureness to pureness and piety. In Chinese society, women with veils are often disdained or cast curious looks. In fact, veiling in public is banned. In this context, the veil becomes an icon of their pride in being 'new' Muslim women (Khadija, 1994; Ahmed, 1992: 164). Women's Islamic attire has multiple connotations, such as the expression of Islamic values and subtle resistance to the male-dominated existing order (El-Guindi, 1999: 177–185) or, in China, to the secular and Marxist CCP. Veils also imply a spiritual independence and solidarity with the weak (Wang Jianxin, 2001: 233–234).

* Religious education and spiritual hijra

As a consequence of the development policy for the greater Northwest initiated in 2000, the flow of immigrants and money into the region has accelerated. In some nüxue in Linxia (Gansu), more than 80 per cent of the students stay in dormitories. Some, learning about the nüxue by word of mouth, come from distant parts of China. The highway route and the development of bus services have made it possible for girls to travel independently. Migrant workers—from the Northwest to the coastal region—send money to their parents in their hometown, and a part of this money is given as sadaqa to the mosques that govern nüxue for further development.[214]

China is not an Islamic country. In countries such as Malaysia and Saudi Arabia, the status of women is stipulated by Islamic family law, which is not always beneficial to women. However, in China, Muslim women are protected by national family laws that promote gender equality. If China applied Islamic family laws and criminal laws, permitted polygamy, and legitimized domestic violence towards wives in its predominantly Muslim regions—as is the case in some Muslim countries—Chinese Muslim women would probably strongly protest against them. In China, Muslim women are pleased to follow the Islamic ideals of equality between men and women and take advantage of both the Chinese laws or their knowledge of Islam.

After graduating from nüxue, most Muslim girls obtain employment. Moreover, even after marrying and having children, they may wish to continue to work. Based on their ‘mission’ to convey the Islamic spirit, exercises, and ethics, nüxue graduates aspire to the duality of being educators of their children or husbands at home and teachers and role models for Muslim girls in society.

Their way of life is a far cry from the one propagated by the conservative division of gender roles, which turns a blind eye to women’s ignorance and stresses absolute submission to the husband. It is also different from the Maoist and Western feminist calls for absolute ‘masculine’ gender equality, which supports equal opportunities for women and men, including the right to serve in the military. Nüxue women are aware of the fragility of their social status, and they thus strive for religious self-formation and self-esteem in order to change the situation from within the framework of Islam. In this context, nüxue can be assessed as a safety net, channel for communication, human network, and sisterhood, which provides women with the power to confront difficulties on their own.

Muslim women are at the forefront of Islamic feminism in China. Mir-Hosseini from Iran defines feminism as ‘women’s awareness of discrimination in family and in society’ and ‘actions to improve their life and change the situation’ (Mir-Hosseini, 1999: 40). Nüxue women represent such feminism. Their Islamic faith and knowledge enable them to convey alternative values: ‘non-masculine’ gender equality that appreciates women’s biological characteristics as given by Allah, criticism of traditional and oppressive patriarchy, and fierce competitiveness. At the same time, nüxue women understand the meaning of piety and modesty.

Although they provide opportunities that benefit Muslim girls, nüxue face various structural and societal problems. A nüxue is often not recognized as a valid academic institution. Moreover, in China, religious study tends to be regarded with prejudice by the majority of the population. All Chinese universities are secular, and while the knowledge of English is compulsory for taking exams, the knowledge of Arabic is not always appreciated in the academic-career based society. Some nüxue prohibit girls from having mobile telephones, accessing the Internet, and even watching television. In fact, some nüxue ban all men, including male religious leaders (ahongs), from their premises. Thus, educated in a purified culture and an ascetic atmosphere, many feel that female students may not have the opportunity to develop their critical thinking skills.

Moreover, a nüxue’s typical admonition, ‘Being a responsible mother is superior to all other social responsibilities,’ might be regarded as irrational by teenagers who wish to pursue a career and are still too young to seriously think of raising children. Additionally, it is likely that government inspection and censorship will become stricter because the religion-centered curriculum of a nüxue does not include Marxist and Deng Xiaoping indoctrination.

Having being deprived of education and social participation for a long time, Muslim women in China have currently pinned their hopes on nüxue. To avoid becoming entangled in the trap of male-centered Islamism, Muslim women must closely monitor the management and curricula of the nüxue and extend their willingness to work in the society and virtues to the public sphere.

* Conclusion

In this chapter, we have examined the ideals and realities of two types of schooling in contemporary China available to Hui women. One is secular public schooling and the other is nüxue, or Islamic religious, schooling. We described attempts made by the ahongs and Hui leaders to promote Islamic and secular education for Hui girls since the early twentieth century and at the beginning of the People's Republic of China. We also pointed out the partnership between ahongs and local Hui leaders in building public girls' schools in cooperation with the government after the Cultural Revolution ended. During this period, the CCP attempted to send Muslim girls to public schools, where religion-related matters were excluded from the curriculum. Helped along by the increase in the Party's administrative and monetary power, the vast majority of Hui girls now attend secular public schools.

It is crucial to understand how the spread of state schooling institutions changed the Hui girls who had lived in deprived conditions. State schooling enhanced their literacy and created new opportunities for them. Some became teachers at secular schools, able to support themselves and their families financially. Accordingly, their social status rose and they earned the respect of their community. In fact, they have become annoyed by the mental conflicts between their 'Muslimness' and secular identity.

On the other hand, the nüxue, established by religious authorities and local Hui leaders in the 1980s and 1990s as a supplementary educational institution, enabled illiterate or semiliterate girls to acquire Islamic knowledge, following a 30-year religious hiatus in the wake of the revolution of 1949. However, since the ratio of girls enrolled in secular public schools has reached almost 100 per cent since 2000, it would appear that the role of nüxue as providers of supplementary education has ended. The secular political power's victory over religious authorities in China is unequivocal.

However, nüxue have survived thanks to the options they offer to those who wish to continue their studies after the nine-year compulsory secular education—studying the essence of Islam and the raison d’être of their status as Hui and learning Arabic, which is believed to be the sacred language of Allah. Thus, nüxue serve as a safety net for poor and marginalized Muslim women and double as vocational training schools. At the same time, nüxue provide girls with a novel gender view that denies the official ‘masculine’ gender equality, which only aims to create excessive competition without imposing any conditions. The ‘new’ gender view stresses the ‘wise wife and good mother’ role in order to train women to be good educators of the next generation and to convey Allah’s messages to human beings. After understanding this new interpretation, they realize Allah’s will in bestowing womanhood upon them and thus take pride in their womanhood. In sum, nüxue empower Muslim women by encouraging them to build self-esteem and achieve self-affirmation.

The above-mentioned gender views on ‘essentialism,’ ‘motherhood,’ and ‘womanhood’ were the only means by which Hui women could re-evaluate and reform their fragile status. Such essentialism can be considered the strategy of the weak. Presently, the majority of the Han population is still dubious about the Hui because of their religion and their alleged relationship with Chinese separatists and Islamic extremists.

Given these circumstances, Muslim women in China have adopted Islamic feminism based on essentialism in an attempt to eliminate discrimination towards women and resist the patriarchy system. However, this requires that they retreat from the excessive competition prevailing in the current environment. Nonetheless, even though Islamic feminism appears to be different from Western feminism, previously muted voices for emancipation and development have prevailed, and Muslim women throughout China have been increasingly enthusiastic and active in this regard for a long time now. They believe that the contemporary nüxue education provides them with opportunities for emancipation. Their Islamic faith and piety make them feel empowered and contribute to their self-esteem. In defining feminism, we should not forget to take into account these women’s struggle for a better life and their utilization of the biological attributes of a woman in achieving that goal.

[200] The total population of Ningxia is 6,102,518, of whom 2,182,260 or 35.76 per cent are Hui (Ningxia Huizu Tongjiju, Guojia Tongjiju Ningxia Diaochadui, 2008: 79). They are concentrated in the Huangtu Plateau region in southern Ningxia, including counties such as Guyuan, Xiji, Haiyuan, Tongxin, and Jingyuan.

[201] Madrasas are schools where Hui and other Muslim nationalities are taught Islamic knowledge, particularly Arabic and the Qur’an, usually in addition to other secular education.

[202] Zhong-A nüxiao, Zhong-A nüxue, and Islamic nüxiao are other names of female madrasas. Nüxue means ‘female school.’

[203] Hajj Yusuf, Liu Jinglong, who was the vice president of the Ningxia Islamic Association, edited this text.

[204] Shimbo’s survey in Ningxia, 15 September 2002.

[205] Shimbo’s survey in Ningxia, 15 March 2000.

[206] Shimbo and Matsumoto’s survey in Ningxia, 2 September 2007.

[207] Shimbo’s survey in Ningxia, 20 August 2004.

[208] The ten-day workshops were organized by the Ningxia Educational Agency, the Soong Ching Ling Foundation of China, and the Soong Ching Ling Foundation of Japan. The aim was to train female teachers in the rural area of Ningxia to develop an understanding of the curricular reforms, as well as to improve their teaching and computer skills. About 120 female Hui teachers attended the workshops (Shimbo, 2007: 1–10).

[209] Shimbo and Matsumoto’s Survey at Yiwu, 25 December 2007.

[210] Shimbo and Matsumoto’s survey at Ningxia, 2 September 2005 and 4 September 2007.

[211] Some nüxue accept Uyghur students from Xinjiang, where the establishment of Arabic classes or mosques is under strict control. Some pious parents wish to send their children to Islamic schools in Ningxia and Gansu. In this sense, a nüxue has become a place in which to foster Muslim consciousness beyond the boundaries of ethnicity.

[212] Shimbo and Matsumoto’s interview with the principals (Ma Xiulan, Ma Chunxiang and Wang Zhongyi) of three nüxue in Linxia, 12 September 2006, 5 and 6 September 2007.

[213] His book, Jahiliyya of the Twentieth Century (Jahiliyat al-qarn al-‘ishrin), was translated into Chinese in the middle of the 1990s. Other very important books are those of Wahhabi Sulaiman, an Albanian Wahhabi Islamist, Muslim Women (n.d.) which were also translated in the mid-1990s by Ma Xiulan, the principal of the Linxia Muslim Women’s School that was discussed in this chapter.

[214] Shimbo and Matsumoto’s Interview with Ms. Ma Xinlan, the principal of the Weizhou Huizu Women’s Elementary School, 2 September 2007.

 6. Religious dependency in Afghanistan

Shia madrasas as a religious mode of social assertion?

Fariba Adelkhah

Spaces devoted to religious observance—mosques, madrasa and pilgrimage sites—have become major phenomena in our societies. They are diversifying and multiplying; they are also being updated, being made bigger and more in tune with modern tastes. With the help of demographic growth, the faithful are frequenting them in their millions. They sometimes provide shelter to politicians, and can in such cases be taken by storm, occupied or even destroyed, either by dissidents or believers from other faiths, or by the security forces.[215]

Accordingly, religious spaces are not homogenous, instead they constitute a likely field for social and political interests to grow and clash. This is not to deny their role in religious engagement, with its specificity or autonomous nature.

The debates, tensions and conflicts crystallized by the religious arena call into play not only its relations with the outside world, notably the West, to such an extent that some intellectuals forecast an inevitable ‘clash of civilisation’ (Badie, 1987; Lewis, 1988),[216] but also, and perhaps primarily, relations between Muslim believers themselves, besides the not so contemporary conflict between lay and religious intellectuals.[217] In this way, and although religion is undergoing massive changes in all its main institutions, madrasa are usually considered these days as entirely unyielding institutions, impervious to any kind of communication with the outside world, whereas they have always been in touch with modernity or the West—at least through schooling. In fact, the madrasa, as they can be observed today, are the fruit of both colonial times (and the para-colonial period in the case of Iran, Afghanistan and Iraq), to the extent that they simultaneously resisted and collaborated with colonial authorities (Sikand, 2005: 81, chap.3<nowiki>; Malik, 2008),</nowiki>[218] and of the Islamic awakening/resurgence notably in the years 1980–2000. They have always offered an opportunity for trans-ethnic or trans-national relationships by accepting students and scholars from different areas (Berkey, 2003: 208).

They are therefore not the embodiment of a timeless or centuries-long tradition, but rather of the political and religious change of which they are part (Zaman, 2002). In particular, they contribute to the redefinition of what is or is not religious, the delimitation of what one could, in reference to Bourdieu, call the ‘problématique légitime du religieux,’ or as it is called by Dale Eickelman (1979), ‘the political economy of the meaning,’ which is not an essence but is historically constructed (Bowen, 2003). For instance, the veil, the proscription of interest-paying loans and teaching, particularly of girls, only became relevant religious topics in the twentieth century, in a context characterized by social transformation in Muslim societies.

This chapter, a study of Shia madrasa in post-2001 Afghanistan based primarily on a field trip carried out in 2007, obviously does not pretend to cover the entire breadth of these changes (and exchanges). The Shia minority represented from 10 to 20 per cent of a total population of about 30 million Afghans. According to Shia sources, this percentage could range from 25 to 30 per cent![219] This study will leave aside the question of theology, its variations and its pundits, the ulama, to focus on the context of religious practices by which madrasa develop, without however postulating that these three pillars (theology, ulama and madrasa) do not influence each other. It is intended to put the internal logic prevailing in Afghan society into the context of that society’s regional and international environment in order to question the claims, aspirations, mobilization, and, last of all, the social dynamics that subsume the madrasa and their emergence as a key provider of education in Afghanistan. Madrasa give rise to impassioned feelings and political confrontation. Their evolution follows the twin dynamics that Georges Balandier (1974) termed ‘outside’ and ‘inside,’ in a neo-Leachian perspective. Indeed, madrasa, as crossroads where diverse social groups engage one with another—by dint of the educational services they provide—structure networks that allow intellectuals from a given area to interact with others outside.

The need to stress this point is heightened by the fact that the denunciation or the legitimization of religious schools easily puts on the margin ‘insider’ debates and conflicts opposing local religious authorities and secular intellectuals. That said, today’s discussions on the clash of civilizations curiously echo those that accompanied the emergence of secular schools in Muslim countries in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, depending on the country, at a time when clerics did not have any outsider rivals in the field of knowledge and when literacy was in any event only embryonic and obviously unequally shared. While Muslim intellectuals, religious or lay, insist on the diversity and openness of Islamic education as a religious experience, echoing classic work in the social sciences, it must be borne in mind that a powerful current of ideas, with its roots in lay and public teaching, was quick to seize on the madrasas' obscurantism and has unceasingly cast itself as a rival to or opponent of clerical institutions.[220] The picture becomes even more complicated if one adds the fury of clergies, with their load of fatwas, condemnations and even executions of lay intellectuals for the sake of protecting Islam. The most telling example is the attempt made to assassinate the great historian Ahmad Kasravi by Navvab Safavi, a cleric, in Iran in the spring of 1945.[221] In the other side of the border, in Afghanistan, in recent years, one could also cite charges brought against Ayatollah Mohammad Mohagheghnasab, a Shia cleric, in 2005, for having shown disrespect for Islam by questioning whether it was right to stone adulterous women or put thieves and apostates to death, or those made in 2003 against Mir Hossein Mahdavi, a journalist, after he wrote 'Religious fascism,' an article in which he criticized clerical institutions.[222] The complex nature of these debates should put some perspective on the inability of people to hear each other on the clash of civilizations. It is true that religious-inspired violence, through fatwas, was already a notable feature of Muslim societies, even before it moved outside the Muslim world and became the issue it is today. A case in point is the confrontation with the Bahai movement, which called for equal rights and education for men and women as early as the mid-nineteenth century. It is important to observe both these types of violence, in that they are so closely entwined and prolong international conflicts and might even strengthen the conflict between religious and lay people, in particular around the question of schooling. If we limit ourselves to the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, violence in the Muslim world comes across as being the result of pressure, either from Western military occupation, or from the centralization of the states themselves and their heightening compromising with European imperialism. The vigor of the resistance to Western intrusion has often drawn a veil over the violence used against some parts of Islamic societies, in the upheaval provoked by the new context. However, violence has not been the only response in the Muslim world to this change, namely modern education. There has also been a series of social and political innovations that have limited the scope of violence and brought about not only the collaboration between religious and modern education, which was later termed, in the Islamic Republic, the ‘union between hawza and university,’ but also the formation of hybrid intellectual groups following the two curricula, who later become known as ‘Islamic intellectuals,’ ‘Muslim intellectuals,’ or even ‘Islamists’ and are nowadays the most important component of the reformist movement (Kepel and Richard, 1990; Zeghal, 2008). In Iran, the best known among these intellectuals were Jala Al-e Ahmad, Mehdi Bazargan, Ali Shariati, Abdolkarim Soroush, Reza Davari, and Mostafa Malekian, who followed the teachings of great clerics including Allameh Tabatabai, Ayatollah Taleghani and Ayatollah Jafari. Modern education was initially called the ‘sciences of the day’ (ulum-i ruz),[223] as opposed to the religious sciences, which were considered part of the classical sciences. Therefore, it was not necessarily thought to be antagonistic to the religious sciences, but to complement them. As of the 1950s and 60s, whatsoever against the repressive environment that came in the wake of the coup against Mohammad Mosaddegh, or because of rivalry with the modern intellectuals,[224] lay religious people and clerics took the initiative of founding schools devoted to ‘sciences of the day’ (ulum-i ruz). The most renowned of these private educational institutions in Iran were Kamal (lit. Perfection, founded by Yadollah Sahabi, an eminent leader of the National Liberation Movement, who later became an advisor to Mehdi Bazargan, the head of the provisional government in 1979), Din-u Danish (lit. Religion and Science, founded by Ayatollah Beheshti, who was later the founder of the Islamic Republic Party in 1979), Alavi (lit. related to Imam Ali, founded by allama Karbasian, Ayatollah Boroujerdi’s student), Mufid (founded by Ayatollah Moussavi Ardebili in memory of Sheikh Mufid (c.948–1022 CE)) and Rifah (lit. welfare, founded under Hachemi Rafsandjani’s advice), which was attended by a large number of the leaders of the 1979 Revolution, and hence the leaders of the Islamic Republic. Some of them also taught in their youth, including Ayatollah Beheshti, Hojjatoleslam Bahonar, Ayatollah Motahhari, Aallameh Mohammad Taghi Jafari and the very conservative Ayatollah Mesbah Yazdi.[225] Symbolically, Ayatollah Khomeini took up residence in a girls’ school, Rifah, for few days when he returned to Tehran on 1 February 1979, before settling at Alavi’s School for security reasons.[226] This belief in a positive interplay between religious and lay education also exists in Afghanistan in that sense that Islamists have recruited in governmental schools and universities during the 1970s (Roy, 1985: 97), and, since 2001, madrasa are taking charge of building governmental schools to provide an equivalent to the necessary diploma to enter the University.

In any event, it is very important that we not get bogged down in the debate surrounding the supposed link between madrasa and violence, if only because most of the students who attend them, even Deobandis, do not resort to violence and because the Islamic school field is not synonymous with war, even holy war. Without citing the wealth of literature dealing with trends in madrasa, we would stress two findings that should help measure both the madrasas' complexity and vitality. On the one hand, they emphasize relationships—areas in which they compete and areas in which they complement each other—between religious schools and lay teaching. On the other hand, they show that religious teaching has responded in various ways to lay teaching, not only from one country to another, but also within a given country, within clerical institutions or between urban and rural areas.[227] It is not possible to stick simply with the 'reactive' view, namely the madrasas' 'response' to public schools. It would be more precise to speak of a 'configuration' (Elias, 1978) between them. Their links have changed depending on the time and the context. If religious and public schools need to be seen in the same light, this does not mean that they are identical and that they are not charting their own specific course. Similarly, the question of modernization cannot be brought down to the abstract question of its acceptance or rejection. It involves a contingent situation in which the plans in terms of which players define themselves, attitudes brought about by social change, the restructuring of hierarchies, the levels at which decisions are taken are multiple and to a great extent unforeseeable. What goes pompously by the name of modernity is no more than the result of such shake-ups.

It may be interesting here to draw a parallel with Catholic schools in western France, as brilliantly analyzed by historian Michel Lagrée, although naturally we would not imply that the reality of Shia madrasa can be compared to Catholic education in France. In order to meet the ideological and political challenge of the 1789 Revolution, the Church built a very dense school network that borrowed the teaching methods of the new public schools. Gradually, the school movement gave birth to new social institutions, ranging from the union of the Christian Youth Workers Movement (Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne) to the Christian Agricultural Youth association (Jeunesse Agricole Chrétienne), the Seamen's Education Movement, a very strong Catholic press and an active business movement. In the end these institutions pushed rural areas that were generally considered conservative to the left of the political spectrum (Lagrée, 1992). This is not to suggest that the madrasa are helping convert Afghanistan to social democracy. But the example of Brittany reminds us that God has indeed moved in mysterious ways throughout history and that religious movements are at the same time social movements, and must be studied as such. The logic of the connections between religions and politics is often paradoxical. For instance, Ernst Troeltsch, commenting on Max Weber, said that Protestantism encouraged capitalism 'in spite of itself and without knowing it' (Troeltsch, 1912).

In Afghanistan, Islamic teaching has also been combined with social, economic and cultural development, particularly with the development of modern schools in the twentieth century as well as with other transformations that are no less important: war, migration and the economic changes that accompany them, such as remittances, growth in the informal markets for goods and financial services, and even the increase in opium farming and the laundering of revenues derived from it. At the same time, it should be noted that the timeline favored by the Afghans themselves does not necessarily coincide with that used in the social sciences: for instance, the first rupture, for the madrasa, probably came as early as 1973, with Dawoud's coup against the reigning monarch,[228] five years before the communist coup against the regime in 1978, and the Soviet invasion which apparently did not interfere with religious observance by Shias. The period of the Jihad 'commanders,' after the Russian withdrawal, appears to have left more lasting scars than the Taliban regime, which it is generally agreed re-established a form of civil calm that was good for trade.

Even more fundamentally, madrasa have provided a melting pot. Granted, Shia madrasa foster a critical view of the 'West,' a term that in Afghanistan's historical context encompasses Russia via communism and the Soviet occupation, of sectarian pluralism in that Shiism is a minority in the country, of tradition or social conservatism; at the same time, they are tributary, through emigration, to the temporality of Dubai and its prosperity. Simultaneously, madrasa also contribute to the emergence or the re-establishment of a feeling of national belonging independent of ethnic or tribal descent. The religious reference comes across as a factor of de-ethnicization and de-tribalization. At the same time, religious practices have a complex relationship with ethnicity, tribalism and localism: for instance, they can foster the desire for autonomy and broaden the scope for political negotiation of the Shia Hazaras with respect to the Afghan state.[229] In this context, the religious convictions that the madrasa carry and dispense, and the ethical discussions that they foster, bring about a social confidence that helps to legitimize change and innovation. However, and as we expand on below, this social confidence does not come automatically. It should be built or built again as it is the outcome of complex interactions between the historical background of religious ideas/thoughts, the intermediaries or ulama and Muslim intellectuals, and the material means that support their influence. For instance the relations that Shia Afghan madrasa maintain with their Iranian counterparts, for historical as well as geographical reasons, play a crucial role and help place them, and legitimize them, in the national context. But schools are nothing these days without rational management and important financial support, which should be provided from different social groups. Therefore Afghan Shiism, which was entirely dependent on Iran's religious historical experience, is today as much dependent on former jihadists, who now make up the majority of religious school managers, and on migrants because of the important financial resources they remit. At different times these three features, as elaborated below, may be the conditions for success of madrasa that in turn provide in this case the political autonomy of Shia, notably Hazara, not only inside Afghan society but also toward his Iranian brothers. In that sense the Afghan historical dependence on Iran constitutes a strong political resource to make up for the Hazaras' inequality with the Afghan political system, dominated by the Sunnis, or, more exactly, the Pashtuns. Reciprocally, the Hazaras' inclusion in the Afghan political landscape allows them to distance themselves from Iran and the vilayat-i faqih's model. However, while keeping at bay the vilayat-i faqih concept, or partly because of that, Afghans like Imam Khomeini, endorse the pre-eminence of politics on religion, a stance that is neither proper to Iran, nor Islamic movements in the Arab world, as Olivier Roy underlined (1995: 101–105; 2002: 36).[230] This is the context that ensures the viability of the affirmation of Shiism in contemporary Afghanistan.

The madrasa are pivotal to this assertion. They respond to a need for religious expression. They fulfill an educative function that public schools are unable to fulfill. They embody a model of cultural, social and economic modernization that has notched up at least a few successes in neighboring Iran, where numbers of Shia Afghans have spent time over recent decades.

They open the doors to global knowledge, starting with English and computers. They give women the opportunity to make something of themselves.

 Pioneer Shia!

It is impossible to dissociate the place occupied by Shiism and Shia religious teaching in contemporary Afghanistan from Afghanis' representation of history. It gives rise to often-passionate accounts in which Shia Afghans willingly paint themselves as the victims. It is important to bear in mind the anachronistic nature of this view, if only because the distinction between Shia and Sunni Islam in its current configuration cannot be analyzed without reference to the formation of the nation-state, the crystallization of national consciences, and the institutionalization of the religious arena, notably the madrasa. Even today, overlaps are a lot more frequent than one may think, in ritual practice as well as in dogma. For instance, it is not uncommon to see sanctuaries frequented by the faithful of different denominations, such as those of Imam Reza in Mashhad, in Iran's Khorasan Province, or Sayda Zaynab in Syria. Despite the strongly held belief in Iran that Jamal al-Din al-Afghani was Shia, no one really knows whether he was Shia or Sunni;[231] similarly, the Saudis cannot really deny that Muhammad Ibn Abd ul-Wahhab, the founder of Wahhabism, was a regular attendee of Shia religious centers such as those in Najaf and Ispahan (Shoushtari, 1363/1984: 477). Even today, Afghan ulamas, in their desire to promote if not 'union' (vahdat), but at least 'rapprochement' (taqrib) and 'brotherhood' (ukhuvvat) between Muslim denominations, via the Council of Brotherhood,[232] focus paradoxically on looking for what differentiates them, following the traditional metaphor of the tree and its branches: the most important thing is the trunk, it being understood that each branch can be different, some longer or thicker, some with more or fewer flowers. It makes sense that an Ayatollah, Mohammad Assef Mohseni, should cite only the practice of temporary marriages as a factor that set the Shias apart from the Sunnis even though he is naturally aware of other differentiating factors that are not questions of law, but have to do with the convictions of the faithful as to the Prophet's descendants or their own experience. In truth, this in no way reduces the depth of the miscomprehension, animosity, or even conflict between people, nor the Shia claim (echoed by the Sunnis) to be the 'true defenders of tradition'

(sunnat), to quote the title of a book written by a Paris-based Tunisian author, Tidjani Tunissi (1383/2004), published in Qom and widely circulated in Afghanistan. But this brings us into the realm of what Freud termed the ‘narcissism of minor differences,’ historically constructed and, today, deconstructed by a reformist movement committed to contextualizing the divine word as it was taught by a man, the Prophet. Included in this movement in Iran are Abdolkarim Soroush, a secular intellectual, as well as Mojtahed Shabestari and Mohsen Kadivar, two clerics. Mohammad Mohagheghnasab is the main representative of this current in Afghanistan. In this respect one should not take too literally the discussion on Shiism: those who, in Afghanistan, cite distinctive or identifying factors in support of this claim do so less for reasons of religious hermeneutics or new well-argued speeches than because they are just repeating the same arguments as in the past.

Moreover, the history of Shiism in Afghanistan cannot be separated from a broader history of Islam, from the succession of kingdoms and empires in the region—especially the Moghol Emire, the Safavid domination over Herat and Kandahar into the eighteenth century and the rivalry between that dynasty and the Ottoman Empire—and from the imperial expansion of England and Russia, and then of the Soviet Union. We obviously cannot encompass this complex history in this chapter, but we will identify the stories to which it gave birth among Shia, and notably among the Hazara.

The most important point to note is the confusion that now exists between Shiism and the Hazara people, or the parallel that is drawn between them, and the fact that this association confirms the Hazaras’ feeling that they have been marginalized and victimized in Afghan society. So while the Hazara people may all be Shia,[233] it cannot be said that all Afghan Shia are Hazara nor that they have been persecuted. Also, the Qizilbash are Shia people according to common belief. There are also Pashtun Shia, just as there are Shia among the Sadat and Bayat peoples, and even among the Tajik (the Ismaili are also considered to be Shia, but stigmatized by the Twelvers, and surprisingly they are not considered Muslim by the Sunni). It should be remembered that the guards of the royal palace were Qizilbash. The basis for this parallel between Shiism and ‘Hazarism’ is the political, ethnic and agrarian conflict that prompted King Abdulrahman (1891–93) to chase the Hazara off their land in order to give it to the Pashtun tribes, bringing their rebellion to an end in a bloodbath and forcing them into exile or to emigrate due to their so-called Iranian origins, during the formation and centralization of the monarchy under the auspices of the British Raj (Kakar, 1979). This was followed by a dolorist narrative surrounding the ‘genocide’ of the Shia and the persecution of the Hazara, in the context or rivalry between the Afghani monarchy, supported by Britain, and the Qajar, gradually pushed out of Afghanistan, and then the context of contemporary ethno-nationalism which came to the fore between the two World Wars in Afghanistan, as in Iran and Turkey.[234]

The sources vary as to the date at which the Hazara people converted to Islam. Three historically distinct moments are generally cited. Some say that Shia Afghans converted when Islam first penetrated the region, through Herat, by bowing before Ali as Caliph (35–40 AH).[235] Others date their conversion to the thirteenth century, under the Mongol empire of the Ilkhanate and the persecution of the Sadat, the Prophet’s descendants, in the Khorasan Province and their exile to Afghanistan, in the region of Ghowr, the contemporary Hazarajat. The predominant view is that the conversion to Shiism coincided, as it did for Iran, with the foundation of the Safavid Empire, in the sixteenth century, which expanded its sovereignty to Kandahar. [236]</sup> Sayed Askar Mousavi (1985) suggests that these three moments should be seen together and that they are not mutually exclusive. He does, however, stress that Afghanistan was the land of asylum of Shia persecuted in Iran, particularly at the outset of the Abbasid Caliphate, in the eighth century. In his view, this means that Shiism in Afghanistan can be traced back to a period before the Ilkhanate and the Safavid and that the refuge of the Sadat in Afghanistan suggests the presence of other faithful. Whatever the truth may be, all these authors agree that the Hazara and the Shia should be seen in the same light and that the marginalization of the Hazara people in Afghanistan’s political history should be interpreted as the expression of the religious domination of the Pashtun tribes, Sunni by a large majority. The Dawoud government and the revolutionary period prior to the Soviet intervention in 1979 were too brief to usher in any real or lasting change in the position of the Hazara and/or the Shia. In contrast, the anti-Soviet Jihad drew the Shia—mainly the Hazara—into the resistance and into the national political landscape.

According to various testimonies, it was not until the 1940s, when Seyed Mir Ali Ahmad Hojjat (1268–1353/1889–1974) was elevated to the rank of Ayatollah[237] and built a hoseynieh in Chindawul, in the outskirts, at that time, of Kabul, and rehabilitated an old mosque, Ghazi Chehab, that the Shia call to prayer was made for the first time and that the denomination came out of its taqiya (dissimulation) and Shia practices began to express themselves openly.[238] Since this time, the celebration of Nawruz, in Ziyarat-i Sakhi, a sanctuary dedicated to the Imam Ali located in Ali Abad, in the Kabul suburbs, gives Shia their main cause to pray in public, their hands open, prostrating with their foreheads touching a small earth stone from Karbala (Safdari, 1384/2006 :74–75; Muassisih-i amuzishi-i imam Khomeini, 1980/2001: 63–66). Even today, Shia remember a time when they were obliged to camouflage their funerals and renounce public mourning processions, during which they would have had to recite the call to prayer in accordance with the customs of their denomination.[239] Expressions such as ‘Hazara sitizi’ (Hazara phobia) and ‘Shia kushi’ (genocide of the Shia) spring to the lips or the pens of Afghans when they want to express the sentiment of frustration and marginalization felt by the Shia. Since the overthrow of the Taliban regime, the Shias have seen an improvement in their political and legal situation. Contrary to the 1964 Constitution, the 2003 Constitution gives Shia the right to be elected president and, since 2009, will allow the use of Jafari fiqh for questions relative to personal law (ahwal-I shakhsiyya),[240] as long as all parties are Shia—but not for business, commercial or penal law.

 A revolution in education (1979–2007)

It is against this historical backdrop and in the light of this dual marginalization, ethnic and denominational, that the growth of Shia religious schools in Afghanistan should be seen. In the last thirty years, this growth has been marked by the conjunction of three events, all different in nature but in fact closely bound together: the Jihad against Soviet occupation and the subsequent civil war; emigration to Iran, Pakistan, the Gulf States or the West; and the Islamic Revolution in Iran in 1979. In 2001, a fourth event added itself to this list: the US intervention, which in theory at least put an end to ethnic or denominational discrimination. Sticking to the period prior to this, religious authorities of all denominations were active against the Soviet Union and participated in the resistance by encouraging the faithful answer the call to fight. They also obtained financial and logistic support from other Muslim countries, including Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Iran, and from various autonomous Muslim political bodies in these countries as well as in Algeria, Egypt and Palestine. A new social category, that of Jihad fighter, gradually emerged. This category partially transcended ethnic or denominational consciences and represented in a sense a generational phenomenon, even though the Jihad brought together fighters of different ages and prompted criticism or even hostility among the younger generation, which accuse the Jihad fighters of having blood on their hands and of having enriched themselves at the expense of the Afghan population with the war and foreign aid. (However the Modjahedins are still the majority of the new Parliment elected in September 2010).

Forced emigration left Afghan refugees with three options: camps in Pakistan; the most accessible economic opportunity, specifically in Iran or the Gulf States; or the traditional path out of the country, namely religious instruction in Mashhad or Qom. Lastly, the fact that the resistance and this wave of emigration coincided with the founding of the Islamic Republic and the development of religious schools in Iran made Persian-speaking and Shia Afghanis the prime beneficiaries or the natural users—at least until 2003, when Teheran implemented a more or less coercive policy of sending Afghani refugees or immigrants home (Adelkhah and Olszweska, 2007)—of the culture and institutions for promoting faith that sprang up there. These three moments allowed Afghan Shiism to return to its historical roots, and also to foster its singularity in a paradoxical manner, marking its contemporary destiny: dependence on Iran but also a trend towards autonomy in relation to Iran; reinforcement of localism and specificity under the guise of religious claims; and the defense of Afghan nationalism. The following pages try to shed light on the ambivalent trend of the religious school in Afghanistan. While they much imitate them in many regards concerning Islamic education and curriculum, Afghans also claim that they are by essence different from Iranian and do not for instance have to follow the concept of vilayat-faqih. This description indeed confirms the point made by Sabrina Mervin (2008) when she stressed that Iran is still a very effective test case for the Shiite world, though they do not obey and follow the same rules and regulations.

Shiite religious education in Afghanistan is dispensed in a variety of institutions: mosques, hoseynieh, madrasa, maktab, hawza, zeynabieh, markaz, universities, and in one case, in a private house which is the property of the founders, a couple (the establishment is associated primarily with Ms Shahin’s name). There are 17 main institutions in Kabul, half of which were founded after the fall of the Taliban[241] (see Figure 6.1). These institutions were created by religious authorities, both clerical and lay. Political authorities, and particularly, Senator Ghorbanali Erfani, a member of parliament, have recently taken the initiative of establishing religious institutions in Dashti Barchi, a poor area in order to aid in their development, notably the west of Kabul which shelters predominantly Shia neighborhoods. Afghan emigrants (principally those living in Iran, Pakistan and Australia) are also keen to build up religious centers, which are managed remotely, both through intermediaries and thanks to modern telecommunications and/or regular trips.

[[s-k-sakurai-keiko-and-fariba-adelkhah-the-moral-ec-19.jpg][Figure 6.1 Shia places of worship and religious institutions in Kabul]]

For instance, Mohammad Javad Rajabzadeh and Ms Hemmati set up the Quran wa Itrat, Scientific and Cultural Institute, initially in Mashhad, in 1990, originally reserved exclusively for Hazara. They took it to Herat in 1992 after the victory of the Mudjahidin but in the face of the difficulties they encountered, they quickly put the Herat branch on ice before reactivating it in 2004 after the Taliban regime was overturned. The Institute has four departments: a religious school for men, Madrasa Ilmiyya-i Baqyyatalla; a religious school for women, Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Itratiyyih; the Koran school; and the local school, which is not for profit, even though it is compulsory to pay school fees. Two thousand people are enrolled at the Institute. Similarly, hojjatoleslam Mohammad Hossein Jafari, who spends part of the year in Mashhad, opened the Maktab Nargues in Kabul, which has two branches, one in Mazar-i Sharif (Maktab-i al-Zahra) and another in Kondouz (Maktab-i Hazrat-i Khadijah)[242]. After immigrating to Iran, where he founded his first school, Madrasa Ghaed, in the Silo quarter in Mashhad, before being opened to all Afghans, Ayatollah Sajedi subsequently went to live in New Jersey, in the United States, at the request of the local Afghani community, after first leaving the management of his school in Mashhad to his brother. Once firmly ensconced in the United States, he opened a Zeynabieh in Karta-i Char, in the Shia area of Kabul. As for Chindawul’s Hoseynieh, it was re-established by the nephew of Ayatollah Hojjat, who lives in Australia. More broadly speaking, the role of the World Centre for Islamic Sciences in Qom deserves to be emphasized. Most of the founders or managers of these institutions passed through this Centre. The list includes Mr Rajabzadeh, Ms Hemmati, Mr Jafari and Mr Rezazadeh, the manager of the Koran teaching schools at the Quran wa Itrat Institute.

Funding of Shiite religious education is provided by resources collected during the Jihad against the Soviets, money raised by émigrés and those affected by the Diaspora, the Islamic Republic of Iran, business donations, religious taxes collected by Ayatollahs Kaboli, Mohseni and Salehi, not to mention the Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, whose main Afghani interlocutor appears to be the old Ayatollah Moghaddasi, who has never set foot outside his country, and finally financial gifts from the faithful. The salient point here is the crucial importance of remittances sent by émigrés and refugees, or, more broadly, the Diaspora, in financing the madrasa. This is not exclusive to Afghanistan, but the phenomenon is possibly a lot greater there than in other countries. As it happens, virtually all the Shia schools I have seen are run by people who have lived, or are still living, abroad. It is impossible to dissociate the madrasas' political economy from import–export activities, the hawala system and, in all likelihood, the laundering of various revenues accumulated in the informal economy. Two questions remain on this topic. Why are the madrasa more suited to laundering than other activities, commercial or industrial for instance? And what are the social remittances that accompany financial remittances, in accordance with logics that have been described well in other migratory contexts (Levitt, 2001)? Although not able to provide a full answer to these two questions, we would like to elaborate on the moral economy of those madrasas that succeed to respond to social demands.

 Madrasa, a response to social demand

Religious education comprises two degree courses: the first, generalist and preliminary, is called Darulquran (the home of the Koran). Its purpose is focused on guidance (irshad) or on doctrinal propaganda (tabligh) but, in reality, because of the dearth of public schools and access to instruction, it provides education. The second is theological (hawza or madrasa) and it addresses educated believers who are, increasingly, subjected to bureaucratic rules like the possession of a high-school diploma, passing entrance exams and/or having to sit exams regularly throughout the school year.

It is impossible to assess the exact number of students studying in Shia religious schools due to the lack of statistics. First, most schools do not keep accurate records of those registered, even in well-known schools; second, teaching methods are traditional, which means there are neither exams nor regular roll-calling in some of these schools. Finally, women are not yet included in the statistics. Nevertheless, thanks to the recent bureaucratization, and notably to the foundation of Kabul's religious school on 2002 (Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Kabul), following the Iranian model (Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qom), we know that there were 978 males registered as religious students (talabih) in October 2007—or rather, we know that 978 male students were entitled to receive a monthly grant. They were studying mainly at Hawza-i Risalat, Madrasa-i Madinatulilm, Madrasa-i Jamiatulislam, Madrasa-i Muhammadyyih, Hoseynieh Qala Fathullah. Another 1,000 or so students are studying in similar courses in other cities like Herat, Mazar Sharif, Daikondi, Ghazni and Kandahar.[243] In contrast, the number of female students studying in religious schools but not provided with a monthly grant due to the fact that they do not pass the obligatory exams to evaluate their abilities remains unknown, although we do know that 300 of them study at the khadijatalkubra school, the female branch of Khatamulnabyyin.

Students generally come from poor areas and/or rural families; for this reason, many of them board at the school where they are studying. However, and since 2001, a few of them, notably those who used to be emigrants to Iran, come from urban backgrounds, and they belong to the merchant class. The female students are unusual, in that many of them come from emigrant backgrounds (living notably in either Iran or Pakistan) and that the great majority, due to the lack of boarding facilities, hail from urban areas—which in this case study means Kabul. The important point is that an increasing number of students now come from émigré communities. For instance, it appears that most of the students of the Khadijatalkubra School, the female branch of Khatamulnabyyin, as well as numerous boys attending various establishments, who had to leave Iran under pressure of the government, are seeking to finish their studies and to obtain a diploma that would be recognized there, allowing them to return legally as students. Migrants increasingly represent a social category in themselves, which transcends the traditional split between rural and urban categories, or between ethnic and denominational differences. The madrasa, which, as we have seen, they help finance, are an Islamic way in which to gain social advancement.

Although religious motivations are usually cited to explain a student's decision to study at a religious school, other strategies cannot be ruled out, including social or professional advancement through subsidized or free education and grants. The fact is that religious education is increasingly being used to gain qualifications and to allow access to university education.

As we will see, the links between religious instruction and lay school are clearer in Afghanistan than in Iran, where there is a large measure of differentiation between the two types of teaching, even though the Hawza has adopted a university-style organization and can demand that its diplomas be seen as the equivalent of a university degree. It is revealing that a single parliamentary commission is responsible for religious, cultural, educational and university affairs in Afghanistan, under the chairmanship of Hazara Jihad fighter Mohammad Mohaghegh.

Unfortunately, my fieldwork did not help me to discover more about the non-religious motivations of the students; it was difficult to get beyond the stereotypes and clichés of their religious ones. Nevertheless, it seems that students, both men and women, who have a mastery of the Koran are very much in demand during the religious months of the Islamic calendar, Muharram and Ramadan. They run prayer meetings and vigils, not only in their own neighborhoods, but also in other neighborhoods and even other cities. As such, and as in other Muslim countries, religious education is feeding other strategies like social ascension and fame. And in the context of the development of public schools in Afghanistan, religious schools have become one of the primary sources of teaching staff. Moreover, because of the rivalry and the on-going dialogue existent between different religious denominations in contemporary Afghanistan, the increasing prominence of women on the religion scene appears to be another tool for the Shiite community to assert its progressive outlook in regard to that of the Sunni. The presence of girls in the madrasa must be seen in the context of migration: their local implantation and the flexibility of their administration allow religious schools to facilitate the insertion of young girls who attended school abroad when they return to Afghanistan, the recognition of courses or diplomas giving them entry into public schools; in addition, the Iranian model under which girls attend school becomes an important reference for families that have spent time in the Islamic Republic and for their extended families in Afghanistan.

Two points need to be underlined. First, most of the founders of religious establishments were Jihad fighters and spent some time in Iran or in Pakistan throughout the war that started in 1979. Second, the Shia religious schooling institutions have witnessed the growing ascendancy of a new category of relatively young managers, who share the latter's background. Taking into account my fieldwork, the kin or clientelist ties between the young managers and the founders, who usually are older and have fewer bureaucratic skills, reduce the possibility of conflicts between them. Moreover, both categories are made up of people who are generally used to traveling outside the country, especially in Iran, Pakistan and Germany.

Shia religious teaching seems to meet a genuine social demand rather than satisfying a taste for theological speculation or mysticism, although a few people do require this aspect to be taught. There is more synergy between the Shia religious institutions and the public or secular schooling institutions than competition. This is especially true for the latest created institutions, the Shia religious schools provide the students with courses that deal with matters beyond religion and intend to contribute to the overall education of the society. Hawza-i Ilmyya-i Khatamulnabyyin would like to be seen as a genuine university and agreements are currently being prepared allowing the students of Maktab-i Nargues to have their degrees recognized, to apply to the Afghan Ministry of Education, and in Iran to the World Centre of Religious Sciences, which has full university status. In the same way, 500 religious students in Hawza-i Kabul obtained a school diploma by being granted an equivalent, thus to be able to pass an exam to enter the University. Therefore more than 150 students follow the two courses, one at the University and the other at Hawza since 2006–2007.

In the same way and in a context characterized by an official acknowledgement of Shiism after the American military intervention and the establishment of the Karzai administration, the Shia educational sector entertains warm relations with the current political authorities: Ayatollah Salehi, founder of the Risalat School, was appointed special presidential adviser for Islamic affairs in 2007; Ayatollah Sheikh Assef Mohseni, founder of the Khatamulnabyyin, was honored by the Academy of Sciences in 2006; Ayatollah Mohaghegh Kaboli, founder of Jamiatulislam, obtained the state's financial commitment to build a new school in 2006.

We must now turn back to the madrasas' political and moral economy as centers of social change. It may be worthwhile to compare Afghani madrasa with the interest-free loan funds (qarzul hasanih) that developed in Iran even before the 1979 Revolution and which have prospered since then. These institutions obviously had a religious and charitable dimension, but also contributed to the penetration of banking services in Iranian society, at a time when a large part of the population did not have access to the modern banking system. From this point of view, they were relatively similar to savings and loan institutions or the monte di pietà. Given the amounts they collected and the loans they made, they helped society become less dependent on the state and restore the exchange value of money. Similarly, the Afghani madrasa by definition dispense religious teaching and remain faithful to the Timurid tradition of charity that is attached to them according to Said Amir Arjomand (1999): under the waqf in Islamic law, they previously had various other charitable works attached to them, such as orphanages, hospitals or caravanserais; today, they continue to welcome people, lodging and supporting students from rural families, housing orphanages and carrying out the bathing and enshrouding of the dead. But the madrasa also increasingly have a money-earning dimension. While money cannot be charged for teaching the Koran,[244] this is not the case for English or computer skills, and these revenue sources are all the more appreciable that it is hard to determine the true value of this type of service. The madrasa also rent out rooms for family meetings for various important occasions (funerals, return from pilgrimage—but not yet for weddings) or for major religious festivals (Ashura, Ramadan). This was taken to its extreme by the Khatamulnabyyin in Kabul, which in 2008 opened an international conference centre with booths for interpreters, sound and projection systems that not even the government had, and which it will now be able to use. In short, the madrasa are located at the junction of the religious field, welfare and accumulation, or from another perspective the sacred, social economy (not for profit) and entrepreneurial activities. In this way, they stem, through their independence relative to the government, from civil society as well as from what goes by the term ‘development,’ without this prejudicing their orientation or the effectiveness of what they provide. The madrasa are today an undeniable force in favor of schooling, their constellation is one of the articulations between migrants and their homeland, and they have become a factor for urban development, in the western part of Kabul, for instance, where places like Pul-i Sokhta, Karta-i Seh and Dasht-i Barchi have benefited from investments in Shia religious schools and the capacity of the Risalat school to have the road linking two predominantly Hazara districts, namely Qala-i Shada and Qala-i Wazir, sealed.

 Afghan Shiism in position of religious dependence

The Afghan current religious arena and especially its Shia component, has been reframed through three different moments: first, the jihad against the Soviet Union that provided an opportunity to get huge funding and pushed the commanders to behave as religious authorities wanted (some commanders being first religious authorities); second, the migration of five to six million Afghans, who subsequently sent home remittances and also promoted back home new social behavior and know-how (thanks to these aspects, many socio-ethnic categories—including Shia—were able to improve their daily life); third, the emergence due to the American intervention and the new political process, of new actors and new political references that have legitimized the acceptance of religious and ethnic pluralism and created new opportunities for female emancipation.

From this viewpoint, Afghan Shiism is in a very peculiar situation. As we have seen, having been marginalized and segregated since the early nineteenth century, it was unable to construct its own institutions and became dependent on Najaf and later Qom, in terms of both human resources and financing. The main sources of imitation (marja-i taqlid) for its believers were Hakim, Khoi and today Shirazi and Sistani. Imam Khomeini also had his supporters. From 1994 onwards, the Supreme Leader, Ali Khamenei, has offered himself as the marja-i taqlid for non-

Iranian Shia, including those living in Afghanistan (Adelkhah, 1995). Nowadays, Ayatollah Assef Mohseni intends to make Kabul inherit the Najaf and Qom periods. However, one must acknowledge the fact that this attempt at radical reform or renewal seems to rely heavily on the Iranian model of religious teaching, which is increasingly focused on its specialized sections and increasingly bureaucratized in order to improve its efficiency and to allow it to rise to the demands of the modern world, if Islamic. Moreover, while 978 theology students are registered in Kabul, more than 8,000 Afghans follow the same syllabus in Iran, according to official figures provided by Ayatollah Kaboli's office in Qom, in 2007; yet the latter figure is very likely underestimated, and one should add the students who have no grants—in particular women—and those who have no legal clearance to stay in Iran. The only two clerics who can be considered as marja-i taqlid, Ayatollah Fayyaz and Mohaghegh Kaboli, prefer to stay in Najaf for the former and Qom for the latter. There, they could enjoy a larger audience than in Kabul where students have in their view not yet reached a high enough level. Incidentally, most of the Afghans responsible for Shia religious institutions stay alternatively in the two countries and have settled their family in Iran, in Qom, Shiraz, Mashhad, Karadj or Teheran, which is a way to remind us that academic nomadism is not a secular privilege (Roy, 2002: 60). They just follow the example provided by other sections of the Afghan Shia political and economic elites. In any event, most of the latter have been trained in the Iranian educational system, either public or religious. The figure of 8,000 students should be seen in this context. Iran is not only one of the main contributors to Afghan Shia education, but also provides it with most of its teaching materials; books, cassettes, CDs, syllabus, teachers and lecturers. Afghanistan's dependency on Iran still functions beyond the Afghan borders and in the Diaspora. The places of worship and religious centers visited by Afghan expatriates in Europe, in Hamburg or Frankfurt, or in the USA, in New Jersey, are led by Afghans trained in Iran. In the Iranian Republic itself, Afghan students or lecturers have not been able to organize themselves in an autonomous way, as Arabs did: there is only one Afghan religious school in Mashhad, the Ghaem School, supervised by Ayatollah Jayyed Sajedi, and another for girls, the Itrat va Quran Centre, supervised by Hojjatoleslam Rajabzadeh, which moved to Herat in 2004 but still has a branch in Mashhad.

In this historical context, particular importance should be given to the Abbasgholi school in Mashhad and the World Centre for Islamic Sciences in Qom, whose influence extends beyond the sole sphere of religion. We have seen how the latter is a major source for the training and recruiting of founders or managers of madrasa. In addition to that, numerous members of the Afghan elite attended them: these include Justice Minister Sarvar Danesh; two of the four parliamentarians from Bamian; two of the 17 parliamentarians from Herat; one parliamentarian from Kabul, Qazni, Sar-i Pul; governors and mayors, including that of Bulkhab; and, of course, academics.

Founded at the end of the seventeenth century by Abbasgholi khan Biglarbeygi in Mashhad and located at the start of Navvab Safavi Street (formerly known as Pain khyaban) in the Tullab quarter, which is also home to the famed Afghan Bazar, the Abbasghol school has been attended, at least since the end of the nineteenth century—we do not have sources for the period before this—by Afghan Shia students, providing a launching pad towards Najaf or, especially since 1922, Qom (Pasandideh, 1385/2006). It was a vital channel in the training of the Afghan clergy as well as the intellectual elite that were behind the country's political and religious movements, as well as its literary circles. It was the alma mater of Allameh Seyed Esmail Balkhi, born in Bulkhab, in Jozjan (1295–1347/1916–1968), the founding father of the modern Islamic movement to which we owe the revitalization of the alliance between Shias and Sunnis; Allameh Modarres Afghani (1284–1365/1905–1986), born in Kharbid, in Jaghouri, a highly respected professor of Arabic literature, who taught at Najaf and Qom; Ayatollah Sheikh Mohammad Eshagh Fayyaz (1314– /1935–), born in Sobeh, in Ghazni, one of the two greatest surviving students of Ayatollah Khoi, who lives in Najaf; Ayatollah seyed Sarvar Vaez Behsoudi (1295–1358/1916–1979), born in Behsoud, the director of Kabul's oldest religious school; Mohammadiyih Abdul Ali Mazari (1326–1373/1947–1995), originally from Balkh, founder of the Nasr Organization and leader of the vahdat (unity) party, founded in 1368/1989. It was also the focus of the main Shia political organizations in the Afghani Jihad movement, including Nasr Organization, Pasdaran-i Jihad, Harakat-i Islami (of Ayatollah Assef Mohseni), the unity party, as well as other cultural or religious institutions, including the Bureau of Afghan Literature, whose members, except Kazem Kazemi, were all Talabih, or the Durr-i Dari Institute, which publishes the journal Khatt-i Sivvum (literally The Third Line) (Olszewska, 2007).[245]

Last of all, one must not forget the role played by the city of Qom in the formation of intellectual Afghan circles,[246] politicians,[247] or even religious reform movements,[248] without forgetting the contribution made by Afghan students to the Iranian revolution, often serving as couriers between Najaf and Qom in the 1970s, as they were not under the same amount of surveillance by SAVAK (National Intelligendce and Security Organization).

Afghanistan's Shia religious dependency on Iran seems irreversible, especially since Afghan students and lecturers settled in Iran are unlikely to go back to their homeland, as job opportunities there are too few. Inexorably, the Iranian model asserts itself in Afghanistan through the religious schooling institutions and other forms of bureaucratization of the religious arena such as associations, Islamic NGOs, publications, boards of religious institutions. However, the success of the Iranian model is encountering resistance, bypasses or reinvention by Afghan religious actors. On the one hand, the Iranian model is prompting reactions of refusal and annoyance because of nationalistic feelings. On the other, it is creating social dynamics and social movements that cannot be reduced to the Iranian influence and has allowed the inclusion of the Afghan Shias in the state, an unprecedented phenomenon.

 Religious differentiation as a national frontier

Shia Afghans—as others—prefer not to use Persian expressions coming from Iran, sometimes going so far as to substitute terms taken from English: driver, engineer etc.! They criticize people who return after spending time in Iran for their Iranian accent or the way in which they dress. The simple fact of having an Iranian accent can keep people off Tamaddon, a Shia television network controlled and funded by Ayatollah Mohseni, who is keen to mark his autonomy with respect to Qom and Tehran, despite the fact that he continues to live there part of the time. And as we have seen earlier, note 28, Mohammed Hossein Jafari was not able to legally register his religious school under the name of Maktab Najris (because too close to the Iranian model) and had to modify its name in Maktab Nargues to make its activity fully legal. Shia Afghans hide their relations with Iran or the aid they receive from there. They express their rancor at having been marginalized, or even looked down upon, during their stays there. ‘The Iranians do not want us as teachers, only as students. It is not the same for Arabs, who are given classes to teach’, said Afghan students in Qom.[249]

But there is more to the problem than just frustration. The head of the Khadijatalkubra religious school, the female section of Khatamulnabyyin, expressed the discomfort felt by Shia Afghanis in their relations with Iranians:

Foreign students following the teaching of the Hawza are fed up with reading about or sitting exams on questions like The origins of the Islamic Revolution or The testament of Imam Khomeini. We want to learn and gain a better understanding of Islam, but all we get in Iran is tabligh (propaganda). What we need most of all is our independence. The Iranians go on and on about the hijab, but they don’t respect it. We don’t want to wear the chador, and especially not the Iranian one, we prefer our hijab. The maqnaih, as a souvenir, OK, but not as national dress. Young Afghan women need to cast it off. What Afghanistan needs is unity, in two areas: between Sunnis and Shias; between universities and religious schools. We don’t want to export the Iranian Islamic Revolution. Imam Khomeini was the Guide of the Iranian people, not ours. We don’t want to be a mouthpiece for an authority that is not ours, we want to remain independent. (Interview with author at Khatamulnabyyin in Kabul, 2007).

Words like this show that the Iranian situation is a problem at three levels: the fact that Shia Afghanis are in the minority, with at least 80 per cent of the population being Sunnis; the fact that they need to deal with the government which is more or less dominated by Pashtuns, who are also Sunnis; the fact that they do not share the conception of modernity that prevails in Iran, despite being big consumers—in the fields of architecture and urbanism for instance—and that they also depend on other references, including the West, beginning with England for obvious historical reasons. The theory of vilayat-i faqih crystallizes this distancing with respect to Iran: ‘It bears in itself its own limits. While the vilayat-i faqih signifies the structuring of a Shia society, it is impossible to see it without defining one’s interests and priorities. And the interests of Afghan society are not the same as those of Iranian society,’ said the head of the Risalat school. ‘This year, we followed Iran in celebrating the end of the holy month of Ramadan, but if an Ayatollah from Afghanistan had seen the moon, we certainly would not have done so, and we would have avoided the problems this raised. It is not in the interests of Shia Afghan society to be dependent on Iran.’ (In 2007, the press was very critical of the Shia clergy’s reliance on Iran, a charge quickly taken up by Shia intellectuals.) Similarly, pro-reform jurist Abdulghayoum Sajjadi, a member of parliament representing Ghazni, a political scientist and a former student of the World Centre of Religious Sciences in Qom said:

We wanted to avoid adopting the Iranian system, and specifically the Guardian Council of the Constitution responsible for vetting laws to ensure they comply with Islam. In Afghanistan, there is no need for a law to comply with Islam, as long as it doesn’t contradict Islamic principles. A supervisory commission elected by parliamentarians from within Parliament should deal with this, but everyone, including the President, agrees that this is a matter for the judicial power. We wanted to avoid the presence of a body that would hinder the work of Parliament.[250]

As we have seen, the singularity claimed by Afghan Shia stems mainly from their minority status. Bearing this in mind, what they seek to highlight is ishtirakat, characteristics they share with the Sunnis: the Koran, the Prophet and the Kaba, obviously, but also the fundamental principles, the Oneness of God (tawhid), the Prophethood (Nubuvvat) and Day of Judgement (Maad). Shia Afghans, with the experience gained in Iran (or thanks to Iran) and the fact that this allowed them to cast off their minority condition, consider themselves to be the privileged messengers of union (vahdat) and brotherhood (ukhuvvat). They gather books, hold debates and draw up institutions preparing the road to rapprochement (taqrib), such as the Council of Brotherhood. But the desire for unity is probably less religious than it is national, in a society that is still traumatized by denominational discrimination and civil war. From this perspective, the US intervention was a veritable blessing, on the one hand by overthrowing the Taliban, who are Sunni and suspicious of any form of social mobilization, and on the other hand promoting political correctness favorable to multi-denominationalism. Dr Mohseni, brother of Ayatollah Mohseni and the executive manager of the Khatamulnabyyin project, who lived in Iran for 30 years, for a long time working for the Reconstruction Crusade, says: ‘We are not afraid of anyone and we want to discuss our convictions even with atheists.’ In the face of ethnic demands and the rise of specificities, the Khatamulnabyyin school is aiming to become a tribune for competency and tolerance:

We do not want to go to war with all and sundry. The world will never be united. We are here to tell the Sunni that the Shia are not demons. Our school does not want to be a strictly religious establishment. It is a university of theological, social and economic science. Some books published in Pakistan are badly presented and describe us as infidels to our Sunni brothers. We do not want to practice our religion in secret. Since the adoption of the Constitution, which recognizes Shiism as it is and as the foundation of our personal rights (ahwal-i shakhsiyya), we have sought to make a public and official call for dialogue with our Sunni brothers. We want to be a meeting place for opinions of all sorts. We want to have exchanges with the outside world and send students abroad, to France for instance. We have used the expertise of many people, Americans for the library, Iranians for building design, and we are probably going to hand catering over to the French, as we have to feed 2,000 people on a daily basis.[251] We want to know and be known. We do not want to convert people to Islam, as no one can change our religion. We just want to live together.

The national dimension of this ecumenical and inter-religious dialogue comes out clearly when Dr Mohseni acknowledges that Iranians have ‘a certain intelligence when they have to define the boundaries between their own interests and national interests: … Iranians never stop complaining, but in time of crisis they stick together and support the state.’ His brother, Ayatollah Mohseni, the founder of the Khatamulnabyyin school, which he is building to plans by Iranian architects and the library of which benefited from the support of the Astan-i Quds,[252] regularly visits Islamic centers in Qom. He had no qualms about protesting to the clergy in the holy city following the publication of books that could have prompted discord with his Sunni brothers: his fear was that these works, if they came across the border, could lead to bloodshed and could ruin efforts made by the Islamic Republic of Iran to forge closer ties, and he warned against a possible crackdown in Iran itself, where the majority of Sunnis are losing patience about the discrimination they are suffering; he demanded that all copies of these books should be recalled.[253]

Getting Shia Afghans out of their minority situation will require interdenominational emulation at the same time as the breaking-down of barriers between religious instruction and university teaching. The Khatamulnabyyin requires new students to have a secondary school diploma recognized by the Education Ministry, and now has the right to award both bachelor's and master's degrees, as well as doctorates. Its staff will readily tell you that the authorities consider it as a university, and that it receives funding from American and British money received during the Jihad, as well as from khums and zakat collected from the faithful. This means it is founded on a dual paradox: the West is financing an Islamic school, and the Muslim faithful an establishment with claims to being a university. In the same vein, the grandson of Ayatollah Mohseni, Javad Mohseni, head of the Tamaddon TV network and a former student of the American University of Beirut, says that a talabih must demonstrate not only religious sensibility, but also the will to gain scientific knowledge. The director of the Fatimyyun school in Kandahar says, 'We want to train experts, not just clerics. We need to introduce mathematics, geography and physics to understand the divine message. We cannot limit ourselves simply to purification. There aren't that many mice falling into wells these days. In fact, there isn't much water left in the wells, as it now comes out of taps. We need to learn to speak foreign languages, starting with Pashtun, Arabic and English.'

At the same time, the Shia are proud of the religious performances of their women preachers. The head of the Risalat school, Javad Salehi, said, 'Last year, at Mawlid, we asked Halimeh Hosseini,[254] a professor in the female school of Khatamulnabyyin and a former student of Jamiat al-Zahra in Qom, to present a paper. She was the only woman in a group of men, who were largely Sunni! It was a great success and we broke a taboo.'

If we had to summarize the ambivalent relations between Shia Afghanis and their Iranian brothers, we would say that while they both view each other with suspicion, it should not be forgotten that birds of a feather flock together. Shia Afghanis readily acknowledge their debt to Iran. Mrs Shahin, who runs a family girls school in Kabul, says that ‘without Iran we would not have any schoolbooks.’ And the head of the Risalat school makes no bones about saying that the Iranian religious instruction model, bureaucratic and academic, is in his view unavoidable: ‘If we leave students to their own devices, they do not work properly and the Muslim treasury (bayt ol-mal) is squandered. The Iranian system of about eleven years’ study, the equivalent of a university system, featuring regular exams, is very successful, and we should apply it in Kabul.’ Moreover, the Islamic Republic of Iran is seen as an advanced model, particularly among émigrés or people in contact with the Afghan Diaspora across the border, with the respect for the treatment of women and the education of girls (Hoodfar, 2004, 2007; Rostami-Povery, 2007).

At the same time, however, Shia Afghans do not think that Iranians can be taken at their word. They say that they only ever made hollow promises during the Jihad. They preferred working with the mainly Sunni Tajik and put their political interests ahead of the Shia brotherhood. The head of the Fatimyyun school, in Kandahar, provides the perfect illustration of this sentiment. Wanting to double the size of his school under a five-year plan (should this be taken as a homage to the Soviet occupation or to the Iranian experience?), he has had ‘as usual, all nature of promises’ from the Iranians, but their only gift to date is a water cooler, which he is still waiting to have installed. This disillusionment has obviously been exacerbated in recent years by the fight in Iran against illegal immigrants coming from Afghanistan. ‘The Iranians aspire to being a nuclear power, but while they wait to achieve this goal they attack a few defenseless Afghan migrants,’ said Sheikh Moussa Rezai in a public declaration in March 2008, during the commemoration of the thirteenth anniversary of the death of Shahid Mazari, leader of the Hazara Unity Party, at the Afghan Consulate in Mashhad.[255]

The Iranians do not have a better opinion of the Afghans. ‘They don’t like studying. That’s why Afghan students in Najaf were used to getting smaller scholarships than other students. They study here in the morning, but they don’t deign to change their cleric’s robes for mason’s clothes to do building work in the afternoon. There are more Afghans than Arabs in Qom, but unlike the Arabs do not have any religious schools there,’ say people in Qom. However, Iran is in its own way dependent on its religious clientele. How brightly would the country’s educational and religious star shine without the 8,000 Afghan students that no doubt make up the biggest contingent of about 15,000 foreign students attending the International Center for Islamic Studies, not only in Qom, but also in Mashhad, Shiraz and Karadj?

 Conclusion: complex relations

That is why the ‘dependency concept’ related to Latin America school that initially was framed by historians and economists, should be understood in its whole complexity. The dependence of the Afghan religious arena does not mean its submission to a foreign power. It can also be understood as a resource that Afghan actors mobilize for their own autonomous strategies. Relations between Afghan Shiism and its older Iranian brother should allow us to refine the concept of religious dependence that could be used in other contexts either in the Christian or Islamic World in a contemporary perspective.

Afghan Shia religious dependence on the Iranian religious experience is not just a two-way relationship. They also have other relationships, with Pakistan, for instance, or Najaf. Afghan religious authorities can cross Iran to go to Najaf or take the road to Pakistan. Conversely, they can move from Najaf into Iran. What we term ‘dependency’ in an abstract manner is in reality a series of routes taken by numbers of real people, in very specific historical contexts. The route taken by Ayatollah Mohseni—the founder of the Khatamulnabyyin school, and the embodiment of the three faces of madrasa’ legitimacy, namely the relationship to Iranian Shia theological teaching, jihad and emigration—is telling in this respect. Born in Kandahar in 1936, he started secondary school in Pakistan in 1949, where he learnt to speak Urdu. He then returned to Kandahar, but was quick to leave again, to study theology in the Hazarajat, in Jaghuri in 1952. He set off again for Najaf in 1953, where he attended classes by Ayatollahs Khoi and Hakim. In 1965, he returned home to look after the Shia minority in his hometown, founding the Fatimyyun hoseynieh. In 1978 he fled the communist police, he left to go to Mecca, then for Syria, before settling in Iran and setting up a political party, Harakat, in Qom. He again returned home after the Soviet withdrawal, but was unable to remain during the period of internal fighting among Jihad members, and returned to Pakistan. During the Taliban regime, citing ‘certain considerations’ (sic), he went to Iran and settled in Qom, where he taught.

He then returned to Kabul, dividing his time between the two countries, and founded his large Khatamulnabyyin religious school in 2005 in order to perpetuate the traditions of Najaf and Qom.

At the same time, it will be remembered that Ayatollah Mohseni has support from religious schools in Qom and in all likelihood Astan-i Quds in Mashhad, and funds from Afghans emigrates. His sons live abroad, in Pakistan, the United States, Germany and Saudi Arabia. As for Ayatollah Sajedi, he studied in Qom, Mashhad and Najaf before founding the Ghaed school in Mashhad and the Zeynabieh in Kabul, as we saw. Under the Taliban regime, he was invited to Quetta, in Pakistan, to assist the Hazara community living in that city, and it was while living there that he was asked to move to New Jersey, where he still lives. It is these serpentine routes that inform the religious relationship between Afghan madrasa and the Iranian religious field.

The second important point that we have stressed is the close relationship between Shia religious schools in Afghanistan and migration. We do not think it is far-fetched to see religious schools as a social expression of emigration. In any event, the madrasa should not be seen solely as local institutions, isolated and focused close in on themselves. They are key factor in the country's involvement in its environment, in the same way as NGOs or companies that work there, and they have to keep up with the social changes of the day. The importance given to broadcasting media, which is shared beyond the Afghan clergy, is telling (Louër, 2008: 271–272). Afghanistan's main TV networks are controlled by former Jihad members and all have a religious bent. The Shia have not been left behind on this count: they have Ayatollah Mohseni's Tamaddon (civilization) network, and Ayatollah Moghaddasi, despite being an aging traditionalist, has launched his Kowsar (paradise) network in Spring 2009. As these networks are trying to offset the often somewhat risqué influence of Bollywood, they are inevitably buying programs not only from Arab countries, but also from Iranian TV, which is tending to cement ties with the Islamic Republic even further.

Lastly, we noted that the madrasa movement, which stemmed from the Islamic movement in the 1980s, helps provide a boundary for a religious arena that shifts from one epoch to another. In this respect, the madrasa can help define what is public and what is private, for instance by schooling young girls or people from rural areas, or by having their private school syllabus recognized by the public schools, or by having equipment provided by the public sphere; saying that the instruction of girls is a Prophetic tradition is in effect to bring girls out of the private or family sphere (or to legitimize their departure from the family) to attend a school, to move freely outside and, possibly, to obtain a public school diploma, giving them the possibility of achieving financial independence. This is how we must see the decision by the Khatamulnabyyin school to open a branch for girls, Khadijatalkubra, three years before its boys' branch, and to take in Shia as well as Sunni, going against family prejudice for each of these two denomination. What is also at stake here is the emergence of a civil society independent of the state, for which the madrasa are one of the main vectors. This brings us back to the notion of public denominational space. This notion is relevant in the context of the Islamic Republic of Iran, but it remains to be seen whether it corresponds to transformations in Afghan society.

More generally speaking, the Iranian religious instruction model, which Afghans helped greatly to emerge, has now been brought back home to Afghanistan. The question is now not so much whether it is viable as how it will change in a society in which the Shia have historically been in a position of inferiority compared with the Sunni, divided by political faction fighting, or even by war, and confronted by the problems of the creation of an independent central state. Perhaps Ayatollah Mohseni is correct when he asserts that it is Kabul's turn, after Najaf and Qom, to lead the future of Islam.

 Acknowledgenents

Many thanks to Dorian Ryser for making the map on Shiite places of worship and religious institutions in Kabul.

[215] The most tragic of such events is the attack on the Babri mosque in the town of Ayodhya in India, in 1992, which left thousands dead, or the attack against the sanctuary of Imam Reza in Mashhad, in 1994.

[216] The two authors speak of Islam’s irreconcilable differences with modernity.

[217] Mehrzad Boroujerdi 1996, Negin Yavai 2003 and Yadullah Shahibzadeh 2008 describe the nature of this connexion between religious and secular intellectuals in Iran notably from 1950s till the 1979 Revolution.

[218] Jamil Malik (2008: 6) points out that, ‘with the introduction of new systems of education, madrasa largely lost its function as a general training institute and turned into an institution exclusively for religious education.’

[219] It is difficult to estimate the size of the Shia population in Afghanistan because of lack of statistics. Estimated as 15 per cent in the early 1980s (Roy 1984: 68), it represented 20 per cent of the total population of about 22 million in 2001 (Afghanistan Statistical Yearbook 2004, Central Statistics Office). Shia are composed mainly of Hazara, which represents the vast majority, Turkmen, Qizilbash, Bayat, and Sayyid.

[220] For instance, Yiki bud yiki nabud (Once upon a time), a book by Mohammad Ali Jamalzadeh, published in Berlin on 1921, criticized clerics, attacking their distance from the people because of their use of Arabic. This book sparked a huge mobilization of ulama in Tehran. The book was burned and its author was excommunicated. <http://www.alefbe.com/articleDjamalzadeh.htm> (accessed March 25, 2009); see also (Katouzian 1382/2003).

[221] Ahmad Kasravi was born in a clerical family in Tabriz and was expected to take over his grandfather’s mosque, but he became the most virulent critic against the clergy. He was eventually assassinated in the winter of 1946 by people close to Navvab Safavi, when he was leaving a court that had been hearing charges that he had shown ‘disrespect to Islam,’ before the ruling had been handed down. Roy Mottahedeh (2000: 104) wrote about him: ‘Kasravi’s autobiography, for all his interest in “scientific history,” is in some ways sectarian history in which the role of progressive mullahs, essential to the success of the first phase of the constitutional movement, is noticeably played down.’ See also (Pakdaman 1380/2001).

[222] Mohagheghnasab was sentenced to two years in prison, but was freed after 86 days. Concerning Mir Hossein Mahdavi, see his leading article in Aftab (no 20, 28 Joza 1382/2003).

[223] That seems to be the Iranian version of what Deobandis call ‘asri ‘ulum (Sikand 2005: 74–75).

[224] These new schools intend to offer educational opportunities for children coming from religious families and an alternative to modern institutions such as Alborz, Hadaf, and Kharazmi high school that were founded by lay intellectuals whose goal was sending students to Europe.

[225] One might also recall Mrs Seyed Nosrat Beygom Amin, the first mojtahad, or recognized as such, who in competition with modernists of her time, founded in 1965 a girl high school where all professors were women in order to convince reluctant traditional families to send their daughters to a modern school.

[226] These two schools are where the first executions after the Revolution took place. <http://www.aftabnews.ir/vdcceoqp.2bqem8laa2.html> (accessed March 26, 2009).

[227] Although it is not possible to quote all recent works that emphasize these connexions and diversities, we would like to illustrate this trend by a few examples of publications (Robert H. Hefner and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) 2007; Cahiers de la Méditerranée 2007; Sikand and Youginder 2005; Eickelman 1992).

[228] Even throughout his mandate as Prime Minister (1953–1963), Dawoud was hostile toward the Shia population but the coup against his uncle, Zaher Shah, seems to have been the turning point to Hazar departure to Iran (Roy, 1985: 70–71). For a good description of the Islamic movements and their diversity during the 1970s, see Kakar (1995: chap. 4).

[229] In the same manner, the madrasas' role in politically integrating Muslim Indians throughout the British colonial period has been underlined by Barbara Daly Metcalf (1982).

[230] Concerning the Islamic Shi'a movements in the Gulf, Laurence Louër goes as far as underlining an 'Unavoidable attraction of the political movement and activists towards the domestic space' (2008: 259).

[231] This kind of discussion and disagreement extends to other Islamic scholars and quite often readers send comments that underline a clear opposition to the fact that sunni ulamas are hijacked by shia ones. See Muasisih amuzishi-i imam khomeini (1980/2001: 63–66).

[232] Founded by Ayatollah Mohseni in 1382/2003 with Ustad Burhaneddin Rabbani's (the former President of Afghanistan) support, the Council publishes a quarterly review Payam-i ukhuvvat (The fraternity's message).

[233] According to Gilles Dorronsoro, because of the usual confusion between Shia and Hazara, and with the stigma resulting from the Sunni people, the non-Shia Hazaras generally tend to reject their ethnic belonging and declare themselves to be Tajik (2000: 56).

[234] The value placed on the Pashtuns' identity and culture by the monarchy was concurrent with the exaltation of the aryanity of the Persians and the Turks against the backdrop of nationalist movements in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, in Iran and Turkey. It is a modern phenomenon of inventing a tradition linked to the emergence of a nation-state.

[235] Islam also penetrated Afghanistan through Zaranj, later, in the third century of the rule of Hijra under the Saffarid dynasty. It appears that the entire country was converted to Islam at that time, with the exception of Nuristan Province, which remained Buddhist until the nineteenth century.

[236] According to Monsutti Hazara, conversion to Shia could be a way to distance themselves from the surrounding populations (2004: 45).

[237] Born in Kabul, he followed the standard route for Afghani students of religion. He emigrated at the age of 11 to Mashhad in the early twentieth century, studying at the Abdal Khan school. He left Mashhad, apparently to attend classes held by Abdolkarim Haeri, the founder of the religious school in Qom. Then he left for Najaf to complete his studies, returning home in around 1930 after having become an Ayatollah <www.hojjat.net/zendeginamah> (accessed January 24, 2009).

[238] It is interesting to note that Ayatollah Assef Mohseni also recently announced that the Shia call to prayer on TV dates from 2007, which corresponds to the inauguration of his own TV network, Tamaddon. (Interview with Payam-i Aftab, 1386.09.14/ Dec. 2007) <http://afterwar.blogfa.com/post-17.aspx> (accessed March 5, 2010).

[239] Interview, a member of the Sadat family.

[240] According to Sarvar Danish, Minister of Justice, the difference between Shias and Sunnis is not related to their fiqh which are very similar but it concerns precisely a very limited section of it, personal law, which covers notably prayers, marriage, divorce, inheritance, guardianship. <http://www.moj.gov.af/?lang=da&p=events&nid=221> (accessed March 25, 2010).

[241] Afshar and Hoseynieh in Qala-i Fathullah (1341/1962), both founded by Ayatollah Mohammad Amin Afshar (1288–1357/1909–1979); Muhammadiye in Karta-i Sakhi (1347/1968), founded by Ayatollah Seyed Mohammad SarvarVaez Behsoudi (1295–1358/1916–1979); Madinatulilm, Pul-i Sokhta (1344/1965), founded by Ayatollah Taghaddosi. The school remained open during the Soviet occupation, the civil war and the Taliban regime; Jamiatulislam, Pul-i Sokhta (1351/1972), founded by Ayatollah Ghorbanali Mohaghegh Kaboli; Risalat, Qala-i Shada (1373/1994), founded by Ayatollah Salehi Modarres; Baghirululuum, founded by Senator and Ayatollah Erfani (1318– /1939–); Khatamulnabyyin, in Karta-i She (1383/2004), founded by Ayatollah Mohseni (1314– /1935–). Various schools such as Maktab-i Nargis in Karta-i Sakhi, founded by hojjatoleslam Ali Jafari, Ayatollah Sajedi's Zeynabieh School in Kartai-i Char, and Ayatollah Hojjat's Hoseynieh in Chindawul must also be added to this list.

[242] The school should have been recorded under the name of Maktab Narjis, following the Iranian model, which is analysed by Keiko Sakurai in this volume, but under pressure and in order to emphasize his autonomy toward Iran, hojatoleslam Jafari had to give it up and he modified the name to Maktab Nargues. It is worth mentioning that the manager of the school, Mrs Fouzieh Nemati, is a former student of Maktab Narjis in Mashad during the Taliban.

[243] Source: interview with Javad Salehi, head of the Risalat school (Kabul, October 2007). In September 2010 the student number reached 1127.

[244] Actually, Iranians seem to have recently broken this taboo when they published the tariffs of what is called 'Quranic activities.' Lecturers are divided in three categories; furthermore, oral and written teachings are not paid for in the same way. National and international exams do not cost the same. <http://www.farsnews.net/newstext.php> (accessed September 15, 2009).

[245] In fact, the journal, Durr-i dari, was published by the Cultural Centre for Afghan Writers, which, for financial reasons, was unable to publish beyond issue number 13. But the chief editor, Seyed Aboutaleb Mozaffari, and his editorial staff decided to extend the experience by founding the Dorr-i Dari Cultural Institute, which gave birth to the journal Khatt-i sivvum in autumn 1381/2002.

[246] These include the Valiasr Cultural and Scientific Circle, the Yassin Cultural Association, the Institute for Fundamental Research, the Bisharat Cultural Institutes and the Cultural Foundation of Afghanistan, which respectively publish the following quarterlies: Ummat, Payam-i Yasin (the Yasin message), Andishih-i Farda (tomorrow's thought), Bisharat (the happy promise) and the bimonthly Parwaz (flight).

[247] We could cite some of the former students of the World Centre for Islamic Education: apart from Gholam Sarvar Danish, the Justice Minister and Abdolghayoum Sajjadi, the parliamentary member for Ghazni and editor of the only—and very good—quarterly political journal, Discourse, Karim Khalili, the advisor of Afghan President Hamed Karzai and Ghorbanali Erfani, member of meshranu jerga, the Senate.

[248] This is the case of Ayatollah Ali Mohagheghnasab, who, it will be remembered, was arrested in Kabul, in October 2005, following complaints made against him by Shia as well as Sunni clerics, as well as by President Karzai's religious affairs advisor, Muhyiddin Balouch. Chief Editor of the journal Huquq-i zanan (women's rights), Mohagheghnasab was accused of having defended declarations deemed disrespectful to sacrosanct Islamic principles in his writings.

[249] For a total number of 115,000 foreigners who are living in Qom, the population is made up of 59,000 Afghans, 8,000 Arabs. Cf. <http://ghom.ir/old-sit> (accessed November 12, 2008).

[250] This is a very clear allusion to the situation prevailing in Iran, where there is recurrent conflict between the Majlis and the Guardian Council of the Constitution, necessitating constant intervention by the Expediency Discernment Council, even though the parliamentarian for Ghazni that we cite readily acknowledged having to 'fight against the vacuum of bad interpretation' created by superposing the parliamentary commission and the judicial power with respect to constitutionality. (interview with the author at the Journal Quarterly discourses HQ in Kabul, 2007)

[251] Dr Mohseni was obviously aware of the fact that I come from France.

[252] <http://Shianews.org> (accessed February 7, 2007).

[253] <http://Baztab.com> (accessed on May 15, 2006).

[254] She is, with Tahereh Rohani, one of the authors of Azadi wa iradih-i insan dar kalam-i islami (Freedom and will in the Islamic words) (1381/2002).

[255] http://katebhazara.blogfa.com/post-433.aspx (accessed March 25, 2010).

 7. Epilogue

Madrasas – vitality and diversity

Dale F. Eickelman

The Moral Economy of the Madrasa takes a fresh approach to the madrasa tradition by focusing principally on its contemporary social and political roles. All the chapters in this book are based on recent field research—often in places where North American and European social scientists are reluctant to tread. The book focuses on the contemporary role of madrasas in Afghanistan, Iran, Pakistan, Bangladesh, and China. Adelkhah and Sakurai’s introductory chapter places the contributions in an appropriate historical and social context equally relevant to the general reader and to the specialist familiar with the Muslim world. Even for such specialists, however, Moral Economy stands apart because of its comparative approach in highly diverse contexts and the editors' ability to indicate how the study of contemporary madrasas informs studies in history, politics, and social thought.

For example, Adelkhah and Sakurai's focus on 'moral economy' is distinctly modern, although the term invokes its antecedents in the heyday of the Scottish Enlightenment in the late eighteenth century. E.P. Thompson (1971) projected the term into common usage in the 1960s and 1970s, and it has since become a point of departure for scholars in contexts as diverse as Indochina in the 1930s (Scott 1976) and Iran in the 1940s (McFarland 1985). Thompson's use of the term was avowedly Marxist, but the concept as now used, including in this book, reaffirms the religious practices, habits of thought, and the deep and popular roots of madrasas. Even as some Muslims and others claim that madrasas are rooted in a nearly timeless past, others see them as short-term opportunistic fronts that disseminate militant radicalism. In the aftermath of September 11, 2001, George Bush, Dick Cheney, and Donald Rumsfeld all claimed at one time or another that 'madrasas' were a threat, and the conservative Insight Magazine at one point in 2007 claimed that Barack Obama had actually attended a 'radical' madrasa as a child (http://www.cnn.com/2007/POLITICS/01/22/obama.madrassa/). At least Fox News, which gave a wider audience to Insight's reporting, distinguished between radical and non-radical madrasas.

Yet in both the Sunni and Shi'a religious traditions, madrasas have a strong resilience. Najaf, long the major center for Shi'a religious learning, survived the first decades of Ba'th rule in Iraq, but after the collapse of the American-encouraged uprising against the Saddam Hussein regime in 1991, its leadership and institutions suffered savage reprisals. After 2003, however, the hawza (as the major centers of learning are called in the aggregate), began quickly to rebuild both as centers of religious pilgrimage and of learning, attracting students at all levels from Iraq, Iran, South Asia, and elsewhere, as well as donations from the faithful (author's interviews with hawza leadership, Najaf, November 20–21, 2009). As madrasas in Iran come under increasing government state restrictions, Najaf is bound to regain its prior role as the major center of Shi'a religious learning, complete with multilingual websites and ready Internet access to the outside world to counter the continued difficulties of physical access.

In social anthropology, formal education has long been stepchild until recently to studies of childhood and child socialization, and the study of madrasas, mosque-universities, and the habits of thought inculcated in them have been no exception. Most studies have focused on madrasas in the Arab world and their Indonesian equivalent, the pesantaran (Eickelman 1985; Hefner and Zaman 2007; this volume, Chapter 1).

Rather than seeing madrasas in South and Southeast Asia as a pale reflection of a historically known or imagined past, these studies begin with the present or the near-present. As the editors of The Moral Economy of the Madrasa remind us, the term madrasa taken at its most basic, means (in Arabic) a place of learning, and this learning is not now and never has been exclusively Islamic. Since the nineteenth century, madrasas have existed alongside secular and state institutions. Throughout the Muslim world, from the late Ottoman Empire, British India, Egypt, to Morocco, madrasa leadership has sought since the nineteenth century to innovate and adapt—and such adaptation is integral to madrasa structure, not solely a reaction to Western encroachment.

In some contexts, as in Bangladesh (this volume, Chapter 5), governments have in recent years sometimes seen madrasas as a low-cost way of extending mass education, especially in remote regions, a notion to which UNESCO contributed in the 1980s (Eickelman 1987). Madrasa education, like state-supplied mass education, has become ‘objectified’ at all levels—a commodity that, as the editors indicate (Chapter 1), is as subject to ‘management science’ and ‘human resource management’ as any other institution or organization. Yet like the hawwala system for the transfer of money and messages over great distances and into remote areas which is more adaptive, trustworthy, and flexible than the modern banking system (see Monsutti 2005), so madrasas are often more adaptive and flexible in the educational sphere than are modern state schools or many of their secular private counterparts.

So Yamane’s chapter on Pakistan’s Federally Administered Tribal Area (FATA) gets immediately to the heart of the political role of madrasas in contemporary Pakistan. In the time of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, Pashtun refugees from Pakistan were in refugee camps in Pakistan, and with American, Saudi, and Pakistani support they were encouraged to join the anti-Soviet Taliban. In 1996, Arabs, together with young Pashtun supporters fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan, entered a village and tried to kill the traditional tribal leadership. This leadership resisted and successfully drove the invaders away. In Spring 2008, ‘those who opposed the traditional tribal system’ were ‘said’ to have caused bombs to fall on a tribal jirga, or gathering of its senior leadership. Yamane is circumspect on who could cause bombs to fall, but forcefully presents this leadership as related to ‘newly established’ madrasas. In these schools, the students are not necessarily Pashtun or respectful of Pashtunwali, the tribal code of honor, nor do they accept the coexistence of their politicized version of Islam with the tribal code.

As in many other parts of the Muslim world, the idea of Islamic law, the shari‘a, encompasses those aspects of local custom (Ar., ‘adat) that are compatible with formal Islamic law. In social practice, the Pashtun of Afghanistan’s south share much in common with their kin in Pakistan’s FATA, although by the 1970s the Pashtun of Afghanistan had more access to education than their Pakistani counterparts.

Pre-1980s madrasas in the FATA remained largely under local control, although they were strongly influenced by wider intellectual and political currents, notably the Deobandi movement. In the newly established madrasas of the 1980s, just as with the Deobandi-inspired predecessors of the 1920s, doctrines of jihad were emphasized. With massive foreign and state support, including from Pakistan’s Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), the new madrasas thrived, and Pakistan, according to Yamane, became a ‘hotbed’ of religious extremism. Some madrasas are under state supervision, while others remain independent, and they vary in their acceptance of external support. Traditional notables were not neglected in the distribution of state and private largesse during the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. After the Soviet withdrawal, however, this funding suddenly ceased, the region was abandoned, and the youth attracted to the jihad movement were left to fend for themselves.

The growth of madrasas in Pakistan since 1947 is stunning. From 245 registered in West Pakistan at the time of independence, Yamane reports that their number reached 2,056 by the 1980s, with many of those in the FATA located along the Pakistan–Afghanistan border. Unlike their older counterparts, the newer madrasas of the 1980s tended to be built away from the residences of local tribal leaders, and the influx of refugees also made these new schools, including their teachers and their leadership, independent from local authorities. Antagonism between the traditional leadership and the mullahs of the new madrasas grew. As the mullahs, including Taliban militants, were also heavily armed, they could paralyze the more moderate leadership of the traditional tribal elders and ignore the decision making of the jirgas. Ironically, the traditional leadership was more open to the introduction of modern education and the education of girls, but was also powerless to act effectively.

Southern Afghanistan lapsed into lawlessness following the Soviet withdrawal. By 1994 the Taliban (‘students’), many of whom were trained in madrasas in Quetta and Kandahar, were initially welcomed. The ‘pure-hearted,’ as they were called at the time, reduced banditry in the region and merchants supported them. By 1997, the Taliban controlled 90 per cent of Afghanistan. Following the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States, the Americans ousted the Taliban government. Nonetheless, as Yamane points out, the Pakistani government declared that the students in the newly established madrasas in Pakistan were ‘local’ Taliban and therefore not subject to attack. Private support for these madrasas and for the Taliban continued to pour in.

Yamane’s argument highlights the underlying conflict between the existing religious hierarchy and tribal leadership in the FATA region and southern Afghanistan and the increasingly powerful Taliban movement. Implicit in his argument is the powerful challenge that the Taliban posed to the legitimacy of the existing political and religious order, both in Pakistan and Afghanistan. It is convenient to claim that the Taliban became ascendant through fear and external support alone, but as Yamane argues, some villagers and external supporters welcomed them in the early 1990s as a stabilizing force based on the shari‘a as villagers and tribesmen understood it. In this respect, the Taliban are distinctly modern and may prove more resilient than outsiders and state authorities care to admit.

Sakurai’s discussion of women’s seminaries in Iran and Pakistan gets to the heart of popular legitimacy. Most contemporary conservative Muslims in these countries acknowledge that women’s opportunities for education have until recently lagged behind those of men, although modern state schooling, at least in Iran, has been more open to them. In both Iran and Pakistan, the religious seminaries were marginalized in favor of state schooling, with its opportunities for employment and state advancement. In 1968, I had an opportunity to visit several male madrasas in various parts of Iran. The most striking thing about them was the significant number of students who had failed the highly competitive entrance examinations for lycée education or the subsequent examinations for entrance to Reza Shah Pahlevi University. The graduation rate for lycées hovered around 10 per cent, and many failed students then shifted to religious education. The consequence, however, was that many madrasa students were thoroughly familiar with secular subjects. In this way, the Iranian state indirectly contributed to the health of the women’s seminaries. In Pakistan, in contrast, at least for the Shi‘a population (15 per cent of Pakistan’s population), the seminary system there is more dependent at the advanced level on studies in Iran and Iraq.

In 1984, Ayatollah Khomeini established Iran’s first full-scale women’s seminary, and the idea spread throughout Iran and into Pakistan. Unlike the male madrasas, largely independent of the Iranian state, female seminaries were creations of the state. Their curriculum, an academic credit system, and formal ways to accept non-Iranian students made the seminaries increasingly attractive because such manifestations of bureaucracy and management enhanced the ‘modernity’ of the institutions.

Women seminary graduates formally participate in education and propagation (tabligh) implicitly to alter the balance between male and female authority in domestic settings. Sakurai reports that the seminaries have become so popular that they can accept only 10 per cent of their applicants. As in Indonesia and elsewhere, seminary education is equivalent to secular higher education, and also attractive to students who prefer a gender-segregated environment.

The administrative and curricular details that Sakurai provides indicate how women's seminaries are fully the equivalent of secular institutions in organization and administration. Her example of how graduates of these institutions work in Pakistan also indicates the pervasiveness of both male and female religious networks. The father of one student from Skardu in Pakistan, for example, studied in Najaf for 14 years, represents Ayatollahs Sistani and Khamenei, and has founded seminaries in Skardu, where his daughter, having studied in Iran, is accorded prestige in her own educational and tabligh activities.

An important byproduct of the women's seminary movement has been to encourage the explicit discussion of women's rights in the Islamic context. Although not an explicit threat to the male hierarchy, there is now a critical mass of women with advanced scholarly credentials, although they still are not regarded as capable of issuing legal opinions on their own. Mir-Hosseini (1999) argued nearly two decades ago that educated women often assumed male names to enter into debates in religious magazines. This practice now seems to yield to direct participation. In Pakistan, where there are fewer educational opportunities for women and men, as in Iran, women are concerned with implementing all Islamic ideals and practices, not just those that apply to gender issues.

Adelkhah has had a long-standing interest in religious space as part of social space, and draws attention to the growing proliferation of religious spaces. Yamane's chapter documents the different forms that madrasas can take, and Adelkhah focuses on how madrasas encapsulate and sometimes advocate religious and social change, redefining the role of religion in society. In post-2001 Afghanistan, madrasas have become a key provider of education. To adapt a phrase from the Russian literary critic Mikhail Bakhtin (1990), madrasas provide a space for an 'excess of seeing.' Foreigners and locals mingle in them, outsiders see or misperceive their activities, and they provide networks for wide-ranging intellectual contacts and networks if trust.

Shi‘a madrasas are places where highly diverse groups can interact, debate, and respond to innovation—and adjust their actions both to what works and how others see them. The Shi‘a madrasas are also cosmopolitan, both in Iran and in Afghanistan, where they have strong ties with their Iranian counterparts. What is new since the 1990s is the accelerated pace at which accommodation to changed circumstances occurs and the wider range of audiences that must be taken into account. Adelkhah also underscores the ‘hybrid’ nature of religious and state education, where the more successful Islamic intellectuals effectively connect many audiences.

Since 2001, she argues that the same holds for Afghanistan, and that the Shi‘a madrasas there provide a model for ‘cultural, social, and economic modernization.’ The model includes English language acquisition, the use of computers, and as in the past, participation with the Sunni majority in discussions of national and ethnic identities—most Afghan Shi‘a are Hazara while most Pashtun are Sunni.

Both Sunni and Shi‘a participated in resistance to Soviet rule after 1979, and by the 1980s the category ‘Jihad fighter’ emerged, in which ethnic and sectarian identities became less important. Emigration to Iran for religious learning was earlier for Shi‘a seminarians. Afghan seminaries have benefited intermittently from Iranian government and private funding. The channeling of such funds is made easier by the networks of personal ties that leading scholars have built up from the time of their own studies outside of Afghanistan. Madrasa students often come from poor backgrounds, but religious studies often are a form of upward social mobility facilitated by the regular stipends and lodging for which madrasa students are eligible. Many, as former anti-Soviet jihadis, have added leadership credentials, and some have traveled to Iran, Pakistan, and Europe. The Iranian model of bureaucratized Islamic associations and schooling predominates, but in terms of language, dress, and the use of media, Afghan Shi‘a seek to distance themselves from their Iranian counterparts in order to attenuate accusations of antagonism to the Pashtun and Sunni majorities.

As Adelkhah concludes, dependence on Iran does not mean submission to a foreign power. The Afghan Shi‘a minority also has ties with Najaf in Iraq and with its counterparts in Pakistan. Migration, both for the purpose of knowledge and for commerce—the two often are intertwined—plays an important role in defining the complex roles that madrasas and religious education play. As with minorities elsewhere, transnational educational networking, migration, and increasingly the new communications technology contribute to allowing Afghanistan’s Shi‘a minority more complex forms of empowerment and participation in religious and social fields.

Madrasas in Bangladesh also play pivotal roles in defining and contesting what it means to be Muslim. As with the other chapters in this volume, Bangladeshi madrasas vary from state-subsidized to independent and in terms of sectarian, or maslaki, orientation. Aliya madrasas are regulated and often funded by the Bangladesh Madrasa Education Board, part of the Ministry of Education. Quomi (Arabic qawmi) madrasas are privately funded, perhaps in emulation of the Aliya madrasas, those have also sought to organize since 1978. In the Brahmanbaria municipality, the subject of Kabir’s study, the Aliya schools are grade-based, as are most secular schools; Qoumi schools are subject-based, although the subjects are also partly organized in a grade-based way. Thus Quranic memorization and recitation constitutes the first stage of learning, followed by more advanced subjects.

Since the 1980s, schools for girls have also been formed. These Quomi schools are fee-based and provide religious scholars with a livelihood. The number of students enrolled in Quomi schools is uncertain, but Aliya madrasas nationwide constitute around 27 per cent of national enrolment, with secular schools constituting the rest. As with other parts of the Muslim world, the introduction of state-sponsored Western-style schooling has not eclipsed madrasa education.

Madrasas, and the religious scholars associated with them, continue to play vital public roles. The state does not fully recognize degrees earned at Aliya madrasas, but this is better than the Quomi degrees, which receive no state recognition. Nonetheless, Quomi students can achieve community recognition and network in their own community and beyond to maintain a livelihood.

This notion of networking is salient in the context of Bangladesh and beyond. As Stefan Reichmuth (2000) has shown for other contexts, tracing the regional and transregional networks now and in the past sheds significant light on the spread of ideas, practices, and identities. Understanding these networks, as Kabir reminds us, sheds light on how the ‘ulama create social and religious space. Sponsoring madrasas can also influence social advancement. Among ‘ulama, debate over doctrinal points also serves to delineate market spheres and solidify one’s primary base. Quomi ‘ulama can argue that the modern disciplinary subjects of the Aliya schools detract students from a ‘proper’ Islamic education. Aliya teachers in turn can argue that the Quomi rigidity is preserving tradition that detracts students from proper critical thinking. These debates remind us of British philosopher Walter Gallie’s notion of ‘essentially contested concepts,’ notions that are so value-laden that agreement on alternate interpretations is impossible. Yet such debates, when carried out in public space, have the potential to transform that space.

The Shimbo and Matsumoto chapter on Hui women’s Islamic education in China traces the rise and fall of its subject. Estimated at 9.8 million in China’s 2000 census the Hui are perhaps half of the Chinese Islamic community and 0.75 per cent of China’s total population. The Hui are marginalized by reason of language, religion, and economic disadvantage. In addition, Hui Muslims were reluctant to educate their girls alongside boys or to have them mix in public places. Nonetheless, in the Republican era (1912–1949) some male religious and other community leaders noted the importance of female education and established several female madrasas (nüxue). After 1949, the Communist government enhanced public education to promote national gender integration, although both religious and secular schooling ground to a halt during the 1966–1976 Cultural Revolution.

At the end of this period, Hui leaders worked with the government to make secular and religious education coexist and to integrate women into it. Even UNESCO provided funding, indicating how Hui leaders could use international concerns about gender equality to leverage international private contributions. The result was a shift away from nüxue to state schooling. Although nüxue were built by the private sector to promote women’s education ‘without sacrificing religious identity,’ the government paid overheads and teachers’ salaries and demanded a shift away from Islamic subjects and toward ‘national integration and secularization’ and a demanding curriculum geared to national school entrance examinations.

The reluctance to allow women to be educated early in the twentieth century has now been replaced by agreement on the economic advantages of secular schooling, with secular schools as the first choice and the possibility of teaching as a career. Although nüxue have been marginalized, they remain privately supported. Their focus has shifted to the study of Arabic and to eliminating illiteracy among older women. Many pursue religion-related careers, and some older women study in preparation for the pilgrimage to Mecca. The study of Arabic offers others the possibility of serving as interpreters in the business world and at the same time cementing their credentials as ‘Muslim feminists,’ playing greater roles in society while adhering to Islamic values.

Several underlying themes emerge from these chapters. The first is that madrasa education everywhere remains important and is strongly shaped by national policy or, as in the case of Pakistan, the lack of a clear national policy or interest in educational reform (Witte 2010). Second is the growing globalization of madrasa education. This does not lead to a greater homogenization, but to the ability to learn from successful madrasa models elsewhere and to seek to emulate the most successful innovations of state-sponsored education. At the same time, madrasa students and their teachers are increasingly aware of alternative ideas of education and their ‘market value’ both in terms of social status and of locally and regionally shared Islamic values. Third is the extent to which madrasa education shapes pervasive notions of what is right and just in both Muslim and non-Muslim societies. These notions are contested and have been subject to strongly competing claims.

The role that madrasas play in society remains highly varied and is sensitive to the societies in which they are embedded. Madrasas everywhere continue to shape religious, social, and political beliefs and practice.

 [Back Matter]

 Glossary

<biblio>

adabmanner or proper rules of conduct ahung, akhundIslamic religious leaders or experts ahwal-i shakhsiyyapersonal law akhiratlife after death, hereafter akhlaqgood qualities, virtue akhundsee ahung

alim, pl. ulamareligious scholar

Alimdegree obtained after completion of grade 12 at Aliya madrasa aqidafaith, creed

aseke rasuldevotee of the Prophet ashuraday of mourning for the martyr Imam Hossein on tenth of Muharram awqafplural of waqf, religous endowment ayatollahlit. sigh of God. Modern honoric title in the Shia clerical institutions

Bahaifollowers of the reformer movement in the mid-19th century related to the religious dissidents Mirza Husain Ali Nuri, known as Bahaullah (1817–1892), and his son (1844–1921)

bayt ul-malhistorically, it was a financial institution responsible for the administration of the treasury (taxes or spoils of war) belonging to muslims in Islamic states, particularly in the early Islamic Caliphate; public or national treasury bidaatreprehensible innovation often considered as heretical and sinful

BrahmanHindu priests

Dakhildegree obtained after completion grade 10 at Aliya madrasa dar al-harbland of the war

dar al-Islamland of Islam dars-i nizamisyllabus of Islamic education devised by Mullah Nizamuddin (d.1748) which continues to influence religious education in South Asia

Daura-i Hadiththe degree for obtaining expertise on the Prophetic tradition dinreligion; often refers to Islam duasupplication and invocation to Allah for seeking favor from Him eid-e miladunnabicelebration of the birth of the Prophet fatwareligious expertise or verdict based on Islamic legal schools

Fazildegree obtained after completion of grade 14 at Aliya madrasa fiqhIslamic jurisprudence

fitnasecession, disorder and chaos; also refers to disagreement and division in Islam furfura pira clan of Sufi master originated from the village of Furfura in Hooghly district in West Bengal, India hadiagift often given to a Sufi master in exchange of healing hadithtradition of the words and deeds attributed to the Prophet

Hanafiateschool of Islamic law ascribed to Abu Hanifa (699–767) hawalalit. transfer of funds; informal network of payment system

hawza, hawza-i ilmiyyaShia religious school

Hazara kushito bring down the Hazara

Hazara sitizito make war with the Hazara hazir u nazir, hadir wa nazirtheological precepts that allow the barrier of time–space, able to be present at one time in different places hijabveil; set of moral or Islamic rule to dress or to behave hoseyniehplace dedicated to Imam Hossein for the use of religious meetings

Hossein, Husaynthird Shia imam, grandson of the Prophet Muhammad (d. 680)

HuiMuslim people in China

ijazalit. authorization; a certificate enabling a clergy to exercise ijtihad ijtihadindependent reasoning in the interpretation of Islamic law; effort to interpret the Islamic laws ilmknowledge; also it refers to religious knowledge ilm-i ghaybthe knowledge of the unseen imanfaith

irshadput on track; give the correct orientation ishtirakatlit. common ground; principle based on making common ground between Shia and Sunni to prevent tension

itratProphet’s lineage

jamiacenter of higher education jihadlit. exertion; holy war

Kamildegree obtained after completing 16 grade, similar to Masters degree, at Aliya madrasa khanqahsufi meetinghouse khatibthe prayer leader of a mosque who provides khutbah, congregational religious sermon; also refers to religious leader khumsreligious tax

kitabkhanathe division of text, usually begins at post-primary level at Quomi madrasas kuttabreligious school

lailat-ul baratnight of forgiveness, the night preceding the 15th day of Shaban month in Arabic calendar lailat-ul mirajthe night of ascent of the Prophet to Allah, the 27th day of Rajab month in Arabic calendar lungislifetime tribal chiefs maadresurrection

madarisplural of madrasa

maduliamulet containing sacred text or incantation for healing illness or evil spirits mahfilpublic gathering, especially where religious sermons and opinions are delivered majarSufi shrine or spiritual preceptor’s grave majhab, mazhabthe four schools of law considered as legitimate in Sunni Islam; often also refers to religion in South Asia

maktabreligious school

malikshereditary tribal chiefs who receive allowances from the government marja-i taqlidthe highest authority in Islamic law among the Shia clergy markazcenter

mashayekhpl. of sheikh, a religious scholar or Sufi master maslarules of guidance maslakiparticular interpretative aspects of Islamic doctrine maulanascholar of religious learning maulvi, maulavischolar of religious learning mawajibregular allowances paid to maliks and lungis mawlidprophet’s birthday

Menhuansufi orders in China miandescended from holy men muftijurist qualified to issue fatwas muhaddithscholar of prophetic tradition muhtamimmanager or director; often refers to the head of a madrasa mujtahidhigh-ranking cleric who has the authority to interpret religious laws according to his judgment murshidleader or teacher in a sufi order; They are often called laorenjia, which is the translation of Pir naeb-e muftideputy Islamic jurist-consultant

nowruznew year

nüahongfemale teachers in women’s madrasa; some of them conduct religious rituals for women nubuvvat, nubuwwatprophecy nurlight, illumination nüxuelit. women’s school; in the context of Islam in China, women’s madrasa pani-poraform of Islamic healing where Islamic preceptor utters some sacred passages onto water, as remedy for curing illness or evil spirits pardalit. separation; it is related to gender segregation

Pashtunwalithe Pashtun’s basic concepts of social life pirspiritual preceptor, a Sufi master qarzul hasanalit. loan made with no interest; Islamic banking qazijudge applying Sharia qingzhenlit. ‘pure and true’; it evokes Islam in China

QuranKoran, the Islamic sacred book riwaja loosely collected set of old customs sadakavoluntary religious donation sadatplural from Sayid; family descends from Prophet Mohammed saiyid, sayyid, sayda, sayiddescended from the Prophet sanadroyal ordinance

sharifnoble, descended from the Prophet shirkpolytheism

suba-i iftadepartment of practical lessons for issuing religious verdicts sunna/sunnatthe normative practices of Prophet’s deeds and actions or traditions tabizamulet containing sacred text or incantation for healing illness or evil spirits tablighpropagation of the faith talib, talabih, pl. talibanmadrasa student taqiyalit. to conceal, to hide; principle based on denial of one’s religious views when it is necessary to protect oneself taqriblit. rapprochement; principle to bring together the Islamic denominations, notably Shias and Sunnis tawhidunicity; the first principle of the five pillars of Islam ukhuvvat, ukhuwwatbrotherhood ulum-i ruzmodern sciences

ummaMuslim community

ushrreligious tax

vahdat, wahdatunity vilayat-i faqihthe government of jurist consult waliholy men

waqf, pl.awqafreligious endowment zakatobligatory almsgiving/religious tax; one of the five pillars of Islam zakat al-fitrreligious tax to discharge at the end of Ramadan zakirathe female religious authority in charge of reciting the story of the martyrdom of Husayn at Karbala

Zeynabiehplace dedicated to hazrat-i Zeynab for the use of religious meetings

</biblio>

 References:

* Books and journals

<biblio>

Aaftaab, Naheed Gina (2005) ‘(Re)Defining public spaces through developmental education for Afghan women’, in Falah Ghazi-Walid and Caroline Nagel (eds) Geographies of Muslim Women: Gender, Religion, and Space, New York: Guilford Press.

Abou Zahab, Mariam (2008) ‘Between Pakistan and Qom: shi’i women’s madrasas and new transnational networks’, in Farish A. Noor, Yoginder Sikand and Martin van Bruinessen (eds) The Madrasa in Asia: Political Activism and Transnational Linkages, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.

Adelkhah, Fariba (1991) La Révolution sous le voile: femme islamique d’Iran, Paris: Karthala.

Adelkhah, Fariba (1995) ‘L’ayatollah Khamenei, source d’imitation?’, Esprit, mai: 165–169.

Adelkhah, Fariba (1999a) Being Modern in Iran, London: Hurst & Company.

Adelkhah, Fariba (1999b) ‘Un évergétisme islamique: les réseaux bancaires et financiers en Iran’, Revue des mondes musalmans et de la méditerranée, 85/86: 63–79.

Adelkhah, Fariba and Olszweska, Zuzanna (2007), ‘The Iranian Afghans’, Iranian Studies, 40(2): 137–165.

Ahmad, Hafiz Nadhar (1987) ‘Pakistan men dini madaris : mukhtasar jaiza’, in Institute of Policy Studies (ed.) Dini Madaris ka Nizam-e Talim, Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies.

Ahmad, Irfan (2005) ‘Between moderation and radicalization: transnational interaction of Jamaat-e-Islami of India’, Global Networks, 5(3): 279–299.

Ahmad, Irfan (2008) ‘Power, purity and the vanguard: educational ideology of the Jama’at-i-Islami of India’, in Jamal Malik (ed.) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror?, London: Routledge.

Ahmadi, Fereshteh (2006) ‘Islamic feminism in Iran: feminism in a new Islamic context’, Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion, 22(2): 33–53.

Ahmed, Akbar S. (1986) Pakistan Society: Islam, Ethnicity and Leadership in South Asia, Karachi: OUP.

Ahmed, Leila (1992) Women and Gender in Islam, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Ahmed, Rafiuddin (1988) ‘Conflict and contradictions in Bengali Islam: problems of change and adjustment’, in Katherin P. Ewing (ed.) Shari’at and Ambiguity in South Asian Islam, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Ahmed, Rafiuddin (1996) The Bengal Muslims 1871–1906: A Quest for Identity, Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Ahmed, Sufia (1996) Muslim Community in Bengal 1884–1912, Dhaka: University Press.

Alam, Arshad (2008a) ‘The enemy within: madrasa and Muslim identity in North India’, Modern Asian Studies, 42 (2–3): 605–627.

Alam, Arshad (2008b) ‘Making Muslims: identity and difference in Indian madrasas’, in Jamal Malik (ed.) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror?, London and New York: Routledge.

Alatiqi, Imad (2009) ‘Male–female encounters in early Islamic society—examples and case study’, paper presented at the American University of Kuwait, the International Conference March 10–12, 2009, titled ‘University Development and Critical Thinking: Education in the Arabian Peninsula for a Global Future’.

Ali, A.K.M. Ayyub (1983) History of Traditional Islamic Education in Bangladesh (Down to A.D. 1980), Dhaka: Islamic Foundation.

Ali, Mansur (1987) ‘Mubahith: ijlas cahlm’, in Institute of Policy Studies (ed.) Dini Madaris ka Nizam-e Talim, Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies.

al-Alwani, Taha Jabir (1935) Adab al-Ikhtilaf fi al-Islam, trans. Abdul Wahid Hamid (2007) The Ethics of Disagreement in Islam, Herndon, VA: International Institute of Islamic Thought.

Arjomand, Said Amir (1999) ‘The law, agency, and policy in medieval Islamic society: development of the institutions of learning from tenth to the fifteenth century’, Comparative Studies in Society and History, 41(2): 263–93.

Asad, Talal (1986) The Idea of an Anthropology of Islam, Washington DC: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University.

Asad, Talal (1993) Genealogy of Religion, Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Badie, Bertrand (1987), Les Deux Etats: pouvoir et société en occident et en terre d’islam, Paris: Fayard.

Bakhtin, M. M. (1990), ‘Author and hero in aesthetic activity’, in Art and Answerability:Early Philosophical Essays eds. Michael Holquist and Vadim Liapunov, and trans. Vadim Liapunov, pp. 4–256. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press.

Balandier, Georges. (1974) Anthropo-logiques, Paris: Presses Universitaire de France.

Bangash, Mumtaz A. (2005) ‘FATA: towards a new beginning’, in Cheema, Pervaiz Iqbal and Nuri, Maqsudul Hasan (eds) Tribal Areas of Pakistan: Challenges and Responses, Islambad: Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Bangladesh Bureau of Educational Statistics (BANBEIS) (2006) National Education Survey (Post-Primary)-2005 Final Report, Dhaka: Ministry of Education.

Banglapedia National Encyclopedia of Bangladesh (2003) Dhaka: Asiatic Society of Bangladesh.

Banki, Purfard, and Amir, Husayn (eds.) (2002) Ayine-i Zan, Qom: Daftar-i Mutaliat wa Tahqiqat-i Zanan, Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawzaha-i Ilmiyya-i Khaharan.

Bano, Masooda (2007) ‘Beyond politics: the reality of a Deobandi madrasa in Pakistan’, Journal of Islamic Studies, 18 (1): 43–68.

Barelvi, Saiyid Mustafa Ali (1980) Musalmanan-e Suba-e Sarhad ki Talim, Karachi: All Pakistan Educational Conference.

Basic Education and Policy Support (BEPS) Activity (2004) Bangladesh Educational Assessment: Pre-primary and Primary Madrasah Education in Bangladesh, United States Agency for International Development: Creative Associates International in collaboration with CARE, George Washington University and Ground Work.

Bayart, Jean-François (2007) Global Subjects: A Political Critique of Globalisation, Cambridge: Polity Press.

Berkey, Jonathan P. (1992a) The Transmission of Knowledge in Medieval Cairo: A Social History of Islamic Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Berkey, Jonathan P. (1992b) ‘Women and Education in the Mamluk Period’, in Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender, ed. Nikki Keddie and Beth Baron, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992: 143–57.

Berkey, Jonathan P. (2003) The Formation of Islam: Religion and Society in the Near East, 600–1800, New York: Cambridge University Press.

Berkey, Jonathan P. (2007) ‘Madrasa, medieval and modern: politics, education, and the problem of Muslim identity’, in Hefner W. Robert and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Bilgrami, Akeel (1992) ‘What is a Muslim? Fundamental commitment and cultural identity’, Critical Inquiry, 18 (2): 821–42.

Boroujerdi, Mehrzad (1996), Iranian Intellectuals and the West: The Tormented Triumph of Nativism, Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

Bowen, John R. (1993) Muslims through Discourses, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Bowen, John R. (2003) Islam, Law and Equality in Indonesia: An Anthropology of Public Reasoning, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Boyle, Helen N. (2004) ‘Modernization of education and Kura’nic adaptation in Morocco’, in Holger Daun and Geoffrey Walford (eds) Educational Strategies among Muslims in the Context of Globalization, Leiden: Brill.

Boyle, Helen N. (2006) ‘Memorization and learning in Islamic schools’, Comparative Education Review, 50 (3): 478–95.

Bruinessen, Martin van (2008) ‘Traditionalist and Islamist Pesantrens in contemporary Indonesia’ in Farish A. Noor, Yoginder Sikand and Martin van Bruinessen (eds) (2008). The Madrasa in Asia: Political Activism and Transnational Linkages, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.

Cheema, Pervaiz Iqbal and Nuri, Maqsudul Hasan (eds) (2005) Tribal Areas of Pakistan: Challenges and Responses, Islamabad: Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Cooke, Miriam and Lawrence, Bruce B. (2005) Muslim Networks from Hajj to Hip Hop, Chapel Hill, NC and London: University of North Carolina Press.

Cornell, Vincent J. (1998) Realm of the Saint: Power and Authority in Moroccan Sufism, Austin, TX: University of Texas.

Cui Xiangsu and Lao Kaisheng 崔相肃, 劳凯声 (1995) Jiaoyufa Shimu Quanshu 『教育法事务全书』 (Book on Educational Law), Beijing: Yuhan Chubanshe 宇航出版社.

Daftar-i Mutaliat wa Tahqiqat-i Zanan (n.d.) Rayhana, Qom: Daftar-i Mutaliat wa Tahqiqat-I Zanan.

Daftar-i Mutaliat wa Tahqiqat-i Zanan (2006) Haura : mahnama-i ilmi: farhangi wa ijtimai-i zanan, Qom: Daftar-i Mutariat wa Ijtimai-i Zanan, 21: 10–11.

Datta, Pradip Kumar (1999) Carving Blocs: Communal Ideology in Early Twentieth Century Bengal, New Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Deoband, Darul-Uloom (2007) ‘The track (Maslak) of Darul Uloom’, available online at: <http://darululoom-deoband.com/english/index.htm> (accessed 25 January 2007).

Ding Guoyong 丁国勇 (1992) ‘Huizu nüzi jiaoyu de xingban yu fazhan’ 「回族女子教育的兴办与发展」 (Initiation and development of Hui girls’ education), in Guojia bawu zhexue shehui kexue zhongdian keti<Nongcun nütong jiaoyu xianzhuang wenti ji duice yanjiu>ketizu 国家八五哲学社会科学重点课题<农村女童教育现状问题及对策研究>课题组 (The 8th national five-year plan key theme team about philosophy and social science) <Research of problem and counter measure of girl education in rural area>) (ed.) Nüzi Jiaoyu Yanjiu Wenxian Ciliaoji, 『女子教育研究文献资料集』 (Collection of Documents on Women’s Education) Internal document.

Ding Guoyong 丁国勇 (ed.) (1993) Ningxia Huizu 『宁夏回族』 (Hui People in Ningxia), Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe 宁夏人民出版社

Dorronsoro, Gilles (2005) Revolution Unending: Afghanistan, 1979 to the present, trans. J. King, London and New York: Hurst and Columbia University Press.

Durrrani, Abd al-Wajed (ed.) (2002) Madaris Dinya Dairiktari, Lahore: Wafaq al-Madaris al-Shia.

Eaton, Richard M. (1994) The Rise of Islam and the Bengal Frontier, 1204–1760. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. (1978), ‘The art of memory: Islamic education and its social reproduction’, Comparative Studies in Society and History, 20(4): 485–516.

Eickelman, Dale F. (1979) ‘The political economy of the meaning’, American Ethnologist 6 (2): 386–93.

Eickelman, Dale F. (1982) ‘The study of Islam in local contexts’, Contributions to Asian Studies, 17: 1–16.

Eickelman, Dale F. (1985) Knowledge and Power in Morocco: The Education of a Twentieth Century Notable. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. (1987) ‘Rapport de séminaire de l’IIPE, Paris, 10–12 decembre 1984’, in Les formes traditionnelles d’education et la diversification du champ éducatif: le cas des écoles coraniques, pp. 81–112. Paris: Institut International de Planification de l’Education.

Eickelman, Dale F. (1992) ‘Mass higher education and the religious imagination in contemporary Arab societies’, American Ethnologist, 19 (4): 643–55.

Eickelman, Dale F. (2007) ‘Madrasas in Morocco: their vanishing public role’, in Hefner W. Robert and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. (2008) ‘Gender and religion in the public and private spheres’, Kazuo Ohtsuka and Dale F. Eickelman (eds) Crossing Boundaries: Gender, the Public, and the Private in Contemporary Muslim Societies, Tokyo: Research Institute for Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa.

Eickelman, Dale F. (2009) ‘Afterword: re-reading Bourdieu on Kabylia in the twenty-first century’, in Jane E. Goodman and Paul A. Silverstein (eds) Bourdieu in Algéria: Colonial Politics, Ethnographic Practices, Theoretical Developments, Lincoln, NB: University of Nebraska Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. and Anderson, Jon W. (eds) (2003) New Media in the Muslim World, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. and Piscatori, James (eds) (1990) Muslim Travellers: Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. and Piscatori, James (eds) (1996) Muslim Politics, Princeton, CA: Princeton University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. and Salvatore, Armando (2004) ‘Muslim publics’, in Armando Salvatore and Dale F. Eickelman (eds) Public Islam and the Common Good, Leiden: Brill.

El-Guindi, Fadwa (1999) Veil: Modesty, Privacy and Resistance, New York: Berg.

Elias, Norbert. (1978) What is Sociology, New York: Columbia University Press.

Fair, C. Christine (2008) The Madrassah Challenge: Militancy and Religious Education in Pakistan, Lahore: Vanguard Books.

Faruqi, Ziyaul Hasan (1963) The Deoband School and the Demand for Pakistan. N e w Delhi: Asia Publishing House.

Fischer, Michael M. J. (1980) Iran: From Religious Dispute to Revolution, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Friedmann, Yohanan(2003/1989) (1989) Prophecy Continuous: Aspects of Ahmadi Religious Thought and its Mediaeval Background, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Gaudiosi, Monica M. (1988) ‘The influence of the Islamic law of waqf on the development of the trust in England: the case of Merton College’, Law Review, 136: 1231–61.

Geaves, Ron (2005) ‘Tradition, innovation, and authentication: replicating the “Ahl as Sunna wa Jamaat” in Britain’, Comparative Islamic Studies, 1(1): 1–20.

Geertz, Cliford (1960) ‘The Javanese Kijaji: the changing role of cultural broker’, Comparative Studies in Society and History, 2(2): 228–49.

Gellens, Sam I. (1990) ‘The search for knowledge in medieval Muslim societies: A comparative approach’, in Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori (eds) Muslim Travellers: Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Ghiyasi, Ghulam Riza (1383/2004–5) Talim wa Tarbiyat dar Islam wa Hawza-i Ilmiyya, Iran: Intisharat-i Bayan al-Haqq.

Goodman, Jane E. and Silverstein, Paul A. (eds) (2009) Bourdieu in Algéria: Colonial Politics, Ethnographic Practices, Theoretical Developments, Lincoln, NB: University of Nebraska Press.

Graham, William A. (1993) ‘Traditionalism in Islam: an essay in interpretation’, Journal of Interdisciplinary History, 13 (3): 495–522.

Gul, Imtiaz (2008). ‘Afghanistan Imbroglio: implication for Pakistan’s tribal areas’, Policy Perspectives, 5(2): 67–86.

Hairu Nüzi Zhongxue (1996) Hairu Nüzi Zhongxue Xiaoyoulu □□ □□□□□□□□□ (Roster of graduates of Hairu Girls’ Junior High School), Tongxin: Hairu Nüzi Zhongxue.

Haroon, Sana (2008) ‘The rise of Deobandi Islam in the north-west frontier province and its implications in colonial India and Pakistan 1914–1996’, Journal of Royal Asiatic Society, Series 3, 19: 47–70.

Harris, Winifred (1947) ‘Moslem womanhood’, typed manuscript April 30 (SOAS, CIM PP2, Botham Papers 1939–52).

Hartung, Jan-Peter (2006) ‘The Nadwat al-‘ulama’: chief patron of Madrasa education in India and a turntable to the Arab world’, in Jan-Peter Hartung and Helmut Reifeld (eds) Islamic Education, Diversity and National Identity, New Delhi: Sage.

Hartung, Jan-Peter and Reifeld, Helmut (2006) Islamic Education, Diversity and National Identity, New Delhi: Sage.

Hashmi, Saiyid Matin (1987) ‘Dars Nizami men Tabdili ka Masala’ in Institute of Policy Studies (ed.) Dini Madaris ka Nizam-e Talim, Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies.

Hefner, Robert W. (2007) ‘Introduction: the culture, politics and future of Muslim education’, in Robert W. Hefner and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) Schooling Islam: the Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ and Oxford: Princeton University Press.

Hefner, Robert W. and Zaman, Muhammad Qasim (eds) (2007) Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Herrera, Linda (2006) ‘Islamization and education: between politics, profit, and pluralism’ in Linda Herrera and Carlos Alberto Torres (eds) Cultures of Arab Schooling: Critical Ethnographies from Egypt, Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.

Herrera, Linda and Torres, Carlos Alberto (eds) (2006) Cultures of Arab Schooling: Critical Ethnographies from Egypt, Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.

Hodgson, Marshall G.S. (1974) The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civilization, vol.1, Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Holland, Dorothy, Lachicotte Jr., W., Skinner, D. and Cain, C. (1998) Identity and Agency in Cultural Worlds, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Hoodfar, Homa (2004) ‘Families on the move: the changing role of Afghan refugee women in Iran’, Hawwa, 2(2): 141–171.

Hoodfar, Homa (2007) ‘Women, religion and the Afghan education movement in Iran’, Journal of Development Studies, 43(2): 265–293.

Hoodfar, Homa and Sadr, Shadi (2009) ‘Can women act as agents of a democratization of theocracy in Iran?’, Final Research Report prepared for the project Religion, Politics and Gender Equality, United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD) and Heinrich-Böll-Stiftung. 1–37.

Huq, Maimuna (2008) ‘Reading the Quran in Bangladesh: the politics of “Belief among” Islamist women’, Modern Asian Studies, 42 (2–3): 457–488.

Hussain, Syed Iftikhar (2005) ‘Inaugural address’, in Cheema, Pervaiz Iqbal and Nuri, Maqsudul Hasan (eds), Tribal Areas of Pakistan: Challenges and Responses, Islamabad: Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Hussain, Syed Talat (2001) ‘Breeding ground of extremisms’, in Dawn (Karachi), 3 December.

Institute of Policy Studies (2002) Pakistan: Religious Education Institutions—An Overview, Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies.

International Crisis Group (2002) Pakistan: Madrasas Extremism and the Military, ICG Asia Report No.36, July.

Jalal, Ayesha (2008) Partisans of Allah: Jihad in South Asia, Lahore: Sang-e Meel Publications.

Jamiat al-Zahra (2006–7) Prospectus for Full and Part-time Entry for Overseas Students 2006–2007, Qom: Deputy of International Affairs, Jamiat al-Zahra.

Jaschok, Maria and Shui, Jingjun (2000) The History of Women's Mosques in Chinese Islam, London: Curzon Press.

Kakakhel, S. Siyah al-Din (1987) 'Dars Nizami: nisab men tabdili?', in Dini Madaris ka Nizam-e Talim, Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies.

Kakar, Hasan K. (1979) Government and Society in Afghanistan: The Reign of Amir Abd al-Rahman Khan. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press (Modern Middle East Series 5).

Kakar, M. Hassan (1995) Afghanistan: The Soviet Invasion and the Afghan Response, 1979–1982, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Kamalkhani, Zahra (1998) Women's Islam: Religious Practice Among Women in Today's Iran, London: Kegan Paul International.

Kasemi, Maulana Muhammad Ali Akbar (2005), Buda'atider Kotipoi Prosner Jabab (Responses to some Questions of Bidaatis), Nabinagar, Brahmanbaria: collected from YM offce.

Katouzian, Muhammad Ali Homayoun (1382/2003) Darbara-i Jamalzada wa Jamalzada-shinasi (Jamalzadeh and Jamalzadehlogy), Tehran: Nashr-i Shahab.

Kazmi, Sayyid Muhammad Saqalain (ed.) (2004) Imamiyah Dini Madaris Pakistan, Lahore: Wafaq al-Madaris al-Shia, Pakistan.

Keddie, Nikki R. (ed.) (1978) Scholars, Saints, and Sufis: Muslim Religious Institutions, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Kepel, Gilles and Richard, Yann (eds) (1990) Intellectuels et militants de l'Islam contemporain, Paris: Seuil.

Keddie N. and Baron B. (ed.)(1992) Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Khadija □□ (1994) 'Nüxing de shiming' □□□□□□□ (Missions of women), Peilei □□□□ 1:2.

Khalid, Salim Mansur (2002) Dini Madaris men Talim, Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies.

Khan, Azmat Hayat (2005) 'FATA (Federally Administrated Tribal / Areas of Pakistan)', in Pervaiz Iqbal Cheema and Maqsudul Hasan Nuri (eds) Tribal Areas of Pakistan: Challenges and Responses, Islamabad: Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Khan, Rashid Ahmad (2005) 'Political developments in FATA: a critical perspective', in Pervaiz Iqbal Cheema and Maqsudul Hasan Nuri (eds)

Tribal Areas of Pakistan: Challenges and Responses, Islamabad: Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Khan, Rashid Ahmad (2008) ‘FATA after Independence: 1947–2001’ in Federally Administrated Tribal Areas of Pakistan, Islamabad: Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Kramer, Martin (ed.) Shi’ism, Resistance, and Revolution, Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Lagrée, Michel (1992) Religion et cultures en Bretagne 1850–1950, Paris: Fayard.

Laycock. (n.d.) ‘Little Chinese girls learning Arabic in a Lanchow mosque’ (CIM photograph File 286) London: SOAS.

Levitt, Peggy (2001) The Transnational Villagers, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Lewis, Bernard (1988) The Political Language of Islam, Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Li Xiaojiang 李小江 (2005) ‘Zhongguo nüxing xue de guoji ziyuan yu benduhua wenti yanjiu’「中国女性学的国际资源与本土化问题研究」 Yunnan Minzu Daxuebao 『云南民族大学报』 22 (1): 31–37.

Li Xinghua 李兴华 (2008) ‘Weizhou Yisilanjiao Yanjiu’「韦州伊斯兰教研究」 (Research of Islam in Weizhou), Huizu Yanjiu 『回族研究』, 2: 73–88.

Li Xinghua, Chen Huibin, Feng Jinyuan and Sha Qiuzhen (李兴华、秦惠彬、冯近源、沙秋真) (eds) (1998) Zhongguo Yisilanjiao 『中国伊斯兰教史』 (The History of Islam in China), Beijing: Zhongguo Shehui Kexue Chubanshe.

Li Zongdao 李宗道, Wang Kelin 王克林 (2000) ‘Tongxin xian de Huizu jiaoyu’ 「同心县的回族教育」 (Hui education in Tongxin prefecture), Huizu Yanjiu 『回族研究』, 3: 62–64.

Louër, Laurence (2008) Transnational Shia Politics: Religious and Political Networks in the Gulf, New York: Columbia University Press.

Majidi, Musa (1986) ‘Tarikhcha-i mukhtasar-i kitabha-i darsi wa sayr-i tahawwul-i an dar Iran’, Faslnama-i Taalim wa Tarbiyat, 1 (4): 65–95.

Makdisi, George (1981) The Rise of Colleges: Institutions of Learning in Islam and the West, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Madrase-i Ali-i Shahid Bint al-Huda (2006–7, 2007–8) Huda: faslnama-i farhangi wa ijtimai, Qom: Madrase-i Ali-i Shahid Bint al-Huda.

Ma Lan 马兰 (2001) Xibu Zhonghun 『西部忠魂』 (The spirit of the Northwest) Hongkong: Yinhe Chubenshe 银河出版社.

Malik, Jamal (1998) Colonialization of Islam: Dissolution of Traditional Institutions in Pakistan, New Delhi: Monohar.

Malik, Jamal (1999) Colonialization of Islam: Dissolution of Traditional Institutions in Pakistan, Dhaka: The University Press Limited.

Malik, Jamal (ed.) (2008) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror?, New York: Routledge.

Mallat, Chibli (1993) The Renewal of Islamic Law. Muhmmad Baqer as-sadr, Najaf and the Shi‘ i international, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Ma Qiang 马强 (2003) ‘Funü jiaoyu yu wenhua zijue—Linxia Zhong-A nüxiao ge-an diaoyan’ 妇女教育与文化自觉—临夏中阿女校个案调研 (Female education and women’s cultural awareness—a study on Linxia women’s Islamic school), Zhongguo Musilin 『中国穆斯林』 (China Muslims), No. 1, <http://islambook.net/xueshu/list.asp?id-1951> (accessed 10 November 2006).

Markaz-i Jahani-i Ulum-i Islami (2007) Shinasan, Qom: Markaz-i Jahani-i Ulum-i Islami.

Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawzaha-i Ilmiyya-i Khaharan (1383–4/2004–5) Rahnama-i Pazirish-i Nizam-i Amuzashi Tamam Vaqt: madaris-i ilmiyya-i khahran, Qom: Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawzaha-i Ilmiyya-i Khaharan.

Ma Shinian 马士年 (1988) ‘Shitan Tang-Song shiqu Yisilanjiao zai woguo dongnan diqu de chuanbo’, 「试谈唐宋时期伊斯兰教在我国东南地区的传播」 (A Study on the spread of Islam in southeast China during the Tang and Song period), in Zhongguo Yisilanjiao Yanjiu Wenji (ed.) Zhongguo Yislanjiao Yanji Wenji, 『中国伊斯兰教研究文集』 (Studies on Islam in China), Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe 宁夏人民出版社.

Matsumoto, Masumi (1999) Chuugoku Minzoku Seisaku no Kenkyuu (A Study on China’s Policy toward Ethnic Minorities) Tokyo: Taga Shuppan.

Matsumoto, Masumi (2001) ‘Chuugoku seihoku ni okeru Islam fukkou to joshi kyouiku: Rinka chuu-a jogaku to Ishuu chuu-a jogaku wo reitoshite’ (Islamic revival and women’s education in the Northwest China) Keiwa Gakuen Daigaku Kenkyuu Kiyou (Bulletin of Keiwa College), 10: 145–170.

Mawdudi, Abul Ala (1988/1977) Towards Understanding Islam, trans. and ed. Khurshid Ahmad, Lahore: Idara Tarjuman-ul-Quran.

Ma Xinlan 马新兰 (1995) ‘Wo yu Huizu nütong jiaoyu’, in Yang Liwen (ed.) Chuangzao Pingdeng 『创造平等』 (Create equality), Beijing: Minzu Chubanshe 民族出版社 (Nationality Press).

McFarland, Stephen L. (1985) ‘Anatomy of an Iranian Political Crowd: The Tehran Bread Riot of December 1942,’ International Journal of Middle East Studies 17 (no. 1, February): 51–65.

Meijie 梅洁 (1999) Chuang Shiji Qingsu: Laizi Zhongguo Xibu Nütong Jiaoyu de Baogao 『创世纪情愫－来自中国西部女童教育的报告』 (Creating True Feeling—Report of Girls’ Education in Western District of China), Shijiazhuang: Hebei Jiaoyu Chubanshe 河北教育出版社.

Menashri, David (1992) Education and the Making of Modern Iran, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Merry, Michael S. (2007) Culture, Identity and Islamic Schooling: A Philosophical Approach, New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Messick, Brinkley (1988) ‘Kissing hands and knees: hegemony and hierarchy in Shari’a discourse’, Law & Society Review, 22 (4): 637–659.

Messick, Brinkley (2005) ‘Madhabs and modernities’, in Peri Bearman, Rudolph Peters and Frank Vogel (eds) The Islamic School of Law: Evolution, Devolution, and Progress, Cambridge, CA: Harvard University Press.

Metcalf, Barbara Daly (1982) Islamic Revival in British India: Deoband 1860–1900, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Metcalf, Barbara Daly (2007) ‘Madrasas and minorities in secular India’, in Robert W. Hefner and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Mir-Hosseini, Ziba (1999) Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate in Contemporary Iran, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Mir-Hosseini, Ziba (2002) ‘Religious modernists and the “woman question”: challenges and complicities’, in Eric Hooglund (ed.) Twenty Years of Islamic Revolution: Political and Social Transition in Iran since 1979, New York: Syracuse University Press.

Momen, Moojan (1985) An Introduction to Shi’i Islam: The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi’ism, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Monsutti, Alessandro (2005) War and Migration: Social Networks and Economic Strategies of the Hazaras of Afghanistan. London: Routledge.

Monsutti, Alessandro (2004) Guerres et migrations: réseaux sociaux et stratégies économiques des Hazaras d’Afghanistan, Neuchâtel and Paris: Institut d’ethnologie et Maison des sciences de l’homme.

Mottahedeh, Roy P. (1985) The Mantle of the Prophet: Religion and Politics in Iran, New York: Simon and Schuster.

Mottahedeh, Roy P. (1998) ‘Traditional shi’ite education in Qom’, in Amelie Oksenberg Rorty (ed.) Philosophers on Education: New Historical Perspectives, London: Routledge.

Mousavi, Sayed Askar (1985) The Hazaras of Afghanistan: An Historical, Cultural, Economic and Political Study, Richmond: Curzon.

Muassisa-i Amuzishi-i Imam Khumayni (1980/2001) Mashahir-i tashayyu dar Afghanistan (Shia celebrities in Afghanistan), Jild-i duwwum, Qom: Muassiasa-i amuzishi-i Imam Khumayni.

Muhammad Qutb 穆罕默德・古図布 (n.d.) Ershi shiji mengmei zhuyi 『二十世紀蒙昧主義』 (Jahiliya of the twentieth century) Internal document.

Muhammad Qutb 穆罕默德・古図布 (1995) ‘Yisilan he funü’ (Islam and women) trans. Anonymous, in Musilin Funü 『穆斯林妇女』 No. 6, July 24.

Munir, Ahmed D. (1987) ‘The Shi’is of Pakistan’, in Martin Kramer (ed.) Shi’ism, Resistance, and Revolution, Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Mutahheri, Allamah Murtaza (1992) Women and Her Rights, trans. M.A. Ansari, Accra: Islamic Seminary Publications.

Nakash, Yitzhak (1994) The Shi’is of Iraq, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Nasr, Seyyad Hossein (1987) Traditional Islam in the Modern World, London: KPI.

Nasr, S.V.R. (1994) The Vanguard of the Islamic Revolution: the Jama’at-i Islami of Pakistan, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Nasr, S.V.R. (2000a) ‘International politics, domestic imperatives, and identity mobilization, sectarianism in Pakistan, 1979–1998’, Comparative Politics, 32 (2): 171–190.

Nasr, S.V.R. (2000b) ‘The rise of Sunni militancy in Pakistan: the changing role of Islamism and the ulama in society and politics’, Modern Asian Studies, 34(1): 139–180.

Ningxia Huizu Zizhiqu Tongjiju, Guojia Tongjiju Ningxia Diaochadui 宁夏回族自治区统计局，国家统计局宁夏调查 (2008) Ningxia Tongji Nianjian 2008 『宁夏统计年鉴』(Statistics of Ningxia 2008), Beijing: Zhongguo Tongji Chubanshe.

Ningxia jiaokesuo guojia nütong jiaoyu yanjiu ketizu 宁夏教科所国家女童教育研究课题组 (National project team of research on girl’s education, Research Institute of Educational Science in Ningxia) (ed.) (1992) Ayu Liangbaiju (Shiyong-ben) 『阿语二百句(试用本)』(Arabic 200 Sentences <Trial edition>), Yinchuan: Ningxia Jiaokesuo 宁夏教科所.

Ningxia Jiaoyu Kexue Yanjiusuo 宁夏教育科学研究所 (Ningxia Institute for Education and Science). (ed.) (2001) Ningxia Nütong Jiaoyu Zhiliang yu Xiaoyi Yanjiu 1997–2000 『夏女童教育质量与效益研究 (1997–2000)』(Research of quality and effect about girl education in Ningxia), Yinchuan: Ningxia Jiaoyu Kexue Yanjiusuo. 宁夏教育科学研究所.

Ningxia nütong jiaoyu yanjiu ketizu 宁夏女童教育研究课题组 (Research team of girls’ education in Ningxia) (1995) ‘Ningxia pinkun diqu Huizu nütong jiaoyu de yanjiu baogao’「宁夏贫困地区回族女童教育的研究报告」(Report on education of Hui girl on poor area in Ningxia), Zhongguo Xibu Nütong Xingdong Yanjiu『中国西部女 童教育行动研究』(Action research on girl education in western China), Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe 宁夏人民出版社.

Noor, Farish A., Sikand, Yoginder and Bruinessen, Martin van. (eds) (2008) The Madrasa in Asia: Political Activism and Transnational Linkages, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.

Olesen, Asta (1995) Islam and Politics in Afghanistan, Richmond: Curzon Press.

Olszewska, Zuzanna (2007) ‘A desolate voice: poetry and identity among young Afghan refugees in Iran’, Iranian Studies, 40(2): 203–224.

Pakdaman, Nasser (1380/2001) Qatl-i Kasrawi (Kasravi’s Murder), Germany: Intisharat-i Furugh.

Pasandideh, Mohammad (1385/2006), Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Khurasan. jild-i awwal:, madaris-i ilmiyya-i Mashhad (Religious school in Khorasan. vol. 1, Madrasa in Mashhad), Mashhad: Bunyad-i Pazhuhishha-i Islami.

Paygah-i Ittilarasani-i Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum (1380/2001), Bashir 80: Rahnama-i Jama-i Muassasat-i Farhangi-i Islami-i Ustan-i Qum, Qom: Intisharat-i Markaz-i Mudiriyat-i Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum.

Pickens Collection (1934–5) ‘Muslim girls and boys with hornbooks’ (photograph), Archive of Harvard Yenching Library. <http://via.lib.harvard.edu/via/deliver/chunkDisplay?_collection=via&inoID=219500&recordNumber=41&chunkNumber=1&method=view&image=full&startChunkNum=1&endChunkNum=1&totalChunkCount=1&offset=0> (accessed 12 August 2008).

Prothom Alo, (2006) April 3, Dhaka

Qiu Shusen □□□ (1996) Zhongguo Huizu Shi □□□□□□□ (History of the Hui in China), Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe. □□□□□□□

Qureshi, Rashida and Rarieya, F.A. Jane (eds) (2007) Gender and Education in Pakistan, Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Rabita al-Madaris al-Islamiya Pakistan (n.d.) Dastur aur Nisab-e Ta‘lim, Lahore: (n.p.).

Rahman, Khalid and Bukhari, S. Rashad (2005) ‘Religious education institutions (REIs): present situation and the future strategy’, Policy Perspectives, 2(1): 55–82.

Rahman, Tariq (2004) Denizens of Alien Worlds: A Study of Education, Inequality and Polarization in Pakistan, Karachi: Oxford University Press.

Rahman, Tariq (2008) ‘Madrasas: the potential for violence in Pakistan?’, in Jamal Malik (ed.) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror?, Londond: Routledge.

Rais, Rasul Bakhsh (1994) War without Winners, Karachi: OUP.

Raju, Zakir Hossain (2008) ‘Madrasa and Muslim identity on screen: nation, Islam and Bangladeshi art cinema on the global stage’, in Jamal Malik (ed.) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror?, London: Routledge.

Reichmuth, Stefan (2000) ‘“Netzwerk” und “Weltsystem”: Konzepte zur neuzeitlichen “Islamichen Welt” und ihrer Transformation,’ Saeculum 51(2): 267–293.

Riaz, Ali (2005) Global Jihad, Sectarianism and the Madrassahs in Pakistan, Singapore: Institute of Defence and Strategic Studies.

Riaz, Ali (2008) Faithful Education: Madrassahs in South Asia, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.

Robinson, Francis (1993) ‘Technology and religious change: Islam and the impact of print’, Modern Asian Studies, 27(1): 229–251.

Robinson, Francis (2000) Islam and Muslim History in South Asia, New Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Robinson, Francis (2001) The ‘Ulama of Farangi Mahall and Islamic Culture in South Asia, London: Hurst & Company.

Rohani, Taherhe and Hoseyni, Halima (1381/2002) Azadi wa Irada-I Iinsan dar Kalam-i Islami (Freedom and Will in the Islamic Words), Qom: Markaz-i Jahani-i Ulum-i Islami (World Centre for Islamic Sciences).

Rostamy-Povery, Elaheh (2007) ‘Gender, agency and identity, the case of Afghan women in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran’, Journal of Development Studies, 43(2): 294–311.

Roy, Asim (1983) The Islamic Syncretistic Tradition in Bengal, Dhaka: Academic Publishers.

Roy, Asim (1995) Généalogie de l’islamisme, Paris: Hachette

Roy, Asim (2002) L’Islam mondialisé, Paris: Le Seuil.

Roy, Asim (2005) La laïcité face à l’islam, Paris: Stock.

Roy, Olivier (1985) L’Afghanistan: Islam et modernité politique, Paris: Seuil.

Rubin, Barnett R. (1995) The Search for Peace in Afghanistan—From Buffer State to Failed State, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Sabrina, Mervin (2007), Les mondes chiites et l’Iran, Paris: Karthala.

Safdari, Mehrab Ali (1384/2006) ‘Ruhaniyyat wa hukumat dar Afghanistan: Zaminiha, mavani wa rahkarha (The Clergy and the Political System in Afghanistan)’, unpublished masters thesis, Qom: Markaz-i Jahani-i Ulum-i Islami (World Centre for Islamic Sciences).

Sakurai, Keiko (2004) ‘University entrance examination and the making of an Islamic society in Iran: a study of the post-revolutionary Iranian approach to konkur’, Iranian Studies, 37(3): 385–406.

Saleem, H. Ali (2008) ‘Pakistani madrasas and rural underdevelopment: an empirical study of Ahmedpur east’, in Malik, Jamal (ed.) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror?, London: Routledge.

Saleem, H. Ali (2009) Islam and Education: Conflict and Conformity in Pakistan’s Madrassahs, Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Salvatore, Armando and Eickelman, Dale F. (eds) (2004) Public Islam and the Common Good, Leiden: Brill.

Sanyal, Usha (1996) Devotional Islam and Politics in British India: Ahmad Riza Khan Barelwi and his Movement, New Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Sanyal, Usha (1998) ‘Generational changes in the leadership of the Ahl-e Sunnat movement of North India in the twentieth century’, Modern Asian Studies, 32 (3): 635–656.

Sanyal, Usha (2008) ‘Ahl-i Sunnat madrasas: the madrasas Manzar-i Islam, Bareilly and Jamia Ashrafiyya, Mubarakpur’, in Jamal Malik (ed.) Madrasas in South Asia: Teaching Terror? London: Routledge.

Schimmel, Annemarie (2003) Islam in the Indian Subcontinent, Lahore: Sang-e-Meel Publications.

Shahibzadeh, Yadullah (2008), From Totalism to Perspectivisme, An Intellectual History of Iranian Islamisme From Shariati to the Advent of Kahtami, Oslo: Faculty of Humanities (University of Oslo).

Scott, James C. (1976) The Moral Economy of the Peasant. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Shimbo, Atsuko (1995) ‘Chuugoku ni okeru joji mishuugaku mondai: Neika kaizoku jichiku wo megutte’ (Problems of Girls’ School Enrolment in China: Focusing on Ningxia). Gakujutsu Kenkyu 43: 1–13.

Shimbo, Atsuko (2007) ‘Globalization no moto deno Chuugoku Musim josei shidousha: koukyouiku to shuukyo kyoiku no hikaku kentou’ (An examination about female education leaders of Muslim women in China under globalization: Comparison and discussion between public education and religious education), Gakujutu Kenkyu, 55: 1–10.

Shinwari, Naveed Ahmad (2008) Understanding FATA: Attitudes Towards Governance, Religion and Society in Pakistan’s Federally Administrated Tribal Areas, Islamabad: CAMP.

Shirkhani, Ali and Zari Abbas (1384–6) Tahawwulut-i Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Qum, Tehran: Markaz-i Asnad-i Inqilab-i Islami.

Shoushtari, Mir Abd ol-Latif Khan. (1363/1984) Tuhfat al-Alam, Tehran: Tahuri.

Sikand, Yoginder (2005) Bastions of the Believers: Madrasas and Islamic Education in India, New Delhi: Penguin Books.

Statistical Centre of Iran (2004–5) Iran Statistical Year Book 1383, Iran: Statistical Centre of Iran.

Taleghany, M.A.R. (trans.) (1995) The Civil Code of Iran, Littleton, CO: Fred B. Rothman & Company.

Taylor, Charles (1989) Sources of the Self: The Making of the Modern Identity, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Teepu Mahabat Khan (2008) The Tribal Areas of Pakistan: A Contemporary Profile, Lahore: Sang-e Meel Publications.

Thompson, Edward P. (1963) The Making of the English Working Class, London: Victor Gollancz.

Thompson, Edward P. (1971) ‘The moral economy of the English crowd in the eighteenth century,’ Past and Present 50: 76–136.

Thompson, Edward P. (1993) Customs in Common, New York: The New Press.

Tijani Tunisi, Muhammad (1383/2004) Ahl-i Sunnat-i Waqii (True Sunni), Qom: Bunyad-i Maarif-i Islami.

Tongxinxian jiaoyuzhi bianzuan xiaozu/Tongxinxian jiaoyuju □□□□□□□□□□□□□ (Editorial team of educational history of Tongxin prefecture and department of education in Tongxin government) (ed.) (1991) Tongxin Xian Jiaoyuzhi □□□□□□□ 1880–1990□ (History of Education in Tongxin Prefecture from 1880–1990), Tongxin: Tongxinxian Jiaoyuju. □□□□□□

Torab, Azam (2002) ‘The politicization of women’s religious circles in post-revolutionary Iran’, in Sarah Ansari and Vanessa Martin (eds) Women, Religion and Culture in Iran, Richmond: Curzon.

Troeltsch, Ernst (1912) Protestantism and Progress: The Significance of Protestantism for the Rise of the Modern World, London and New York: Williams and Norgate, J.P. Puttnam’s Sons.

Tsukamoto, K. (2006) ‘Rapid increase of Muslim merchants—Yiwu, China’, Asahi Shinbun, 24 May.

Uddin, Sufia M. (2006) Constructing Bangladesh: Religion, Ethnicity, and Language in an Islamic Nation, Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Veyne, Paul (2007) Quand notre monde est devenu chrétien (312–394), Paris: Editions Albin Michel.

Wadud, Amina (2006) Inside the Gender Jihad: Women's Reform in Islam, Oxford: Oneworld.

Walbridge, John (2001) 'Muhammad-Baqir al-Sadr: The Search for New Foundations', in Linda S. Walbridge (ed.) The Most Learned of the Shi'a, Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Wang Jianxin □□□ (2001) 'Seihoku chihou no Kaizoku—keizai hatten wo meguru minzoku to shuukyou no yukue' (Muslims in the Northwest—ethnicity and religion in the economic development), in Sasaki Nobuaki (ed.), Gendai Chugoku no minzoku to keizai (Ethnicities and Economics in Contemporary China) Tokyo: Shakai Shisousha.

Wang Zhengming □□□ and Tao Hong □□ (2003) Houtu—Xihaigu de Huihui men □□□□□□□□□□□□ (Piled Land—Hui in Xiji, Haiyuan, Guyuan of Ningxia), Yinchuan: Ningxia Renmin Chubanshe.

Wickham, C. Rosefsky (2002) Mobilizing Islam: Religion, Activism and Political Change in Egypt, New York: Columbia University Press.

Wiktorowicz, Quintan (2004) Islamic Activism: A Social Movement Theory Approach, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.

Witte, Griff (2010) 'Poor schooling slows anti-terrorism effort in Pakistan,' Washington Post, January 17, p. A10.

Xibu sishengqu nütong jiaoyu yanjiu zonghe ketizu 西部四省区女童教育研究综课题组 (Research team of girls' education in four provinces of west China) (1999) Nütong Jiaoyu Yanjiu zai Zhongguo 『女童教育研究在中国』 (Study of girls' education in China), Yinchuan: Internal document.

Yao Jide et al. (eds) 姚继德他編 (2005) Yunnan Yisilanjiao Shi 『云南伊斯兰教史』 (History of Islam in Yunnan), Kunming: Yunnan University Press 云南大学出版社.

Yavari, Negin (2003) Intellectuals and the State in Iran: Politics, Discourse, and the Dilemma of Authenticity, Gainesville, FL: University Press of Florida.

Zaman, Haider (2005) 'Problems of education, health and infrastructure in FATA', in Cheema, Pervaiz Iqbal and Nuri, Maqsudul Hasan (eds) Tribal Areas of Pakistan: Challenges and Responses, Islamabad Policy Research Institute.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim (1998) 'Sectarianism in Pakistan: the radicalization of Shi'i and Sunni identities', Modern Asian Studies, 32 (3): 689–716.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim (2002) The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim (2005) 'Pluralism, democracy and the 'ulama', in Robert W. Hefner (ed.) Remaking Muslim Politics: Pluralism, Contestation, Democratization, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim (2007) 'Epilogue: competing conceptions of religious education', in Hefner W. Robert and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim (2008) ‘Reformisme, islamismes et libéralismes religieux’, Revue des mondes musalmans et de la Méditerranée, 123: 17–35.

Zastoupil, Lynn and Moir, Martin (1999) The Great Indian Education Debate: documents Relating to the Orientalist–Anglicist Controversy, 1781–1843, London: Curzon.

Zeghal, Malika (1996) Gardiens de l’Islam: les oulémas d’al-Azhar dans l’Egypte contemporaine, Paris: Presses de Sciences-Po.

Zeghal, Malika (2007) ‘The ‘recentering’ of religious knowledge and discourse: the case of al-Azhar in twentieth-century Egypt’, in Hefner W. Robert and Muhammad Qasim Zaman (eds) Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zeghal, Malika (ed.)(2008) ‘Réformismes, Islamismes et libéralismes religieux’, Revue des mondes musulmans et de la méditerranée, 123, juillet.

Zhongguo Renmin Gongheguo Guojia Tongjiju 中国人民共和国国家统计局 (ed.) (2008) Zhongguo Tongji Nianjian 『中国统计年鉴』 (China’s Annual Statistics), Beijing: Zhongguo Tonji Chubanshe.

Zhouwei 周卫 (1997) Pinkun zhong de Qipan 『贫困中的期盼』 (Hope in poverty), Nanning: Guangxi Jiaoyu Chubanshe 广西教育出版社.

</biblio>

* Online journals and newspapers

<biblio>

Alef, http://www.alefbe.com

Ayandi-i Rushan, http://www.bfnews.ir

Gulbarg, http://www.hawzah.net/Hawzah/Magazines/MagArt.aspx?id=14959

Iran Daily, http://www.iran-daily.com

Nama-i Jamia, http://jz.ac.ir

Payam-i Hawza, http://www.hawzah.net/Per/Magazine/PH/Index.htm

Rasa news agency, http://www.rasanews.com

</biblio>

 Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version]

<biblio>

Abbasgholi school 119

Abbasid Caliphate 110

Abdulrahman 109 accountability 8 accounting 6

adab 78–9

adaptability 69

Adelkhah, F. 1–10, 103–30, 134–5

administration 6

Advanced Elementary School 88

Afghan Desk 23

Afghani, A.N. 119

al-Afghani, J.D. 108

Afghanistan 1–2, 5, 7–8, 11–12, 15, 17, 20, 22–3, 25–6, 41–2, 44–5, 103–35; civil war 25; coup 21; Diaspora 114, 118, 123; Southern Afghanistan 14, 20

Africa 42; sub-Saharan Africa 7

Ahl al-Hadiths 43

Ahl-e Hadith (Salafiya) seminary 18, 22

Ahl-i Hadith 63–4

Ahl-i Sunnat wal-Jamaat 63–4, 72–3

Ahmad, Jala Al-e 105

Ahmad Khan, Sar Saiyid 16–17

Ahmad, Mirza Ghulam 64, 71

Ahmadi tenets 64

Ahmadiyya 4, 63

ahongs 88–9, 91–3, 95, 99–100

Akbar, A. 15

Al-Batul Mohila Madrasa 66, 69–70

Al-Qaeda 11

Alahabadi, A. 19

Alavi 105–6

Albania 42

algebra 19

Algeria 111

Ali 110

Ali Abad 110

Aligarh College 16–17

Alim 66–7

Aliya 65–9, 71–2, 74–5, 78–9, 135–6

Allah 64, 73, 75, 97–101

Amanullah 14

American University of Beirut 123

Amin, Nosrat 51

Amini, Ebrahim 49, 51

Amoli 49, 51

ibn Anas, M. 2

anthropology 131

Anti-Japanese War 91

Anti-Religion Movement 89

Anti-Rightist Campaign 89

Arab countries 64, 108, 125, 131

Arabic 4, 6, 41, 86, 88–92, 95–100, 119, 123, 136

Arabic literature 40

Arabs 11, 21, 23, 26, 42, 118, 124, 131

Arjomand, S.A. 117

Asefi 41

Asia: Central Asia 20, 25, 86; South Asia 4, 16, 59–60, 63–4, 79, 131; Southeast Asia 8, 23, 131

assassinations 24, 104

Astan-i Quds 122, 125

Australia 112

authenticity 61, 71–2, 75, 78 authorizing 68–77, 80

awqaf 16

Azad, Abul Kalam 16

Azad Kashmir 22

Azerbaijan 42

al-Azhar 1, 8

Babol 42

Babur, Nasrullah Khan 21, 25

bachelor’s 38, 42, 69

Baghdad 1–2

Bahai 2, 4, 105

Bahaollah 2

Bahonar, M.J. 106

Bahrain 42

Bakhtin, M. 134

Balandier, G. 104

Balkhi, A.S.E. 119

Balochis 12

Balochistan 20, 22–3, 25

Baltistan 42

Bamian 119

banditry 20, 25, 132

Bangkok 42

Bangladesh 5, 42, 59–84, 130–1, 135; distribution of madrasa types/students 67–8; form/structure of madrasa schooling 65–7

Bangladesh Befaqul Madarisil Arabia see Befaq Board

Bangladesh Madrasa Education Board 65, 135

banking 6, 43, 117, 131

Barelvi, S.A. 16, 63–4, 72–3, 79

Barelvis 17–18, 22, 43

Barzagan, M. 105

Ba‘th Party 130

Bayat 109

beards 89

Befaq Board 76–7

Beheshti, M. 105

Behsoudi, S.V. 119

Beidasi Women’s School 96

Beijing 86

Bengal 16

Bengali 74

Bengali-ness 62

Bengladesh Jamiatul Madarisin 75

Bhuiyapara 77

Bhutto, D.A. 21

Biglarbeygi, A. 119

Bihishti Zewar 16

Bilgrami, A. 62

Bint al-Huda 41–2

boarding schools 91

Bollywood 125

Bologna 4

Bourdieu, P. 3, 103

Brahmanbaria 60, 65–8, 135

British 12–13, 16, 65, 110, 131

Brittany 9, 107

Buddhists 65

Bulkhab 119

Bureau of Afghan Literature 119

bureaucratization 5, 52, 114, 118, 120, 133, 135

Bush, G.W. 4, 130

Cadet Madrasas 66, 77

Cairo 1, 8

Calcutta Aliya Madrasa 65

capitalism 107

caps 87

careers 94–5, 100

Catholic schools 106 centralization 5, 105, 110

Chang’an 86

charity 117

Cheney, D. 130

China 5, 8, 42, 85–102, 130, 136

Chindawul 110, 112

Chinese 88, 94–6, 98

Chinese Communist Party (CCP) (see also Communists) 86, 94, 98, 100

Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) 91

Chittagong 70

Christian Agricultural Youth Association 106

Christian Youth Workers Movement 106

Christians 4, 12, 65

civil war 25, 111

clash of civilizations 4, 103–5

Cold War 21–2

colonialism 65, 68, 103

communications technology 6, 135

Communism 8, 107

Communists (see also Chinese Communist Party) 5, 86–7, 136

Compulsory Education Act 88, 93 computers 19, 108, 117, 134 confidence 8

Congo 42

consumerism 85

contestation 59–84

Cordoba 1

Cornell, V.J. 60

Council of Brotherhood 108, 121

Council for Supervising Non-Iranian Seminary Students 41

cultural coherence 62 cultural identity 62, 77–9

cultural reproduction 59

Cultural Revolution [China] 89, 91, 93, 100, 136

Cultural Revolution [Iran] 39

Daikondi 114

Dakhil 66–7, 78

Damascus 1

Danesh, S. 119

dar al-harb 16–17

dar al-Islam 17

Dar al-Tabligh 34

Dar al-Ulum 16–17, 25

Darul Giasul Uloom Madrasa 70

Darul Quran madrasas 66

Darulquran 114

Darus Sunna Kamil Madrasa (DSM) 71–3

Dasht-i Barchi 112, 117

Dataria 71

Daura-i Hadith 66

Davari, R. 105

Dawoud, M. 107, 110

Day of Judgement 121

Delhi 1, 16

democratization 4

demographics 5

Deng Xiaoping 100

Deoband 1–2, 16–17, 63–4, 71, 73

Deobandis 17–18, 22, 43, 45, 72, 76, 79, 106, 132 dependency concept 124

deregulation 6 development 3, 5, 107, 117

Dhaka 65, 76, 78

differentiation 59–60, 62–4, 71; institutional 75–7; religious 120–4 din 68–9, 71

Din-u Danish 105

discipline 78

discrimination 85; ethnic 86; ethnic/denominational 111; gender 87 doctoral courses 41

dress 78–9, 135

Dubai 107

Durand Line 12

Durkheim, E. 3

Durr-i Dari Institute 119 duties 50

ebtedayee 66–7

Ecole normale sup,rieure 6 economic crisis 7 economic motives 93

economic power 2

Education Act 93

Egypt 1, 21, 111, 131

Eickelman, D.F. 3, 103, 130–7

elders (see also jirga) 11–12, 14–15, 24, 26, 132 emancipation of women 8, 101, 118 employment 68, 99, 133

endowments see waqf

Engels, F. 94

England 109, 121

English 6, 19, 40, 99, 108, 117, 120, 123, 134 enunciation 66

epistème 4

equality 3, 49–51, 85–6, 89, 92, 99, 101, 136

Erfani, G. 112

essentialism 101

ethics 37

ethnicity 85, 107

ethno-consciousness 88

ethno-nationalism 110

etiquette 78–9

Europe 2, 16, 97, 118, 130, 135; Christian Europe 4; imperialism 105; Western Europe 36

Evolution of Educational Thought 3 examinations 18–19, 33–4, 36–8, 40, 45–6, 88, 92, 96, 99, 114–15, 133, 136 extremism 2, 21, 132

Faisalabad 18

Faraizi Movement 16

fasting 41

Fatima (R) Mohila madrasa 71

Fatima Zahra 41

Fatimyyun hoseynieh/school 123–4

fatwas 17, 25, 52, 66, 104–5

Fayyaz, S.M.E. 118–19

Fayziyya va dar al-Shifa 37

Fazil 66–7

feast of duty 42

Federal Administered Tribal Area (FATA) 11–31, 131, 133

fees 8, 96

female education (see also girls’ education) 32–58 feminism 50–1, 53, 99, 101, 136

feminists 136

feminization 49–52

feudal system 21

fiqh 2, 40, 111

Fischer, M. 7

Foucault, M. 4

Fox News 130

fragmentation of authority 53

France 6, 9, 106

Frankfurt 118

Freud, S. 109

Frontier Crimes Regulations (FCR) 12

funding 43–4, 46, 135–6

furfura pir 71

furqania 66

Gallie, W. 136

Gangohi, R.A. 16

Gansu 86, 88, 96–8

gender 49–51, 85, 87, 89, 92, 97–9, 101, 136

geography 19

Germany 116, 125

Ghaed school 125

Ghaem school 118

Ghazi Chehab 110

Ghazni 114, 119, 121

Ghowr 110

Giasuddin Khan 71

Gilgit-Baltistan 22, 43

girls’ education 6, 16, 24, 45, 87–94, 96–9, 104, 106, 116, 118, 123, 125, 132, 135–6 globalization 6, 8, 63, 77, 137

Golpaygani 37

grades 66

grammar 36

Gramsci, A. 4

Greeks 7

Guangzhou 97

Gulf 41, 111

Guyuan Normal School for Nationalities 94

Habul 119

hadith (see also Prophetic tradition) 1, 32, 37, 63–4, 72, 76, 89, 96

Hafizia 66

Hairu Girls Junior High School 91–3

Haiyun Women’s School 96

Hakarat 124

Hakarat-i Islami 119

Hakim, M.B. 118, 124

Hamburg 118

Han 87, 91–2, 94–5, 98, 101

Hanafiat 64

Hanafis 2, 18, 22, 43, 72–3

ibn Hanbal, A. 2

Harun Islamabadi, M. 70

hawala 6, 131

hawza 7, 105, 112, 114–15, 131

Hawza-i Ilmiyya 4

Hawza-i Ilmiyya-i Itratiyyih 112

Hawza-i Ilmyya-i Khatamulnabyyin 116

Hawza-i Kabul 116

Hawza-i Risalat 114

Hazara 23, 45, 107–10, 112, 115, 117, 125, 134

Hazara sitizi 111

Hazara Unity Party 124

Hazarajat 110, 124

Hebei 86

hegemony 4

Hekmatiyar, G. 20–1

Hemmati, 112

Henan 86

Herat 109–10, 112, 114, 119

High Council of Seminaries 37

Hindus 12, 65

Hizb-i Islami 20

Hojjat, S.M.A.A. 110, 112

Holland, D. 62

Hong Weizong 91, 96

Hong Yang 96

Hongmen Menhuan 91

honor 14

Hosan, M.Q.B. 76

Hoseynieh Qala Fathullah 114

hospices 1

hospitality 14

Hosseini, H. 123

Hui 85–102, 136

human resources management 6, 131

Hussain, S. 130

identity 3, 59–85, 100, 134

ijaza 36–7, 39

ijtihad 37, 51, 63

Ilkhanate 110

Ilyas, M.M. 16

imperialism 105

India 7, 12–13, 16–17, 32, 42–3, 63–5, 71

Indian National Congress 17

Indochina 130

Indonesia 23, 42, 131, 133

information and communication technologies 6, 135 inheritance 15 insider 104

Insight Magazine 130

Institute of Policy Studies, Islamabad 20

institutionalization 18–19, 37 integration 85, 92, 95

Intelligence 17

Inter-Service Intelligence (ISI) 21, 25, 132

interest 6, 43, 103, 117

International Centre for Islamic Studies 41, 124

Internet 6, 99, 131

interpretation 52, 63–4, 71, 98, 136 interpreters 95–7, 136

intolerance 85

Iqbal, M. 17, 19

Iqra Rozatul Itfal Trust (IRIT) 19

Iran 4–5, 7–8, 32–58, 64, 99, 103–5, 107–12, 114–15, 117, 119–26, 130–1, 133–5; Ministry of Science, Research and Technology 41

Iranian model 114, 116, 118, 120, 126; implementation in Pakistan 43–9

Iraq 1, 32, 41–2, 103, 130–1, 133, 135

Isfahan 1, 34, 108

Islamabad 22

Islamia Balika (Girls') Madrasa 66

Islamia madrasas 66

Islamic awakening/resurgence/revival 16, 85, 98, 103

Islamic economics 7

Islamic law (see also fiqh) 14–15, 36, 51, 117

Islamic Propagation Office of the Qom Seminaries 39, 50

Islamic values 93–4, 136–7

Islamists 98, 100, 105–6

Islamization 21–2, 43–5, 85

Ismaili 2, 109

Itrat va Quran Centre 118–19

Ittihad-i Islami bara-i Azadi-i Afghanistan 20

Jafari, M.H. 105–6, 111–12, 120

Jafari school 2

Jaghuri 119, 124

Jamaat-i Islami 18, 21, 23, 43, 60, 64, 76

Jamia 66

Jamia Islamia Yunusia Madrasa (YM) 71–3, 78

Jamia Narjisiyya 46

Jamia Zainabiyya 46

Jamiat al-Muntazar 45, 47

Jamiat al-Ulama-i Hind 16–17

Jamiat al-Ulama-i Islami 23

Jamiat al-Ulama-i Pakistan 17

Jamiat al-Ulama-i Sarhad 16–17

Jamiat al-Zahra 33–4, 42, 45, 50–1, 123

Jamiat-i Islami 20

Jamiatul Madrisin 76

Jamiatulislam 116

Japan 97

jihad 15–17, 21, 23, 25–6, 107–8, 110–11, 114–17, 119, 123–5, 132, 134–5

jirga 11, 13–15, 24, 26, 132

Jozjan 119

jurisprudence 36, 40, 50, 73

Kaba 121

Kabir, H. 59–84, 135–6

Kaboli, M. 114, 116, 118

Kabul 1–2, 21, 25, 110, 112, 114–15, 117–19, 123, 125–6

Kadivar, M. 109

kalam 96

Kamil 66–7, 78

Kandahar 25, 109–10, 114, 123–4, 132

Karadj 118, 124

Karbala 47, 110

Karta-i Char 112

Karta-i Seh 117

Karzai, H. 116

Kashmir 12, 23, 42

Kasravi, A. 104

Kazemi, K. 119

Keju test 92

Khadija 41

Khadijatalkubra 115, 120, 125

Khalis, Y. 20

Khamenei, A. 37, 42, 49, 51, 114, 118, 134

Khamoushi, F 42

Kharbid 119

Khatamulnabyyin 115–17, 120, 122–5

Khoi, A.Q. 49, 118–19, 124

Khomeini, R. 1, 32–4, 36, 39, 41, 49, 51–2, 106, 108, 118, 133

Khorasan 34, 108, 110

khums 36, 46–7, 123

kitabs 66

Kondouz 112

Koran see Quran

Korea 97

Kowsar 125

Kufa 1

Kyrgyzstan 42

Lagrée, M. 106

Lahore 18, 45–7

Latin America 124

laundering 114

learning see knowledge

Lebanon 42

legitimacy 8

Lenin, V.I. 94

Linxia 96, 98

Linxia Zhong-A Nüxiao 96

literacy 5, 12, 65, 85, 87–8, 92, 96, 100, 104, 136

livelihoods 69

loans 6, 103, 117

logic 36

Lucknow 1

lungis 15

lycées 133

Ma Benzhai 91

Ma Jiafu 91–2

Ma Xinlan 90

Madrasa al-Zahra 45–6

Madrasa Ghaed 112

Madrasa Ilmiyya-i Baqyyatalla 112

Madrasa Reform Commisssion 19

Madrasa Sikhsok Parishad 75

Madrasa-i Ilmiyya 4

Madrasa-i Jamiatulislam 114

Madrasa-i Madinatulilm 114

Madrasa-i Muhammadyyih 114

Mahdavi, M.H. 104

al-Mahdi seminary 42

Majlis-i Intizamiya 18

Majlis-i Mushawat 18

Majlis-i Umumi 18

maktab 1, 4, 32, 34, 36, 60, 66, 112

Maktab-i al-Zahra 112

Maktab-i Fatimah 34

Maktab-i Hazrat-i Khadijah 112

Maktab-i Nargues 112, 116, 120

Maktab-i Narjis 34, 42–3

Maktab-i Tawhid 34

Maktab-i Zahra 34

Malaysia 23, 42, 97, 99

Malekian, M. 105

Maliki 2

maliks 14–15, 17, 22

Management Centre for the Qom Seminaries 40

Management Centre for Women’s Seminaries 34–5, 37, 40, 50

Management Council of the Qom Seminaries 37 management science 6, 131

Manicheanism 3

Mansura 18

Mao Zedong 94

Maoism 94, 97, 99

marginalization 85, 95, 109, 111, 118, 120, 136

marja-i taqlid 32, 118

marjas 49

markaz 112

market economy 8, 92, 94, 97

Marx, K. 94

Marxism 88, 98, 100, 130

Marxism-Leninism 94

Mashhad 34, 42, 108, 111–12, 118–19, 124–5

Masjid-e torka see Sheikh Ansari mosque maslaki 59, 62–4, 71–2, 79, 135 master’s 37–9, 41–2, 69

Mas‘ud, A.S. 21

mathematics 88, 94

Matsumoto, M. 85–102, 136

Maududi, A.A. 21

maulana 15

maulvi 15

mawajib 15

Mazar Sharif 112, 114

Mazari, M.A.A. 119

Mazari, S. 124

Mecca 94–5, 97, 124, 136

Medina 97

Mehsud 26

memorization 66, 135

merchants 16, 20, 25–6, 132

Merry, M.S. 62

Mervin, S. 112

mian 15

Middle East 2, 20, 23, 86; ‘Greater Middle East’ 4 migration 107, 115–16, 118, 124–5, 135 militancy 130

Ming era 86, 91

Mir-Hosseini, Z. 99, 134

mobilized Islam 69

modernity 3, 103

modernization 14, 60–1, 106, 108

Moghaddasi, 114, 125

Mohaghegh, M. 115

Mohagheghnasab, A. 104

Mohagheghnasab, M. 109

Mohseni, M.A. 109, 114, 116, 118, 120, 122–6 money 117

Mongol Empire 109–10

Mongolia 86

Mongolian era 86

moral economy 8–9, 114, 117, 130

Morocco 60, 131

Mossadegh, M. 105

Motahhari, M. 49, 51, 106

motherhood 101

Mottahedeh, R. 7

Mousavi, S.A. 110

movements 106–7

muballigh 33

Mufid 105

muftis 2, 15

Mughal period 72

Muhammadi 23

Muharram 115

mujahidin 17, 20, 22–5, 44, 112

mujtahids 36–7, 51, 53

muliculturalism 77

mullahs 11, 15, 23–6, 132

Multan 18

murshids 92, 96

Muslim League 17

Muslimness 62, 100

Mutazalites 2

Myanmar 42

Nadia 77

Nadiatul Quran 76–7

Nadiatul Quran Kendrio Mohila Madrasa 66

Nadwah 63

Nadwatul Ulama 64

Najaf 1, 7–8, 32, 42, 47, 49, 108, 118–19, 124–6, 130–1, 134–5

Najafi, Husayn 45, 47

Nanotavi, M.Q. 16

Nasr Organisation 119

national curriculum 92, 94

National Liberation Movement 105 nationalism 88, 112

‘nationalization’ 7–8

Nawruz 110

neo-Leachian perspective 104 nepotism 68

networking 69–73, 79, 135–6

New Jersey 112, 118, 125

new madrasas 11–31; political background 21–2

Ningxia 86, 88–91, 94–7

Ningxia Institute of Educational Science 91–2

nizami 64

Nizamiyya 1–2

non-governmental organizations (NGOs) 5, 22, 90, 92, 120, 125

North America 130

North-West Frontier Province (NWFP) 12–13, 16–18, 20–3, 25

Northern Areas 22

nüahong 97

al-Numan, A.H. 2

Nurani 66, 76–7

nüxues 88, 94–101, 136

Obama, B. 130

obscurantism 104

Office of Research and Study of Women’s Issues 50

Ohab, Abdul 76–7

Olesen, A. 15

Oneness of God 121

opium 107

Ottoman Empire 109, 131

outsider 104

Oxford 7

Pahlavi see Reza Shah

paideia 7

Pakistan 4–7, 11–58, 63, 97, 111, 115–16, 124–5, 130–5, 137; debt waiver 26; implementation of Iranian model 43–9; Ministry of Interior 17, 22; West Pakistan 22

Pakistan Movement 12

Palestine 111

Panjabis 12

parda 52

Pasdaran-i Jihad 119

Pashtunistan 12, 20

Pashtuns 11–15, 20, 22–4, 26, 108–10, 121, 123, 131–2, 134–5

Pashtunwali 11, 13–15, 24, 132

Patia 70

Payam-i Zan 50

pedagogy 74–5

Persian 19, 41–2, 74–5, 86, 111, 120

pesantaran 131

Peshawar 16, 21, 25

pilgrimage 97, 136

Pingyuan County 88

planning 5

pluralism 3, 7, 53, 118

political correctness 122 political economy 8–9, 117 political economy of meaning 3, 103

politicization of employment 68

politicized Islam 12, 23, 132

Polytechnique 6

polytheism 64, 73

population see demographics pork 94

positionality 73, 75

poverty 3, 68

power-knowledge 3–4

preparatory courses 37–8 primary schooling 36, 66, 89 privatization 6

propagandists 33

propagation (see also tabligh) 39–40, 42, 50, 75, 97

property speculation 5

Prophet 1, 15, 64, 72–3, 75, 78, 109–10, 121

Prophetic tradition (see also hadith) 63–4, 72–4, 76, 125

Protestantism 107

proxy war 21

public schooling 68, 88–90, 92–4, 97, 100 public services 6

Pul-i Sokhta 117

Punjab 22–3, 43

purification 51, 123

Qadiani 71

Qajar 110

Qala-i Shada 117

Qala-i Wazir 117

qazi 15

Qazni 119

Qing Dynasty 86, 88

Qinghai 86, 97

Qiratia 66

Qizilbash 109

Qom 1, 8, 33–7, 40–2, 45–6, 49–50, 109, 111–12, 118–26

Qudsi, 41

Quetta 20, 25, 125, 132

Quomi 65–71, 74–6, 78–9, 135–6

Quran 4, 6, 24–5, 37, 40, 51, 64, 66, 72–6, 78, 88–90, 94, 96, 115, 117, 121, 135

Quran wa Itrat Institute 112

Quranic schools see maktab

Quranic studies 16, 19

Qutub, S. 98

Rabbani, B. 20–1

Rabita al-Madaris al-Islamiya 18

radicalism 7, 130

Rajabzadeh, M.J. 112, 119

Ramadan 41, 43, 86, 94, 115, 121

rational sciences 64

rationalization 37, 52 reciprocity (badal) 14 recognition 69, 116, 135

Reconstruction Crusade 122

Reform and Open Policy 94

reformism-revivalism 61 refugees 11, 21–6, 45, 111, 114, 131–2

Reichmuth, S. 135

religious dependency 103–29

remittances 107, 114, 118

Republican era 88, 97, 136 revealed sciences 64 revolution 42, 44, 89; French 106; Iranian/Islamic 2, 5, 34, 40, 49, 105, 111, 117, 119

Reza Shah 32, 42

Reza Shah Pahlevi University 133

Rezai, S.M. 124

Rezazadeh, 112

rhetoric 36

Rifah 105–6

rights 3, 49–50, 52, 105, 134

Risalat School 116–17, 121, 123

riwaj 14–15, 26

Riza Khan, Ahmad 64, 72

Robinson, F. 64

Roy, O. 108

Rumsfeld, D. 130

Russia (see also Soviet Union) 107, 109

sadaqa 47, 98

Sadat 109–10

Sadiq, J. 2

al-Sadr, M.B. 7

Safavi, N. 104

Safavid Empire 109–10

Sahabi, Y. 105

Sahalawi, N. 64

Sahi Masjid 72

sainthood 60

al-Saiyaf, A. 21

Saiyaf, A.R. 20

Sajedi, J. 112, 118, 125

Sajjadi, A. 121

Sakina bint al-Husayn 47

Sakurai, K. 1–10, 32–58, 130, 133

Salar 96

Salarzai tribe 13

Salehi, J. 114, 116, 123

sanad 15

Sar-i Pul 119

Sari 42

Saudi Arabia 21, 23, 99, 108, 111, 125, 131

SAVAK (National Intelligence and Security Organization) 119

Sayda Zaynab 108

sayyid 15

schisms 4

scholarships 5, 89

scholastic tradition 7 schools of Islamic law see fiqh sciences 1, 16, 19

sciences of the day 105

Scottish Enlightenment 130

scriptural tradition 63

Seamen’s Education Movement 106 seclusion 52

Second World War 36

sectarianism 49, 59, 63 sects 43, 47

secularization 3, 7–8, 90, 92, 136

Sefati, Zohreh 51

segregation 52, 118

selfhood 60–3, 78–9 seminaries: feminization 49–52; growth of 34–6; Iranian model 32–58

September 11, 2001 2, 4, 20, 26, 130, 132

Shabestari, M. 109

al-Shafii, M.I. 2

Shahin, 123

Shandong 86

Sharia 25, 64, 1323

Shariati, A. 105

sharif 15

Sheikh Ansari mosque 1

Shia kushi 111

Shia Madrasa Board 45–6

Shia/Shiites 2, 8, 12, 18, 22, 32–3, 40–1, 43–7, 49, 51–2, 64, 75, 104, 106–7, 109–12, 116–17, 119–21, 123, 125–6, 130–1, 133–5

Shiism 8, 42, 107–11, 114, 117–20, 124

Shimbo, A. 85–102, 136

Shiraz 34, 118, 124

Shirazi, M.H. 118

Shizi-shan-zhuang Elementary School 91–2

shuras 25

Sikhs 16

Silo 112

Sindh 12, 18, 22, 41, 43

Singapore 97

Sistani, A. 42, 49, 118, 134

Skardu 42, 134

smoking 78

Sobeh 119

social advancement 115

social justice 8 social studies 19

sociology of education 3

Sorbonne 4

Soroush, A. 105, 109

Soviet Union 5, 11–12, 15, 17, 20–3, 25–6, 44, 107, 109–10, 114, 117, 124, 131–2, 134–5 speculation 5

Spin Bordak 25

Stalin, J. 94

stoning 104

structural adjustment 7

Student Front 23

Su Le 88, 90

suba-i ifta 66

subsidies 18, 20–1

Sufis 1, 14–15, 21, 71, 91 suicide bombing 24

Sukkur 41

Sukurai, K. 134

Sunna 64

Sunnis 8, 12, 18, 41–5, 64, 73, 79, 108–10, 116, 119, 121–3, 125–6, 130, 134–5

syncretism 61

Syria 108, 124

Tabatabai, A. 105

tabligh 37, 39–43, 97, 114, 133–4

Tablighi Jamaat 16

taharat 51

Tahrik-i Taliban Pakistan (TTP) 26

Tajiks 23, 109, 123

Takmil-i Hadith 66

Taleghani, M. 105

Taliban 2, 11, 15, 20, 24, 107, 111–12, 122, 125, 131–3; challenge to tribal order 25–6

talibs 6

Tamaddon 120, 123, 125

Tang Dynasty 86

Tanzim al-madaris (ahl-i Sunna) 18, 22 teachers 93–7

Tehran 106, 111, 118, 120

television 75, 99, 120, 123, 125 terrorism 2, 4, 26

Thailand 42

Thanavi, M.A.A. 16

Thompson, E.P. 130

Tibet Uprising 89

Timurid tradition 117

Titas 65

Tongxin County 88, 90–1

Tribal Areas 20

tribal system 11, 13, 22–5, 132

tribalism 107

Tripura 65

Troeltsch, E. 107

Tunisia 1

Tunissi, T. 109

Turkey 110

Turkish 85–6

Turkmenistan 25, 42

Twelvers 109

‘Two Hundred Famous Phrases in Arabic’ 90

ulama 15–17, 23, 104, 107–8, 136

Ullah, Mubarak 73

Ulum madrasas 66

Umar, M. 15

umma 1, 8–9

underdevelopment 85

unemployment 68

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) 90–1, 131, 136

United States (US) 21, 26, 42, 44, 97, 111–12, 116, 118, 121, 123, 125, 131–2

unseen 64, 72

urbanization 5, 7

Urdu 19, 74–5, 124

ushr 19

USSR see Soviet Union

Uyghur 85, 96

Uzbeks 23

Vadugarh 72

veil 87, 89, 95, 98, 103

venue of convenience 1

Veyne, P. 4

victimization 109

vilayat-i faqih 33, 38–9, 49, 108, 112, 121 violence 2, 105–6

al-Wahhab, M.A. 2, 108

Wahhabism 2, 49, 108

Waliullah, S. 19, 64

Waqaf al-Madaris al-Arabiya 18, 22

Waqaf al-Madaris al-Salafiya 18, 22

Waqaf al-Madaris al-Shia 18, 22

waqf 2, 7, 36, 46, 65, 96, 117

Waziristan 11, 14, 26

Weber, M. 107

Weizhou 88, 96

Weizhou Girls Elementary School 92

Weizhou Girls Junior Elementary School 88, 90

Weizhou Girls Normal School 88

Weizhou Hui Girls Elementary School 91

Weizhou Islamic Girls School 88

West 2–4, 32, 34, 40, 62, 77, 103, 107, 111, 121, 123, 131; aid/subsidies 20–1, 26; and gender equality 50; military occupation 105; way of life 52; Western consumerism 85; Western feminism 99; Western thought/philosophy 7, 16; Western-style schooling 68, 135

Westernization 52, 77

womanhood 101

Women’s Education Centre 39

women’s empowerment 32–58

workers 39

World Bank 85

World Centre for Islamic Sciences 112, 119

World Centre of Religious Sciences 116, 121

Wulasi Jirga 14

Xiji County 91

Xingyuan Women’s Islamic School 95

Xinjiang 85–6

Yamane, S. 11–31, 131–4

Yazdi, M. 106

Yinchuan 95

Yiwu 95, 97

Yuan dynasty 86

Yunnan 86, 88, 97

Yunus, Abu Taher Muhammad 71

zakat 19, 21, 36, 43–4, 46, 65, 123

zakat al-fitr 47

zakiras 47, 49

Zaman, M.Q. 59

Zayarat-i Sakhi 110

Zeitouna 1

zeynabieh 112, 125

Zhejiang Province 95

Zheng He 91

Zia al-Haq 19, 21–2, 43–4

</biblio>

#title Remaking Muslim Politics

#subtitle Pluralism, Contestation, Democratization

#author Robert W. Hefner

#date Nov 28, 2004

#source
<[[https://press.princeton.edu/books/paperback/9780691120935/remaking-muslim-politics][press.princeton.edu/books/paperback/9780691120935/remaking-muslim-politics]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-23T22:58:55

#topics

#DELETED temporarily

#isbn 9780691120935

#cover r-w-robert-w-hefner-remaking-muslim-politics-1.png

 [Front Matter]

 [Book Series Title Page]

PRINCETON STUDIES IN MUSLIM POLITICS

Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Editors

Diane Singerman, Avenues of Participation: Family, Politics, and Networks in Urban Quarters of Cairo

Tone Bringa, Being Muslim the Bosnian Way: Identity and Community in a Central Bosnian Village

Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Muslim Politics

Bruce B. Lawrence, Shattering the Myth: Islam beyond Violence

Ziba Mir-Hosseini, Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate in Contemporary Iran

Robert W. Hefner, Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in

Indonesia

Muhammad Qasim Zaman, The Ulama in Contemporary Islam:

Custodians of Change

Michael G. Peletz, Islamic Modern: Religious Courts and Cultural

Politics in Malaysia

Oskar Verkaaik, Migrants and Militants: Fun, Islam, and Urban

Violance in Pakistan

Laetitia Bucaille, Growing up Palestinian: Israeli Occupation and the Intifada Generation

Robert W. Hefner, Remaking Muslim Politics: Pluralism, Contestation, Democratization

 [Book Title Page]

Remaking Muslim Politics

pluralism, contestation,

democratization

Robert W. Hefner, Editor

princeton universty press

princeton and oxford

 [Copyright]

Copyright © 2005 by Princeton University Press

Published by Princeton University Press, 41 William Street, Princeton,

New Jersey 08540

In the United Kingdom: Princeton University Press, 3 Market Place, Woodstock, Oxfordshire OX20 1SY

All Rights Reserved

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Remaking Muslim politics : pluralism, contestation, democratization /

Robert W. Hefner, editor.

p. cm.—(Princeton studies in Muslim politics)

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-691-12092-7 (cl : alk. paper) — ISBN 0-691-12093-5 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Islamic countries—Politics and government-2Oth century. 2. Islam and politics—

Islamic countries. 3. Religion and politics—Islamic countries. 4. Islamic renewal—Islamic countries. I. Hefner, Robert W., 1952- II. Series.

DS35.69.R46 2005

320.917’67’09045—dc22 2004050522

British Library Cataloging-in-Publication Data is available

This book was printed in part through the generosity of the Pew Charitable Trusts

This book has been composed in Sabon

Printed on acid-free paper. ®

[[http://www.pupress.princeton.edu][www.pupress.princeton.edu]]

Printed in the United States of America

13579108642

 Contents

Acknowledgments vii

Note on Transliteration ix

Contributors xi

1. Introduction: Modernity and the Remaking of Muslim

Politics

Robert W. Hefner 1

2. New Media in the Arab Middle East and the Emergence of Open Societies

Dale F. Eickelman 37

3. Pluralism, Democracy, and the ‘Ulama

Muhammad Qasim Zaman 60

4. The End of Islamism? Turkey’s Muslimhood Model

Jenny B. White 87

5. Dilemmas of Reform and Democracy in the Islamic

Republic of Iran

Bahman Baktiari 112

6. Thwarted Politics: The Case of Egypt’s Hizb al-Wasat

Augustus Richard Norton 133

7. Rewriting Divorce in Egypt: Reclaiming Islam, Legal

Activism, and Coalition Politics

Diane Singerman 161

8. Empowering Civility through Nationalism:

Reformist Islam and Belonging in Saudi Arabia

Gwenn Okruhlik 189

9. An Islamic State Is a State Run by Good Muslims: Religion as a Way of Life and Not an Ideology in Afghanistan

Thomas Barfield 213

10. Islam and the Cultural Politics of Legitimacy: Malaysia in the Aftermath of September 11

Michael G. Peletz 240

11. Muslim Democrats and Islamist Violence in Post-Soeharto

Indonesia

Robert W. Hefner 273

12. Sufis and Salafis: The Political Discourse of Transnational

Islam

Peter Mandaville 302

13. Pluralism and Normativity in French Islamic Reasoning

John R. Bowen 326

Index 347

 Acknowledgments

[[This volume is the product of a collaborative project entitled “Civic Pluralist Islam: Policies and Prospects for a Changing Muslim World.” The project was funded by a grant from the Pew Charitable Trusts to the Institute on Culture, Religion, and World Affairs (CURA) at Boston University, and carried out from January 2002 to September 2003. I wish to thank Luis Lugo at the Pew Charitable Trusts for his generous support of this project, in which he had expressed a strong interest well before the world-changing events of September 2001. I also want to thank Peter L. Berger, the Institute director, for his unfailing support of this and other Institute projects on Islam, as well as for the intellectual inspiration he has provided on so many of my own reflections on religion and modernity.]]

As is always the case in a collaborative project of this sort, none of the effort would have been possible without the support, insights, and criticism of colleagues and friends. James Piscatori of Oxford University and Ali Banuazizi of Boston College participated in the first of our Working Group meetings, and played a central role in the formulation of some of our project goals. The sociologist of religion and regular collaborator at CURA, Jose Casanova, participated in the second of our meetings, providing many important reflections on modern religious change in the Catholic and Muslim worlds. Khaled Abou El Fadl of UCLA provided a paper on the normative grounds in Islamic tradition for democracy that became a key reference material for project participants’ discussions. For personal reasons none of these participants was able to prepare a chapter for the present volume, but their role was no less vital.

I also wish to give special thanks to the religion editor at Princeton University Press, Fred Appel. I can think of no other occasion when the editor for a book with which I have been involved has attended a project seminar, offered important intellectual contributions to its proceedings, and been cordial and supportive to boot.

Last but not least I have to thank two people who may be startled to find their names included in the acknowledgments to a book in which they did not directly participate. However, their thoughts and struggles have informed my own effort to understand modern Muslim politics. They are the Iranian thinker Abdolkarim Soroush, whom I had the pleasure to speak with on several occasions during the first phases of this project, when he resided in Boston, and my Indonesian friend and first teacher on civic pluralist Islam, Nurcholish Madjid. My hope is that these two men might hear a faint echo of their own spirit in these pages, without too much, as some say these days, “chatter.”

Robert W. Hefner

<right>

Boston, January 2004

</right>

 Note on Transliteration

[[This book is intended for a wide readership, nonspecialists as well as specialists. As a result, we have used minimal transliterations of Arabic, Turkish, Persian, and other foreign language terms. No sub- or superscripts have been used, except where an individual author deemed them absolutely necessary. Arabic words have been transliterated and spelled in a manner consistent with national usages rather than an international standard.]]

 Contributors

[[Bahman Baktiari is professor and director of International Affairs program at the University of Maine. He is the author of, among other works, Parliamentary Politics in Revolutionary Iran: Institutionalization of Factional Politics (1997).]]

Thomas Barfield is Chairman of the Department of Anthropology at Boston University and the author of several books on the history, politics, and culture of Afghanistan and Central Asia, including The Perilous Frontier: Nomadic Empires and China (1992).

John R. Bowen is Dunbar-Van Cleve Professor of Arts and Sciences at Washington University and in Anthropology and Social Thought and Analysis. He has written on religion, politics, and law in Indonesia, most recently in Islam, Law, and Equality in Indonesia: An Anthropology of Public Reasoning (2003), and is currently writing on Islam in France.

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. His most recent book is New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, coedited with Jon W. Anderson (2003), 2nd edition.

Robert W. Hefner is Professor of Anthropology and Director of the Program on Islam and Civil Democracy at the Institute on Culture, Religion, and World Affairs, Boston University. His recent books include, Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia (2000) and volume 6 of the forthcoming New Cambridge History of Islam, Muslims and Modernity: Culture and Society since 1800.

Peter Mandaville teaches in the Department of Public and International Affairs at George Mason University. His publications include Transnational Muslim Politics: Reimagining the Umma (2001) and two edited volumes on non-Western and hermeneutic approaches to the study of international relations.

Gwenn Okruhlik is a Visiting Scholar in the Department of Government at the University of Texas at Austin and was a Visiting Researcher/Ful- bright Scholar at the King Faisal Center for Research and Islamic Studies in Riyadh during 2002–3. Her research focuses on identity and citizenship, Islamism, and social movement theory and the political economy of Saudi Arabia.

Michael G. Peletz is W. S. Schupf Professor of Anthropology and Far Eastern Studies at Colgate University. His most recent books are Islamic Modern: Religious Courts and Cultural Politics in Malaysia (2002) and Reason and Passion: Representations of Gender in a Malay Society (1996); he is currently working on a book on the decline of gender pluralism in Southeast Asia since early modern times (ca. 1500).

Augustus Richard Norton is a professor in the departments of anthropology and international relations at Boston University. He is the editor of Civil Society in the Middle East, 2 vols. (1994, 1995), and is now completing a book on ‘Ashura in Lebanon.

Diane Singerman is an Associate Professor in the Department of Government, School of Public Affairs at American University. She is the author of Avenues of Participation: Family, Politics, and Networks in Urban Quarters of Cairo (1995) and coeditor of Development, Change, and Gender in Cairo: A View from the Household (1996).

Jenny B. White is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Boston University. She is the author of Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics (2002) and Money Makes Us Relatives: Women’s Labor in Urban Turkey (1994) and is currently at work on a book about Turkish- German identity.

Muhammad Qasim Zaman is Associate Professor of Religious Studies at Brown University. He is the author of The Ulama in Contemporary Islam (2002) and Religion and Politics under the Early Abbasids (1997).

 Chapter 1: Introduction: Modernity and the Remaking of Muslim Politics

Robert W. Hefner

The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and the subsequent military campaigns in Afghanistan and Iraq placed the question of Islam and Muslim politics squarely in the American public’s mind. In bookshops and classrooms, and on radio and television talk shows, Americans were treated to crash courses on the history of Islam, Muslim attitudes toward democracy, the reasons (some) Muslim women veil, and the question of whether the Western and Muslim worlds are indeed fated to a “clash of civilizations.”

The impact of this heady media brew was decidedly mixed. In February 2002, a half year after the 9–11 attacks, the liberal-minded leader (imam) of one of Washington D.C.’s largest mosques told me that the number of invitations he had received to speak at churches and synagogues had increased twentyfold from the year before, and the number of American citizens whom he had helped to convert to Islam had quadrupled. “Never in my eighteen years of living in the United States have I encountered such an outpouring of interest in Islam, most of it quite sympathetic!” On the other hand, in the months following the 9–11 attacks, there were dozens of unprovoked assaults on Americans of Muslim and Middle Eastern background. Several prominent conservative evangelists blamed the 9–11 attacks not just on individual extremists, but on Islam itself, which they decried as worship of a false god (Cooperman 2003). More alarming yet, surveys conducted by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public life revealed that, two years after the terrorist attacks, growing numbers of Americans believed that Islam encourages violence among its followers (Pew Forum 2003).

In a society as culturally diverse as the United States, it was inevitable that there would be contrary pushes-and-pulls to the post 9–11 reaction. With the passage of time, it was not surprising too that the events of September 11 came to be seen against the backdrop of other events: the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, the conflict in Chechnya, border skirmishes between India and Pakistan, the war in Iraq, and continuing strife between Israelis and Palestinians, among others. Other than the fact that, somehow, they all involved Muslims, there was no agreement on the narrative thread with which to tie these events together. What was clear was that the question of Muslim politics loomed larger than at any time in modern American history.

As public discussion continued, two broadly opposed positions emerged concerning Islam’s compatibility with democracy and civic pluralism,[1] one pessimistic, the other cautiously optimistic. Prominent in the former camp was the distinguished senior historian of the Middle East, Bernard Lewis. Written just prior to the September 11 attacks, Lewis’s best-selling What Went Wrong? attributed the Muslim world’s turbulence to the fact that, in the course of its encounter with Western modernity, “[t]he Muslim attitude was different from that of other civilizations that suffered the impact of the expanding West” (Lewis 2002, 36). In particular, Lewis argued, the premodern history of Muslim confrontation with Europe insured that in the modern era Muslims showed a defensive or even hostile attitude toward things Western. Muslims were “willing enough to accept the products of infidel science in warfare and medicine, where they could make the difference between victory and defeat.... However, the underlying philosophy and sociopolitical context of these scientific achievements proved more difficult to accept or even to recognize." This rejection, Lewis concluded, "is one of the more striking differences between the Middle East and other parts of the non-Western world that have in one way or another endured the impact of Western civilization" (Lewis 2002, 81). The difference ensures that it is unlikely that Muslim societies will embrace democracy and pluralism any time soon.

Certainly there is no dearth of jihadi militants willing and able to enunciate the starkly anti-Western rhetoric Lewis has in mind.[2] But other observers wonder whether it is fair to take such individuals as representative of Muslim opinion as a whole. There is compelling evidence that many among the world's Muslims endorse no such rejection of modernity and democracy. To take just one example, Ronald Inglehart and Pippa Norris's recent World Values Survey compared opinion in eleven Muslim-majority societies with several Western countries and found in all but one of the Muslim countries (Pakistan) public support for democracy was equal to or even greater than in Western countries (Inglehart and Norris 2003). Where Muslim and Western attitudes diverged was not on matters of democracy, but in relation to "self-expression values" only recently ascendant in the West, such as gay rights and full gender equality.

Recent developments in Turkey, Iran, and Indonesia offer an even more striking indication of Muslim interest in democracy and civic pluralism. On November 3, 2002, voters in Turkey gave their overwhelming support to a new, Islam-oriented party, known as the Justice and Development Party (JDP). The JDP is a reformist party that traces its origins back to a series of Islamist parties banned by secular Turkish authorities in previous decades (White 2002). Despite rumblings from the country's secular-minded Constitutional Court, the JDP managed to escape the wrath of authorities while broadening its appeal among Turkish voters, many of whom had previously been skeptical of Islamic parties. It did so in large part by tapping voter resentment over corruption and the country's continuing economic crisis, while distancing itself from the Islamist rhetoric of its predecessors. More significant yet, as Jenny White explains in chapter 4 in this volume, the party leadership made clear its commitment to principles of human rights, the rule of law, and pluralist democracy. The leadership explained that rather than providing an alternative to democratic institutions, Islam should deepen the values of justice, equality, and human dignity on which those institutions depend.

The terrorist attacks on synagogues and British-owned buildings in Istanbul in November 2003, in which dozens died and more than five hundred were injured (Smith 2003), showed that not all Turkish Muslims agree with Justice and Development's democratic commitments. But the Turkish public's horrified reaction to the bloodshed showed just where most citizens' sympathies lay. In this sense, events in Istanbul were illustrative of a struggle for the hearts and minds of Muslims taking place not just in Turkey but around the world. The contest pits those who believe in the compatibility of Islam with democracy and pluralist freedom against those who insist that such values and institutions are antithetical to Islam.

Events in Iran since 1997 offer a second example of a similar plurAl-ization and contestation of the forms and meanings of Muslim politics. Iran is especially interesting because it is the only country in the Muslim world to have undergone the political metamorphosis from an Islamic revolution to the establishment of an Islamic Republic and, finally, the emergence of a postrevolutionary society (Brumberg 2001; Hooglund 2002). During its first quarter-century, the republic was seen by Islamist activists around the world as proof of their religion's ability to provide an alternative to Western-style democracy. As Bahman Baktiari explains in chapter 5, however, the third, or postrevolutionary, phase of the Islamic Republic's evolution has yielded some surprises. Events since the election of the reform-minded President Khatami in May 1997 show that the youth, women, and professional wings of Iran's new middle class have grown disenchanted with the reigning repressive interpretation of Muslim politics. They seem more interested in the creation of a civil society with genuine pluralism and freedoms than they are the shibboleth of velayat-e faqih (lit., "rule by the religiously learned," i.e., clerics; see Arjomand 1988, 148–59). As yet the dream of a democratic spring in Iran remains unfulfilled, and, as in Turkey, the long-term success of efforts to remake Muslim politics is far from guaranteed. But what is clear is that, in Iran as in Turkey, a growing number of faithful have concluded that there is no contradiction between their great religion and civil-democratic decency.

The Southeast Asian nation of Indonesia offers a third example of a Muslim politics as plural and contested as its counterparts in Turkey and Iran. Although often overlooked in discussions of Muslim societies, Indonesia is the largest Muslim-majority country in the world. In the final years of the Soeharto dictatorship (1966–98), a powerful movement for a democratic Muslim politics took shape. In alliance with secular Muslims and non-Muslims, the movement succeeded in May 1998 in toppling the long-ruling Soeharto. No less remarkable, Muslim participants in the democracy campaign dedicated themselves to devising religious arguments in support of pluralism, democracy, women's rights, and civil society (Abdillah 1997; Barton 2002; Hefner 2000). Unfortunately, as I discuss in chapter 11, in the months following Soeharto's overthrow, Indonesia was rocked by outbreaks of fierce ethnoreligious violence. Some of the violence showed the telltale signs of ancien regime provocation. But other acts were linked to independent extremists, including one group with ties to al-Qa'ida. The violence slowed the reform movement and put the Muslim community's pluralist experiment in question.

Notwithstanding these and other setbacks, events in Turkey, Iran, and Indonesia have proved that Muslim politics is not monolithic, and that there is more to its contemporary ferment than the bleak alternatives of secularist authoritarianism or extremist violence. Less widely noted but no less important, there is an effort underway in many countries to give Muslim politics a civic, pluralist, and even democratic face. In some nations, perhaps the majority, the initiative is still so preliminary or disorganized as to hardly merit the label "movement." Elsewhere, as in Saudi Arabia (chapter 8), the reformers are not clamoring for full-fledged party democracy, but greater pluralism and citizen participation. In these and other Muslim countries, however, there are hints of change in the air, and hope of better things to come.

 The Modern Maelstrom

It was with an eye toward exploring these changes that the Institute on Culture, Religion, and World Affairs at Boston University, with the generous support of the Pew Charitable Trusts, brought together fourteen specialists of Muslim politics for three meetings, in May 2002 and in January and September 2003. The meetings were part of an eighteen-month program of research and analysis on social supports for, and obstacles to, pluralism and democratization in the Muslim world. The project was not intended to address the September 11 violence as such. Having directed a small program on Islam and Civil Society for the previous nine years, I had submitted the project proposal to the Pew Trusts in August 2001, a few weeks prior to the events of September 11. The aim of the "Working Group on Civic-Pluralist Islam," as our project came to be known, was to look at Muslim politics from within, examining the local roots for a pluralist public sphere and a democratic politics. In undertaking this program, we also hoped to bridge the gap between, on one hand, academic scholars and, on the other, policy makers and a general public increasingly concerned about developments in the Muslim world.

The contributors to this volume are first and foremost scholars of Islam and Muslim politics. But all share the conviction that policy-oriented public scholarship is intellectually important in its own right. Some of our colleagues in academia may not share this conviction; even those who do often regard public scholarship as a lesser intellectual genre. What this viewpoint forgets is that most of the great Western social theorists of the nineteenth and early-twentieth century were public intellectuals as well as or even more than they were academics. They understood well the rhetorical demands and intellectual benefits of having to communicate specialized insights to general audiences. What this perspective also overlooks is one of the most impressive aspects of cultural life in the contemporary Muslim world: its proud legacy of public intellectualism (see Abaza 2002, 55–74; Eickelman and Anderson 1999). All this said, the main motive for bringing together the authors who contributed to this volume was our shared conviction that efforts to understand events in the Muslim world can succeed only if we move beyond sound bites and stereotypes and acknowledge the plurality and contest of modern Muslim politics.

To begin to appreciate this variety, and to understand the background to the essays in this volume, we need to look beyond the categories of Western liberal history and recognize several distinctive concerns of Muslim politics. Three are particularly relevant to the chapters that follow. First, far more than is the case in contemporary Western democracies (but not unlike some Western subcultures; see Casanova 1994; Wuthnow 1988, 173–214), Muslim politics is informed by the conviction that religious scholars, the ulama (literally, “those who know,” sing., alim), have the right and duty to make sure that all major developments in politics and society are in conformity with God’s commands. Notwithstanding a few radical experiments like revolutionary Iran or Afghanistan’s Taliban, this first feature of Muslim politics is not typically understood as an imperative for theocratic rule. Religious scholars do not govern and, again, notwithstanding certain utopian Islamisms to the contrary, real-and- existing Muslim polities are not characterized by a seamless fusion of religion and state or a dictatorship of “clerics” over a supine civil society (see Arjomand 1988, 147–63; Brown 2000; Zubaida 2003). Indeed, in a manner that may at first appear paradoxical, most Muslim societies are marked by deep disagreements over just who is qualified to speak as a religious authority and over just how seriously ordinary Muslims should take the pronouncements of individual scholars.

Rather than an all-powerful theocracy, then, the more general effect of this first principle of Muslim politics is diffusely cultural. The principle makes it difficult for public political deliberation to lapse into laissez- faireism, leaving urgent ethical questions to individual choice or the marketplace of public opinion alone. As Muhammad Qasim Zaman (chapter 3) and John Bowen (chapter 13) illustrate in their discussions of “normativity” in this volume, social and political initiatives are in principle subject to ethical assessment by scholars whose charge is to assure that the developments are consistent with God’s commands. The latter are in turn understood in relation to the body of revealed regulations or Islamic “law” known as shari‘a (lit., “the path,” “the way,” as in divine regulations or law; see Murata and Chittick 1994, 25–27). In this sense, contemporary Muslim politics operates on two levels: a generalized or mass level driven by the actions and concerns of ordinary Muslims, and a restricted or specialized track involving the efforts of religious scholars to respond to modern problems within the normative horizons of the shari‘a and Islamic tradition as a whole.[3] Much of the fevered argument of contemporary Muslim politics centers on questions as to how these two tracks are to be harmonized.

Although this first concern informs Muslim political ideals today just as it did during Islam’s classical age, its social urgency has varied over time. As occurred with the rise of secular nationalism in the middle decades of the twentieth century, there are times in Muslim history when popular culture drifts away from normative-mindedness, and the public appears less concerned with justifying its political choices with reference to religious ideals. However, when, as in much of the Muslim world after the 1960s, a society experiences a period of deepening Islamization, the concern for religious legitimation will rebound into public awareness, unleashing a torrent of debate on what is and what is not in accord with God's commands.

This social fact points to a second feature of Muslim politics, this one related to contemporary efforts to remake that politics in a pluralist and democratic mold. A key requirement for such a reorientation will be the emergence of public intellectuals backed by mass organizations with the social and discursive resources to convince fellow Muslims of the compatibility of Islam with pluralism and democracy. It goes without saying that the formulation of such religious rationales would have been unnecessary had Muslim societies undergone the process of radical secularization Western theorists had predicted back in the 1950s. But the resurgence of the 1970s and 1980s ensured that contemporary politics in most Muslim societies shows a deep concern with religious powers and discourses.

Viewed from another perspective, this second concern of Muslim politics might seem like a particular example of a general theme in contemporary democratic studies. In recent years "democracy in the vernacular" has been a new and welcome focus of attention in political studies, in large part as a result of efforts to extend that theory's cultural horizons beyond the Atlantic-liberal West (see, for example, Bhargava, Bagchi, and Sudershan 1999; Hansen 1999; Kymlicka 2001). As with Kay Warren's (1998) examination of Mayan activist intellectuals in contemporary Guatemala, or Robert Weller's (1999) study of village temples and women's networks in Taiwan, vernacular approaches emphasize that democratization needs local roots if it is to grow. While recognizing that there are, in the Wittgensteinian sense, "family resemblances" to democratization across cultures, vernacular studies insist that such resemblances are not proof of an end of history or a culturally homogeneous modernity. Notwithstanding certain family resemblances, modernity is multiple in its organizations and meanings (Eisenstadt 2000; Hefner 1998c; Knauft 2002). Democracy and democratization will be as well.

In the case of Muslim societies, there is a distinctive organizational tension to the requirement that pluralism and democratization have vernacular roots. Although Islam has jurists and religious scholars, it has no pope, sacerdotal priesthood, or ecclesiastical hierarchy to coordinate their actions. In most times and places, religious scholars (ulama) claimed the main responsibility for fulfilling Islam's prime ethical imperative, "commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong" (al-amr bi'l-ma'ruf wa'l-nahy 'an al-munkar; see Cook 2000). They did so on the grounds that they were most knowledgeable in the sciences of the Qur'an and the traditions of the Prophet.

Even in premodern times, however, just how scholars carried out this duty and who among them was most qualified to do so were questions on which consensus was often difficult. The ulama might recognize an informal hierarchy in their ranks, and, in the Shi'a Muslim world in particular, at times the hierarchy's behavior bore a passing resemblance to the ecclesiastical disciplines of Western Christianity (see Arjomand 1988, 177–188; Cole 2002, 189–211). In many countries, however, Muslims recognized more than one school of religious law (madhhab). Even where a community adhered to just one school, individual jurists (fuqaha) could reach different conclusions on matters of social importance, and the most expert reserved the right to issue opinions of their own. Although they usually shied away from interfering directly in debates on the shari'a, rulers, too, did not hesitate to meddle in religious affairs indirectly. They patronized scholars and mystics who voiced opinions on shari'a similar to their own. They supported shrines to Sufi saints and sponsored religious festivals that, while avoiding comment on the details of the law, nonetheless enacted a visual model of the way religion, politics, and the social were to be imagined (see Eaton 1984, 334; Hammoudi 1997, 68–80; Woodward 1989, 199–214). Rulers also appointed court jurists to serve as spokespersons before the scholarly community. It is telling, however, that the latter experts were viewed as having "no monopoly of giving fatwas [religious opinions], and the practice of consulting private scholars of high reputation has never ceased" (Schacht 1964, 74). Stories of holy men resisting rulers' interference were a classic theme in the popular religious imagination (Messick 1993, 143; Munson 1993, 27). Not the centralized Church of Roman Christendom, religious authority in the Muslim community as a whole tended toward a fissiparous pluricentrism.[4]

As Zaman illustrates in his discussion of modern Pakistan (chapter 3; see also Zaman 2002), in most contemporary Muslim societies the ulama still play a role in public ethical discussion. However, modern pressures for pluralism and popular participation are increasingly apparent as well. They can be seen in the fact that the precise influence of ulama on public discussion varies widely, as do local understandings of just who is and who is not qualified to provide informed religious opinion. In recent years, then, the long established pluricentrism of religious authority has been compounded by a participatory revolution transforming Muslim culture and politics as a whole.

As Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori have observed (1996, 13; cf. Abaza 2002; Esposito and Voll 2001, 3–22), one of the most significant elements in this transformation has been the emergence of “new Muslim intellectuals” across the Muslim world.[5] Although some are graduates of religious schools (madrasa) and are familiar with classical commentaries, the majority of new Muslim intellectuals are alumni of national educational systems who acquired their religious knowledge through self-study or participation in small discussion groups (halaqah). As recent events in Zaman’s Pakistan, White’s Turkey, Eickelman’s Morocco (chapter 2), and Michael Peletz’s Malaysia (chapter 10) all illustrate, one characteristic of their autodidactic education is that the new Muslim intellectuals tend to be more interested than their classical predecessors in linking their religious studies to nontraditional concerns. Some of these are of a loosely populist nature, touching on questions of how to raise one’s children, how to live a good life, or how to make household ends meet. At the elite end of the public spectrum, however, others among the new intellectuals grapple with the question of Islam’s relation to science, democracy, human rights, and globalization (cf. Abdillah 1997; Eisenstadt 2002; Esposito and Voll 2001; Meeker 1991). Religious conservatives may reject such reflexive extensions of the tradition as “innovations” (bid‘a) incompatible with God’s law. But other Muslim thinkers, as well as masses of ordinary believers, will beg to differ.

There is an additional organizational feature to these efforts to press public culture and politics into a more participatory mold. The Islamic resurgence took place in the aftermath of a great social and cultural transformation across most of the Muslim world. Urbanization, migration, and growing socioeconomic differentiation combined to undermine received and often village-centered religious disciplines. The state's inability to meet all but a portion of the needs of the new urban masses also created a demand for alternative providers of public services in the fields of health, education, and public security. Finally, mass education, literacy, and a growing network of mosques and Islamic schools combined to strengthen the determination of ordinary Muslims to exercise choice and take charge of their faith (Eickelman 1992). Together, these developments generated a great popular appetite for a more participatory practice of public life and religion. Dale Eickelman and James Piscatori (1996) have rightly seen these events as a potential foundation for a democratic reformation of Muslim politics.

This democratic potential is real enough. However, its realization will depend upon more than the mere fact of heightened popular participation. As events in Europe during the first half of the twentieth century showed all too tragically, mass participation under conditions of ethnoreligious pluralism can generate enormous social tensions, the effects of which may be anything but democratic. As with European fascism and communism, if popular participation and social competition are not embedded in cultures and powers of a civic-pluralist sort, the result may be more polarizing and violent than it is democratic. There is no dearth of such examples in today's world (Brass 2003; Hansen 1999; Hefner 2000; Mamdani 2001). Whether the mass participation that so marks the modern age is democratizing, then, depends on not just participation or associations in civil society, but the higher-level cultures and organizations to which ground-level mobilizations are linked.

In the case of Muslim societies, in particular, the outcome of the new pluralist participation will depend upon a third feature of contemporary Muslim politics: the efforts of rival groupings to "scale up" their influence by strengthening their organizations in society and forging pacts or alliances with influential actors and agencies in the state. Mobilizational initiatives like these usually begin at the local level, with efforts to bring together like-minded actors in associations dedicated to some social, religious, or welfare task. It is activities like these that recent studies of civil society have tended to privilege as the spring from which democratic cultures flow. However, if they are to have a lasting influence in society as a whole, at some point these activities and networks must be drawn into what the sociologist Peter Evans (1996) has described as collaborations “across the state-society divide.” As Theda Skocpol has also observed (arguing against Durkheimian portrayals of civil society as entirely independent of the state), civic groups in nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century America were not merely local and not always nonpolitical. Many were linked to translocal organizational networks that sought to forge ties with national leaders and associations so as to influence state policies (Skocpol 1999, 33).[6] There are myriad reasons for civic groups in modern Muslim societies to want to do the same. From the perspective of prodemocracy groupings in particular, it is clear that without some measure of coordinate support from the state and the legal system, democratic elements in society remain vulnerable to attack by uncivil elements in state and society (Hefner 2001; Keane 1996).

It goes without saying, of course, that collaborations across the statesociety divide can be put to nondemocratic ends as well. As in Zia ul- Haq’s Pakistan (chapter 3), post-Nasser Egypt (chapter 6), modern Saudi Arabia (chapter 8), and post-Soeharto Indonesia (chapter 11), some state officials may conclude that it is in their interest to make common cause with ultraconservative Islamists, rather than Muslim democrats. At other times or in other places, however, ruling elites may choose to lend a hand to the reformist cause. Whatever the political establishment’s tack, the prevalence of such mobilizations and alliances in countries across the Islamic world shows that contemporary Muslim politics has changed. It is no longer restricted to a handful of elites, religious dignitaries, and representatives of the privileged classes. The age of mass mobilization has dawned, and with it has come not merely a pluralization of the political field, but a contestive pluralization centered on rival interpretations of Muslim politics, and rival efforts to organize in society and across the state-society divide.

In the competitions that ensue, Muslim parties and organizations sometimes enjoy a distinctive advantage over their secular rivals. As Jenny White (2002) has demonstrated for Turkey and Carrie Rosefsky Wickham (2002) in Egypt, some of the most successful of today’s Islamic mobilizations owe their success not to formal ideology or top-down party organizations, but to the local networks and relationships from which they draw their membership. Muslim mobilizations often take preexisting religious networks built around neighborhood mosques and religious schools and weave them together into a parallel Islamic sector. As in the Egyptian case (Wickham 2002, 93–118), some Islamic organizations do so by offering educational and health services the state is unable or unwilling to provide. However, the really decisive advantage enjoyed by these mobilizations is their ability to organize their constituencies “on an individual level through known, trusted neighbors, building on sustained, face-to-face relationships, and by situating its political message within the community’s cultural codes and norms” (White 2002, 7). While government parties show a preference for a top-down and bureaucratic organization, the new Islamist mobilizations are a politics in the vernacular par excellence.

Again, whether this participation in the vernacular is democratizing is another, more complex question. The contrast between the Egyptian and Turkish examples on this point indicates that the political outcome of the effort can be varied, to say the least. Egypt’s Islamists have tended to be conservative on matters of democracy, pluralism, and women’s rights, although there are signs this may be changing. Turkey’s Islamic parties have tended to look more favorably on democracy and pluralist freedoms. The difference reflects not merely basic cultural differences between these two societies, but, as Richard Norton shows in his chapter, the Egyptian state’s unfortunate habit of combining the repression of democracy activists with mobilization of conservative Islamic clients (cf. Sullivan and Abed-Kotob 1999, 126; Wickham 2002, 21–35).

These and other examples illustrate once more that there is no uniform Muslim modernity, nor a monolithic Muslim politics. What Muslim- majority societies do have in common, however, is a new dynamic of popular participation and contestive pluralism. In a growing number of nations, this condition is not merely challenging the old ways of doing things; it is inspiring dreams of a Muslim politics that is civil and democratic.[7]

 Remaking Muslim Politics

Against the backdrop of these three features of contemporary Muslim politics, it is perhaps easier to understand the distinctive aims and methods of the groups discussed in this volume, most of whom hope to bring about a civic-pluralist reformation of Muslim politics. In light of the first concern of Muslim politics, the concern for religious legitimation, we should not be surprised to see that reformers devote what is, from a Western utilitarian perspective, an inordinate amount of time and energy to coming together to read, write, and formulate the terms for a new practice of Muslim politics. Some reformers do little more than share their reflections with a handful of like-minded intellectuals; others may have access to public platforms in institutions like universities and research institutes. Some, too, may take advantage of new publishing technologies and the Internet to disseminate their writings to larger and more anonymous publics. As Dale F. Eickelman and Peter Mandaville show in their essays on media and transnational Islam (chapters 2 and 12; see also Anderson 2003; Eickelman and Anderson 1999), modern print and electronic media have allowed for the transmission of new ideas even into communities once walled off by established guardians of the faith.[8]

Where conservatives still command a significant mass following, these tentative probes toward pluralist reform may often display a “nonpolitical” guise. As in Diane Singerman’s discussion of legal reform in contemporary Egypt (chapter 7) or Gwenn Okruhlik’s analysis of pluralism in Saudi Arabia (chapter 8), proponents of reform in such circumstances may choose to focus their efforts not on formal politics, but on educational programs, incremental legal reforms, and public discussions that offer ordinary Muslims an element of choice and participation. Sometimes they also do so because, as Okruhlik makes clear, the reformers are not clamoring for a full-fledged party democracy as much as they are simple pluralist freedoms. Not public spheres of citizen participation in the modern sense of the phrase (see Calhoun 1992; Habermas 1989), the limited-access nature of these activities may also be intended to reduce the risk of conflict with conservative opponents. If and when these “nonpolitical” initiatives begin to make headway, however, the effort almost always goes public, and, as with Singerman’s legal activists, is accompanied by attempts to forge alliances with sympathetic actors in state and society.

But going public has its risks. It may only galvanize the ultraconservative opposition and increase the likelihood of confrontation. Committed as they are to a less state-centric practice of their faith, civic-pluralist Muslims may feel torn when confronted by conservative violence and intimidation. Some are willing to, and do, give their lives for the pluralist cause. Recognizing that the success of their efforts depends on long-term changes and the demobilization of “uncivil” groupings, others may quietly retreat to the security of private life and friendships, away from the threat of state repression or public confrontation, praying the storm will pass. Satellite dishes, Internet connections, and the quiet circulation of pamphlets and books may be the only signs of a profession of the faith at odds with those in the commanding heights of religious society.

In the best of circumstances, however, the reformists may succeed at building social coalitions and even creating collaborations across the state-society divide. If and when they achieve the latter, they may get access to the legal and educational resources needed to scale up their influence well beyond the limited-access groupings of society (Eickelman and Anderson 1999, 14; Bowen 2003, 258–68; Hefner 1997). A process of this sort is already underway in countries like Turkey, Iran, Morocco, Malaysia, and Indonesia. In these countries, the movement for a civic- pluralist Islam is no longer just a matter of limited-group discussions, Internet chat groups, or tacit pacts with sympathetic government officials; it has become a powerful stream in public politics and culture. The setbacks that have occurred in several of these countries cannot hide the fact that the struggle to remake Muslim politics is here to stay, and that the circumstances and desires to which it responds are widespread across the Muslim world.

With some 1.3 billion of the world’s 6 billion people professing Islam, the outcome of this struggle to reorient Muslim politics is likely to be one of the defining political events of the twenty-first century. As a result of globalization and immigration, the contest will also impact Western societies directly. As John Bowen and Peter Mandaville’s essays make especially clear, several Western countries are themselves in the midst of a great Muslim immigration, and their strategies for accommodating the new immigrants vary. Already there are 5 million to 7 million Muslims in the U.S., and no fewer than 30 million in Western Europe, where their numbers are growing more rapidly than the general population (Cesari 1994; Nielsen 1992). As Bowen and Mandaville both show, many among the new population are grappling with the question of what it means to be European or American and Muslim (see AlSayyad and Castells 2002; Ramadan 1999). Although, as Mandaville’s essay also illustrates, a few have lent their support to international jihadi causes, the more prominent have begun to play a central role in the pluralist stream of transnational Islam (see Mandaville 2001). Their ability to do so effectively over the long run, however, will depend on the willingness of Western societies to accord Muslims full rights of citizenship. This will demonstrate more effectively than any media campaign that there is no clash of civilizations between Islam and the West, but a convergence of interests among people of civil-democratic conviction.

 Conditions of a Modern Possibility

There is a broader background to this volume’s examination of contemporary efforts to remake Muslim politics. It bears on the question of how we are to understand that politics in relation to processes of participation, pluralization, and democratization seen in other parts of the world. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe and the successful transitions from authoritarianism in Korea and Taiwan inspired optimism about the prospects for transitions of a similar nature in other non-Western societies, including Muslim ones. A host of political scientists, sociologists, and anthropologists threw themselves into the task of determining just why authoritarian regimes collapse and what their fate says about the conditions that might allow for transitions elsewhere.

As is not uncommon in such high-stakes endeavors, the academic community never reached a consensus on most of these questions. Pressed by real-world problems, however, Western policy analysts had no such luxury. They were compelled by force of circumstances to come up with actionable guidelines for democratic transitions. Unlike their obstreperous academic counterparts, then, policy circles soon settled on a few rival models, each with a very different view of the cross-cultural prospects for democracy.

The first model emphasized that the key to democracy and sustainable prosperity lay with the bedrock institutions emphasized by Western Cold Warriors during their half-century of battle with Soviet totalitarianism: free markets and fair elections. In 1993, the historian and policy analyst Francis Fukuyama presented one of the more celebrated versions of this argument.

He suggested that the modern world had arrived at “the end of history,” in the sense that it was no longer possible for any serious person to believe that there were weighty alternatives to liberal democracy and capitalism. Each time Fukuyama voiced his views, of course, one could hear the sighs of British social democrats, Christian conservatives, deliberative democrats, and American communitarians, all of whom (from different perspectives) lamented what they regarded as a slighting of their recommendations for amendments to liberalism’s orthodoxy.

For several years in the early 1990s, however, the Fukuyama formula had an air of commonsense inevitability about it, at least in American policy circles. This was the case not so much because policy makers subscribed to the Hegelian claim that history had ended, but because in anxious circumstances like those of postcommunist Europe, Fukuyama’s model was one of the few that seemed to offer a workable guide for the future. The key to sustainable democracy was, simply enough, free elections and “getting markets right.”

It was not long, however, before the din of real-world events began to raise questions about the adequacy of the markets-and-elections model. It was not that free elections and equitably competitive markets are not useful things. The problem was that knowing that they are useful is not quite the same as understanding what is required to get them up and running and sustainable. As a series of setbacks in Eastern Europe and Russia during the 1990s showed (Gray 1993), free markets are not “free” in the sense that they are the spontaneous product of unconstrained social exchange. Their free and fair operation depends upon a host of resources in state and society that together “embed” the marketplace (Granovetter 1985; Hefner 1998b; Hollingsworth and Boyer 1997). To build trust, enforce contracts, control crime, and, in a word, make a modern market work, a good deal more is needed than self-interested exchange among so many Robinson Crusoes (Clegg and Redding 1990; Hamilton 1998).

This same qualifying note is all the more relevant when it comes to understanding what is required to make pluralist democracy work. Ethnoreligious violence in Yugoslavia, the genocide in Rwanda, Hindu-Muslim strife in India, racial attacks on immigrants in Germany—these and other developments during the 1990s demonstrated that, at least outside of Washington’s Beltway, there were a fair number of people who had yet to learn that history had ended. Indeed, rather than the end of history, outbreaks of communal violence in the 1990s seemed to indicate that, with the Cold War over, “local” histories and cultures had reasserted themselves with a vengeance.

One response to this disturbing realization was to throw up one’s hands and conclude that democracy is, above all, a Western institution that depends on Judeo-Christian values; as such, it can take root only in societies of Judeo-Christian background. The most influential statement of this position was that of the Harvard political scientist Samuel P. Huntington, first in a widely read article (Huntington 1993) and then in a later book, The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order (1996). Whereas Fukuyama had implied that Muslim societies were unlikely to resist the great wave of democratization (Fukuyama 1993, 45–46), Huntington argued that democracy depends on a complex of values and institutions lacking in many non-Western societies, not least of all Muslim ones. The list of requisite values and institutions included “individualism, liberalism, constitutionalism, human rights, equality, liberty, the rule of law, democracy, free markets, the separation of church and state” (Huntington 1993, 40).

Huntington’s pessimism represented a departure from his earlier views on the “third wave” of democratization (Huntington 1991). In writings subsequent to his 1993 article, as well as a two-year monthly seminar on cultural globalization at Harvard University that I was invited to attend, he softened the argument somewhat, recognizing that its strict cultural assumptions might be taken as a counsel of relativist despair. European and American policy analysts shared this reservation. In these and other circles, pressure mounted for an alternative to the clash-of-civilizations model.

The alternative was forthcoming soon enough. Setting aside generalizations about civilization and top-down emphases on markets and elections, the new paradigm stressed the importance of grassroots initiatives for building democracy. There were many variations on this model, but perhaps the most influential was Robert Putnam’s Making Democracy Work: Civic Institutions in Modern Italy (1993). In this engagingly well written book, Putnam took a page from Alexis de Tocqueville’s nineteenth-century

Democracy in America (1969) and argued that civil society and social capital are “the key to making democracy work” (1993, 185). Drawing on, but also narrowing, a theoretical concept earlier developed by the sociologists Pierre Bourdieu and James Coleman, Putnam defined social capital as “features of social organization, such as trust, norms, and networks, that can improve the efficiency of society by facilitating coordinated actions” (Putnam 1993, 167). Putnam’s main thesis was that it was in these voluntary, “horizontal” networks that citizens develop the trust, cooperative skills, and egalitarian attitudes required for democracy. Within these analytic horizons, it was hard to resist Putnam’s bold conclusion: “Membership in horizontally ordered groups (like sports clubs, cooperatives, mutual aid societies, cultural associations, and voluntary unions)” is “positively associated with good government,” while “membership rates in hierarchically ordered organizations” are “negatively associated with good government” (Putnam 1993, 176). For one brief shining moment, it seemed as if the long-sought recipe for democracy had been found.

The press of real-world events made the concepts of civil society and social capital all the more appealing in policy circles. With several postcommunist states teetering on the edge of collapse, and with the awful evidence that rulers in some countries had deliberately provoked acts of ethnoreligious violence to neutralize rivals, the state in some post-Cold War countries had begun to look like a part of the problem rather than the solution. The idea of civil society provided policy makers with the license they needed to look beyond the halls of state for partners in society.

However beneficial its program impact, the idea of civil society was just not strong enough to stand up under the weight of the theoretical burden it had been assigned. Irrigation associations, small-credit cooperatives, and women’s crisis centers are one thing, but what about racially based secret societies, civilian militias, or fundamentalist cults? Sociologically speaking, the latter are all voluntary organizations situated in the space between the family and the state. As such, they qualify for membership in civil society, at least according to the definitions most widely used during the 1990s (see Hall 1995; Hann 1996; Hefner 1998a; Rot- berg 2001; Skocpol and Fiorina 1999). However, as with Hindu nationalists in India mobilizing their networks to attack Muslims (Brass 2002, 6; Hansen 1999, 203–14), or Rwandan priests using their leadership capital to goad parishioners to kill Tutsis (Mamdani 2001, 226), the idea that all civil society associations and all social capital are “good” for democracy runs up against one unnerving complication: social capital can be used for all manner of ends, including antidemocratic ones.[9]

All this is to say that associations that are, locationally speaking, part of civil society are not always “civil” in terms of the attitudes they inspire or the political culture they promote (Hefner 2001; Keane 1996, 10). Some forms of social capital and some civic organizations are democracyfriendly, but others —Hutu death squads, the Ku Klux Klan—are not. Robert Putnam’s 1993 work attempted to anticipate this objection by emphasizing that it is horizontally organized civic associations that are democracy-friendly, while vertically controlled ones are not. Associations of a horizontal sort, he argued, foster “robust forms of reciprocity” and communicate mutual expectations in “reinforcing encounters,” thereby enhancing trust and increasing the flow of communication (1993, 173–4). But many of America’s extreme right-wing militias, as well as religious extremists in many parts of the world (Juergensmeyer 2000), show these same robustly reciprocal qualities. And, unfortunately, they do so without producing habits of the democratic heart.

In a subsequent study of social capital in the United States (Putnam 2000), Putnam introduced a useful qualification on his earlier argument, one broadly consistent with the lessons from several essays in this volume. Recognizing that not all social capital is democracy- or pluralismfriendly, Putnam distinguished what he called an exclusive or “bonding” social capital from an inclusive or “bridging” variant. Bonding organizations, he observed, are “inward looking and tend to reinforce exclusive identities and homogeneous groups” (Putnam 2000, 22). By contrast, bridging social capital tends to “generate broader identities and reciprocity” (23). The latter may be well suited for mediating ethnic and religious divisions.

Another way of saying this is that real-and-existing civil societies are always rife with social tensions, not least of all because, rather than being blissfully homogeneous, they are crosscut by divisions of religion, ideology, ethnicity, gender, and class (Hefner 2001; Keane 1996; Stolle and Rochon 2001). Unless counteracted by more encompassing organizations and discourses that extend participatory rights beyond the ingroup, these divisions can generate social tensions that are anything but democratic. Moreover, notwithstanding the romantic view of civil society as entirely independent of the state, the development of these stabilizing arrangements depends not only on forces in society, but on symbiotic collaborations across the state-society divide (Evans 1996; Hefner 2001; Skocpol 1999).

Here, then, are a few lessons from recent discussions in democratic theory relevant for understanding events in the Muslim world. They provide important clues as to when the participatory revolution transforming contemporary Muslim politics may be democratizing, and when it may not.

 Resurgence and Democratization

As noted above, during the 1970s and 1980s, the Muslim world witnessed a resurgence of piety and public religious activity unprecedented in modern history. The physical signs of this change were ubiquitous: in mosque construction, the proliferation of religious studies circles, crowded Friday worship, pilgrimages to Mecca, bearded men, veiled women, and the growth of Islamic publishing. Earlier, during the heyday of modernization theory in the 1950s, Western analysts had forecast that Muslim societies would inevitably experience the same processes of privatization and decline that, it was assumed (too simplistically), religion in the modern West had undergone. Muslims might be latecomers to the secularization process, the argument went, but they too would succumb to the secularist juggernaut (Lerner 1958). By the time the Islamic revolution swept Iran in 1978–79, this forecast had begun to look jejune. By the early 1990s, it seemed simply absurd.

Ironically, part of the foundation for the resurgence had been laid back in the 1950s and early 1960s not by pious Muslims, but by the secular nationalist leaders who governed most of the newly independent countries of the Muslim world. However meager their achievements in economic policy, the nationalists made headway in the field of general education. Certainly, their record was still modest by comparison with educational programs in East Asia, not least of all because in some Muslim societies women’s education lagged significantly behind that of men. In addition, in a few poor countries, like Pakistan, Afghanistan, and the Sudan, rates of education even for males remained stubbornly low (UNDP 2002). Notwithstanding these qualifications, nationalist governments in the majority of countries succeeded in creating the first generation of Muslim youth with general literacy and educational skills (see Eickelman 1992).

During these early years, most among the newly educated applied their skills to more or less secular ends, exactly as nationalist leaders had hoped. From Morocco to Indonesia, socialist and secular nationalist slogans predominated among the educated middle class. With the notable exception of Saudi Arabia, where the state was officially based on shari‘a law, Islamist issues and parties seemed to have been outflanked by their secular rivals, and seemed marginal to the central currents of postcolonial Muslim politics.

Although their specific views varied from country to country, nationalist ideologues agreed in asserting that folk culture was to blame for the Muslim world’s backwardness, and popular culture would have to be aggressively recast if society were to progress. In this regard, the nationalists shared an elite-modernist impulse with Mustafa Kemal, the secularizing founder of modern Turkey (see Berkes 1998). However, with the exception of Kemalist Turkey, nationalist leaders hesitated to launch a too-direct attack on religious institutions. Recognizing Islam’s crowd appeal, leaders instead cloaked their secularist programs in a nationalist garb that “retained a modest Islamic façade, incorporating some reference to Islam in their constitutions such as the ruler must be a Muslim or that the shariah was a source of law, even when it was not” (Esposito 2000, 2).

Soon, however, the nationalist edifice began to weaken. Having raised popular expectations to such unrealistic heights, the nationalists only insured the population’s greater disappointment as it became clear that the state was unable to deliver on its promises. The sense of crisis was exacerbated by a demographic transition taking place across the Muslim world. From 1950 to 1990, the proportion of the population living in urban areas swelled, as a result of rural-to-urban migration and, especially in Africa and the Middle East, some of the world’s highest fertility rates. In forty years, urban populations grew 200 to 300 percent, without a corresponding expansion in urban infrastructures. Still predominantly rural in 1950, by 1990 all but a handful of Muslim countries saw 35 to 55 percent of their population residing in cities and towns. There residents suffered the usual ill effects of pollution, crime, unemployment, and poor state services (see Brown 2000, 123–30).

By the early 1970s, then, the secular, socialist, and nationalist stars that had once shone so brightly had begun to lose their luster. Yet the need for some kind of public ethical compass was more compelling than ever. With masses of people from different ethnic and regional backgrounds packed into slums, the old ways of village and town had become obsolescent. The impersonal and often corrupt bureaucracies of state and party inspired even less confidence.

It was during this period, then, that neighborhoods across the Muslim world witnessed a steady expansion in the number of mosques and madrasas. Americans familiar with the role played by urban churches in their own country during the late-nineteenth century, when ethnically based congregations helped to integrate foreign immigrants into American society, should find little startling in this phenomenon (Finke and Stark 1992; Wuthnow 1988). Researchers who have examined the wave of Protestant conversion in urban Latin America during the 1970s and 1980s (Martin 1990; Stoll 1990) will also recognize parallels. For the urban poor and lower-middle class, mosques and religious schools offered islands of civility and moral clarity in a turbulent sea. In the face of growing class- and status-differentiation, these institutions provided avenues of participation for believers otherwise consigned to society’s margins. As in the late-nineteenth-century United States, the pervasiveness of religious associations gave a deeply religious hue to interactions in civil society. That society was not made up of modern liberalism’s individuals freed from ethnoreligious bonds, but individuals and groups bound by crosscutting ties of kinship, ethnicity, and religion.

One telling indicator of the public’s heightened interest in religion was the rapid development of a market for inexpensive Islamic books and magazines. The literature provided a means for people who had never had an opportunity to study in religious schools to familiarize themselves with the fundaments of their faith (Gonzalez-Quijano 1998; Eickelman and Anderson 1999). The opportunity also stimulated the emergence of a new class of teachers and preachers, with target audiences different from those of the classically trained ulama (Eickelman and Piscatori 1996). Most of the preachers had only a vague familiarity with classical religious scholarship, although, as in Egypt, a few were unemployed graduates of religious colleges (Gaffney 1994). More important yet, the new preachers made their message relevant in ways different from the scholastic preaching of mainstream ulama, adapting their topics to the concerns of urban publics. Such were the demands of entrepreneurial success in an increasingly competitive religious market.

Here then was the background to the great religious resurgence seen across the Muslim world in the 1970s and 1980s. Described in the language of modern political theory, the resurgence was primarily an affair of civil society, not the state.[10] Equally important, notwithstanding its impact on rural society, its leading lights and organizations were urban in ethos and organization. The resurgence created a great reservoir of social capital, comprised of networks and solidarities dedicated above all else to public piety and expressions of Islamic identity. As with denominational Christianity in America in the nineteenth century (Finke and Stark 1992; Hatch 1989), the heightened religiosity was accompanied by fierce competition among purveyors of different religious messages. Among the case studies offered in this book, only Afghanistan stood apart from the general pattern of a public Islam redefined by the interests and choices of urban consumers (see Barfield’s chapter 9).

Although the cultural temperament of the Islamic resurgence varied from country to country, the process as a whole shared three basic characteristics. The first was that, in scope and density, the resurgence represented a historically unprecedented mobilization of civil society, one that created vast new reserves of social capital—“features of social organization, such as trust, norms, and networks” for “facilitating coordinated actions” (Putnam 1993, 167). In the first instance, the networks and energies of this Islamic social capital were primarily dedicated to public religious activities. Mosques and madrasas became the anchors for new forms of public association. The call to prayer marked the rhythms of the day. More women began to veil. Greetings and other everyday commen- salities were peppered with Islamic gestures and phrases.

A second observation is equally important, although it is sometimes overlooked in commentaries that overemphasize the politics of the resurgence or, worse yet, confuse it with radical Islamism. In its early years, the resurgence was a profoundly public event, but not one that was especially political in any formal sense of the term. Most of the newly pious were primarily interested in just what they claimed to be: religious study, heightened public devotion, expressing a Muslim identity, and insuring that public arenas were subject to ethical regulation. The key symbols of the resurgence were similarly pietistic: reciting the Qur'an, keeping the fast, wearing the veil, avoiding alcohol, giving alms. The Muslim world was not alone in witnessing a resurgence of public religion in these years. As Jose Casanova has noted, a similar "deprivatization" of religion took place among Hindus in India, evangelicals in Africa and the Americas, and in many other countries (Casanova 1994; cf. Berger 1999, Martin 1990; van der Veer 1994). Many of the faithful in these settings were as much concerned with creating islands of civility and piety as they were anything strictly political.

The third feature of the resurgence, however, raises a more sobering question concerning its long-term political impact. In light of its scale and the competition among its promoters, it was inevitable that at some point religious entrepreneurs would move to channel the resurgence's social capital into political ends. The process was made all the more likely in that religious associations were among the few public arenas in which ordinary people could make their voices heard.

Again, however, it is important to emphasize that the range of political ideals voiced varied enormously. Some believers insisted on the compatibility of Islam with pluralism and democracy. Others called for a totalizing transformation of the social order according to an unchanging plan, modeled on an ideal of pristine unity identified with the first generation of Muslim believers (see Voll 1991). Nowhere was the tension between these two visions of Muslim politics more apparent than in matters of women's rights and personal status law. In some countries, conservative Islamists tried to mobilize their membership to reverse legislation on women's rights dating from the earlier nationalist period, on the grounds that it was un-Islamic (Keddie 1991; Kandiyoti 1995). At the same time, developments in education and employment continued to draw growing numbers of women, even from conservative Islamist families, into public life. The result has been an ambiguous and unfinished remaking of women’s roles. In all but the most conservative organizations, women today are more prominent than ever in the workforce, public religious life, and even political parties (see Abu-Lughod 1998; White 2002, 52).

At the same time, in many societies conservative Islamists militate in support of polygyny, gender segregation, and mandatory veiling. In short, women’s participation in public life has increased in most of the Muslim world. Whether that participation is to take place on the basis of equality and democratic dignity is a question that has yet to be resolved.

Whatever its social ambiguities, the resurgence has clearly acquired a new and, in at least some circles, more political tack. The question now is which among the variety of Muslim politics is to prevail.

 At the Crossroads

To understand why some resurgents would turn to an undemocratic interpretation of Muslim politics, it is helpful to recall that although the radicals’ ideas represented a break with mainstream Muslim politics, they did not emerge from a cultural vacuum. Most radical Islamists justify their actions with reference to the ideas of a few seminal thinkers who rose to international prominence in the 1950s and 1960s. The most influential of these are the Egyptian literary critic turned Islamist, Sayyid Qutb (1906–66; see Moussalli 1992), and the Pakistani theorist Mawlana Sayyid Abu’l-A‘la Mawdudi (1903–79; see Nasr 1996). Both of these writers were in turn influenced by the earlier, ultraconservative reformism of Ibn Abd al-Wahhab in what is today Saudi Arabia (Voll 1991, 345–52).

A key theme in these writers’ works is that God alone has sovereignty (hakimiyya) over the world, and that he has provided Muslims with what amounts to a complete (kaffah) ethical model for social and political life. This guidance, these authors claim, is contained in a religious law for all times, the shari‘a. Whereas classically trained scholars regarded the law as complex, subtle, and always in need of expert exegesis (Zubaida 2003, 24–27), modern Islamists tend to insist that the law’s meaning is transparent to all willing to submit to its commands. The fact that even radical Islamists cannot agree on the law’s myriad details does not diminish this faith in the clarity and singularity of divine command. Inasmuch as God’s law is clear, those who refuse its implementation are seen as having allied themselves with the forces of godlessness (jahiliyya). Muslims, even the masses of ordinary Muslims, are to be shunned if and when they fall into such error. Through injunctions like these, radical thinkers provide a cultural rationale for a “bonding capital” that is “inward looking and tend[s] to reinforce exclusive identities and homogeneous groups” (Putnam 2000, 22). At the limit, where rulers and publics are deemed in violation of God’s command, armed struggle against both may be required.

According to these same writers, a key feature of Islam’s comprehensiveness is that Islam does not recognize a separation of religion and state, but demands their unitary fusion in an “Islamic” state. This formula is said to be based on the model of the Prophet and his rightly guided successors. As a number of writers have observed (Brown 2000; Roy 1994; Zubaida 1993), this alleged precedent actually neglects as much as it claims to recall. It forgets that, historically, the great majority of Muslim jurists believed that “the law is God’s law, not to be harnessed to the needs and the interests of the state” (Tucker 1998, 37). The conservative formula also fails to recognize that a richly differentiated political landscape took shape even during the Prophet’s lifetime, and developed all the more after his death, as the Muslim community evolved from a small charismatic movement to a great world civilization (Lapidus 1975; Zubaida 1993, 2). For it to have been otherwise, for Muslim society and politics to have remained an undifferentiated totality, would have meant the impoverishment and inevitable collapse of Muslim civilization. Muslim societies thrived precisely because their leaders adopted a flexible and differentiated approach in matters of governance, culture, and society.

Rather than fidelity to prophetic precedents, then, the Islamist dream of an all-encompassing religious governance bespeaks a modern bias, one all too familiar in the twentieth-century West. It is the dream of using the leviathan powers of the modern state to push citizens toward a pristine political purity. As the author of an excellent biography of Mawdudi has remarked, there is little in this vision that is specifically Islamic:

Mawdudi’s assimilation of Western ideas in his discourse flowed without interruption. The Islamic state duplicated, assimilated, and reproduced Western political concepts, structures, and operations, producing a theory of statecraft that, save for its name and its use of Islamic terms and symbols, showed little indigenous influence. (Nasr 1996, 90)

Another stream in modern Muslim politics, however, has spoken out against an etatist and essentializing interpretation of politics, calling instead for a pluralistic organization of state and society. Whether with Ab- dolkarim Soroush and the reformists in postrevolutionary Iran (Soroush 2000), Nurcholish Madjid and the “renewal” (pembaruan) movement in Indonesia (Hefner 2000), or Rachid Ghannouchi in Tunisia (Tamimi 2001; cf. Kurzman 1998, 19), a central theme of civil Islam has been the insistence that some degree of separation of state and religious authority is necessary to protect the integrity of Islam itself. The point is not that religion should be a purely private matter, but that its values are more susceptible to corruption if responsibility for religious affairs is surrendered to state elites.

“Religion forbids us from assuming a God-like character,” writes the Iranian dissident (and former anti-American militant) Abdolkarim Soroush (Soroush 2000, 64). He goes on: “This is especially true in politics and government where limiting the power of the state, division of powers, and the doctrine of checks and balances are established in order to prevent accumulation of power that might lead to such Godly claims” (64). Like many Muslim reformers, Soroush’s formula borrows some of its vocabulary from Western democratic theory. But it also speaks in a movingly evocative vernacular, invoking the example of Islam’s great jurists, who protected Islam’s ideals by refusing to grant rulers a monopoly over religious truth. Rather than a pristine fusion, then, civil Islamists relocate the center of public religion to the associations and dialogue of civil society, while also pressing for a system of pluralist government subject to effective checks and balances.

Whether the civic-pluralist stream in contemporary Muslim political culture will spread and become the model for a broader, pluralistic reformation of Muslim politics will depend upon more than the cogency of a few intellectuals' arguments. Since September 11, 2001, in particular, Muslim and Western scholars alike have realized that the civil Islamic effort faces a new and unexpected challenge. The September attacks showed that an armed fringe in the radical Islamist community is attempting to overcome its disadvantage in numbers by pressing its one comparative advantage. Groups like the al-Qa'ida and the Jema'ah Islamiyah in Southeast Asia have taken advantage of globalization to link their finances and military resources to local conflicts to which Muslims are party (see Gu- naratna 2002; ICG 2002; see chapter 11 below). Prior to the overthrow of the Taliban in late 2001, the arms, training, and ideological guidance provided at al-Qa'ida camps in Afghanistan added fuel to some of the Muslim world's most flammable conflicts. As Barfield's essay illustrates (chapter 9), the Taliban and al-Qa'ida made an odd couple indeed. Al-Qa'ida is an internationalist organization led by well-heeled dissidents from the ranks of the Muslim upper-middle class, while the Taliban were a ragtag gang of parochial ethnics who emerged from the ruins of the most backward state in the Muslim world.

Unfortunately, as recent attacks in Indonesia, the Philippines, Turkey, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia have shown, al-Qa'ida and like-minded groupings seem intent on extending odd-couple collaborations like these to other parts of the world. They have made their methods clear. They channel transnational flows of money, arms, and fighters into local conflicts. In so doing, they also portray these conflicts not as local, but as part of a global clash of civilizations pitting Christians, Jews, Hindus, and other "crusaders" against Muslims. Having described the struggle in these Manichaean terms, the radicals provide a moral rationale for attacking the enemies of Islam everywhere they are to be found. For Western readers of the present book, it is essential to realize that the violence is targeted not only at Western interests, but at pluralist and moderate Muslims. The violence aims to polarize local conflicts and, in so doing, destroy the political center.

In a few instances, these tactics have succeeded in giving local jihadis an influence greatly out of proportion with their actual numbers in local society (see chapter 11). In all but the most desperate circumstances, however, most Muslim publics have been repelled by these actions. They recognize that the threat to the West posed by the globalization of jihadi adventurism is minor compared to the threat such violence poses to Muslims and Islam.

 Conclusion

The long-term outcome of this struggle for the heart and soul of Muslim politics will depend on not only the clarity of rival visions, but concrete balances of power in state and society. The strengthening of the civil democratic stream in Muslim politics will also depend on a long-term collaborative effort by governmental and nongovernmental agencies in the Muslim and Western worlds.

Owing to, perhaps, an unfamiliarity with the nuances of Muslim politics, as well as regrettably short-term policies, governments in the West have not been as consistent as they should be in their policies toward the Muslim world (Gerges 1999; Hinter 1998). One especially unhelpful factor has been a concern in Western policy circles that if the democratic dam is opened wide, the groups most likely to rush in will be authoritarian Islamists little interested in pluralism or democracy. “One vote, one time,” was the phrase that summarized this anxiety in Western circles at the time of the Algerian elections in 1991. The fear led French and American officials to side with the forces of military repression in Algeria, after the electoral triumph of an (admittedly complex) alliance of moderate and militant Islamists (Willis 1996).

It does little good simply to wave this anxiety aside. As in the early-twentieth-century West, there are political radicals eager to take advantage of democratic openings so as to pursue undemocratic ends. However, it is helpful to remember that rulers in most Muslim societies have not gone so far as the Algerian authorities to repress moderate opponents and, in so doing, paint the political process into a corner. The essays in this book provide numerous examples of societies in which a vigorous measure of grassroots pluralism is still available for, so to speak, scaling up. Equally important, as noted above, there is a wealth of evidence indicating that most Muslims yearn for democracy and civic decency. They do so not because these ideals were “made in the West,” but because they are the most effective and just response to problems of pluralism and participation widespread in our age.

If Muslim governments and their Western friends do not take the steps needed to promote civic pluralism and democracy, the result will likely be only more radicalism and popular disenchantment with the West. The main reason reform must not be delayed is that Muslim societies are already sociologically modern. They are modern in the sense that they are well on the way to developing the characteristics distinctive to the condition of modernity: a pluralization of life-worlds, heightened pressures for participation, and a growing popular demand that the script for coordinating roles on the public stage be, in some vernacularized sense, civil and democratic.

This is not to say that democratization is inevitable or that efforts to support Muslim democratization have to be all or nothing. The history of democratization in the modern West shows that the process is enduringly incremental, always incomplete, and, alas, reversible even where it is achieved (Keane 1996). The process typically unfolds in a piecemeal and domain-specific manner, its course specified not just by the brilliance of its ideals, but by concrete balances of power and participatory struggles. The most effective way for Western agencies to support the process in Muslim societies, then, is to invest in those spheres where local actors are already pressing for heightened participation and civic decency. In efforts like these, civil society groupings will be crucial. But programs in civil society will remain vulnerable and incomplete unless complemented by democratic reforms in the state. Democratization is sustainable only when based on leveraged collaborations between state and society that scale up the democratic powers of each.

In light of the centrality of education and public discussion in the Islamic resurgence, investment in general education represents a second and no less critical support for a pluralizing Muslim politics. Skeptics might point out that some of the more violent radicals in recent years have come from the ranks of well-educated youth. The militants who carried out the attacks of September 11, 2001, were not the illiterate offspring of an impoverished underclass. But it is far more noteworthy that some of the most gifted proponents of Muslim pluralism come from the ranks of public intellectuals and religious scholars with a great knowledge of the law, and a habit of enriching its insights by juxtaposing it to other traditions of knowledge (see Abou El Fadl 2001; An-Na'im 1990; Safi 2003). More, not less, education is the key. And education has a greater democratic benefit when it conveys a spirit of intellectual "bridging" rather than exclusive "bonding."

There are two additional reasons for focusing investments in education, including, especially, women's education and higher education. First and most important, this is what the great majority of modern Muslims yearn for. Studies like the recent Arab Human Development Report 2003 provide vivid demonstrations of the depth of this desire, and the calamity its nonfulfillment has created. The deficit is no more tragically apparent than in the continuing exclusion of women and girls from equal access to education (UNDP 2003, 31).

A second reason for highlighting investment in education is that education is the most paradigmatic of modern cultural institutions. Today no society can compete even in the lower rungs of the global order without a well-run educational system. In its diverse specializations, its encouragement of innovation, its (relative) gender equality, and its culture of civility-in-plurality, higher education is a shimmering example of all that is best about modern freedom and civic decency.

The recent revolutionary experiments in Iran, Sudan, and Afghanistan demonstrate that attempts to use the state to deny modern pluralism, and to implement a totalizing (kaffah) practice of the faith, run contrary to the demands of modern education and society as a whole. Again, in sociological fact, Muslim societies are already modern. The growth of the professions, the expansion of the press, the fascination with the Internet, the demand for women's education—these and other pluralizing developments are well under way in all but the poorest Muslim nations. Religious radicals may deny the public's hunger for pluralist fruits. No doubt the Taliban in Afghanistan went to the greatest lengths to deny this interest and press society back toward a pristine, undifferentiated whole. But this only reminds us that Taliban programs bore a more striking resemblance to Pol Pot's Cambodia than they did the model of the Prophet.

Here, then, is the strongest support for democracy and civic decency in the Muslim world. The support is especially significant because it comes from Muslims themselves, not from a West that, unfortunately, has been less than consistent in its attitudes on Islam. The support originates in Muslims' recognition that efforts to impose a repressive homogeneity on a diverse society only damages their faith and consigns believers to backwardness. This latter conclusion will be rejected, of course, by those who insist that Islam has unchanging instructions for everyone and all aspects of social life. Just as was the case with totalitarian schemes in the modern West, efforts to implement such totalizing programs will do great harm to society. Even more serious from believers' perspective, the more radicals press for a fusion of religion and state, the more they remove the checks and balances necessary for maintaining the integrity of not only the political process, but of religion itself. The urge for absolutist union creates the conditions for religion's abuse. Power corrupts; absolute power corrupts absolutely. And nothing more certainly degrades religion than human absolutism in God's name.

These are the lessons that give the civil Islamic project its historic urgency and relevance. Recent events have demonstrated that it is in the best interest of Islam itself that Muslim politics be plural and democratic. In an age of mass participation and powerful states, to do otherwise is to guarantee religion's subordination to the powerful and corrupt. "The modern world has also undermined a right that has always been a source of evil and corruption," writes Abdolkarim Soroush (2000, 64), "that is, the right to act as a God-like potentate with unlimited powers." This is the conviction, so historic and deep, from which civil democratic Islam flows. Originating at the heart of the Muslim experience of modernity, the conviction is becoming more, not less, widespread in our world. Its diffusion ensures that the struggle for a civic-pluralist politics will remain a central stream in Muslim civilization for years to come.

[1] “Civic pluralism” refers to a public culture and social organization premised on equal rights, tolerance-in-pluralism, and a legally recognized differentiation of state and religious authority (see Eickelman and Piscatori 1996, 158; Hefner 2000, 12). Where such a civic pluralism is in turn linked to a system of free and fair elections, a separation of powers in the state, the rule of law, and human rights we may speak of a civic pluralist democracy. As I have discussed elsewhere (Hefner 1998a), the benefit of this phrase is that it makes clear that there are versions of modern democracy other than liberal variants alone. Much like the civic republicanism Charles Taylor has described (1989, 1995), Muslim civic pluralism may well dedicate greater attention to the cultivation of public values, including religious ones, than is deemed appropriate by modern liberal democrats. However, even some of the latter have recently begun to reexamine their heritage’s secularist premises. See Rosenblum 2000.

[2] For a sample of some of the more radical denunciations, see Parfrey 2001.

[3] It goes without saying, of course, that this effort to engage the modern within the horizons of a religiously grounded discourse is by no means unique to Islam. Charles Taylor (1999) and Jose Casanova (1994) provide compelling reflections on such efforts within modern Catholicism; Tu Wei-ming’s (1996) volume provides a richly nuanced sense of the effort in East Asian Confucianism. Thomas Blom Hansen (1999) provides a powerful overview of the politics of the process in contemporary Hinduism.

[4] In addition to the varied legal schools, the relative autonomy of religious scholars, the popularity (after the eleventh century) of Sufi mystical orders, and imperial support for shrines and festivals, another institution that served [[to pluralize practical religious authority among the community of believers was the institution of philanthropic endowments known as]]waqf (pl. awqaf). A waqf is a property set aside in perpetuity to provide revenues or resources for the maintenance of institutions such as mosques, religious schools, or charities for the poor. In some precolonial Middle Eastern countries, vast expanses of agricultural land were designated as nonperishable property of this sort. Although rulers might play a role in the management of larger waqf properties, religious law set strict limits on the rights of these and other waqf stewards. In premodern Muslim societies, the pervasiveness of such lands was an integral economic support for the autonomy of key Islamic institutions and the pluricentrism of religious authority. On waqf, see Kahf 1995; on waqf and religious authority, see Hoexter 2002.

[5] Thomas Barfield's discussion of Afghanistan in chapter 9 offers an example of a starkly conservative society in which new Muslim intellectuals are few in number; war-ravaged Afghanistan is, however, the exception to the modern Muslim rule.

[6] Skocpol's conclusion resonates with the non-Durkheimian view of civil society I am emphasizing here: "The story of American voluntarism has been clearly one of symbiosis between state and society—not a story of society apart from, or instead of the state" (Skocpol 1999, 70). This "historically evolved symbiosis of federal democracy and federated voluntary associations," she explains, "created a very special matrix for American citizenship and popular civic participation" (70–71). The synergistic approach to state and society developed in Skocpol and the present chapter implies that democratization is less the result of particularistic trust than it is efforts to build confidence in public institutions by, among other things, creating concrete checks and balance among power holders in state, society, and the market. Such leveraged influence can help to pacify and democratize the competition that occurs in all societies. Unlike the romantic characterizations widespread in 1990s literature, real-and-existing civil societies are not calmly consensual, but marked by "organized conflict and distrust" (Skocpol and Fiorina 1999, 14; cf. Hefner 2001; Keane 1996).

[7] Although the contributors to this book are primarily concerned with its contemporary sociology, the intellectual roots of civic pluralist Islam were laid well before contemporary times. For overviews of these intellectual antecedents see Esposito and Voll 2001; Moussalli 2001; Rahman 1982; and Sachedina 2001. Charles Kurzman's Liberal Islam (1998) offers a superb selection of primary materials from some of the most important pioneers.

[8] For an analysis of the role of new media in Saudi politics, see Fandy 1999.

[9] It is useful to recall that, as originally developed by Pierre Bourdieu and James Coleman, the idea of social capital made no such assumption that the ends to which it is applied are always democratic. Bourdieu defines social capital as “the aggregate of the actual or potential resources which are linked to possession of a durable network of more or less institutionalized relationships of mutual acquaintance and recognition—or in other words, to membership in a group” (Bourdieu and Waquant 1992, 119). In other words, social capital refers to the power and influence created by virtue of membership in a network or group, and these powers can be applied to all manner of ends. See also Hefner 2000, chap. 2.

[10] This generalization would have to be qualified in several countries, where embattled regimes responded to leftist and Islamist oppositions by sponsoring programs of conservative Islamization. Carrie Rosefsky Wickham (2002) provides a brilliant analysis of just such a tactic in Mubarak’s Egypt, resonating with Norton’s essay in this volume. See also Zaman on Pakistan, Peletz on Malaysia, and my own chapter on Indonesia.

 References Cited

Abaza, Mona. 2002. Debates on Islam and Knowledge in Malaysia and Egypt. London: RoutledgeCurzon.

Abdillah, Masykuri. 1997. Responses of Indonesian Muslim Intellectuals to the Concept of Democracy (1966–1993). Hamburg: Abera Verlag Meyer and Co.

Abou El Fadl, Khaled. 2001. Speaking in God’s Name: Islamic Law, Authority, and Women. Oxford: One World.

Abu-Lughod, Lila, ed. 1998. Remaking Women: Feminism and Modernity in the Middle East. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

AlSayyad, Nezar, and Manuel Castells. 2002. Muslim Europe, or Euro-Islam: Politics, Culture, and Citizenship in the Age of Globalization. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books.

Anderson, Jon W. 2003. “The Internet and Islam’s New Interpreters.” In New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson, pp. 45–60.

An-Na’im, Abdullahi Ahmed. 1990. Toward an Islamic Reformation: Civil Liberties, Human Rights, and International Law. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Arjomand, Said Amir. 1988. The Turban for the Crown: The Islamic Revolution in Iran. New York: Oxford University Press.

Barton, Greg. 2002. Gus Dur: The Authorized Biography of Abdurrahman Wahid. Singapore: Equinox Publishing.

Berger, Peter L., ed. 1999. The Desecularization of the World: Resurgent Religion and World Politics. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans Publishing.

Berkes, Niyazi. 1998. The Development of Secularism in Turkey. New York: Routledge.

Bhargava, Rajeev, Amiya Kumar Bagchi, and R. Sudarshan, eds. 1999. Multiculturalism, Liberalism, and Democracy. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Bourdieu, Pierre, and Loic Waquant. 1992. Introduction to Reflexive Sociology. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Bowen, John R. 2003. Islam, Law, and Equality in Indonesia: An Anthropology of Public Reasoning. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Brass, Paul. 2003. The Production of Hindu-Muslim Violence in Contemporary India. Seattle and London: University of Washington Press.

Brown, Carl. 2000. Religion and State: The Muslim Approach to Politics. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Brumberg, David. 2001. Reinventing Khomeini: The Struggle for Reform in Iran. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Calhoun, Craig, ed. 1992. Habermas and the Public Sphere. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Casanova, Jose. 1994. Public Religions in the Modern World. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

CesaA, Joeelyne. 1994. Etre m tsulman en Fa ice: Associations, militants, et mosquees. Paris: Karthala.

Clegg, S. R., and S. G. Redding, eds. 1990. Capitalism in Contrasting Cultures. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter.

Cole, Juan. 2002. Sacred Space and Holy War: The Politics, Culture, and History of Shi‘ite Islam. London: I. B. Tauris.

Cook, Michael. 2000. Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Cooperman, Alan. 2003. “Bush’s Remarks about God Assailed.” Washington Post, November 22, p. A6.

Eaton, Richard M. 1984. “The Political and Religious Authority of the Shrine of Baba Farid.” In Moral Conduct and Authority: The Place of Adab in South Asian Islam, edited by Barbara Daly Metcalf, pp. 333–56. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Edwards, Bob, and Michael W. Foley. 2001. “Civil Society and Social Capital: A Primer.” In Beyond Tocqueville: Civil Society and the Social Capital Debate in Comparative Perspective, edited by Bob Edwards, Michael W. Foley, and Mario Diani, pp. 1–14. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England.

Eickelman, Dale F. 1992. “Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies.” American Ethnologist 19, no. 4 (November): 1–13.

Eickelman, Dale F., and Jon W. Anderson. 1999. “Redefining Muslim Publics.” In New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson, pp. 1–18. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F., and James Piscatori. 1996. Muslim Politics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Eisenstadt, Shmuel N. 2000. “Multiple Modernities.” Daedalus 129, no. 1 (Winter): 1–30.

———. 2002. “Concluding Remarks: Public Sphere, Civil Society, and Political Dynamics in Islamic Societies.” In The Public Sphere in Muslim Societies, edited by Miriam Hoexter, Shmuel N. Eisenstadt, and Nehemia Levtzion, pp. 139–61. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Esposito, John L. 2000. “Introduction: Islam and Secularism in the Twenty-first Century.” In Islam and Secularism in the Middle East, edited by John L. Esposito and Azzam Tamimi, pp. 1–12. London: Hurst and Company.

Esposito, John L., and John O. Voll. 2001. Makers of Contemporary Islam. New York: Oxford University Press.

Evans, Peter. 1996. “Government Action, Social Capital and Development: Reviewing the Evidence on Synergy.” World Development 24, no. 6: 1119–32.

Fandy, Mamoun. 1999. Saudi Arabia and the Politics of Dissent. New York: Palgrave.

Finke, Roger, and Rodney Stark. 1992. The Churching of America, 1776–1991: Winners and Losers in our Religious Economy. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press.

Fukuyama, Francis. 1993. The End of History and the Last Man. New York: Free Press.

Gaffney, Patrick D. 1994. The Prophet’s Pulpit: Islamic Preaching in Contemporary Egypt. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Gerges, Fawaz A. 1999. America and Political Islam: Clash of Cultures or Clash of Interests? Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

GonaaleZiQuijano, Yves .19981. LesGe isduLiwe-.tiiitione l amp inteleectd dans itgypte Republicaine. Paris: CNRS Editions.

Granovetter, Mark. 1985. “Economic Action and Social Structure: The Problem of Embeddedness.” American Journal of Sociology 91:481–510.

Gray, John. 1993. “From Post-communism to Civil Society: The Reemergence of History and the Decline of the Western Model.” In Liberalism and the Economic Order, edited by Ellen Frankel Paul, Fred D. Miller, Jr., and Jeffrey Paul, pp. 26–50. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Gunaratna, Rohan. 2002. Inside Al Qaeda: A Global Network of Terror. New York: Columbia University Press.

Habermas, Jürgen. 1989 ([1962].) The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Hall, John A. 1995. “In Search of Civil Society.” In Civil Society: Theory, History, Comparison, edited by John Hall, pp. 1–31. Cambridge: Polity Press.

Hamilton, Gary G. 1998. “Culture and Organization in Taiwan’s Market Economy.” In Market Cultures: Society and Morality in the New Asian Capitalisms, edited by Robert W. Hefner, pp. 41–77. Boulder, Colo.: Westview.

Hammoudi, Abdellah. 1997. Master and Disciple: The Cultural Foundations of Moroccan Authoritarianism. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Hann, Chris. 1996. Civil Society: Challenging Western Models. London and New York: Routledge.

Hansen, Thomas Blom. 1999. The Saffron Wave: Democracy and Hindu Nationalism in Modern India. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Hatch, Nathan O. 1989. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Hefner, Robert W. 1997. “Islamization and Democratization in Indonesia.” In Islam in an Era of Nation-States: Politics and Religious Renewal in Muslim Southeast Asia, edited by Robert W. Hefner and Patricia Horvatich, pp. 75127. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

———. 1998a. “On the History and Cross-Cultural Possibility of a Democratic Ideal.” In Democratic Civility: The History and Cross-Cultural Possibility of a Modern Political Ideal, edited by Robert W. Hefner, pp. 3–49. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers.

———. 1998b. “Introduction: Society and Morality in the New Asian Capitalisms.” In Market Cultures: Society and Morality in the New Asian Capitalisms, edited by Robert W. Hefner, pp. 1–38. Boulder, Colo.: Westview.

———. 1998c. “Multiple Modernities: Christianity, Islam, and Hinduism in a Globalizing Age.” Annual Review of Anthropology 27:83–104.

———. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

———. 2001. “Introduction: Multiculturalism and Citizenship in Malaysia, Singapore, and Indonesia.” In The Politics of Multiculturalism: Pluralism and Citizenship in Malaysia, Singapore, and Indonesia, edited by Robert W. Hefner, pp. 1–58. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

Hollingsworth, J. Rogers, and Robert Boyer. 1997. Contemporary Capitalism: The Embeddedness of Institutions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hooglund, Eric, ed. 2002. Twenty Years of Islamic Revolution: Political and Social Transition in Iran since 1979. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Hinter, Shireen T. 1998. The Future of Islam and the West: Clash of Civilizations or Peaceful Coexistence? Westport, Conn.: Praeger.

Hoexter, Miriam. 2002. “The Waqf and the Public Sphere.” In The Public Sphere in Muslim Societies, edited by Miriam Hoexter, Shmuel N. Eisenstadt, and Ne- hemia Levtzion, pp. 119–38. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1991. The Third Wave: Democratization in the Late Twentieth Century. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

———. 1993. “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs 72, no. 3 (Summer): 14–33.

———. 1996. The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order. New York: Simon & Schuster.

ICG. 2002. “Al-Qaeda in Southeast Asia: The Case of the ‘Ngruki Network’ in Indonesia.” Brussels, ICG Asia Briefing, August 8.

Inglehart, Ronald, and Pippa Norris. 2003. “The True Clash of Civilizations.” In Foreign Policy, March/April, 62–70.

Juergensmeyer, Mark. 2000. Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Kahf, Monzer. 1995. “Waqf.” In The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, edited by John. L. Esposito, vol. 4, pp. 312–16. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kandiyoti, Deniz. 1991. “Islam and Patriarchy: A Comparative Perspective.” In Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender, edited by Nikki R. Keddie and Beth Baron, pp. 23–42. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Keane, John. 1996. Reflections on Violence. London: Verso.

Keddie, Nikkie R. 1991. “Introduction: Deciphering Middle Eastern Women’s History.” In Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender, edited by Nikki R. Keddie and Beth Baron, pp. 1–22. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Knauft, Bruce M., ed. 2002. Critically Modern: Alternatives, Alterities, Anthropologies. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Kurzman, Charles, ed. 1998. Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kymlicka, Will. 2001. Politics in the Vernacular: Nationalism, Multiculturalism, and Citizenship. New York: Oxford University Press.

Lapidus, Ira M. 1975. “The Separation of State and Religion in the Development of Early Islamic Society.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 6, no. 4 (October): pp. 363–85.

Lerner, Daniel. 1958. The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East. Glencoe, Calif.: Free Press.

Lewis, Bernard. 2002. What Went Wrong? Western Impact and Middle Eastern Response. New York: Oxford University Press.

Mamdani, Mahmood. 2001. When Victims Become Killers: Colonialism, Nativism, and Genocide in Rwanda. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Mandaville, Peter. 2001. Transnational Muslim Politics: Reimagining the Umma. London: Routledge.

Martin, David. 1978. A General Theory of Secularization. Oxford: Blackwell.

———. 1990. Tongues of Fire: The Explosion of Evangelical Christianity in Latin America. London: Basil Blackwell.

Meeker, Michael E. 1991. “The New Muslim Intellectuals in the Republic of Turkey.” In Islam in Modern Turkey: Religion, Politics, and Literature in a Secular State, edited by Richard Tapper, pp. 189–219. London: Tauris.

Messick, Brinkley. 1993. The Calligraphic State: Textual Domination and History in a Muslim Society. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Moussalli, Ahmad S. 1992. Radical Islamic Fundamentalism: The Ideological and Political Discourse of Sayyid Qutb. Beirut: American University of Beirut.

———. 2001. The Islamic Quest for Democracy, Pluralism, and Human Rights. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.

Munson, Henry. 1993. Religion and Power in Morocco. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Murata, Sachiko, and William C. Chittick. 1994. The Vision of Islam. New York: Paragon House.

Nasr, Seyyed Vali Reza. 1996. Mawdudi and the Making of Islamic Revivalism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Nielsen, Jorgen. 1992. Muslims in Western Europe. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

O'Donnell, Guillermo, and Philippe C. Schmitter. 1986. Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Tentative Conclusions about Uncertain Democracies. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Parfrey, Adam. 2001. Extreme Islam: Anti-American Propaganda of Muslim Fundamentalism. Los Angeles: Feral House.

Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. 2003. "Poll: Two Years After 9/11, Growing Number of Americans Link Islam to Violence." Washington D.C.: Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, September 10 Press Release.

Putnam, Robert D. 1993. Making Democracy Work: Civic Traditions in Modern Italy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

———. 2000. Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community. New York: Simon and Schuster.

Rahman, Fazlur. 1982. Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Ramadan, Tariq. 1999. To Be A European Muslim: A Study of Islamic Sources in the European Context. Leicester, U.K.: The Islamic Foundation.

Rosenblum, Nancy L. ed. 2000. Obligations of Citizenship and Demands of Faith: Religious Accommodation in Pluralist Democracies. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Rotberg, Robert I., ed. 2001. Patterns of Social Capital: Stability and Change in Historical Perspective. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Roy, Olivier. 1994. The Failure of Political Islam. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Sachedina, Abdulaziz. 2001. The Islamic Roots of Democratic Pluralism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Safi, Omid, ed. 2003. Progressive Muslims: On Justice, Gender, and Pluralism. Oxford: One World.

Schacht, Joseph. 1964. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Singerman, Diane. 1995. Avenues of Participation: Family, Politics, and Networks in Urban Quarters of Cairo. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Skocpol, Theda. 1999. “How Americans Became Civic.” In Civic Engagement in American Democracy, edited by Theda Skocpol and Morris Fiorina, pp. 2780. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press.

Skocpol, Theda, and Morris P. Fiorina. 1999. “Making Sense of the Civic Engagement Debate.” In Civic Engagement in American Democracy, edited by Theda Skocpol and Morris Fiorina, pp. 1–23. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press.

Smith, Craig S. 2003. “Blast Hits 2 British Sites in Turkey as Bush Visits Blair.” New York Times, November 21, p. 1.

Soroush, Abdolkarim. 2000. Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Stoll David. 1990. Is Latin America Turning Protestant? The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press

Stolle, Dietlind, and Thomas R. Rochon. 2001. “Are All Associations Alike? Member Diversity, Associational Type, and the Creation of Social Capital.” In Beyond Tocqueville: Civil Society and the Social Capital Debate in Comparative Perspective, edited by Bob Edwards, Michael W. Foley, and Mario Diani, pp. 143–56. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England.

Sullivan, Denis J., and Sana Abed-Kotob. 1999. Islam in Contemporary Egypt: Civil Society versus the State. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne-Rienner Publishers.

Tamimi, Azzam S. 2001. Rachid Ghannouchi: A Democrat within Islamism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Taylor, Charles. 1989. “Cross-Purposes: The Liberal-Communitarian Debate.” In Liberalism and the Moral Life, edited by Nancy L. Rosenblum, pp. 159–82. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

———. 1995. “Invoking Civil Society.” In Philosophical Arguments, pp. 204–24. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

———. 1999. “A Catholic Modernity?” In A Catholic Modernity? Charles Taylor’s Marianist Award Lecture, edited by James L. Heft, pp. 13–37. New York: Oxford University Press.

Tocqueville, Alexis de. 1969. Democracy in America. Translated by George Lawrence. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

Tu, Wei-ming, ed. 1996. Confucian Traditions in East Asian Modernity: Moral Education and Economic Culture in Japan and the Four Mini-Dragons. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

Tucker, Judith E. 1998. In the House of the Law: Gender and Islamic Law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

UNDP. 2002. Arab Human Development Report 2002: Creating Opportunities for Future Generations. New York: United Nations Development Programme.

———. 2003. Arab Human Development Report 2003: Building a Knowledge Society. New York: United Nations Development Programme.

van der Veer, Peter. 1994. Religious Nationalism: Hindus and Muslims in India. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Voll, John O. 1991. “Fundamentalism in the Sunni Arab World: Egypt and the Sudan.” In Fundamentalisms Observed, edited by Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby, pp. 335–402. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Warren, Kay. 1998. Indigenous Movements and Their Critics: Pan-Maya Activism in Guatemala. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Weller, Robert P. 1999. Alternate Civilities: Democracy and Culture in China and Taiwan. Boulder, Colo.: Westview.

White, Jenny B. 2002. Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Wickham, Carrie Rosefsky. 2002. Mobilizing Islam: Religion, Activism, and Political Change in Egypt. New York: Columbia University Press.

Willis, Michael. 1996. The Islamist Challenge in Algeria. New York: New York University Press.

Woodward, Mark R. 1989. Islam in Java: Normative Piety and Mysticism in the Sultanate of Yogyakarta. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.

Wuthnow Robert. 1988. The Restructuring of American Religion: Society and Faith since the Second World War. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim. 2002. The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Zubaida, Sami. 1993. Islam, the People, and The State: Political Ideas and Movements in the Middle East. London: I. B. Tauris.

———. 2003. Law and Power in the Islamic World. London and New York: I. B. Tauris.

 Chapter 2: New Media in the Arab Middle East and the Emergence of Open Societies

Dale F. Eickelman

The New Arab “Street”

The “war in Iraq,” as CNN calls it, is the “war against Iraq” or the “aggression against Iraq” in most of the local and international Arabic print media. Al-Sharq al-Awsat (London) is the only exception, calling it the “war of Iraq” (harb al-‘Iraq) in Arabic, but the “war in Iraq” in English. Other newspapers, such as Morocco’s al-Ittihad al-Ishtiraki, add “No War” in English to the banner of each page of Iraq-oriented news.

For most people, however, newspapers are lagging behind television (and to a much lesser extent radio, at least in cities) as a source for war news. The coalition’s military action against Iraq, unlike its 1990–91 predecessor, is fully dominated by television in the Arab Middle East and, for the first time, much of the television coverage is generated by Arab satellite television rather than by European news organizations. Even the quality print media is reduced on many days to using the photographs of televised images. The Arab “street” is fueled by satellite television images and commentaries, and from multiple sources.

I am writing these lines from the madina, the old walled city, Fez, Morocco, in April 2003. I arrived in Morocco one day after the beginning of overt hostilities on March 19. Darb Bishara, the neighborhood where I live, is twelve minutes by fast walk to the nearest motor roads and taxi stands, a walk that takes me along Tal‘a Sghira, one of the main madina thoroughfares, crowded most of the day with donkeys, mules, pushcarts, peddlers, and pedestrians. The larger cafes along the way have television sets and the smaller ones radios. Everyone avidly follows the news reports, but few of the sets are tuned to the Moroccan state media.

State television and radio have lost the battle for eyes and ears except for the countryside, where there is no alternative. Most of the sets are tuned to al-Jazeera Satellite Television or one of the newer Arab satellite channels. Medi 1, the private North African radio station broadcasting from Tangiers with a mix of Arabic and French, dominates the radio sets. Not just among the intelligentsia but also among the shopkeepers and the street peddlers who stop for tea, the state-controlled broadcast media are listened to primarily for the “official story.” Its limitations are recognized by virtually its entire audience. Even in the economically “on-the-edge” parts of the old city, such as my quarter, satellite dishes dot the rooftops. Not everyone has satellite TV, but everyone gets exposed to it in the course of the working day.

Although most people do not use the full spectrum of available channels, all major European and Arabic satellite channels can appear on many sets at the press of a button. Everyone compares stories, and there is an understanding of the approaches that different media take. Everyone has been skeptical of the changing U.S. official story of why the “coalition” invaded Iraq. Cheers occasionally were heard up and down the street, as for a soccer match, when Saddam made a live-on-videotape appearance on Iraqi or al-Jazeera Satellite TV. By April 10, there was a general recognition that the “war” had turned against Saddam Husayn. The front page of al-Sharq al-Awsat was dominated by a huge photograph of a statue of Mr. Husayn being toppled from its pedestal, with the large-type headline, “and the Regime of Saddam Is Toppled” (wa-yasqut nizam Saddam), but the party-sponsored local press confined itself to saying that “obscurity” prevailed in what was happening in Iraq. Satellite television was unambiguous.

There were some street demonstrations through the end of March, culminating in a united call from all Moroccan political parties for mass demonstrations on Sunday, March 30 in the major cities, with the largest taking place in Rabat. After these demonstrations, the relatively minor violence went unreported in the next day’s local print and broadcast media—although it was reported (together with a photograph of demonstrators burning an American flag) in the March 31 al-Sharq Al-Awsat.

After the fall of Baghdad, discussion along this particular Arab “street” in the Fez madina was eerily like discussions in the Western press: What happens next? Will America (Britain is scarcely mentioned) bring a better government? What will be the Turkish reaction, especially if Iraq’s Kurds are given voice in government? The term “democracy” (Al-dimuqratiya) is used only by the educated, but a greater number are aware of the restrictions placed on their genuine political participation. Discussion is more animated in private homes. In other words, the Arab “street” is rapidly evolving from the shapeless and manipulable image that it possesses in the West, and there is a more concrete awareness than in the past of the benefits of more open societies.

 Discovering Open Societies

The substantial growth in mass education over the last three decades, the proliferation and accessibility of new media and communications, and the increasing ease of travel make it impossible for state and religious authorities to monopolize the tools of literate culture. The ideas, images, and practices of alternative social and political worlds have become a daily occurrence. They enter domestic space through satellite and cable television, and the alternate realities are better understood than in the past. Rapidly rising levels of literacy and familiarity with an educated Arabic formerly restricted to an elite facilitate this better comprehension. They also rehearse viewers to respond to those in authority in the common language of the Arabic of the classroom and the media.

Mass education was important in the development of nationalism in an earlier era (Gellner 1983, 28–29)) In recent years, the proliferation of media and means of communication have multiplied the possibilities for creating communities and networks among them, fragmenting religious and political authority, dissolving prior barriers of space and distance, and opening new grounds for interaction and mutual recognition) Combined with mass higher education, the increasing accessibility of the new media facilitates the collaboration of like-minded people across national and regional boundaries) This also facilitates the scaling up of civic-pluralist forces in society)

To be sure, the power of new media to challenge and fragment claims to religious and political authority had become evident at the time of the 1978–79 Iranian revolution) Audiocassettes—easy to smuggle and duplicate—were then the subversive media of choice) Since then, the accessible nature of newer media and rising levels of education have increasingly blurred the boundaries between producers and consumers) Fax machines, desktop publishing, photocopying machines, the Internet, and new uses of older media make communications more participatory and create new audiences) The greater ease of travel—for education, pilgrimage, tourism, labor migration, and emigration—also accelerates the flow of ideas and practices)

More important, some new media seen as innovative in the early 1980s are now almost taken for granted) In countries such as Saudi Arabia, the same fax machines that rapidly disseminate criticisms of the regime from opposition groups abroad are also essential to the conduct of business) The state is powerless to limit their use without disrupting the economy, and attempts to counter “faxed criticisms” in other media—such as the press—by warning readers against disseminating them further merely draws subsequent attention to their existence (for example, “Shaykh Muhammad” 1994))

Elsewhere in the Middle East, since Iran’s May 1997 presidential elections, some Iranian intellectuals and Western observers have gone so far as to speak of a new era of “post-Islamism” in the Islamic Republic in particular and the rest of the Muslim world in general due in large part to the rise of educational levels and new forms of communication (Roy 1999). Clearly, this post-Islamism is defined by the widespread awareness of alternatives to existing dominant ideologies and institutional arrangements. Fariba Adelkhah, for example, argues that this transformation is as significant as the original Islamic revolution. It is fueled by the combination of rising levels of education and the coming of age of a new generation of Iranians—now the majority of the population—not even born at the time of the 1978–79 revolution. This new generation, she argues, is creating an Iranian “religious public sphere” (espace public confes- sionel). In spite of resistance from conservatives, many in this generation publicly employ reasoned argument that, even if developed primarily in private or semiprivate settings, also has political repercussions (Adelkhah 2000, 177). Likewise, after many fits and starts in Turkish electoral politics throughout the 1990s, a political party inspired by religious values has persuaded the Turkish electorate—and the military guardians of the secularism enshrined in the Turkish constitution—in 2002 that one can be religiously motivated and adhere to the principle of secularism in the public sphere at the same time (White 2002).

In most Arab states, discussions concerning the nature of just and appropriate governance and the role of religion in politics is not as foregrounded and public as in Iran and Turkey, although debates in newspapers—which reach far fewer people than the broadcast media in the Arab world—are often spirited and hotly contested, even in the Arabian Peninsula. The legitimacy of royal authority and challenges to incumbent rulers are taboo subjects, but on other matters, including legislative reforms influencing the rights of women, the rapidly expanding range of public discourse about politics and religion is quickly outdistancing the pace of change in formal institutions.

A public sphere is emerging throughout the region in which messages and images in face-to-face conversations, newspapers, books, magazines, anonymous leaflets, video- and audiocassettes, and satellite and regular television crisscross, overlap, and build on one another. When censored or suppressed in one medium, such messages recur in another. Images of alternative institutions and practices, once on the periphery of the social imagination of much of the public, are now concrete and foregrounded. Even silence contributes to the public sphere, when some topics are avoided because of real or imagined penalties for direct public expression. Authoritarian limitations on participation in discussions and debate over public issues are resented and increasingly easy to evade. These discussions are not confined to immediate locality but increasingly include attention to wider regional and transnational issues.

Not surprisingly, some critics downplay the emergence of the public sphere in the Arab world. Seymour Martin Lipset (1994, 6), for example, asserts that Muslim, “particularly Arab,” notions of political authority are especially hostile to democracy because Islamic political doctrines are “alien” to political freedom. The result is to assume that Muslims, more than the followers of other religions, are guided by religious doctrines that inhibit a shift to democratic rule.

Others argue that the authoritarian “cultural schemas” that pervade expectations of authority throughout the region have hardly changed over centuries. These schemas supposedly privilege hierarchical masterdisciple relations in the religious and political spheres, severely limiting alternative political and institutional styles (for example, Hammoudi 1997, 8; Sharabi 1988).

In this respect, Samuel Huntington’s (1993, 24–255 crisp “West versus rest” argument that “non-Western civilizations” have increasingly become political actors is as deceptive in its Manichaean simplicity as Daniel Lerner’s earlier “Mecca or mechanization” (1964 [1958], 4055 and Manfred Halperin’s (1963, 1295 argument that the Muslim world faces an unpalatable choice: either a “neo-Islamic totalitarianism” intent on “resurrecting the past,” or a “reformist Islam” which would open “the sluice gates and [be] swamped by the deluge.” This essentializing of civilizational traditions deflects attention from the internal and historical variations among Muslim societies past and present and from the vigorous internal debates that have taken place in the past and that are shaping the present of Muslim-majority societies.

This chapter offers an alternative to such bleak assumptions. It compares the rapidly changing contexts in which political and religious authority and “information” is structured and disseminated in the Arab Middle East. The emphasis is less on formal political institutions—Al-though such institutions as elections play a major cultural role—than the commonly shared, often implicit, ideas of what is right, just, or religiously ordained and on which any community or group of individuals form cooperative relations.

 The New Media and Mass Higher Education

Even before the events of September 11, 2001, it was already becoming clear that rapidly increasing levels of education, greater ease of travel, and the rise of new communications media were developing a public sphere in Muslim-majority societies in which large numbers of people—not just an educated, political, and economic elite—expect a say in religion, governance, and public issues. State authorities continue in many ways to be arbitrary and restrict what is said in the press, the broadcast media, and in public, but the methods of avoiding such censorship and control have rapidly proliferated. Today, silence in public no longer implies ignorance, and it is the conjuncture of rising levels of education, new communications media, and increased mobility that have created new forms Silence, or apparent acquiescence, is often a weapon of the weak. In some countries of the Arabian Peninsula, a “politics of silence” in which audiences applaud tepidly rather than with enthusiasm, is one of the few forms of public protest available, despite the simulacra of democratic forms offered by repressive and authoritarian governments (Waterdrinker 1993). For instance, Tunisia’s President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali was reelected with 99 percent of cast ballots in 1994, but few Tunisians took at face value his response to a French journalist’s question that such results, far from being “a bit too good,” merely reflected “the profound realities of the Arab-Muslim world,” and the vote results “a massive adhesion to a project of national salvation” (Ben Ali 1994). Public silence in Tunisia in the face of such claims does not equal agreement with them.

An exclusive focus on religious extremism deflects attention from the more profound changes taking place throughout Morocco, Egypt, Jordan, and other places in the Arab world which are correlated with mass higher education and the new media, factors that have begun profoundly to affect how people think about authority and responsibility in the domains of religion and politics.

Throughout the Arab world, mass higher education has expanded significantly since the 1960s. As elsewhere in Muslim majority states, mass higher education has reshaped conceptions of self, religion, nation, and politics. It is as significant as the introduction of printed books in sixteenthcentury rural France. Ironically, however, we know more about literacy in medieval and premodern Europe than in the contemporary Muslim and Arab worlds. Many scholars have noted linkages between advanced education and religious activism, but the focus on extremism and terrorism deflects attention from conceptual innovations and emerging networks for communication and action (Eickelman 1992).

Religious activism in the political sphere, the claims of its adherents notwithstanding, is a distinctively modern phenomenon, and its supporters are principally the beneficiaries of mass higher education. Mass education may be important in itself, but it also suggests basic transformations in ideas of what people accept as legitimate political authority.

For the most part, mass higher education is a recent phenomenon in the Middle East and North Africa. It began in earnest only in the 1950s, with Egypt's commitment to universal schooling following the 1952 revolution. Fifteen to twenty years later—that is, by the 1970s—after large numbers of students began to complete the advanced educational cycles, its consequences can be more clearly discerned. The timing of educational expansion varies for other parts of the Middle East. Major educational expansion in Morocco began after independence in 1956, accelerated in the 1960s, and today almost matches the rate of population growth. From 1957 to 1992, university enrollment grew from 1,819 to 230,000 students. Fifty times as many women are being educated today in Morocco as in the early 1960s.

A complementary measure of change is the circulation of books and magazines. The Moroccan writer Mohammed Bennis (interview with the author, in Mohammediya, July 16, 1992), recalled his student days in Fes in the 1970s, when the first "little" intellectual journals began to flourish in Arabic, rather than French, which had been the dominant language of the educated elite. In lectures and public meetings, students began to insist that teachers and their classmates express themselves in Arabic and not use French words in Arabic syntax when Arabic words and phrases were available. The shift from French to Arabic and the growing enrollments in higher education significantly increased participation in debates about politics, culture, and society. The intellectual effervescence of the 1970s that Bennis describes saw the emergence of the first cohort of Moroccans to acquire their pervasive "habits of thought" in Arabic, the country's national language (Bourdieu 1988). As elsewhere, pressure from this cohort created a demand for "re-imagining" Islam and politics and produced a significant readership for “quality” books in Arabic. In spite of the rising rate of unemployment among university graduates, reading is for them a means of “appropriating,” organizing, and making objective ideas of society, politics, and self (Chartier 1987, 6–11).

As a result, new books and new markets for them have developed, which suggests a sea change in the images and vocabulary that affect the prospects for political thinking. Egypt, one of the few countries where there are figures on readership, provides an excellent case study of the changing market for books and magazines. Although studies of readership in Egypt, as elsewhere in the Arab world, are weak, the few that are available suggest that only 1 to 2 percent of the population read books regularly. But discussions about books—through word of mouth, the broadcast media, or widely read newspapers and magazines (Gonzalez- Quijano 1998, 398–408)—reach much larger segments of the population. Even censors draw attention to books by banning them or attempting to restrict their circulation. The most rapid growth is occurring in publications with religious content: the growth of secular mass education has increased attachment to Islamic culture. As Gonzalez-Quijano (1998, 15960) explains, during the Nasser era in Egypt, religious books were of marginal importance, at least in terms of official production figures. With the opening of the book market in the 1970s, the relaxation of censorship controls, and subsidies from the oil-rich states, religious books became much more common. In recent years, books have become a part of mass culture in Egypt, and “products” intended for the consumption of a literary elite have become an endangered species.

Especially important is the growth in popularity of “Islamic” books. These are inexpensive, attractively printed texts, accessible to a readership that lacks the literary skills of the educated cadres of an earlier era. The style is often a breezy mix of oral style and colloquial diction. The covers take advantage of modern printing technologies and are designed to be both readily accessible and eye-catching. Thus the cover of Shaykh ‘Abd al-Hamid Kishk’s Ayyuha l-Muslimun, ufiqu (O Muslims, awake) (1989) shows a bearded Muslim (bright blue), seated at a table in front of a red-covered Qur’an, closing his eyes (perhaps in fatigue or distraction) as a serpent (orange and blue) hovering over him prepares to strike. Other covers are reminiscent of pamphlets distributed by the Jehovah’s Witnesses. Layla Mabruk’s Rihla ila ‘alam al-khulud: ‘Adalat yawm Al-qiyama (A trip to eternity: Justice on judgment day) (1989) shows a weakened hand sticking out of a bright red pool, while above the title, encircled by a green garland and oblivious to the scene below, two Muslims pray. A Saudi pamphlet with a curious cover showing a bright red ball plunging into a well in an otherwise parched desert explains that democracy, which is “creeping” (tatasarrub) into the Muslim world, is incompatible with Islam because Islam offers governance by the Creator (al-khaliq), as understood solely by a properly instructed religious elite, whereas democracy, a non-Arabic term, necessarily implies rule by the created (al-makhluqin), in which unbelievers and the ignorant have an equal say in governance and usurp God’s rule (Sharif 1992, 16–18). In many parts of the Muslim world, including North Africa, this style of argument—in some respects a mirror image of Huntington’s—is regarded with amusement by many, but it also offers a style more accessible than that sustained by Muslim moderates such as Binsa‘id (1993), who argue for political pluralism in the mainstream Arab print media.

“Islamic” books seek to capture the religious—and, with increasing explicitness, the political—imagination of a new generation. In these books, readers find echoes of what they already know and have their questions about religion and conduct answered. Conventional intellectuals may accord no legitimacy to the commercial entrepreneurs who benefit from a market that allows Shaykh Sha‘rawi to sell 250,000 copies of a book when the sale of 10,000 books is regarded as a success and 50,000 as a best-seller. However, few can fail to recognize the significance of an emerging and distinctive “popular culture” in which the “Islamic” book has become a commodity for a mass audience (Gonzalez-Quijano 1998, 270, 412).

In retrospect, the 1952 Egyptian revolution appears less a break with the past than an intensification of the existing monarchical vision of directing change from above. This notion is visualized by King Farouk’s personal bookplate (in Gonzalez-Quijano 1998, 96), which shows a printing press directly under Farouk’s name and a crown, with a city and minarets in the background. A learned man in front of the press passes a book to a peasant kneeling next to his plow and oxen. This self-image of the distribution of knowledge was not significantly challenged in the years of the military junta and Nasser’s presidency. The real revolution came later, as mass education created a new public for the printed word. In retrospect, the economic reforms set in motion in the 1970s unintentionally created the space for a cultural and intellectual reorientation through “market forces” which favored “Islamization from below”— uncontrolled and uncontrollable by state forces.

The implications of mass higher education and mass communication include (1) a changed sense of authoritative discourse, (2) the emergence of a sense of religion and politics as system and object, and (3) altered conceptions of language and community. First, mass education fosters a sharp break with earlier traditions of authority, with a direct, albeit selective, access to the printed word. With mass education, belief and practice increasingly become expressed publicly without reference to the authority of traditionally educated religious elites and relate more directly to political action than was earlier the case. The rise of this new dominant discourse affects both the expressive forms of the state and its religious and secular opposition. Mass education enables citizens to talk back to state authority, and this changes how the state can represent itself.

Second, mass education and mass communication encourage the conception of religion and politics as self-contained systems that can incorporate features from other systems. Mass education encourages this by treating Islam as one subject among many in the curriculum, even as students learn that “Islam is one” and encompasses all. The successive editions of Sayyid Qutb’s Social Justice in Islam, (first edition 1949; seventh edition 1974) show how he refined his view of Islam as “an inwardly consistent and harmonious ‘system,’ ... making it possible for it to be at once flexible, comprehensive, and distinctive” (Shepard 1992, 200, 211). Even radical Islam “accepts much that is borrowed from the West” (Shepard 1987, 315; see also Shepard 1989), with the borrowing facilitated by the fact that religion is seen as a “system” (nizam), although such borrowings are often denied or unrecognized. Moderates, as opposed to radicals, are more likely to acknowledge such borrowings, arguing that while Islamic principles are eternal, the way they are implemented can be adjusted to historical context. This point was brought home by a religious activist in the Arab Gulf who explained in 1978 how democracy could never take hold in the Muslim world because it was a concept alien to shura, which was Qur’anic and Islamic. In 1990, he asserted that Al-dimuqratiya was compatible with Islam. When I reminded him of what he said a decade earlier, he replied: “Now we know better.

Shura is not a major concept in the Qur’an and its few usages there are ambiguous. Democracy can be adapted to Islamic ideals.” Likewise, when Islamic activists in Morocco declare that they are engaged in the “Islamization” of their society, they make explicit their sense of one system of ideas and practices—theirs—acting against the system of beliefs and practices held by other members of society.

Finally, the standardized language of mass higher education encourages new senses of community and affinity. In India, the temple-mosque dispute at Ayodhya in December 1992 went from a local matter to a national crisis in Hindu-Muslim relations because of “a massive expansion in the availability of television and the ending of the Indian government’s carefully managed news monopoly.” The narrative of the BBC World Television reporting of the incident, widely followed by English speakers in India, was a model of balance, but the pictures acted “as recruiting banners for the militants on both sides” (Economist 1993). The video clips fed to Oman television by an American network at the time of the massacres in the Sabra/Shatila refugee camps in Beirut in 1982 had a similar effect, as has footage of the Hebron/al-Khalil killings and their aftermath in February 1994, and the live coverage of the 2003 war in Iraq by journalists working for Arab satellite television.

Benedict Anderson (1991) argues that the rise of written vernacular languages in Europe and the spread of print technology have created language communities wider than those of face-to-face interactions yet narrower than the communities created by shared sacred languages. With modifications, this premise can be transposed to the Arab world, in which there has been intensified access to the printed word, and, in terms of the spoken word, to a more standardized Arabic.

One indication of shifts in the religious and political imagination of a younger, educated generation in many parts of the Middle East is the effort of the state to co-opt religious discourse. In Morocco in the 1960s and early 1970s, both the monarchy and its political opposition employed a “developmentalist” idiom in which “religious” issues were separated from “political” ones. By the late 1970s, the public language of the monarchy’s supporters was much more religiously oriented, and the monarch asserted that he was developing a cadre of Ministry of the Interior officials trained in administration and Islamic thought, claiming that his actions were modeled on those of the Prophet Muhammad (Hassan II 1984, 162).

 Satellite Television Content and Open Societies

Satellite television has been able to make a strong impact on public space in the Arab Middle East because of the shared “modern standard” Arabic of the classroom and the major broadcast media. This conjuncture becomes especially evident when unimpeded live televised debates are combined with call-in questions and comments. Such uses of the media bring speakers and listeners closer together, allowing authorities to be questioned. Uncensored satellite television in Arabic creates ready and open alternatives to the “official story” promulgated by state-controlled broadcast and print media, challenging other media, obliging them to respond with editorials or rebuttals, and entering many different domains of discussion.

In short, satellite television is contributing to the emergence of a “network” society (Castells 1996). Even if only 10–15 percent of Middle Eastern Arabs regularly watch satellite broadcasts (Alterman 1998, 15), the issues and commentaries on uncensored satellite television increasingly shape regional discussions and debate, linking these discussions to those held among Arab professionals in Europe and North America.

As a contributor to the expanding public sphere, Qatar’s al-Jazeera Satellite Channel remains paramount, although it is facing increasing competition from rival transnational satellite channels based in the United Arab Emirates and in Lebanon. There are numerous other Arab satellite channels, but most stick to entertainment because of political constraints. Al-Jazeera began broadcasting in November 1996.

The Al-Jazeera formula resembles the one pioneered by CNN, although its discussion programs are more vigorous and controversial. One example is the weekly program, “al-Ittijah al-Mu‘akis” (The Opposite Direction), moderated by Faisal al-Kassim. A Syrian by origin, al-Kassim graduated at the top of his class in English from the University of Damascus in 1983 and won a scholarship for graduate studies in Britain. His doctoral thesis at the University of Hull was on political iconoclasm in modern British drama. He began working part-time for the BBC in 1988 and made the shift from BBC radio to television in 1994, a position that lasted until the collapse of the BBC's Arabic satellite transmissions in May 1996.

In "The Opposite Direction," two guests with contrary views square off in the Qatar studio, although occasionally the program broadcasts from elsewhere in the Arab world. With al-Kassim moderating, the guests talk to one another for about an hour, followed by telephone call-ins. The program is live, including the telephone calls, which are not prescreened or subject to the "time delay" technology common in American broadcasting. The topics and the broadcasts join the central debates of the Arab world—the Arab-Israeli crisis, the state of the economy, Iran and the Gulf, Kuwait-Iraq animosity, polygamy, Turkey-Israel relations, human rights and Islam, Syria's negotiations with Israel over the Golan Heights, and democratization.

Thus a broadcast on Islam and secularism featured a heated discussion between Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a leading religious conservative, and Syria's Sadeq al-Azm, a committed secularist. For many in the audience, Al-Azm's presentation was the first time they heard a "secularist" argument. Another program featured a debate on polygamy between Toujan Faysal, the first woman in Jordan's parliament and a secularist, and Safinaz Kazim, a religiously conservative Egyptian. When Faysal said at one point that Qur'anic doctrine was out of date, the Egyptian accused her of blasphemy, ripped off her microphone, and got up to leave. Al-Kassim reminded her that she was on live television. She shot back: "I don't care if we're on Mars. I'm not tolerating this blasphemy," and left the studio. The incident also suggests how satellite television is allowing women to join public religious discussions, albeit cautiously, as "The Opposite Direction" never pairs women with men. In October 1999, a former Algerian prime minister, Reda Malek, unhappy with a particularly sharp telephone question, asked al-Kassim to stop the tape. Al-Kassim replied, "I can't. We broadcast live. You're not in Algeria." Furious, the Algerian cursed on air and stormed out of the studio (author's interview with Faisal al-Kassim, Doha, October 30, 1999).

Al-Jazeera programs also focus on regional issues. Thus Abdallah Nafisi, in a program discussing economics, blurted out an attack against the then head of Saudi Arabia's Supreme Council of Ulama, Shaykh Ibn Baz (1912–99), when he declared:

I defy Bin Baz to say something about royal corruption in Saudi Arabia. His country is infested with corruption. He can do fatwas on Viagra, but not mention [regime opponents like] Safar al-Hawali, people languishing in prison. We cannot separate politics from money in the Arab Gulf. "The rulers"—he used the insulting phrase, "the shopkeeper rulers" (al-hukkam al-tujjar)—"only care about opening bank accounts in the West." (author's interview with Faisal al-Kassim, March 20, 1999)

Although accused of bias against the Saudis, a Saudi specialist in media studies recently published a program-by-program analysis of "The Opposite Direction," concluding that it showed no political or religious bias (al-Shamri 1998). The publication of such a book in Saudi Arabia itself suggests the rapidly evolving public sphere, as the "craft" of censorship becomes increasingly public.

The contribution of al-Jazeera to the public sphere is manifested in the speed with which videotapes of its programs circulate freely in the shops and private homes in Damascus, Casablanca, Muscat, Amman, Riyadh, and elsewhere, among those without direct access to satellite television. For many viewers, its Arabic news broadcasts have become the standard against which other broadcasters are judged. Given that reliable surveys of viewing habits and trust in the televised media are lacking for the Arab world, the evidence is largely anecdotal. Yet, dependable figures for Gaza and the West Bank place Qatar's al-Jazeera TV as the most reliable source for information (33.7 per cent), followed by other satellite channels (26.0 per cent), with local Palestinian authority (14.0 per cent) and Israeli television (8.9 per cent) lagging far behind, but still ahead of MBC, Egyptian, and Jordanian broadcasts (Jerusalem Media and Communication Center 1999: 9).

Moreover, satellite television tilts the balance of public argument in favor of ideas and practices that can be explained, defended, and foregrounded. The speed and intensity with which it facilitates the circulation of ideas, images, and practices also distinguishes contemporary public spaces from those of the past. Likewise, journalists and newspaper editors can comment almost simultaneously on events because they can read any of the rapidly growing number of Arabic newspaper Web sites for reactions to current events. Uncensored satellite television enables a wider public to participate in such discussions.

Arabic language satellite channels, like the other new media, including the Internet, have had profound consequences for the political and religious imagination. First, they create and sustain a new public. Modern mass education means not only more widely spread skills than prior patterns of elite education, but also offers wider, competing repertoires of intellectual techniques and authorities and the erosion of exclusivities that previously defined communities of discourse, extending them also to women and minorities.

Second, viewers can now watch religious and political authorities and commentators explain their views and answer questions more as equals than as distant orators who cannot directly be challenged. Moreover, it is not just religious specialists who debate religion, but other educated persons and public figures. The distance between authorities and their audiences is diminished, and claims to the mantle of authority become more open. Finally, satellite television introduces audiences to new ways of thinking, in favoring effective and reasoned presentations. Satellite television is also immediate. Thus Arab opinion makers and television journalists were almost unanimously opposed to the “coalition” invasion and emphasized Iraqi resistance and civilian casualties. They did not flinch, however, from showing U.S. forces vanquishing the last vestiges of the Saddam Hussein regime, forcing readers and viewers immediately to confront the new situation and the impotence of the Iraqi regime (Morley 2003).

Satellite television thus plays a major role in creating and sustaining a new public sphere and brings to it a new objectivity. Satellite television and other new media contribute to turning anonymous or unknown contemporaries into consociates that share common assumptions of civility and morality. Not everyone can telephone guests on politically and religiously sensitive talk shows, and the number of callers from outside the Arab world still outnumber regional callers. But even this fact reminds people of the limits to expression in the Arab Middle East and North Africa. The viewing public, however, is no longer mass and anonymous, but defined by mutual participation—indeed, by performance. In this sense, which Benedict Anderson (1991, 37–46) refers to as a growing sense of reading together, the public sphere emerges less from associations, more strictly the domain of civil society, than with ways of dealing confidently with others in an expanding social universe of shared communication.

 Making Openness Work: Media, Authority, and Elections in Morocco

Although mass education and mass communication are profoundly changing political expectations and ideas of legitimate rule throughout the Middle East, the prospects for democracy vary with the political institutions specific to each country. This is not to say that developments in one country do not have significant repercussions in another. For example, the radicalization of Algerian politics since 1989 led directly to Morocco's October 1992 municipal elections and the June 1993 parliamentary ones. Prior to these elections, the specter of intolerant religious radicalism and equally violent state responses in neighboring Algeria were reported daily in the press and television, and the truth of the violence was confirmed by the many Moroccans with cross-border ties. As in Egypt, assassinations and violent clashes between radical Muslim and state-sponsored hit squads had become commonplace, and the growing Algerian crisis triggered Hassan II's April 1992 decision to hold elections. Although there were reported instances of fraud in both elections, they were generally perceived as "more fair" than preceding ones (International Foundation for Electoral Systems [IFES] 1993, 3; Eickelman 1994). Until the January 1992 military takeover, Algeria followed the "big bang" model of democratization—rapid and direct implementation of decision making on the basis of popular vote. In contrast, Morocco's approach has been incremental, with elections irregularly held since 1963. As was the case for the 1992 municipal elections, the June 1993 parliamentary elections for 222 of the 333 parliamentary seats did not result in a clear victory for any party.

Elections for the remaining 111 indirectly elected parliamentary seats took place on September 17, 1993. On April 26, 1994, “partial” municipal and parliamentary elections—for fourteen seats—were held in the electoral districts where earlier results were invalidated.

The reasons for the large number of invalid votes in the June 1992 elec- tions—13 percent of the 7,153,211 votes cast nationally, with up to 50 percent in some towns, such as Tangier—vary with region, but a high rate of invalid votes can be read as a sign of greater willingness to use the tools of the “system,” flawed as it is, and an awareness that the system can be manipulated not only by the government—which acknowledged prior to the September 2002 parliamentary elections that all prior Moroccan elections had been rigged in one way or another—but also by voters. As with the October 1992 municipal elections, some candidates reportedly purchased votes. In some towns, including Casablanca and Khouribga, the “market value” for votes varied between 50 and 100 Moroccan dirhams ($5-$10), roughly the same as for the October 1992 municipal elections. Unfortunately, polling station reports (taqarir ‘an ‘amaliyat ihsa’ al-aswat) did not distinguish between empty envelopes and votes invalidated for other causes. However, interviews I conducted with polling station officials and party observers in one locality the day after the 1992 elections suggest that the majority of invalid votes were due to blank envelopes, and a survey of election results in one area where detailed results were accessible suggested a correlation between a high incidence of “null” votes and votes for a candidate—who lost—reputed to have purchased votes (see also IFES 1993). In some areas, such activities were limited because candidates engaged attorneys to monitor the practices of rivals and the efforts by opponents to secure the support of local officials. Rival parties threatened to report illegal practices to local electoral commissions and to other authorities. This response in itself indicated a greater confidence in the “rule of law” and the electors’ growing sophistication and awareness of the gap between the rhetoric of the state and its practices.

An exclusive focus on election results deflects attention from major changes taking place beneath the surface. The state needed to make complex arrangements to set the 1992 and 1993 elections in motion and to convince Morocco’s political parties that the elections would be fair. The behind-the-scenes negotiations were not secret—the fact that they were taking place was widely known and reported in the national press. Among the issues involved were (1) the creation of national and regional electoral commissions, including procedures for handling instances of fraud and abuse; (2) computerized election registration to reduce the possibility of electoral fraud; (3) lowering the voting age from twenty- one to twenty; and (4) granting political parties access to television for the first time.

Other changes were more subtle. By mid-1992, the activities of human rights groups were regularly reported in the national press. Even when newspapers refrained from publishing details of human rights abuses because of censorship rules, some national newspapers referred to banned books and to the continued concerns of foreign human rights groups. Another innovation followed Hassan II's August 20, 1992, speech from the throne in which he called for a major reexamination of the rights of women and a revision of the mudawwana, the shari'a-based legal code governing family law administration in Morocco. Even if the results were modest, it set in train conferences and drafting sessions that gave the appearance of improved conditions, especially when coupled with the election of two women to parliament. Finally, press laws were liberalized. The relaxed restrictions culminated in a major scandal in mid-February and March 1993, when Moroccans were treated to daily accounts— a morality play for Ramadan, as it were—of the trial of a senior Casablanca police official for sex crimes involving an estimated fifteen hundred female victims, all of whom he videotaped having forced sex with himself. Although the broadcast media remained silent, the print media covered the trial extensively. For the month of Ramadan, the circulation of Moroccan newspapers soared, as journalists honed their tabloid skills and newspapers regularly sold out (Rocco 1993; Mayer 1993, 93–105). With a total blackout on the subject in the broadcast media, the print media enjoyed a brief renaissance and the event as a morality play was likewise conveyed via audiocassette tapes in Arabic and Berber to wider audiences throughout Morocco (Lakhsassi 1998).

Morocco's September 27, 2002, parliamentary elections offer an interesting contrast to previous ones. They were the first to be held under the rule of Muhammad VI, who assumed the throne after the death of his father in July 2000. On the day before the elections, the prime minister announced that these elections would be a "complete break with the past" and acknowledged that prior ones had been manipulated (cited in Ksikes 2003, 29). In fact, strong efforts were made to eliminate the purchase of votes for cash, the offering by candidates of meals, and other forms of pressure. Prior to the election, the government commissioned television commercials in Arabic and in Berber intended to show illiterates how to vote, and others, featuring a rough-voiced man of authority in a jallaba, promising swift and sure punishment for electoral fraud.

With twenty-six political parties and a system of proportional voting for both a national list of candidates for each party and another “local” list, the voters needed all the help that they could get. As a promissory note on the new “transparency” (shafafiyya), voters were promised a televised counting of the ballots beginning as soon as the doors shut at the country’s thirty-seven thousand polling stations. In the events, only “partial” results were announced after a day’s delay, with complete results announced only four days after the elections and an unexplained blackout of the Ministry of the Interior’s election Web site (Le Journal Hebdo- madaire 2003, 13).

The effort at “transparent” elections was a chastening experience for the government, the political parties, and politically aware Moroccans. The government learned that transparency cannot be achieved by topdown orders alone. The complex system of proportional voting proved so complex that local officials hired to tally the votes acknowledged that their cursory training proved inadequate to the task (interviews in Tanger, September 29, 2003; Mohamed Brahimi, cited in Ksikes 2003, 31). Moreover, the tenor of the televised commercials, showing illiterates how to hold a pen and mark ballots for the one of the twenty-six parties of their choice, proved an embarrassment for educated Moroccans. The very effort to communicate such a complex system of voting to Morocco’s illiterates—60 percent of the female population and roughly 40 percent of the males—highlighted one of the country’s national educational failures. Finally, at the time of the elections and in subsequent published analyses, the government’s concern to diminish the “Islamist” vote was evident. Although the breakup of an al-Qaida cell in the summer prior to the elections and the arrest of a religiously motivated criminal in Casablanca in August 2002 were not fabricated incidents (Oberle 2002), many felt that the government made special efforts to publicize these events and cast Morocco’s Islamists in a bad light. Although the followers of Abdesslam Yassine, grouped into a movement known as “al-‘Adl wa-l-ihsan” (Justice and Benevolence) are neither recognized as a political party and do not recognize the legitimacy of the elections, another Islamist group, “al-‘adl wa-l-dimuqratiya” (PJD, Justice and Democracy) made a strong showing in the circumscriptions where they were allowed to field candidates. The fact that the government had negotiated in advance the numbers of circumscriptions where they were allowed to field candidates was an open secret (Jama’i 2003, 18). The government was afraid that they would make major gains and disrupt the balance of Morocco’s recognized, and balkanized, political landscape. The government, allegedly at the instigation of the king, also reserved seats of the national parliamentary list for women, guaranteeing that women would hold at least 30 of parliament’s 325 seats.

As in the past, the parties also recognized their limitations in communication. All parties were permitted access to television, but as in prior elections, few possessed the ability to use the medium effectively. Parties also received subsidies for campaign literature and for workers, as in prior campaigns, but these were active only in the days immediately prior to the elections. Most leaflets were confined to showing a candidate’s photograph, and the color and symbol allotted to them. Some reports suggested that the Islamist PJD used the pulpits of mosques to get out the vote (Ksikes 2003, 32), but this claim, made only anonymously and after the elections, may have been made only to “explain” the strong turnout for the PJD in contrast to the other political parties.

From the point of view of many voters, the “transparency” of the elections took away from some of the appeal of earlier ones. For many Moroccans who do not understand the electoral process or are not persuaded that they benefit from it, the lack of cash traded for votes may have taken away an incentive to participate in the elections. By 4:00 p.m. on election day, the Ministry of the Interior announced turnout as only 30 percent of the registered voters. By the close of the polls at 7:00 p.m., some 56 percent had voted, one of the lightest turnouts in Morocco’s electoral history.

The September elections did not therefore constitute a major transformation for Morocco, although the number of violations of electoral procedures was light compared with prior elections (Le Journal Hebdo- madaire 2003, 28–299) From the perspective of Tangier, where I observed the elections, the prevalence of cellular telephones by party activists did much to limit opportunities for abuse) Party sympathizers could call headquarters within moments of suspected infractions to report them, so that observers or negotiators could be sent to the scene) Some parties also pooled their efforts to report infractions or problems on a timely basis, and shared information between towns and regions was the norm and not the exception) In past elections, only the government possessed the ability to communicate rapidly, at least between major centers) The government hot line (numero verte) to report violations also functioned, but appeared to function only to record complaints and not to act on them) In the past, such reports might have taken hours or even a day to be communicated)

 “Scaling Up” for More Open Societies

Elections such as Morocco’s require a conjuncture of “scaling up” and “scaling down)” The “scaling up” involves using informal background understandings of trust and cooperation to envisage participation linking persons, localities, and regions to wider society) “Scaling down” entails recognition on the part of the state that elections, like effective plural political participation, require not just a top-down order, but also a recognition of an inevitable trial-and-error as new forms of political organization become part of local background understandings of community and trust. Flaws remain in Morocco’s electoral process, but in contrast with past elections, they cannot be imputed exclusively to a grand design from the center. Despite their claims to the contrary, Moroccan political parties unevenly cover the country, and none has a universal appeal. Unlike the situation that existed immediately after independence in 1956, no party has deep roots in all the rural areas, where local candidates with no committed party affiliation other than cooperation with the government, usually in the form of local officials, still prevail. The poor showing of many parties in many regions suggests that Morocco’s political parties have only begun to master the techniques needed to secure mass support.

Yet significant political change is taking place. Politically active Moroccans began in 1992 to signal significant long-term political change. As one “opposition” political leader suggested:

We are seeing the first stage in the breakup of the system of power in Morocco. In the 1970s and 1980s we asked the question, “What is the role which political parties can play in the monarchy?” Now the question has changed to “What is the role of a monarchy in a modern society?” Technically this is a forbidden question, but Hasan knows that this is the issue on everyone’s minds. (interview with author, Rabat, June 11, 1992)

Nonetheless, most Moroccans are convinced that the conduct of the current elections breaks with past practices, allowing “democracy” to begin to acquire a specific substance and the “rule of law” to become more than a slogan, in large part because of at least some of the media and the new forms of communication.

Elections cannot be understood or implemented in a cultural vacuum, but take place in a web of significance that includes the background understandings and shared assumptions of a people. In the case of Morocco, as elsewhere in the Arab Middle East, moral authority does not derive from elections alone. In many rural parts of Morocco, voting still takes place along tribal lines. Sometimes this is interpreted as the local manipulation of voters. An equally plausible explanation in many regions is that voters consult with one another and decide collectively prior to elections how they will cast their ballots, although such votes were not always cast along tribal lines.

Linda Layne describes a similar situation for tribal Jordan, where people in tribal areas often voluntarily declare their vote to bystanders because of the cultural sense of dishonor at acting in a covert manner. In the Jordanian tribal context, giving “voice” (sawt) to one’s vote—the literal meaning of vote in Arabic—meant refusing to separate the role of voter from that of person (Layne 1994, 112–23).

Such background understandings are also evident in the tribal areas of Yemen where, rather than belong to just one political party, most people belong to several even when such political identities are mutually contradictory (Dresch and Haykel 1995). The paradoxical effect is to sustain civil society. Dresch and Haykel argue that understanding the prospects for democracy in the Yemen requires a “local knowledge” that cannot be subsumed by any single, culturally universal instrument such as elections. Elections acquire an importance only when interpreted in context of political understandings derived neither from an overly determined metatheory —“elections are the only means to determine the people’s will”—nor from directly “observing the flow of Yemeni social life without the benefit of dialogue with informed Yemenis.” Moreover, in the Yemen, as elsewhere, the limits to what are considered “political” are in flux.

Progress toward representative government has been slow in the Arab world, but an awareness of what is lacking has become increasingly evident due to the new media, mass higher education, and the experience of large numbers of people in the region with life elsewhere. During the Cold War years, the United States—to contain the presumed Soviet threat, secure the free flow of oil to the West, and defend Israel’s secu- rity—systematically opposed popular nationalist leaders, regimes “willing to experiment with political freedom,” and those which moved too quickly to replace the old order (Cottam 1993, 20, 32–33). In some cases, these concerns continued after the end of the Cold War—in the case of some oil-rich states, the United States has spoken softly about human rights abuses. Likewise, U.S. concern about promoting democracy was far from prominent when the Algerian military canceled the January 1992 elections.

In the field of the history of science, one major advance has been to break with the assumption that there is a fixed, hierarchical relation between theory, the instruments of perception, and experiment, but rather a wide variety of interactive relations among them (Galison 1988, 208, 210). Setting aside such fixed measures of democracy as proposed by Lipset can offer an ability to understand the complex background understandings needed to make elections work in the different contemporary contexts of the Arab Middle East.

A first step is to learn to elicit the cultural notions of legitimate authority and justice and to recognize the multiple voices of the Muslim and Arab world attuned to these issues. Ideas of just rule, religious or otherwise, are not fixed, even if some radicals claim that they are. Such notions are debated, argued, often fought about, and re-formed in practice. Such debates are occurring throughout the region. Recognizing the contours, obstacles, and false starts, both internal to the different countries of the region and external, to making governance less arbitrary and authoritarian is a needed first step. One observer of Moroccan politics, commenting on the shortcomings of Morocco's September 2002 elections, recently wrote:

I am no longer interested in transparency as an end in itself, but rather as an instrument of political negotiation to brandish several months prior to [our] local elections. In fact, the [government] communications campaign for these coming elections has already begun. (Ksikes 2003, 29)

"Communication does not necessarily mean credibility," concludes Ksikes. Perhaps not. However, communicating in a common language and being able to confront authority in it, comparing multiple sources of information on other people's experiences with similar issues elsewhere, and possessing rapid means of information and communication held until recently only by state authorities or a political elite have dramatically changed shared understandings of religion and politics throughout the Arab Middle East—and altered the prospects for open societies and democracy. Such challenges are not regional alone, and foreign powers who act in the region to encourage more open societies must now match deeds with words. Successes, like shortcomings, will now become known in real time.

 References Cited

Adelkhah, Farbia. 2000. Being Modern in Iran. New York: Columbia University Press.

Alterman, Jon B. 1998. New Media, New Politics? From Satellite Television to the Internet in the Arab World. Washington, D.C.: Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Anderson, Benedict. 1991. Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism. London: Verso.

Ben Ali, Zine El Abidine. 1994. “L’integrisme, c’est maintenant votre probleme.” Interview with Jacques Jacquet-Françillon, Figaro, August 2, p. 5.

Binsa‘id, Sa‘id. 1993. “al-hiwar wa-l-fahm la al-qafl‘iyya wa-l-jahl” (Dialogue and understanding, not alienation and ignorance). al-Sharq al-Awsat (London), July 7, p. 10.

Bourdieu, Pierre. 1988. Homo Academicus. London: Polity Press.

Castells, Manuel. 1996. The Rise of the Network Society. Malden, Mass.: Blackwells.

Chartier, Roger. 1987. The Cultural Uses of Print in Early Modern France. Translated by L. G. Cochrane. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Cottam, Richard W. 1993. “United States Middle East Policy in the Cold War Era.” In Russia’s Muslim Frontiers: New Directions in Cross-Cultural Analysis, edited by Dale F Eickelman, pp. 19–37. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Dresch, Paul, and Bernard Haykel. 1995. “Stereotypes and Political Styles: Islamists and Tribesfolk in Yemen.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 27, no. 4 (November): 405–31.

Economist (London). 1993. “Feeding Fundamentalism.” August 21, p. 36.

Eickelman, Dale F. 1992. “Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies.” American Ethnologist 19, no. 4 (November): 643–55.

———. 1994. “Re-Imagining Religion and Politics: Moroccan Elections in the 1990s.” In Islamism and Secularism in North Africa, edited by John Ruedy, pp. 253–73. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Galison, Peter. 1988. “History, Philosophy, and the Central Metaphor.” Science in Context 2, no. 1 (1988): 197–212.

Gellner, Ernest. 1983. Nations and Nationalism. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

Gonaalez,-Qulıano, Yves. 1998. LesGe tsii Iı.iwe’.ѣ<litio te l amp inteleectd dans ligypte republicaine. Paris: CNRS Editions.

Halperin, Manfred. 1963. The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Hammoudi, Abdellah. 1997. Master and Disciple: The Cultural Foundations of Moroccan Authoritarianism. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Hassan II. 1984. Discours et interviews. Rabat: Ministry of Information.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1993. “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs 72, no. 3 (Summer): 22–49.

International Foundation for Electoral Systems. 1993. “Morocco: Direct Legislative Elections.” Washington, D.C.: International Foundation for Electoral Systems.

Jamal, Aboubakr. 2003. “27 septembre 2002: Enquete sur un scrutiny amenage.” Le Journal Hebdomadaire (Casablanca), no. 102, April 5–11, p. 10.

Jerusalem Media and Communication Center. 1999. Palestinian Opinion Pulse 1, no. 33 (November).

Le Journal Hebdomadaire (Casablanca). 2003. “La Societe civile relativise la transparence des elections,” no. 106, April 5–11, pp. 28–29.

Kishk, ‘Abd al-Hamid. 1989. Ayyuha l-Muslimun, Ufiqu (O Muslims, awake!). Cairo: al-Mukhtar al-Islami.

Ksikes, Driss. 2003. “Un Hold-up avorte?” Tel Quel 72, April 5–11, pp. 28–37.

Lakhsassi, Abderrahmane. 1998. “Scandale national et chansons populaires.” In Miroirs maghrebins: Itineraires de soi et paysages de rencontre, edited by Susan Ossman, pp. 99–109. Paris: CNRS.

Layne, Linda L. 1994. Home and Homeland: The Dialogics of Tribal and National Identities in Jordan. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Lerner, Daniel. 1964 [1958]. The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East. New York: Free Press.

Lipset, Seymour Martin. 1994. “The Social Requisites of Democracy Revisited.” American Sociological Review 59, no. 1 (February): 1–22.

Mabruk, Layla. 1989. Rihla ila ‘alam al-Khulud: ‘Adalat Yawm al-Qiyama [A trip to eternity: justice on judgment day]. Cairo: al-Mukhtar al-Islami.

Mayer, Ann Elizabeth. 1993. “Moroccans—Citizens or Subjects? A People at the Crossroads.” Journal of International Law and Politics 26, no. 1 (Fall): 63–105.

Morley, Jefferson. 2003. “Arab Media Confront the ‘New Rules of the Game.’” Washington Post, April 14 ([[http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A64349-2003Apr9.html] [http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/]] [[http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A64349-2003Apr9.html] [A64349-2003Apr9.html]])

Oberle, Thierry. 2002. “Rabat leve le voile sur ses islamistes.” Le Figaro, September 25, p. 4.

Rocco, Fiammetta. 1993. “The Shame of Casablanca.” The Independent on Sunday (London), May 9.

Roy, Olivier. 1999. “Le Post-islamisme.” Revue des Mondes Musulmans et de la Mediterranee, nos. 85/86, pp. 11–30.

Al-Sharif, Muhamad Shakir. 1992 [1412]. Haqiqat al-Dimuqratiya (the truth about democracy). Riyadh: Dar al-watan li-l-nashr.

Al-Shamri, Sulayman bin Jazi’. 1998. Barnamij al-Ittijah al-Mu‘akis: Dirasa ‘Ilmiyya Akadamiya (The “Opposite Direction” program: An academic study]. Riyadh: Department of Information, King Saud University.

Sharabi, Hisham. 1988. Neopatriarchy: A Theory of Distorted Change in Arab Society. New York: Oxford University Press.

“Shaykh Muhammad.” 1994. “Shaykh Muhammad al-Utayman in a Discussion of Incendiary Publications: Whomever Publishes These Leaflets and Pamphlets, Copies Them, or Distributes Them Commits a Major Sin and Bears Responsibility for His Own Crime and for the Crime of All Those Influenced by Them.” al-Sharq al-Awsat (in Arabic), November 20.

Shepard, William E. 1987. “Islam and Ideology: Towards a Typology.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 19, no. 3 (August): 307–36.

———. 1989. “Islam as a ‘System’ in the Later Writings of Sayyid Qutb.” Middle Eastern Studies 25, no. 1 (January): 31–50.

———. 1992. “The Development of the Thought of Sayyid Qutb as Reflected in Earlier and Later Editions of ‘Social Justice in Islam.’” Die Welt des Islams 32, no. 2: 196–236.

Waterdrinker, Brigette. 1993. Genese et construction d’un etat moderne: Le cas du Sultanate d’Oman. Memoire de DEA Etudes Politiques, Institut d’Etudes Politiques de Paris.

White, Jenny B. 2002. Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

 Chapter 3: Pluralism, Democracy, and the ‘ulama

Muhammad Qasim Zaman

The question of how Islam and Muslims view democracy, pluralism, and modern understandings of the rights of human beings has been much discussed, with varying degrees of pessimism and optimism (e.g., Esposito and Voll 1996; Mayer 1999; Humphreys 1999; Hefner 2000; Sache- dina 2001). Muslim scholars like Abdulaziz Sachedina (2001) have argued vigorously that a careful reading of the Qur'an as a whole provides strong grounds for "democratic pluralism" and for a civil society in which Muslims and non-Muslims enjoy equal rights. Sachedina's argument is premised on a disjunction between the original teachings of the Qur'an and the historical development of juristic and political thought. While the Qur'an, on his reading, is strongly supportive of human rights irrespective of creed, Muslim jurists and rulers of Muslim majority states typically privileged Muslims over non-Muslims, just as they privileged men over women. The challenge faced by the Muslim scholars, the "Muslim religious establishment," is to rethink Islamic law and legal theories on the basis of the Qur'an in the modern world, he says, and he laments that the religious establishment has yet to show any serious engagement with this enterprise.

Others have taken a less severe view of the premodern history of Islamic law and jurisprudence, arguing that even as a sacred law, the shari'ah preserved many crucial elements of flexibility in its norms and that the manner and scope of their implementation could vary considerably at different times and places (see, e.g., Tucker 1998; Hallaq 2001). While underlining certain basic inequalities in the moral universe of the medieval jurists, Baber Johansen has shown that the jurists of the Hanafi school of Sunni law were careful to protect the rights of the individual against the claims of the state (Johansen 1999). The jurists worked with the two overarching categories of the nonnegotiable "rights of God" (such as certain punishments mandated in the Qur'an and in the normative example of the Prophet) and the "rights of man." While the latter were a matter of private negotiation between the parties affected by an infraction, the former—the rights of God—were upheld by the state on behalf of God and of the entire community. But the jurists worried that the state could infringe on the rights of the individual under the guise of protecting God's rights and sought therefore to restrict the laws pertaining to those rights to the barest minimum, even as they extended the scope of the rights of the human being. As one nineteenth-century jurist, Ibn 'Abidin (d. 1836) of Damascus, had put it, "This is not so because we are treating the claims of law [regarding the rights of God] lightly, but because the human being is in need and the law is not" (cited in Johansen 1999, 214).

Such juristic concerns suggest their possible relevance to projects of rethinking individual rights and civil society in both a modern and an Islamic context. Mohammad Fadel has offered another illustration of how there might be unexpected concordance between the concerns of many Muslim "modernists" and the arguments of medieval jurists. In interpreting Qur'an 2.282, which speaks of the need for two female witnesses to replace a single male witness, certain Sunni jurists explained this inequality in what Fadel characterizes as "sociological" terms: what made a woman's testimony less valuable was the result not of any "natural" deficiency (as many others argued), but of the fact that she had less exposure to the outside world and thus presumably had less to say about disputes that arose there; in matters of which she might be expected to have a more intimate knowledge, her testimony was not half that of a man, just as in matters of narrating and transmitting religious texts, the authority of her word was no different from a man's. In the presence of such sociological explanations, Fadel concludes:

one can no longer simply assume that modernist interpretations of Qur'an 2.282 represent a radical break from Islamic law; indeed, from the perspective of fiqh, the sociological interpretation ... is the only plausible reading of the verse ... [T]his suggests that Muslim modernism in general, and Muslim feminism in particular, might profit from exploiting problems and tensions that have long been recognized to exist within Islamic law. In the long run, this strategy may be more successful than claiming the need for a "new" jurisprudence that is to be derived ex nihilo from the original sources of Islamic law. (Fadel 1997, 200)

While Fadel's concern is to recommend this strategy to the modernists, might something similar be considered with reference to the traditionally educated Muslim religious scholars, the 'ulama, as well? Scholars of contemporary Islam have often seen the 'ulama as a mere relic of the past, as having been entirely co-opted by the ruling elite, as altogether mired in an unchanging view of both Islam and the world and, in any case, as having little of interest or importance to contribute to contemporary Islamic discourses. But, as I show elsewhere (Zaman 2002), the ‘ulama have not only undergone significant changes in the modern world, they have often also adapted in a variety of ways to the transformations around them and have thereby come to play roles of considerable importance in countries like Pakistan, India, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Iran, and elsewhere. These roles are varied and, while they can be usefully compared across Muslim societies, they are, in each instance, the product of particular configurations of local, national, and international factors. In each case, moreover, the ‘ulama compete for influence and authority with other actors in the public sphere—for instance, with Muslim modernists and Islamists of various stripes.[11] Yet far from marginalizing the ‘ulama, it is precisely in the framework of an ongoing public contestation—over religious authority, politics, the proper orientation of their societies, the common good—that many of their new roles and their discourses have often been articulated (Zaman 2004). At the same time, however, it is typically with reference to the Islamic religious and especially the juristic tradition that they have continued to define and express themselves. The prospect of (re)discover- ing hitherto ignored positions within this tradition should, then, appeal to them more than it does to anyone else.

Whether the shari‘ah has the resources at all that can lend themselves to the building or strengthening of a civil, democratic society in the contemporary world is an important and difficult question. And while many scholars deny that such resources exist (cf. An-Na‘im 1990), the foregoing illustrations should at least indicate that the question is by no means a settled one and, indeed, that it can be answered in the affirmative. Yet this is not the only question worth asking. We also need to ask, as I do in this chapter, whether, in seeking to maintain a continuing link with the premodern juristic tradition, the ‘ulama are willing to draw on that tradition’s resources in a way that might be conducive to a civil, democratic Islam. A common answer to my question is a simple “no” (e.g., Sache- dina 2001, 132). There is, indeed, much in the rhetoric and actions of the ‘ulama to warrant such a judgment. But as I would argue in this chapter, in focusing on the ‘ulama of South Asia and more specifically on those of Pakistan, the answer is in fact much more ambiguous. To appreciate why this is so, we need some understanding of the discourses of the contemporary ‘ulama, the ways in which they engage with and build on the premodern Islamic tradition, and the pressures and contradictions of the political context in which these discourses have found expression.

Though they share a colonial legacy, the two nation-states that emerged with the partition of British India in 1947 have evolved along very different paths: India is the largest democracy in the world, whereas Pakistan’s experiments with democracy have been interrupted, and marred, by long periods of military or quasi-military rule. The population of India is predominantly Hindu, and Muslims comprise approximately 12 percent of the total population; yet, even this relatively small proportion makes the Muslim population of India larger than that of most predominantly Muslim states (Hasan 1997, 1–3). The population of Pakistan, on the other hand, is overwhelmingly Muslim. And while India is a secular state—although led, since the late 1990s, by a Hindu nationalist government—Pakistan professes to be an “Islamic Republic.” All these and other differences notwithstanding, ‘ulama and their institutions of learning, the madrasas, have thrived in both postcolonial India and in Pakistan.

Most South Asian Muslims are Sunnis, though there is a substantial Shi‘i population in both India and Pakistan (about 15 percent of Pakistan’s Muslim population is Shi‘i). It was under British colonial rule that the major sectarian orientations within South Asia’s Sunni Islam crystallized, in part as a response to the challenges facing the Muslim community with the end of the centuries-long Muslim rule in India, the advent of a colonial power, and the massive economic, social, and technological changes that colonialism brought in its wake. One of the most important of these sectarian orientations is associated with the madrasa of Deoband, which was founded in 1867 in a small north Indian town (Metcalf 1982). The “Deobandis” represent a self-consciously “reformed” Islam, firmly rooted in the foundational texts and in the Hanafi school of Sunni law and defining itself in opposition to “popular” forms of belief and practice they often associate with the veneration of shrines and holy men. The madrasa of Deoband soon had affiliate madrasas, all called “De- obandi,” in different parts of South Asia, even as it attracted many students from outside the Indian subcontinent. The “parent” madrasa remained in what became postcolonial India, where numerous other madrasas have emerged since independence. But it is in Pakistan that the madrasas belonging to various sectarian orientations—Barelawi, Ahl-i Hadith, Shi‘i and, most notably, Deobandi—have grown most dramatically. Altogether, in 2001, there were 2,715 madrasas in the Punjab alone, the most populous of Pakistan’s four provinces; and the number of madrasa students, which was said to be 249,534 in this province in 2001, had multiplied by more than ten since 1960 (Zaman 2002, 2; cf. 126). The products of these madrasas are very unequal in their grounding in the Islamic religious tradition: they range from highly sophisticated scholars of Islamic law and exegetes of the Qur’an and of the traditions of Muhammad (hadith) to those barely able to fulfill their functions as prayer leaders and preachers. Yet for all the differences in the stature and credentials of their graduates, it is in these madrasas that those who emerge as “‘ulama” become ‘ulama; and, as I would argue later in this chapter, madrasas are crucial sites for thinking about at least some facets of pluralism and democracy in relation to the Islamic tradition.

 The ‘Ulama’s Islamic Tradition and Muslim Politics

The Muslims of South Asia faced one of the most critical moments in their modern history when, as the end of British colonial rule came in sight, they had to decide how their future as a religious and political community was best secured. One group of Muslim leaders, led by the All-India Muslim League, had come to advocate the creation of a separate homeland for the Muslims, seeing in this the best guarantee for escaping permanent domination by a Hindu majority in postcolonial India. But other Muslim leaders, and these included many prominent Deobandi ‘ulama, resolutely opposed the demand for a separate Muslim state. These ‘ulama were led by Husayn Ahmad Madani (d. 1957), who argued that Muslims throughout the world constituted a single global community, a community that could not legitimately be carved into separate Muslim nations. Conversely, he held, Muslims living in particular regions—in this case, South Asia—could be part of a composite nation with other religious communities in that region. That is, “nations” were based on ethnicity, language, and territory, whereas “communities” were defined by ties of faith. The Muslims of India therefore formed an Indian nation together with the Hindus, even as they remained part of an indivisible, global umma (Madani n.d. [1938]).

The position of these “nationalist ‘ulama,” as represented by Madani, was much derided by its critics for its failure to appreciate the dangers Muslim identity would face in a Hindu-dominated India. Such criticism was not without basis but, irrespective of it, two things are worth noting in the position of Madani and the nationalist ‘ulama. First, there are, in fact, important precedents in the premodern juristic discourses on the question of Muslims living in territories governed by non-Muslims. While many jurists were resolutely opposed to such a possibility, others allowed it (Abou El Fadl 1994). And though Madani did not explicitly invoke these debates in defence of his own “nationalist” position, his views unmistakably echo some of these premodern juristic discussions. Second, and no less importantly, he insisted on the “flexibility” of Islam and of the shari‘ah in adjusting to different social configurations and in interacting with non-Muslims (Madani n.d. [1938], 39–40, 49–51). To him, there was nothing in Islam that inherently disallowed such interaction, and it is clearly on this understanding of the shari‘ah that he, as a leading religious scholar, based his remarkable opposition to the creation of a Muslim (or “Islamic”) state in favor of a united, secular nation-state.

Even as the Muslims of postcolonial India profess their allegiance to the secular nation-state, their leaders have continued to debate how best to protect the interests of the community. Sayyid Abu’l-Hasan ‘Ali Nadwi (d. 1999), the best known of the Indian ‘ulama of the latter half of the twentieth century, argued, for instance, for the need for greater political mobilization by Indian Muslims as a way of safeguarding their religious and cultural identity (Zaman 2002, 160–70). Conversely, ‘ulama like Wahid al-din Khan (b.1925) have argued that the interests of India’s Muslims are best served by renouncing political activism and instead by focusing on building better ties with the non-Muslim majority, while also striving for strengthening the religious foundations of the Muslim community (Khan 1994). Wahid al-din Khan is highly critical of ‘ulama like Nadwi, as well as of Islamist ideologues like Abu’l-A‘la Mawdudi (d. 1979) of Pakistan for seeking solutions to the contemporary ills of the Muslims in politics (Khan 1996, 163–217, and especially 196–97, 199–207, 210–11). Rather than political activism, he advocates peaceful proselytism at the grass roots of society as the proper path to Islam’s reinvigoration (cf. Khan 1986). But unlike Madani, Nadwi, and most other ‘ulama, in South Asia or elsewhere, he also advocates a radical critique of the Islamic tradition in the contemporary world (Khan 1996, 31–95). This tradition, he argues, is largely the product of a time when Muslims were politically dominant in the world, with the result that it has little to guide them in drastically changed contexts. Rather than draw their resources from the existing body of premodern juristic debates, he urges Muslims to energetically engage in rethinking Islam to arrive at solutions that are genuinely compatible with the needs of their time. He is not alone among the ‘ulama in advocating the need for systematic reflection on the foundational texts for solutions to new legal problems (ijtihad) but, unlike many of them, Wahid al-din Khan does not see the premodern juristic tradition as necessarily defining the perimeters within which any further juristic exertion ought properly to be undertaken.

While the minority position of the Indian Muslims led ‘ulama like Madani and Wahid al-din Khan to argue for a pluralistic, multifaith society, others outside India have also attended to the question of pluralism within the ranks of Muslims themselves. The best known among them is the Qatar-based Egyptian scholar Yusuf al-Qaradawi, one of the most influential of the ‘ulama in the contemporary Muslim world (Zaman 2004). Qaradawi invokes the long recognized area of “disagreement” in the premodern juristic discourses to argue that a plurality of views within the Muslim community is no threat to Islam and that it ought to be perfectly acceptable (Qaradawi 2001). Given the long history of juristic disagree- ments—which often provided the jurists and the judges some space for flexibility in the articulation and implementation of the law—Qaradawi’s point is anything but novel. It is significant nonetheless, for invoking this history allows Qaradawi to try to carve out some pluralistic space in contemporary Muslim societies. At the same time, it reminds us that, in the culture of the ‘ulama, novel or at least present-minded concerns continue to be couched in terms of their tradition.

The foregoing examples tell us something about how the ‘ulama have, in their different ways, sought to accommodate Islam to a changing world. Yet none of these illustrations is free of ambiguity. Even as he extols the juristic tradition’s tolerance for disagreement, Qaradawi makes a distinction between disagreement that constitutes “variety” and that which he labels “opposition” or “contradiction.” The former kind, of which the juristic disagreements on subsidiary matters of the law are the prime instance, is not merely tolerable but a source of the tradition’s richness of intellectual resources. But the latter kind of disagreement—by which he presumably means disagreement on the very foundations on which the Muslim society is to rest, or disagreement on whether that society is to rest on Islamic foundations at all—is, for him, intolerable (al-Qaradawi 2001, 210–15). In effect, then, the only sort of “pluralism” that is acceptable to Qaradawi is pluralism within the ranks of those who already agree on the fundamentals of belief and practice in their community. Madani, on the other hand, did clearly envisage a society in which Muslims and non-Muslims would be equal citizens, though he did so, of course, in the context of a state where Muslims were to be a minority. And, as historian Peter Hardy has observed, Madani clearly did not envisage a nation-state in which the Muslim community, qua religious and cultural entity, would altogether merge itself. He appears, rather, to have conceived of a free, united India where Muslims would be autonomous as a cultural entity, to be guided by their own religious leaders, the ‘ulama, within the framework of the secular state (Hardy 1971, 38–41). Viewed thus, the significance of Madani’s “united nationalism” and its potential for adapting Islam to a pluralistic India is by no means negated, but it does appear less far reaching than it did at first sight. Wahid al-din Khan, for his part, calls for a more vigorous participation of Muslims in weaving India’s cultural fabric and in taking seriously the promises of India’s secular pluralism. Yet, as noted earlier, his position is articulated on the basis of a thoroughgoing critique of the Islamic intellectual and juristic tradition, one verging on claims of its irrelevance in the modern world, and this exacts a considerable cost in terms of the resonance of his potential appeal for many Muslims, let alone for other ‘ulama.

If there are ambiguities in formulations such as the foregoing, there appears to be considerable clarity in the stridency of the antipluralist and antidemocratic positions that one encounters in the discourses of many contemporary ‘ulama. For instance, for all their other disagreements, there is little to distinguish the ‘ulama of Pakistan (or of India, for that matter) so far as their attitudes toward the Ahmadi community are concerned. The Ahmadis are anathematized by most other Muslims, and not just in South Asia, for their belief that Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (d. 1908), the founder of their community, was a prophet. This assertion contravenes the fundamental Islamic belief that Muhammad was the last of God’s prophets and, under pressure from the ‘ulama and the Islamists, the government of Prime Minister Zulfiqar ‘Ali Bhutto (1971–77) amended the constitution of Pakistan to expressly declare the Ahmadis as nonMuslims. Many Sunni ‘ulama are no less hostile to the Shi‘a than they are to the Ahmadis, however, and since the early 1980s, Pakistan has witnessed widespread sectarian conflicts between the Shi‘a and the Sunnis (Nasr 2000; Zaman 2002, 111–35). This sectarian militancy has been led by lower-ranking ‘ulama, who have tended to combine a humble socioeconomic background and madrasa training with, often, military training in Afghanistan in the course of the Afghan struggle against Soviet occupation or during the subsequent civil war. However, many leading figures among the ‘ulama of Pakistan and India have also urged the sectarian foot soldiers on, even as their own political influence has been enhanced by the activities of these sectarian militants. There is more to the context of sectarian hostilities in Pakistan than the discourses and activities of the ‘ulama, though these do suffice to raise serious questions about the ‘ulama’s toleration of difference.

Nor do the ‘ulama’s discourses give solid proof of their commitment to what they often pejoratively refer to as “Western-style democracy” (e.g., ‘Uthmani 1993a, 41, 111–16). The most basic of their discomforts on this score lies in what they see as the conflict of such democracy with the immutability of the shari‘ah: given that God’s law is for all times, no hu- mans—even if they all agree—can have the authority to alter it, let alone to decide whether or not this law ought to be implemented. While Muslims may well debate and disagree on precisely how God’s law is to be implemented, for this does admit of many different possibilities, they cannot, by definition, disagree on whether it ought to be implemented (‘Uthmani 1993a, 49–50). Yet it is precisely the ability to debate the very foundations of a society and polity that a “Western-style democracy” confers on the citizens. So while most of the ‘ulama typically endorse such features of a democratic system as regular and free elections and public accountability, they fervently deny that the authority of the elected representatives of the people extends, even in principle, to all areas of public or religious life, just as they deny that democratic inclusiveness can encompass everyone. Thus “heretical” Muslims, let alone those who are not—or are refused recognition as—Muslims, can scarcely be equal citizens with Muslims in an Islamic state.

Even more troubling than a rejection of, or serious limitations on, democratic pluralism is the view, espoused by many ‘ulama, that jihad against unbelievers is a continuing obligation. The literature on jihad is voluminous, but I want to briefly take up a single example of the contemporary (but pre-September 11, 2001) discussions on it. This relates to one of the most prominent of Pakistan’s contemporary Deobandi ‘ulama, Mawlana Muhammad Taqi ‘Uthmani, a former judge of the Shari‘at Appellate Bench of the Supreme Court of Pakistan and the vice president of the Dar al-‘Ulum of Karachi, one of the largest of Pakistan’s madrasas. In a written question which, together with his detailed response, was later published in a book by Taqi ‘Uthmani, Islam and Modernism (1999), he was asked about the legal status of “aggressive” as opposed to “defensive” jihad in the modern world. The questioner himself was of the view that armed struggle by Muslims is only justified in self-defense, and that Muslims are not to open hostilities against any state which has no aggressive designs against them. The proper path for promoting the interests of Islam, the questioner believed, was that of peaceful proselytism, and there could be no justification for aggression against a non-Muslim state that allowed opportunities to Muslims to preach their faith within it. The questioner wanted to know whether Taqi ‘Uthmani agreed with this view, or on what basis he disagreed.

In his response, Taqi ‘Uthmani disputed the idea that opportunities for peaceful proselytism constituted sufficient grounds for regarding a nonMuslim state as friendly. The crucial issue, he argued, is the “might” (Urdu: shawkat; Arabic: shawka) of the non-Muslim states, which, being presently greater than that of Muslim states, is by itself an obstacle on the path to proselytism (‘Uthmani 1999, 102). Formal permission to preach Islam in such a situation becomes meaningless, he says, for the might of the state so conditions people as to make them incapable of becoming receptive to Islam. It is this might that jihad seeks to undo, Taqi ‘Uthmani argues, and he concludes his response with contemptuous disdain for the view that the sort of expansionism aggressive jihad represents has no place in the modern world (‘Uthmani 1999, 107–9))

It is impossible to neatly classify the Pakistani ‘ulama between the “extremist” and the “moderate,” the activist and the quietist, the political and the apolitical) Even many leading figures among them, who have largely devoted their careers to scholarly pursuits, maintain varied links with the radical sectarian militants and benefit from the latter’s successes, as noted earlier) Taqi ‘Uthmani himself is one of the most prolific of ‘ulama—not just in Pakistan but anywhere in the contemporary Muslim world—in terms of his writings on society and politics, his commentaries on classical collections of hadith, and on a range of subjects relating to the interpretation and the implementation of Islamic law) His is far from being the most radical voice among either the Islamists or the ‘ulama, and yet, as the foregoing views suggest, it is hard to classify him as a “moderate” in any meaningful sense)

How then do we interpret Taqi ‘Uthmani’s views on jihad? I would argue that despite the seeming clarity of his position, there is, in fact, considerable ambiguity in it—an ambiguity that sheds some light on the contemporary ‘ulama’s discourses in general. We should bear in mind that Taqi ‘Uthmani’s position here is a theoretical defense of the idea of jihad, not a call on Muslims to embark upon it. His concern is to safeguard what he sees as Islam’s timeless verities—including what the Qur’an or the Prophet’s example has to say about jihad—against efforts by Muslim modernists to reinterpret or repackage Islam in light of their liberal values. (Recall that Taqi ‘Uthmani’s essay on jihad is part of a collection of his essays in a volume entitled “Islam and Modernism.”) The real issue here seems to be that of defending jihad because it has all along been part of the Islamic juristic and historical tradition. If the Islamic tradition provides the resources on which to conceive of a pluralistic world, as the tentative attempts of Madani and Qaradawi suggest, that tradition equally constrains the possibilities in contemporary discourse. The constraints are not necessarily disabling, however. Indeed, much of the growth and change in premodern Islamic law took place through a careful negotiation between the existing constraints and the available mechanisms for ingenuity and innovation (cf. Jackson 1996; Hallaq 2001); and ‘ulama like Taqi ‘Uthmani and Qaradawi continue to argue for the possibility of adaptation, growth, and change in that law. Even so, what typically distinguishes the ‘ulama from other religious intellectuals in contemporary Muslim societies is precisely their insistence on taking the tradition, or large parts of it, along with them; and it is this concern, more than any other, that underlies Taqi ‘Uthmani’s alarming, and deceptively unambiguous, defense of jihad.

There is often also a considerable disjunction between the formal discourses of the ‘ulama and the range of political and other practices in which they participate. Despite his seeming disdain for the opportunities for proselytism that Western democracies offer to Islam, Taqi ‘Uthmani has in fact been a frequent visitor to Europe and North America, and he has published detailed accounts of his travels on these continents (‘Uth- mani 1996). Sunni and Shi‘i organizations have engaged in systematic, targeted killings of their rivals, yet their leaders have not been above tactical alliances against what they perceive as common foes. Thus, the leader of the Tahrik-i Ja‘fariyya-i Pakistan, Pakistan’s premier Shi‘i political organization, which had been banned alongside radical Sunni organizations by the government of General Pervez Musharraf in January 2002, was part of the alliance of religiopolitical parties in the general elections of October 2002 (The News, September 6, 2002). This alliance included factions of the Jam‘iyyat al-‘Ulama-i Islam, the political organization of the Deobandi ‘ulama and the parent body of the Sipah-i Sahaba (also banned in January 2002); and it included Pakistan’s premier Islamist organization, the Jama‘at-i Islami, which in the past has often had difficult relations with the ‘ulama.[12] The earlier alliance of one faction of the Jam‘iyyat al-‘Ulama-i Islam with the government of Benazir Bhutto during her second tenure as prime minister (1993–96) offers another instance of the ‘ulama’s pragmatic politics. This alliance was remarkable in view of the ‘ulama’s widespread discomfort with the fact that a woman headed the government and that it projected a largely Westernized image. My point here is that irrespective of what many ‘ulama would say about secular, liberal regimes, about the Shi‘a, about “Western-style democracy,” and about proselytism in Western societies, they have seldom allowed their formal discourses to foreclose the range of political options that might be open to them. If the ‘ulama’s invocation of pluralist ideas continues to have much ambiguity about it, their rejection of such ideas is often no less ambiguous.

This ambiguity is important to underscore for at least two reasons. First, it already suggests, of course, that it would be a mistake to characterize the ‘ulama as uniformly or irremediably hostile to democratic pluralism. Such a simplistic characterization would not be conducive to an understanding of Muslim politics any more than it would to improving the prospects for a civil, democratic Islam. Second, at least some of the ambiguity we encounter in the world of the ‘ulama, in their discourses and practices, is a studied ambiguity,[13] one they have often allowed to exist because it facilitates greater maneuverability for them as well as more diverse but simultaneous choices in the public sphere. Yet it is not the ‘ulama alone who have allowed the ambiguities and, indeed, the contradictions of their own position, and that of Islam in the public sphere, to exist unremedied. The state itself has played a large role not just in tolerating many of these contradictions but even, in case of Pakistan in particular, in fostering them.

 Islam and the State

In an important review of the strategies through which “state-society synergy” might be promoted in the interest of social and institutional development, political sociologist Peter Evans notes the importance of focusing on “positive cases”—instances that indicate how the state and society have, despite meager resources, reinforced each other in helping build institutions rather than those where their mutual suspicions have impeded the cause of social development (Evans 1997, 205; cf. Tendler 1997). Attractive as his proposal is, this section would largely ignore his advice. While Evans is interested, inter alia, in identifying local resources which can be “scaled up” for development through multifaceted forms of interaction between public and private actors, I hope to demonstrate how the Pakistani state has often provided critical opportunities for scaling up antidemocratic and antipluralist trends in society. The justification for this line of argument is not to add to the literature on the failings of the state (cf. Evans 1997, 205), but to arrive at a better understanding of the career and contradictions of Islam in Pakistan. Nor does my discussion presume that the Pakistani state is itself necessarily a cohesive or coherent entity. As Robert Hefner has shown with reference to Indonesia, in his chapter in the present volume and elsewhere (Hefner 2000, 65, 142–43), a recognition of the factionalism within the ranks of the ruling elite offers considerable insight into the contradictory ways a state might act on particular occasions. Even with such a recognition, however—which I will assume rather than illustrate here—we still need to understand how those who comprise the ruling elite might themselves contribute, in the name and through the instruments of the state, to the scaling up of uncivil norms and practices.

Long before the first of Pakistan’s three constitutions (1956, 1962, 1973) was promulgated, the Constituent Assembly of the new state had, in 1949, adopted the Objectives Resolution, which set out the principles on which the state was to be based. The Resolution declared that sovereignty over the entire universe belongs to God, and the people of Pakistan are to exercise this sovereignty as God’s legatees. While Pakistan’s successive constitutions have often been seen as largely enshrining the vision of a modernist political elite—and some observers of the long debates over Pakistan's first constitution have wondered why the religious groups conceded so much to the worldview of that elite (Binder 1961)—a recognition of the sovereignty of God already gives a decisive rhetorical advantage to those who wish to take that claim seriously. It is hard to imagine that the modernist elite saw this as anything more than an affirmation of the state's overall Muslim identity; and yet the claim remains a very powerful one. Nor was the Objectives Resolution the last instance of the fostering of extravagant expectations about the role of Islam in public life without much accompanying evidence of the state's commitment to live up to those expectations. Nonetheless, such claims and expectations have created an Islamic space where the modernist elite is forced to be constantly on the defensive against the 'ulama and the Islamists.

That Pakistani governments have, more often than not, come to power through undemocratic means reinforces this defensiveness, even as it enhances the temptation to continually put their Islamic commitments on display. The "Islamization" campaign carried out during the eleven-year rule of General Muhammad Zia al-Haqq (r. 1977–88) was by far the most vivid of such displays. Where the Objectives Resolution had previously been a preamble to the constitution, it now became its integral part. The zakat-tax, one of the basic Islamic obligations, was officially enforced by the state; new institutions, such as the Federal Shari'at Court, were created to oversee the implementation of Islamic law; and stringent measures were adopted against an indigenous religious community, the Ahmadis.

The case of the Ahmadis, which we have already touched on, illustrates much more than the range of issues affected by the Islamization campaign; it also reveals how the state has allowed antipluralist tendencies in society to thrive and to be scaled up. The 'ulama, and many others, have actively polemicized against the Ahmadis virtually since the emergence of this community in the late-nineteenth century. Yet Pakistan's first foreign minister, Muhammad Zafrullah Khan, was a member of the Ahmadi community; calls for his dismissal were among the reasons for widespread riots in the Punjab in 1953. Though the rioters had demanded at that time that the Ahmadis be officially declared "non-Muslims," it was not until 1974 that the government of Zulfiqar 'Ali Bhutto brought about a constitutional amendment to meet that demand. Yet, once this battle was won, the assertion of the Ahmadis' otherness took the form of the demand that they be forbidden to use any Islamic symbols whatso- ever—such as referring to themselves as "Muslims," or their places of worship as "mosques," or using the call to prayer like other Muslims, and so forth. In 1984, the state obliged again, this time with a presidential ordinance that more or less translated these demands into articles of Pakistan's penal code (Waqar-ul-Haq [1994], 100–101 [Articles 298B&298C of the Pakistan Penal Code]).

Though Shi'i 'ulama had themselves supported demands for the Ahmadis' exclusion from the community, many of the Sunni 'ulama who had honed their skills at agitational politics against the Ahmadis later turned them against the Shi'a themselves. Since the 1980s, Pakistan's radical Sunni organization, the Sipah-i Sahaba, has spearheaded the demand that, like the Ahmadis, the Shi'a too ought to be declared a non-Muslim minority for only then would Pakistan's character as a truly "Islamic state" be affirmed. The state has resisted this demand, though that has not prevented widespread sectarian bloodshed over the past two decades.

One further instance of how the state's own illiberal measures are then scaled up in alarmingly strident directions should suffice here. This concerns the infamous "blasphemy law," which, too, was made part of the Pakistan Penal Code during the reign of General Zia al-Haqq. Under this law, it is a capital offense to "defile" in any way—"by words, either spoken or written, or by visible representation, or by any imputation, innuendo, or insinuation"—the Prophet Muhammad (Waqar-ul-Haq [1994], 99 [Article 295C of the Pakistan Penal Code]). With this law on the books, a number of people, Muslim and non-Muslim, have been accused of "blasphemy," and those so accused have been sentenced to death by Pakistani courts (Dawn, September 10, 1998, March 14, 2001, August 19, 2001; The News, July 19, 2002). The capital punishment itself has never been carried out on grounds of blasphemy. Yet the existence of this law (together with extremely fluid conceptions of just what is to count as blasphemy) has led to many acts of vigilantism, and this is aided by the perception that the agencies of the state are themselves less than eager to actually carry out what the law requires of them. The government of General Pervez Musharraf (1999-) attempted to repeal this law, but strong opposition from the religious groups forced it to abandon the effort (Bearak 2001a, 2001b; The News, February 19, 2002).

But while many ‘ulama have been at the forefront in opposing any change in the law on blasphemy, just as they have been among the most active in calling for the exclusion of particular religious groups from the community of Muslims, it is important to emphasize that the state itself is at least as complicit in carrying through such measures as the ‘ulama are in agitating for them. If the ‘ulama have made strident demands, particular governments —popularly elected (Zulfiqar ‘Ali Bhutto’s) or military (Zia al-Haqq’s)—have gone along with them; and that, in turn, has provided the ground on which even more stringent demands have been made. If elements within the ruling establishment contribute to the scaling up of an uncivil society, of antipluralist sentiments, it is not difficult to understand the severe constraints the state faces when it seeks to “reform” particular institutions in the interest of creating a “good” civil society.

There is no better illustration of such constraints than official attempts toward the regulation of the ‘ulama’s institutions of learning, the madra- sas. The regulation or reform of madrasas raises questions that pertain to more, however, than the contradictions of governmental policies or the influence of the ‘ulama in society. More centrally for our concerns here, they also have some bearing on the problems and prospects of thinking about a civil, democratic Islam in relation to the ‘ulama.

 Reforming Madrasas in Pakistan

The madrasas of Pakistan have received unprecedented media attention in the aftermath of the September 2001 terrorist attacks. It was in Pakistani madrasas, after all, that many of the Taliban of Afghanistan— including a substantial proportion of their top leadership—were educated (Rashid 2000, 90). As the United States prepared for military action against the Taliban, thousands of Pakistanis, many of them associated with madrasas, decided to go to Afghanistan to fight alongside the Taliban, even as other ‘ulama and madrasa students actively sought to rally support against the policies of General Pervez Musharraf. A number of militant Pakistani organizations blamed for terrorist activities both before and after the September 2001 attacks have likewise been closely allied to madrasas; and in January 2002, General Musharraf not only banned these organizations but also declared a new resolve to better regulate the affairs of the madrasas.

That resolve has remained largely unimplemented so far. While a number of madrasas in Pakistan are large institutions with thousands of students—like Karachi's Dar al-'Ulum, or the Dar al-'Ulum Haqqaniyya in the North-West Frontier Province, where many of the Taliban had stud- ied—there is no parallel to a central institution like the millennium-old Azhar University of Egypt. Pakistani madrasas of different sectarian affiliations are affiliated to one another through madrasa boards, but this connection is at best a loose one. Unlike in Egypt, therefore, it has not been possible for the government to regulate the religious schools through a centralized bureaucratic structure, though even in Egypt many dimensions of the religious sphere remain outside of governmental regulation (Wickham 2002). Madrasas are often largely financed by private donations, which again makes it difficult to regulate their affairs.[14]

Official committees have periodically been constituted by the government to suggest ways of reforming the madrasas (Zaman 2002, 60–86), and these have typically been led by bureaucrats. They outnumbered the 'ulama on the madrasa reform committee of 1962 and they were marginally fewer than the 'ulama on the 1979 committee, though even the latter was presided over by a Western-educated bureaucrat; the more recent and ongoing initiatives toward madrasa reform are likewise overseen by bureaucratic officials. To such committees, reforming madrasas has essentially meant the introduction of "useful" subjects (a notion with deep roots in British colonial discourse) into the curriculum of these institu- tions—that is, modern science, the English language, and other disciplines that comprise the country's educational "mainstream." Reform also signifies doing away with the study of the "ancillary" subjects like Islamic philosophy, which for centuries has formed part of the madrasa curriculum but which the bureaucratic committees do not see as properly "religious" subjects. The 'ulama, however, not only take a more expansive view of the Islamic tradition than do the modernist ruling elite; to them governmental initiatives toward integrating madrasas into the educational mainstream are but a thinly veiled effort to undermine their status as bastions of an "unadulterated" Islam in society and polity. As some of the more strident critics of the effort to reform madrasas have argued, what would result from "mixed" secular and religious education of the sort the government has envisaged are “loyal civil servants,” not ‘ulama of any significance or stature (Zaman 2002, 79–81; The News, July 7, 2002). In the 1990s, when government officials repeatedly pointed to links between madrasas and sectarian terrorism in Pakistan, the ‘ulama often labeled any effort toward reforming their institutions as an excuse to shut them down altogether. In the aftermath of the September 2001 terrorist attacks, the government’s renewed efforts to regulate madrasas came to be seen as the result of international, and especially American, pressure to do so as part of the global War on Terrorism;[15] and while the ‘ulama had long equated the defense of the madrasas with the defense of a beleaguered Islam, they now strove—and not without some success— to make that equation more palpable to their audiences.

The contradictions of government policies have, meanwhile, remained unresolved. It is not a little ironic that the government of Benazir Bhutto should have sought to reform madrasas even as elements within the same administration oversaw the rise of the Taliban through Deobandi madra- sas in Pakistan. And even members of the government of President Pervez Musharraf have continued to praise the role of madrasas in Pakistan (e.g., The News, June 24, 2002b) at the same time as they express their resolve to reform them. But the problem is not merely one of contradictions in governmental rhetoric or even a certain discordance within the ruling elite. Indeed, it extends even beyond the issue of addressing the contradictions of Islam in Pakistan’s public life. The issue also relates to the severely limited alternatives that the state itself offers to some of the services the madrasas provide. In a country where almost half of the population is still illiterate, madrasas often provide all the education that many from the poorest segments of the population will ever have. Such education is typically free, as are the food and boarding that madrasas provide to their students. Quite apart from the social mobility that religious learning has often facilitated in many Muslim societies (Edwards 2002, 292), graduates of madrasas are frequently able to earn a livelihood as religious functionaries. Again, in a state with large-scale unemployment, this is not an inconsiderable achievement. It is doubtless such services that government officials have in mind when they acknowledge the “valuable” functions that madrasas serve in society. Yet their aspirations to reform madrasas appear all the more weak in the face of such acknowledgments, and this because such reform proposals offer few credible alternatives to the provision of some of the people’s basic needs. The point here is not that madrasas provide most of such needs, or that they provide them well. It is, rather, that in an arena largely left vacant by the inefficiency and perceived corruption of the state, madrasas have, in many cases, offered services that are not otherwise available; and such services may arguably seem the more attractive to at least some segments of the population because they are provided in the name of Islam.

Considering their successful resistance against governmental regulation, their independent economic base, their deep roots in local communities, and their engagement with the affairs of society, might we think of Pakistani madrasas and the ‘ulama associated with them as sharing certain features often held to be the basis of a “civil” society? Jose Casanova has spoken of the roles that “public religions” can play in contemporary Western societies once those religions accept the functional differentiation of spheres in society —that is, once they accommodate themselves to the fact of secularization in this crucial sense (Casanova 1994). The ‘ulama typically don’t accept secularization in this or most other senses. Yet it is worth noting that they, too, play roles not dissimilar to the kind of roles Casanova envisions for public religions. Reflection on the normative foundations of the polity, on the moral and religious dimensions of public policy, and on the common good as being distinct from merely the aggregate of individual interests (Casanova 1994, 228–29) are to be found in the discourses of the contemporary ‘ulama as well (Zaman 2004).

Yet, many Pakistani madrasas often also maintain ties with militant sectarian organizations in the country, as already noted, and the views of the ‘ulama on such things as the position of women or on pluralism are often far from being conducive to a democratic society. In and of themselves, however, such illiberal proclivities do not exclude the ‘ulama and their madrasas from the landscape of civil society. Rather, they remind us that not all civic associations are necessarily committed to democratic civility; some, indeed, help foster a “bad” civil society (Chambers 2002, 100–105; Berman 1997). Though usually not articulated in quite these terms, at least part of what motivates governmental and other modernist criticisms of madrasas is the perception that they retard the growth of a good civil society or that they foster precisely the wrong kind of attitudes in society—attitudes that are xenophobic, antipluralist, antidemocratic. But what governmental initiatives toward madrasa reform also claim is, of course, that even this institution can be scaled up in ways that would promote a “good” civil society and the common good; indeed, the very aspiration to reform rather than, say, to shut down madrasas bespeaks such a claim. The ‘ulama have, of course, typically seen such statements of intent as a thin veneer for an all-out assault on the integrity of religious education and on the institutions associated for centuries with providing it. Yet it is worth asking whether madrasas can, in fact, be scaled up in ways that might promote a “good” civil society. More specifically, under what conditions might such an effort successfully take place?

 Madrasas and a “Good” Civil Society?

Having illustrated earlier in this chapter some of the ways in which the state itself collaborates in scaling up illiberal religious trends in society, I will now assume, for purposes of argument, that the ruling elite does in fact have a genuine interest in fostering a “good” civil society and in promoting a tolerant, pluralist, and democratic culture. This is obviously a problematic assumption. It is contested by the historical record of how that elite has conducted itself, as well as by questions about the inner cohesion of that elite (see Hefner, in this volume). Yet my interest in the remaining part of this chapter is not with how to ameliorate the behavior or cohesion of that elite but, rather, with what it would take to reform the ‘ulama’s institutions. Part of the answer to my question here is, of course, that the institutions of the ‘ulama might have better prospects of being scaled up in the direction of democratic pluralism once the polity in which they are located comes itself to be genuinely committed to a democratic culture. But this is only part of the answer, and to highlight other aspects of it, I intend to take this part as a given and to proceed accordingly.

In very broad terms, there are at least two conditions for the scaling up of madrasas to have some reasonable prospects of success: first, the state must act together with the ‘ulama, in a genuinely synergistic effort, to canalize the madrasas’ activities in particular directions; and second, any reform of the madrasas ought to involve a serious grappling with the Islamic tradition of which the ‘ulama see themselves as the custodians. It might seem that the various initiatives that have addressed issues of madrasa reform in Pakistan have already fulfilled the first condition. After all, prominent ‘ulama have served on the committees entrusted with reform in numbers comparable to or even exceeding those of the government officials. Yet, irrespective of the actual composition of such committees, the initiative has typically rested with the government rather than the ‘ulama in all practical respects. Governmental efforts at reform have therefore been seen with great suspicion by many ‘ulama, and this even when some have gone along with the governmental recommendations for reform. A genuinely synergistic effort requires that those governmental officials who are concerned with the madrasas—for example, by way of suggesting reforms in them, or in actually overseeing particular facets of a madrasa’s activities—be perceived as at least not hostile or indifferent to the madrasa’s welfare. That the government would have the accounts of madrasas audited, or give special perquisites only to the madrasas which conform to its guidelines, or that it would even create “model,” state-sponsored madrasas —all of which is stipulated by the most recent iteration of proposals for madrasa reform (Zaman 2002, 221 n. 75)—can go a long way toward regulating the affairs of the madrasa. But, to many among the ‘ulama, these stipulations also easily translate into the efforts of an inefficient, corrupt, and hostile bureaucracy to stifle not just the autonomy of their institutions but their very existence. And it is such suspicions that have often been among major stumbling blocks on the path to reform. If, on the other hand, government functionaries at the local levels work with the ‘ulama and madrasas in their communities (that is, with many of the same ‘ulama with whom these officials might already interact in their local mosques, or in other ways), it might be possible to create and broaden significant forms of trust between the ‘ulama and the representatives of the state. This would be one manner of bridging the much debated state-society divide, whereby the state is able to shape the direction in which institutions of civil society move while remaining responsive to the particular concerns of those institutions (Tendler 1997, 135–65, esp. 146).

The second condition which ought to attend upon any effort to scale up madrasas is that this be done, at least in some measure, by engaging with the resources provided by the Islamic tradition. What does such engagement mean? To the ‘ulama, either the invoking of certain isolated passages of the Qur’an in support of a particular argument or even the claim that the Qur’an, “taken as a whole,” necessarily supports a certain position is usually less than sufficient justification for that position. Nor do incidental, decontextualized parallels between contemporary and earlier views suffice. To take the tradition seriously is, for them, to engage with the existing record of authoritative juristic or exegetical dis- courses—which go well beyond the foundational texts—in a way that acknowledges the assumptions and methods informing those discourses, and then to show how they bear on the problem at hand. From the perspective of many contemporary ‘ulama, such a procedure does not necessarily exclude evolution and change in the law (cf. ‘Uthmani 1993b, 85–108 and passim); but it clearly does rule out radical critiques of or departures from the shari‘ah just as it rules out ways of approaching the Qur’an that have scant earlier precedent or authority.[16] But taking the tradition seriously also means, to the ‘ulama, that they be recognized as “experts” in all matters Islamic, on a par with experts in any other area of modern life (Zaman 2002, 99–100). This is a patently exclusionary position, of course, but it becomes the more insidious in that, in the ‘ulama’s theory at least, “Islam” relates to all facets of life. That the ‘ulama have often espoused highly illiberal views on a range of issues does not make this position any more palatable.

Might there be a way, however, to take the tradition seriously—in reforming existing institutions or creating new ones—but to do so while bypassing the ‘ulama? Though my discussion of madrasas has hitherto been concerned only with Pakistan, it is worth considering a highly interesting proposal put forth by philosopher Akeel Bilgrami regarding the reform of certain Muslim institutions in contemporary India (Bilgrami 1999). Bilgrami seeks to find a path that steers clear of two unsatisfactory approaches to reform: the liberal and the communitarian, as he characterizes them. In the context of contemporary India, the liberal approach refuses to recognize the validity of negotiating with the separate religious communities that constitute the Indian union, or to accept that members of these communities can have valid reasons for resisting certain initiatives which the state sees as essential to a unified nationhood and to the common good. Such initiatives include the necessity for a uniform civil code, which the constitution of India has long promised but which many Muslims have continued to resist because they see it as a challenge to their religious and cultural identity. On the liberal view, the state ought to enact this uniform civil code because it is desirable to do so, and because this measure is resisted only by “reactionary element[s]” within the Muslim community while the “moderate” majority within that community seems to be in its favor (Bilgrami 1999, 199). Opposed to this liberal view is what Bilgrami labels the communitarian position, which also laments the reactionary elements within the Muslim community but remains resolutely opposed to a statist intervention against them. The communitarian position holds that the state should encourage democratization within the Muslim community, so that the influence of the reactionary elements is broken; but apart from this facilitating of intracommunity democracy, the state ought not to interfere in telling the community how to behave. Bilgrami, for his part, proposes that the state ought to act by proposing to the community internal reasons for reform:

[T]he state can bring about reform in a way that appeals to (some of) the value-commitments of communities whom it is seeking to reform, in particular by appealing to values which stand in ... tension with those values and practices which it seeks to reform. In other words it is the state which addresses them internally in a way that they themselves might have done on intra-community sites And if the notion of coercion is contrasted with the notion of reason-giving, a state which arrives at secular outcomes in this way need not be seen as any more coercive than the procedures by which these outcomes are delivered on intra-community sites. To see things this way is to see the liberal state as being able to provide a field of force of internal reasons addressing different communitarian perspectives from within their own internal substantive commitments and unsettling them into awareness of their own internal inconsistencies so as to eventually provide for a common secular outcome each on different internal grounds. (Bilgrami 1999, 195; emphasis in the original)

Yet Bilgrami gives no example of internal reasons for reform that the state (or anyone else) might proffer. This may well be because he offers his argument at a highly abstract level (Bilgrami 1999, 211). But the lack of specific examples of externally given internal reasons may also underscore the difficulties that arise when the project is predicated on excluding or marginalizing the ‘ulama. It is the ‘ulama, though not just the ‘ulama, that Bilgrami seems to have in mind when he refers to the “reactionary element” whom the government of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had heeded during the Shah Bano Controversy in the mid-1980s (cf. Bilgrami 1999, 199). The issue was whether a destitute divorced woman had the right to be financially supported by her former husband after the expiry of the three-month-long “waiting period” following her divorce. The standard interpretations of the shari‘ah held that she had no such right, but the Hindu-dominated Indian Supreme Court had presumed to offer a new interpretation of the Qur’an to argue that the shari‘ah’s position was not really in accord with the Qur’an itself. While many Muslim modernists applauded the Supreme Court’s verdict as upholding the best interests of Muslim women, the Indian ‘ulama led what turned out to be a successful mass campaign to have the decision reversed through parliamentary legislation (Engineer 1987; Lawrence 2000, 131–49; Zaman 2002, 167–70; also cf. Nussbaum 2000, 167--20))

There have been occasions, in late-colonial as well as contemporary India, when internal reasons were, in fact, given to seek much needed legal reform involving Muslim women (Zaman 2002, 21–31; 2004). But these instances have typically involved internal reasons being given by the ‘ulama with reference to their juristic tradition, rather than such reasoning taking place on a site that excludes the ‘ulama. My point is not, of course, that the ‘ulama alone are qualified to offer such reasons. It is, rather, that any appeal to the need for internal reasons would be shallow and unconvincing if it doesn’t seriously engage the Islamic religious tradition, and to try to do so means (among other things) being able to converse with those who see themselves as the representatives of that tradition rather than excluding them from any conversation for being “reactionary.” As noted at the beginning of this chapter, such a conversation might involve reminding them that their own religious tradition is rich enough to allow arguments against some of the views they now hold, that their premodern precursors have held positions that amount to a greater variety of options than the modern ‘ulama are often willing to acknowledge, and that even many modern ‘ulama have themselves appealed to that variety of options in trying to get out of some particularly difficult situations.

The state does have a role in this effort to find internal reasons for reform, for instance by creating “model” madrasas as proposed by the government of President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan (The News, January 30, 2002; Dawn, April 3, 2002). Yet the purpose of governmental reform, and even the logic behind the proposed “model” madrasas, has typically been to introduce modern, Western sciences to the ‘ulama, and thereby to integrate their institutions into the educational mainstream (cf. Dawn, June 20, 2002; Dawn, July 5, 2002; The News, July 12, 2002).

While that objective remains worth pursuing, it does not necessarily offer the panacea to the ills that the ‘ulama’s detractors see them as representing. Reform in this sense has little direct relevance to building resources for democracy and pluralism except inasmuch as it ultimately seeks to remove the ‘ulama—Bilgrami’s “reactionary element”—from the scene altogether. For all the governmental denials that this might be the purpose behind the reformist project, this at least is how the ‘ulama perceive it, which is primarily why they have so vociferously opposed madrasa reform in Pakistan.

Some of the other proposals for sponsoring change in and through madrasas seem even less satisfactory insofar as the ‘ulama’s likely responses to them are concerned. In late 2002, the U.S. Department of Defense briefly contemplated the promotion of favorable views of the United States in certain countries through local religious and other institutions. As reported by the New York Times, “[s]uch a program ... could include efforts to discredit and undermine the influence of mosques and religious schools that have become breeding grounds for Islamic militancy and anti-Americanism across the Middle East, Asia, and Europe. It might even include setting up schools with secret American financing to teach a more moderate Islamic position laced with sympathetic depictions of how the religion is practiced in America” (Shanker and Schmitt 2002; cf. Schmitt 2002). A little less than a year later, a memo from the U.S. Secretary of Defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld, addressed to some of his closest advisers but leaked to the national press, asked if the United States ought to “create a private foundation to entice radical madrassas to a more moderate course” (Los Angeles Times, October 23, 2003; also cf. Pincus 2003). That such initiatives would dislodge extreme interpretations of Islam more effectively than they undermine the effort to locate and justify “moderate” ones remains, at best, uncertain.

But a different sort of reform might also be worth considering—a reform for which the state-sponsored “model” madrasas can very well be one possible site. This reform involves, as I have suggested earlier, encouraging the ‘ulama to have a more vigorous engagement with facets of their own tradition, and encouraging them to debate among themselves and with others on these grounds. The idea of reform in this sense has largely remained foreign to many Muslim modernist intellectuals and policy makers; and the reasons for this are not far to seek. These reasons have much to do with the dim view of the Islamic legal tradition that many of these modernists hold, which in turn is often a product of the limited acquaintance they have with that tradition. As its self-professed legatees and guardians, the ‘ulama of the contemporary world have themselves often done little to improve the others’ appreciation for, let alone their grounding in, the Islamic tradition. A result of this set of circumstances is for Muslim modernists and policy makers to often begin their reformist arguments by effectively writing off the tradition rather than viewing it as an arena from where (or in which) varied internal reasons for reform might in fact emerge. Yet it is in such internal reasons, with the ‘ulama as crucial but scarcely the exclusive interlocutors, that the best prospects for reform might lie—reform that can have very considerable implications for democracy, pluralism, human rights, as well as for a whole range of other pressing issues confronting Muslim societies today.

[11] In broad terms, I mean by Muslim “modernists” those who have been educated in modern Western (or Westernized) institutions of learning and have sought to rethink or adapt Muslim practices, institutions, and discourses in light both of what they take to be “true” Islam—as opposed to how the Islamic tradition has evolved in history—and of how they see the challenges and opportunities of modernity. The “Islamists” share much with the modernists in their intellectual backgrounds and in the novelty of the positions they advocate; but they do not share the modernists’ enthusiasm for the need to adapt Islam to the conditions of modernity, just as the modernists don’t share theirs for the public implementation of Islamic norms. For a discussion of the modernists, the Islamists, and the ‘ulama, and how they might be characterized in terms of their attitudes toward the Islamic discursive tradition, see Zaman 2002: 3–11.

[12] This alliance, known as the Muttahida Majlis-i ‘Amal (The Unified Association for Action), won 59 out of a total of 342 seats in the National Assembly, the lower house of the Pakistani parliament. In an electoral success unprecedented for the religious parties, the alliance not only emerged as the third largest group in the National Assembly but also won a majority of seats in the legislative assembly of the North-West Frontier Province and was the second largest group in the provincial assembly of Baluchistan. For the results of, and reactions to, the elections to the National and the provincial assemblies, see Dawn (Karachi) and The News (Islamabad), October 11, 2002, and subsequent days.

[13] For other assessments of the ambiguities in the discourses of the ‘ulama, though with reference to premodern juristic thought, cf. Johansen 1999, 216–18; Kerr 1966, 21–32.

[14] A study conducted in 2002 found that private donations to mosques and madrasas amounted to over $1 billion annually, and that an overwhelming proportion (94 percent) of all charity goes to ventures identified as “religious” (Dawn, July 29, 2002).

[15] For some examples of the resistance along these lines to the government’s proposed reform of the madrasas, see Dawn, June 23, 2002, June 30, 2002, July 7, 2002, July 19, 2002; The News, July 25, 2002, November 22, 2003.

[16] The ‘ulama’s view of tradition can therefore have little room for, say, An-Na‘im (1990), who proposes new legal norms derived exclusively from those verses of the Qur’an that were revealed to Muhammad in Mecca, that is, during the first thirteen years of his prophetical activity, but not during the last decade of his career in Medina. An-Na‘im’s justification for the outright exclusion of the Medinan materials is that their social and political content, unlike the ethical verities of the Meccan period, have long since lost their utility. It should be clear from my discussion throughout this chapter that no argument developed on the basis of such radical premises can count, for the ‘ulama, as valid. Also cf. the comments of Abou El Fadl (2002, 109–10) on Bilgrami 2002.

 References Cited

Abou El Fadl, Khaled. 1994. “Islamic Law and Muslim Minorities: The Juristic Discourse on Muslim Minorities from the Second/Eighth to the Eleventh/Seventeenth Centuries.” Islamic Law and Society 1:141–87.

———. 2002. “The Place of Tolerance in Islam” and “Reply.” In The Place of Tolerance in Islam, edited by Khaled Abou El Fadl, Joshua Cohen, and Ian Lague, pp. 3–23, 93–111. Boston, Mass.: Beacon Press.

An-Na‘im, Abdullahi Ahmed. 1990. Toward an Islamic Reformation: Civil Liberties, Human Rights, and International Law. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Bearak, Barry. 2001a. “Pakistani Tale of a Drug Addict’s Blasphemy.” New York Times, February 19, A1, A4.

———. 2001b. “Death to Blasphemers: Islam’s Grip on Pakistan.” New York Times, May 12, A3.

Berman, Sheri. 1997. “Civil Society and the Collapse of the Weimar Republic.” World Politics 49:401–29.

Bilgrami, Akeel. 1999. “Secular Liberalism and the Moral Psychology of Identity.” In Multiculturalism, Liberalism, and Democracy, edited by Rajeev Bhargava, Amiya Kumar Bagchi, and R. Sudarshan, pp. 164–211. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

———. 2002. “The Importance of Democracy.” In The Place of Tolerance in Islam, edited by Khaled Abou El Fadl, Joshua Cohen, and Ian Lague, pp. 61–66. Boston, Mass. Beacon Press.

Binder, Leonard. 1961. Religion and Politics in Pakistan. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Casanova, Jose. 1994. Public Religions in the Modern World. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Chambers, Simone. 2002. “A Critical Theory of Civil Society.” In Alternative Conceptions of Civil Society, edited by Simone Chambers and Will Kymlicka, pp. 90–110. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Dawn (Karachi). 1998. “Death Penalty under Blasphemy Law,” September 10.

———. 2001. “Man Sentenced to Death for Blasphemy,” March 14.

———. 2001. “Sentenced to Death for Blasphemy,” August 19.

———. 2001. “No Question of Instability in Pakistan: Musharraf,” November 9.

———. 2002. “Selected Madaris May be Given University Status,” April 3.

———. 2002. “No Help to Madaris without Registration ...” June 20.

———. 2002. “MMA to Resist Registration of Madressahs,” June 23.

———. 2002. “MMA Rejects Law on Madaris, Changes to Constitution,” June 30.

———. 2002. “Rs. 14 b[illio]n Project Prepared to Bring Madaris into Mainstream,” July 5.

———. 2002. “Villager Stoned to Death on Imam’s Call,” July 6.

———. 2002. “Gov[ernmen]t Firm on Madaris Law,” July 7.

———. 2002. “Seminaries Plan Protest Drive,” July 19.

———. 2002. “Madaris, Mosques Collect Rs 70 b[illio]n annually.” July 29.

Edwards, David B. 2002. Before Taliban: Genealogies of the Afghan Jihad.

Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Engineer, Asghar Ali, ed. 1987. The Shah Bano Controversy. Bombay: Orient

Longman.

Esposito, John L., and John O. Voll. 1996. Islam and Democracy. New York: Oxford University Press.

Evans, Peter. 1997. “Government Action, Social Capital, and Development: Reviewing the Evidence on Synergy.” In State-Society Synergy: Government and Social Capital in Development, edited by Peter Evans, pp. 178–209. Berkeley: International and Area Studies, University of California.

Fadel, Mohammad. 1997. “Two Women, One Man: Knowledge, Power, and Gender in Medieval Sunni Legal Thought.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 29:185–204.

Hallaq, Wael B. 2001. Authority, Continuity, and Change in Islamic Law. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hardy, Peter. 1971. Partners in Freedom—and True Muslims: The Political Thought of Some Muslim Scholars in British ındıı,191’2.-1947. Lund-. Stands-navian Institute of Asian Studies.

Hasan, Mushirul. 1997. Legacy of a Divided Nation: India’s Muslims since Independence. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

Hefner, Robert W. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Humphreys, R. Stephen. 1999. Between Memory and Desire: The Middle East in a Troubled Age. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Jackson, Sherman. 1996. Islamic Law and the State: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Shihab al-Din al-Qarafi. Leiden: Brill.

Johansen, Baber. 1999. “Secular and Religious Elements in Hanafite Law: Function and Limits of the Absolute Character of Government Authority.” In Contingency in a Sacred Law: Legal and Ethical Norms in the Muslim Fiqh, edited by Baber Johansen, pp. 189–218. Leiden: Brill.

Kerr, Malcolm H. 1966. Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad ‘Abduh and Rashid Rida. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Khan, Wahid al-din. 1986. Tabligh Movement. Translated by Farida Khanam. Delhi: Islamic Centre.

———. 1994. Indian Muslims: The Need for a Positive Outlook. Translated by Farida Khanam. Delhi: al-Risala Books.

———. 1996. Fikr-i Islami: Afkar-i islami ki tashrih wa tawdih. Delhi: al-Risala Books.

———. 1998. Madamin-i Islam: Islam ke mukhtalif pahlu’on par maqalat. Delhi: al-Risala Books.

Lawrence, Bruce B. 2000. Shattering the Myth: Islam beyond Violence. Karachi: Oxford University Press.

Los Angeles Times. 2003. “Rumsfeld’s Memo: ‘Are We Winning or Losing the ... War on Terror?’” October 23, A15.

Madani, Husayn Ahmad. n.d. [1938]. Muttahida qawmiyyat awr Islam. Delhi: Qawmi aikta Trust.

Mayer, Ann Elizabeth. 1999. Islam and Human Rights: Tradition and Politics. 3rd ed. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

Metcalf-, Barbara D. 1982. IslarnicBeial ill Blit سلأ a. D:ol>ancl,li8(>Cı-li9CıCı. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Nasr, S.V.R. 2000. “The Rise of Sunni Militancy in Pakistan: The Changing Role of Islamism and the Ulama in Society and Politics.” Modell Asial Studies 34:139–80.

News, The (Islamabad). 2002. “Three Model Madaris to be set up,” January 30.

———. 2002. “No Plan to Repeal Blasphemy Laws: Gov[ernmen]t,” February 19.

———. 2002. “Madaris Rendering Valuable Services,” June 24.

———. 2002. “Registration under Draft Madaris Law not Compulsory,” June 24.

———. 2002. “Ministers-Ulema Talks on Madaris Fail,” July 7.

———. 2002. “Government Serious about New Curriculum for Madaris ... ,” July 12.

———. 2002. “Christian Sentenced to Death for Blasphemy,” July 19.

———. 2002. “Religious Bodies Reject Madrassah Ordinance,” July 25.

———. 2002. “Provinces Asked to Oust Banned Outfits from Polls,” September 6.

———. 2003. “Madaris Pledge to Counter Gov[ernmen]t’s Takeover Move,” November 22.

Nussbaum, Martha C. 2000. Womel ald Humal Developmelt; The Capabilities Apploach. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Pincus, Walter. 2003. “Idea of Influencing Schools Echoes ’50s.” Washilgtol Post, November 1, A19.

al-Qaradawi, Yusuf. 2001. Kayfa lata‘amal ma‘a’l-tulath wa’l-tamadhhub wa’l-ikhtilaf. Cairo: Maktabat wahba.

Rashid, Ahmed. 2000. Talibal; Militalt islam, Oil, ald Fuldameltalism il Cel- tlal Asia. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Sachedina, Abdulaziz. 2001. The islamic Roots of Democlatic Plulalism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Schmitt, Eric. 2002. “White House Plays Down Propaganda by Military.” New Yolk Times, December 17, A15.

Shanker, Thom, and Eric Schmitt. 2002. “Pentagon Debates Propaganda Push in Allied Nations.” New Yolk Times, December 16, A1, A14.

Tendler, Judith. 1997. Good Govellmelt il the Tlopics. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Tucker, Judith. 1998. il the House of the Law; Geldel ald islamic Law il Ottomal Sylia ald Palestile. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

‘Uthmani, Muhammad Taqi. 1993a. Nifadh-i shari‘at awr us-ke masa’il. Karachi: Maktaba-i Dar al-‘Ulum.

———. 1993b. Taqlid ki shar‘i haythiyyat. Karachi: Maktaba-i Dar al-‘Ulum.

———. 1996. Jahan-i dida: Bis mulkon ka safar-nama. Karachi: Idarat Al-ma‘arif.

———. 1999. Islam awr jiddat-pasandi. Karachi: Maktaba-i Dar al-‘Ulum.

Waqar-ul-Haq, Mohammed. [1994]. The Major Acts, with ... Commentary [on the] Criminal Law (Amendment) Ordinance (Qisas and Diyat Ordinance). Lahore: Law Times Publications.

Wickham, Carrie Rosefsky. 2002. Mobilizing Islam: Religion, Activism, and Political Change in Egypt. New York: Columbia University Press.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim. 2002. The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

———. 2004 (forthcoming). “The ‘Ulama of Contemporary Islam and Their Conceptions of the Common Good.” In Public Islam and the Common Good, edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Armando Salvatore. Leiden: Brill.

 Chapter 4: the End of Islamism? Turkey’s Muslimhood Model

Jenny B. White

The radical period is over, predicted Akif Beki, Ankara correspondent for the Islamist television station Kanal 7.[17] Islamism has become “religion,” relegated to the civil realm, found only in religious communities, no longer in the state. “There has been a civil-ization. Islamism has become Muslim hood.” This diagnosis was echoed by Mehmet Aydin, noted Islamic scholar and minister in the new Justice and Development Party (AKP) government. The formerly Islamist AKP won national elections on November 3, 2002, with enough votes to form a government.[18] The party, Aydin insisted, no longer accepts the label “moderate Islamist.” Rather, party members consider themselves to be “moderate Muslims” whose religious ethics inspire their public service as individuals but cannot be construed as part of their identities as political actors in the public sphere. “AKP is a political movement and the movement’s actors have a very warm, close relationship, primarily as individuals, to ... religious experience At the moment, I believe that all the ministers are fasting ... We are religious people, but our actions in the public sphere ... do not have a religious side or theological meaning. Where is there a religious side? There’s a link in our values. Just because I’ve become a politician, I’m not about to leave the values I believe in by the wayside.” As parallels, he noted President George W. Bush’s personal religiosity and championing of “faith-based programs,” as well as the close relationship between church and state in some European countries. He pointed out that the noted Islamist scholar Ali Bulaç had distanced himself entirely from Islamism, saying that it was a period that was now over, as people lived their beliefs within a pluralist framework.

Has Islam become individual, personal practice distinct from the public and political realms, as these voices claim, despite the presence of Islam-inspired devout Muslims in those realms? If so, how does this compare to the vision of the followers of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, founder of the Turkish Republic, of a pristinely secular, modern public and political realm, with religion relegated to the private sphere? In Turkey, a series of secularist governments, backed by a fiercely Kemalist military, have implemented this model by setting legal curbs on religious expression in public. Religious insignia of all kinds, whether turban or Roman collar, are forbidden on the streets; women's head coverings, while tolerated on the street, are banned in government offices, the civil service, and many university classrooms, and more subtly discouraged in other workplaces and arenas. The state has replaced the ulema with a Ministry of Religious Affairs that trains and oversees all religious specialists, vets sermons, supervises mosques and religious schools, and issues advice about how to be a good Muslim that the state feels is compatible with a rational, scientific, secular society. The new AKP government challenges this by agreeing that religion is personal but arguing that, as such, it can be incorporated into the public and political spheres without compromising the secular state system. Kemalists, however, would likely conclude that the secular nature of the state is not safe in the hands of individuals in whose lives religion plays such an important role that they feel the need to fast and pray while doing their public duty (for instance, in the prime ministry).

Thus, the issue that has emerged as a major area of dispute under the new government is the boundaries of the private and the public, the personal, the civil, and the political. The Kemalist model seems to imply that a modern, secular democratic system requires not just certain practices in the public arena, but also a certain kind of person. When a secular person enters the political realm, she becomes secularist; when an Islamic believer enters the political realm, she becomes, by definition, Islamist. The Muslimhood model challenges this by asserting that believing Muslims can be secular politicians, that their qualities of personhood not only do not disqualify them from running the secular governmental machinery, but may even benefit the political realm by inserting personal ethics and a moral stance. On November 3, 2002, Turkey's voters seemed to agree when they elected the Islam-inspired AKP to head the government and threw out the corrupt and ineffectual centrist parties.

What is the evidence for the death of Islamism in Turkey and the rise of a personalized Muslimhood? Can this work as a political formula? If so, can this serve as a more general model for Islamic (or "Muslim") governance, or does it reflect characteristics and circumstances unique to Turkey? Are there alternative trends and actors that might contradict or undercut the personalization and privatization of Islam and the Muslim- ization of politics and the public sphere?

 The Personalization of Islam

Günter Seufert has suggested that Islam in Turkey has become increasingly detached from personal identity and become a means of expres- sion.[19] He linked this to the development since the 1980s of a consumer society in which identity can be demonstrated through purchased goods, and items are advertised by playing on identities. This implies a change in political focus as well. He argued that, whereas in the past, Turks might have asked, “What does an Islamic identity say about national identity?” now they are asking, “What does the nation mean for a Muslim?” “How does democracy fit with Islam?” has become “What does Islam mean for democracy?”

While the Kemalist state has long laid claim to the right to define Islam through its Ministry of Religious Affairs, the new AKP government is challenging this definition, and the market and media are wresting control over defining a “Muslim” away from the state and, perhaps, even away from Islamic groups and movements. Navaro-Yashin (2002) describes the fashion industry that has grown up around a form of veiling, tesettür, that has been associated with political Islam. At a tesettür fashion show, a woman watching the veiled models striding down the runway told Navaro-Yashin that she welcomed the elaboration of an explicitly middle class form of veiling. She had recently begun to veil, she revealed, and the sales staff in her usual shops no longer recognized her, treating her as if she couldn’t afford to shop there. If she wore couture tesettür, she reasoned, that wouldn’t happen (Navaro-Yashin 2002). The 1990s saw the spread of Islamist gated communities and department stores. During Ramazan in November 2002, the special holiday pages in major newspapers gave advice on such topics as whether or not sushi and lobster were permitted foods and how to take care of the skin while fasting. Subjects generally were approached from a pluralist angle, pointing out different Islamic interpretations and variations by region and country. Scientific explanations were amended to religious ones; for instance, explaining that research by veterinarians had revealed substances harmful to human beings in the flesh of animals like pigs, dogs, and lions. This was true as well for newspapers, like Zaman, associated with the Islamic movement. At the mammoth annual Fatih Book Fair, held in the courtyard of the Sultan Ahmet Mosque, people crowded the stands. The book fair is self-consciously Islamic and the patrons dress the part. The book displays, however, sometimes present surprising contrasts, with translations of Dostoyevski, Gogol, Turgenev, and Jack London next to The Big Islamic Catechism, and Steinbeck and George Orwell sharing a shelf with Islam's Smiling Face and Army and Commander in Islam. One stand advertised a sale on Malcolm X, another a computer program for learning prayers in Arabic, a problem for most Turks, who do not understand Arabic. Shoppers, however, often reached over more esoteric offerings and picked up books like Test Your Child's IQ and slim, colorful volumes for children about Islam and prayer, including talking books that made the sounds of the Arabic alphabet.

Recently, the Mevlevi, or whirling dervishes, have begun appearing in popular music and video clips and on entertainment shows on television.

This is a radical departure from their previous public performances in which the public was told not to clap, since this was a religious ceremony, not a form of entertainment. On a late-night program on Show TV in November 2002, the female host exchanged light banter with a sexy, blonde Turkish singer, both in low-cut evening gowns, then introduced a small group of young men dressed as (and presented as) dervishes, along with a musician who played Sufi music to accompany them while they whirled for the cameras. One of the dervishes was a young boy of seven, the son of the musician. (Classic Mevlana performances also often included at least one young apprentice dervish.) When the whirling ended, the hostess asked the boy to announce, "Stay tuned. After the commercials, we'll be right back." This was still unusual enough to merit a lightly shocked article on the entertainment page of Sabah newspaper, where the journalist Yüksel Aytug criticized the show's host for asking the young dervish, "How long have you been turning?" Spinning-tops "turn," he admonished, but dervishes "whirl" and they do so in a ceremony with deep religious and philosophical meaning. They are not dancers or entertainers (November 24, 2002, 30).

Despite unease with the desacralization of religious practices, it appears to be becoming more common. An article in the newspaper Milliyet featured a musician that taught children Sufi whirling as a game and planned to put together a show around Sufi whirling and music by a South African singer (November 14, 2002). A more Islamically oriented newspaper advised women to finger prayer beads to reduce stress (Zaman, October 28, 2002). Another newspaper showed an actress wearing a muska, or amulet, as a fashion accessory over a tight bathing suit. Cultural and musical syncretism is not new in Turkey, but the incorporation of religious practices into such risque formats would have been thought highly inappropriate until recently and unleashed a negative reaction. As Seufert pointed out, however, over the last four or five years, objects and practices associated with an Islamic identity have come to be dislodged from their religious moorings and become available, primarily via the marketplace and media, to those whose primary identity is not Islamic, but who are interested in demonstrating that they are Muslim. Muslim- hood, in other words, has become fashionable.

 The Death of Islamism

What has become of the much-discussed Islamism of the 1980s and 1990s? According to Ak Beki, it is a failed project, a trend that has played itself out. Until the 1970s, he explained, Islam was understood as orthodox religious tradition, not as an ideology, or something that belonged in the political or civic realms. During that decade, influences from India and Egypt made themselves felt with the translation of Maw- dudi, Hasan al-Banna and Sayyid Qutb. This brought with it a sense of alienation from and reaction against the West. Their ideas gained a following and began a radical trend that advocated a political project, control over the state so as to set up an Islamic government. By the 1990s, however, this state-centric approach had shown itself to be a dead end in Turkey. It proved impossible to gain control of the state except by political struggle, and radicals were not prepared to wage an armed fight. The final failure was on February 28, 1997, when the National Security Council, the liaison institution between the military and the government, pushed the Islamist prime minister, Necmettin Erbakan (Welfare Party) out of power in what has come to be known as a “soft coup.” Erbakan himself, Beki went on, had irritated many in the Muslim community with his confrontational politics, and they were glad to see him go. Islamist ideas, along with the anti-Western “complex,” began to be reevaluated and rejected. Another factor was the increasing cultural interaction between Islamist and non-Islamist intellectual circles that led Islamists to be influenced by multicultural approaches. In the 1990s, Beki argued, Islam as ideology was replaced by Islam as religion, centered on the Qur’an.

One of the main arenas for the interaction of Islamists and nonIslamists have been the annual Abant meetings, sponsored by the followers of Fethullah Gülen, an Islamic movement centered on education. These meetings brought together Islamist and secularist intellectuals and politicians from across the ideological spectrum, as well as representatives of Turkey’s other major Islamic sect, the Alevi. Since 1998, they have gathered for several days each year in the picturesque mountain town of Abant, halfway between Ankara and Istanbul, to hash out positions on topics like the relation of Islam to laicism (1998), religion and society (1999), state and law (2000), pluralism and social reconciliation (2001), and globalization in light of the “spirit of Abant” (2002). A book of proceedings is published after every meeting and a joint position statement is issued. The platform expresses support for democracy, human rights, and individual freedoms, arguing that these are entirely in accord with Islamic principles. There is no contradiction between religion and rationality: divine inspiration can better be understood in the light shed by the rational accumulation of knowledge. “Religious identity is individual” (Abant Platformu 2000, 316–17). It is communal insofar as religion is a component of a person’s culture and a source of common values. Mehmet Aydin, one of the organizers, defined the “Abant spirit” as respect for different bodies of knowledge and ideas in Turkey and an attempt to see them represented; respect for the “honor” of knowledge and ideas, even if different, and a willingness to let the discussion go wherever it leads; an open mind and heart, being democratic and courageous; giving importance to the logic of the dialogue; and attempting, at the end of the discussions, to capture a shared common denominator that may not represent everyone’s views in their entirety, but enough to recognize their contribution. The Abant meetings are designed to make of this “spirit” of reconciliation a “usable” model (2002, 101–2))

 Muslim Actors: Groups

Participants in the Abant meetings comprise organized religious sects or groups as well as individual thinkers who may or may not be associated with particular strains of thought about Islam and its place in the public sphere) Some prominent secularist thinkers also participate) First I will discuss two Muslim groups, the Fethullahlar and the Alevi, quite different, but well represented in Turkish society and the public sphere and both arguably representative of moderate streams in Turkish Islam) The sponsors of the Abant meetings, the Fethullahc 1, are followers of the retired preacher Fethullah Gülen) Gülen's movement consists of a network of nominally independent organizations in Turkey's major cities united around Gülen's teachings and supporting a publishing and media empire and educational initiative) Gülen's movement is an offshoot of the Nurcu movement, based on the writings of Said Nursi (1877–1960) that argue that there is no contradiction between religion and science) The Nurcu spread in Turkey in the 1950s and held a particular appeal for those educated in the secular school system) Gülen's followers include many teachers, students, businessmen, and educated professionals) Gülen seeks to "Islamize Turkish nationalism; recreate a legitimate link between state and religion; emphasize democracy and tolerance; and encourage links with Turkish republics" (Aras 1998, 29)) He believes that Turks share with Central Asian Turks a knowledge-based, nonpolitical form of Islamic interpretation, influenced by Sufi tradition) He differentiates this "Turkish-Muslim identity" from Arab Islam, arguing that Turkish Muslims are more tolerant and open to dialogue with all parts of society, including other religions and sects) He promotes the seeking of knowledge as a religious value and integration with the Western world, even if that means incorporating Western technology, clothing, and, to some extent, lifestyle) In his writings, he emphasizes that religion is a private matter and its requirements should not be imposed on anyone) Instead, the Fethullahlar spread their message by sponsoring schools, dormitories, summer camps, and reading circles) Gülen-financed schools can be found in Turkey and abroad, primarily in Central Asia and the Balkans) The Fethullahlar put on conferences to which they often invite internationally known scholars to discuss themes like Islam, democracy and civil society. They own a popular television station (STV) and a newspaper (Zaman) and publish large numbers of books and periodicals.

In the 1980s, the Turkish military and government encouraged a model of nationalist religion, which came to be known as the Turkish-Islamic synthesis, in a bid to counter the appeal of leftist ideologies. Gülen's brand of Turkish Islam, with its emphasis on Islamic education and belief in the compatibility of religious ethics and modern state institutions, seemed ideal and initially was supported. Major politicians accepted invitations to dine and speak with Gülen. However, as Islamist politics grew in popularity through the 1990s, especially at the ballot box, Gülen and his followers were accused of dissembling and, in reality, wishing to turn Turkey into an Islamic state. For the past several years, the frail leader has lived in the United States, where he initially came for medical treatment, unable to return to Turkey under threat of arrest. His movement, however, retains its momentum. It is too early to say whether the AKP government will allow him to return, since the military, the courts, and, to some extent, the police, have acted relatively independently of the government in the past. However, the prime minister in 2002, Abdullah Gül, and other members of his government have attended Abant meetings in the past, and Minister Mehmet Aydin was one of the organizers.

The Alevi are a non-Sunni syncretistic Muslim minority estimated to make up between 20 and 25 percent of the Turkish population. For centuries, they have been marginalized and sometimes persecuted by the Sunni majority for their beliefs, which some consider heretical. They do not subscribe to the Sunni requirements regarding prayer and fasting, and their ceremonies, at which music plays a prominent role, are not gender segregated. Although traditionally socially liberal and politically to the left of center, the Alevi are often overlooked in discussions of moderate Islam in Turkey. This may be due to their association with leftist activities in the turbulent 1960s and 1970s. In the 1980s, however, the Alevis, much like the Fethullahcilar, were perceived to be allies of the state in countering the perceived new threat of Islamism. They were granted permission to reopen their lodges, closed along with other Islamic institutions after the founding of the Republic, and to practice and hold their cem ceremonies openly. This has led to what some have called an Alevi revival or repoliticization, including the founding of numerous Alevi associations and foundations and local and national radio stations. In 1989, they issued an "Alevi Manifesto" in which they demanded unconditional acceptance of their religious community and their specific culture by the public and the state, and an end to all discrimination.

That discrimination at times has been severe. The Ministry of Religious Affairs is Sunni-dominated and disproportionately supports Sunni education and activities. As recently as 1995, several people in a cafe in an Alevi neighborhood were killed in a drive-by shooting, probably by right-wing nationalists. When community residents marched on the police station to protest their inactivity, the police, many of whom are sympathetic to the nationalists, retaliated, killing several residents. The ensuing riots left at least a dozen people dead and over a hundred wounded. That same year, outsiders broke into several university campuses and beat up students eating lunch during Ramazan, the month of fasting. When students protested police inactivity, they were beaten. When a guest on a television entertainment show made a joke that the Alevi have no morals and have group sex during their ceremonies, Alevis tried to set the television station on fire. A former high official at the Ministry of Religious Affairs, himself an Alevi, went on television to calm the situation and reassure the Alevi that they were integrated into Turkish society.

Since the end of the 1980s, however, the Alevis, under the leadership of an educated and politically active Alevi elite, organized in powerful associations, have become a force in Turkish politics and society. The explosion of interest in Alevis by the Turkish media, scholars, and politicians in Turkey and abroad raised Alevi visibility in the public sphere. Participation in Alevi activities increased, particularly in the cities. People were more willing to present themselves as Alevi (Erdemir 2002, 2). These events led to ongoing discussions about what exactly Alevi religion and culture are, particularly among younger, urban, educated Alevis who have lost touch with the inward-looking tribal traditions of traditional religious leaders, the dedes (Vorhoff 1997, 56).

Like the Sunni Islamist movement, Alevi presence in the public sphere has taken the form of mass demonstrations, civic organizations, and media publications—books, periodicals, and newspapers. Some of these publications have changed their content to cater to the move in reader interest from socialist politics to cultural commentary about Alevi rituals, music, and personalities (Vorhoff 1997, 57). This has fed a crisis in authority within the Alevi community. The analytical dissection and publi- cization of Alevi identity and the creation of Alevi civic institutions over the last decade has created a public body of knowledge about Alevi identity that is often at odds with the more esoteric knowledge of the dedes and threatens their authority, based on their membership in holy lineages (Massicard 2001). The new public represents what one might call a different market, representing many different interests, including a desire for religious consumption. Unlike the more intimate ceremonies of the past, the new urban cems, held in great, modern halls, may involve hundreds of people, many strangers to one another. Although they provide a welcome opportunity to establish networks that cross village, lineage, and regional ties, some participants are disturbed by their “folkloric” aspect, viewing urban cem ceremonies as nothing more than public performances that have lost the authenticity of traditional ceremonies (Erdemir 2002, 9).

Thus, the new Alevi presence in the public sphere is characterized by internal generational, rural/urban, and ethnic divisions, but also by the desacralization of religious ceremonies as Alevi Muslimhood becomes a fashionable identity. What this identity entails will likely be the result of competition in the marketplace of religious consumption, rather than of tradition or politics. Erman and Göker remain skeptical about whether “the recognition of Alevi difference(s) will aid the creation of a more pluralistic political system” (2000, 115). Like Sunni Islamists, Alevis are now riven by social class divisions that may make it impossible to develop an identity politics founded on cultural and religious aspects that address all the needs and interests of a diverse following.

The Justice and Development Party (AKP) seems, at first glance, the most successful manifestation of Islam in the public and political realm. The party is the latest in a series of overtly Islam-inspired parties since the 1960s, each, in turn, closed down by the state (in the 1980s and 1990s, these were the Welfare and Virtue Parties). With each new party, the platform changed and constituency broadened until, by the 2002 election, the AK Party was supported by a spectrum that included peasants and urbanites, poor and wealthy, as well as intellectuals. Its success at the polls was due, in part, to an intensive, personalized method of mobilizing and to an ability to translate its platform of social justice into a local cultural language of neighborliness and mutual obligation (White 2002). Islam as an ideology played a relatively restrained supporting role in Virtue Party mobilization, quite different from the strident Islamism of its predecessor, Erbakan's Welfare Party.

This evolution toward moderate, nonconfrontational Islamic participation was the harbinger of a further receding of Islam into a cultural, ethical stance under the AKP. What caused this moderation and movement from a strident Islam oriented toward changing the state to a model of Muslims doing politics within the state? The chastening effect of continual closings played a role, as did the ability of banned parties to reconstitute themselves to compete again. The decline of other political parties opened the field to competition by a younger generation of politicians. The AK Party is led by the charismatic Recep Tayyip Erdogan, a former soccer player, businessman, and mayor of Istanbul, who replaced the patronage-based politics of Necmettin Erbakan, leader of the previous Islamist parties, with a more participatory, populist grassroots political style. Market and media created crosscurrents of ideas and practices, uprooting previous meanings.

In the remainder of this essay, I will focus on the special circumstances of Turkish Islamic thinkers that led to a rejection of Arab reformist Islam in favor of what they consider to be a Turkish brand of Islamic philosophy that influences the present government. The movement toward a Turkish Islamic philosophy in some ways parallels the personalization and privatization of Islam and desacralization of Islamic practices discussed above, allowing a fractured new public to position themselves in a variety of ways within an Islamic idiom. In other words, the Muslimhood model does not create a unitary body of thought, goals, or practices, but projects a pluralist vision of an Islamic public sphere that reflects more closely the diverse nature of Islam in Turkey, but also contains within it contradictions that may sow the seed of dissent.

 Muslim Thinkers: The Reformists

The annual meetings of intellectuals at Abant and a number of AKP, Alevi, and Gülen sponsored publications, meetings, and educational events have reinforced the Abant model that promotes compatibility with and, indeed, the necessity of pluralism, democracy, and individual rights in a Muslim society.

A group of prominent reformist intellectuals, based at Ankara University's School of Theology, has developed a stream of Islamic thought that seeks to develop a new form of interiority of Islamic belief in Turkey—religion as human nature or an internal state, not society's religion or tradition.

This puts them in an ambiguous relationship with some orthodox and overtly political forms of Islamism, but very much in line with the Abant model and the trends of personalization of Islam and Muslimization of the public and political spheres discussed above. In other words, reformist intellectual currents and the effects of market and media seem similarly aligned in encouraging a movement toward personalization of Islam, or Muslimhood, and away from a politicized Islamism.

Some of the main figures among the Reformists (Yenilikçiler), as they call themselves, are Mehmet Aydin, Mehmed Said Hatiboglu, M. Hayri Kirbasoglu, Ömer Özsoy, Salih Akdemir, Yasar Nuri Öztürk, and Hidayet Sefkatli Tuksal one of the few women prominent in the movement. Mehmet Aydin was born in Elazig in 1943. He graduated from Ankara University's School of Theology in 1966 and the following year, with support from the Turkish Ministry of Education, went to Edinburgh University in England for a doctorate in philosophy. When he returned in 1972, he began teaching in the School of Islamic Sciences at Ankara University and also taught philosophy at Middle East Technical University. In 1984, he moved to Dokuz Eylül University, where he was dean from 1993 to 1999. In fall of 2002, he became a minister in the new AKP government. He is considered to be a modernist and has published ten books on Islam and philosophy, including Turkish Contribution to Philosophy (in English, 1985), and Why? (in Turkish, 2002), which consists of reflections on September 11. In this collection of his newspaper columns, he suggests that rather than a clash of civilizations, the attacks of September 11 and Muslim responses to it are symptoms of the Muslim world's inability to get its own house in order, understand the West, and explain Islam to the West. This is exacerbated by the Muslim world's lack of understanding of Western languages and, thus, of the West's sociology, social psychology, politics, ideology, and strategic vision. The same, he continues, can be said of the West with regard to the Muslim world.

Many of the Reformists are professors at Ankara University's School of Theology, known as a hotbed of modernism, and most have published extensively. Ömer Özsoy is considered by some to be an Islamic feminist. M. Hayri Kirbasoglu, born in Manisa in 1954, specializes in the study and exegesis of hadith, the sayings of the Prophet Muhammed as handed down by chains of more or less reliable sources. His "scientific" evaluations of several popular collections of hadith have led him to doubt their veracity.

Salih Akdemir represents the less orthodox stream of the Reformists. He does not believe that Islam requires women to cover their heads; he supports gender-mixed student housing and the controversial Muslim practice of temporary marriage. Unlike some of his colleagues, he reportedly does not live an orthodox Islamic lifestyle. He practices an individualistic approach to Islam and argues that Islam is "human nature," not tradition. He is inspired by Jung's notion of collective conscience and he believes that, in this regard, all religions are the same. "Allah is inside all of us You use a computer, don't you? ... Allah put inside the angels a diskette; they say whatever is on the diskette; but inside Adam he put a copy of his own hard drive. This potential, this humanity created by Allah, can develop into something like Nietzsche's superior man. The last human being will carry all the godly characteristics ... But with ... our two-faced leaders in Turkey, in America, in Europe, this humanity isn't going anywhere. It's really all slavery. They lift the chains a bit and give them a bit of bread and their eyes widen." The requirements of the Qur'an, he argues, cannot simply be brought into the present. One has to make changes, adapt it to new situations, bring new solutions to bear. He reinterprets Islamic texts by means of semantic analyses. One of his new projects is called the "Transcendental Unity of Semitic Religions."[20] Although shari'ah law has been a basic Islamist goal, the Reformers focus on the Qur'an, rather than on the more questionable "Arab" interpretations. Their own analyses draw on eclectic methods and sources. Among Islamist activists, there is no consensus over the meaning of shari'ah, with some using it simply as a metaphor for a just society with no change in laws required, while others focus on the legality of marrying four wives.

Another heterodox scholar is Yasar Nuri Öztürk, born in Bayburt in 1945. He has degrees in law, theology, and Islamic philosophy and, after practicing law for a time, joined the faculty of Marmara University. In 1993, he was appointed dean of the School of Theology at Istanbul University. He is the author of nineteen books and, through his newspaper columns and television appearances, has a broader presence in the public arena than most other Reformists. In the 2002 elections, he was a candidate not for the AK Party, but for the left-of-center and traditionally secularist Republican Peoples' Party (RPP); he is now a member of parliament. His ideas are especially popular with elite secularists. That and his reputation as a gadfly has somewhat tarnished his repute as an Islamic scholar.

Two other names deserve mention here, those of Ismet Özel and Ali Bulaç. representing what some have called Left Islam. (See Meeker 1991 for analyses of their writings and a list of publications.) Their publications and public appearances have been influential among believers and secularists alike. Ismet Özel is a well-known poet and columnist in several radical Islamist newspapers. He teaches French and comparative literature at Bilgi University, an institution known for the left or liberal orientation of its faculty. He was born in 1944 in Kayseri, in central Anatolia, the sixth child of a police official. He studied political science at Ankara University and French literature and language at Hacettepe University. In the 1960s he was well known as a leftist, but by the 1980s had begun to look to Islam instead for solutions. In his first book, Three Problems: Technique, Civilization, Alienation (in Turkish), he argues that the central problem for contemporary Muslims is not whether and how "Western science and technology can be integrated with Islamic belief and practice," but rather "the reconstitution of an Islamic way of life, an objective that begins with the individual reconstituting his personal thought and practice" (Meeker 1991, 211). His writings rely heavily on Western philosophers and thinkers. One young theology student admitted to me that he finds Özel's writings "impenetrable."

Ali Bulaç was born in 1951 in Mardin. He spent seven years in a madrasa receiving an Islamic education and later studied sociology at Istanbul University. He knows Arabic and is familiar with classical Islamic writers. His first book, Concepts and Orders of Our Times (in Turkish), in the late 1970s became what Meeker calls a "kind of manifesto for Muslim intellectuals" (1991, 197–98) and has sold over forty thousand copies. In the book, Bulaç analyzes capitalism, scientific socialism, and fascism as attempts to come to grips with class conflict. At the end of the book, he suggests that Islam provides a means to cope with contemporary conditions by forming the basis of an alternative "moral social order in which property rights are recognized but the rich become the willing guardians of the poor" (Meeker 1991, 200). Bulaç argues that it is not necessary to use Western principles and institutions to confront the Western challenge. The task of the Muslim intellectual "is not to rework Islam so that it takes the form of yet one more modernist construction, but to show how its beliefs and practices remain a sufficient foundation for community in contemporary life" (Meeker 1991, 201). Although Bulaç is heavily involved in Gülen-sponsored publications and the Abant meetings, his and Özel's work represents a distinct stream of Islamic Reformist thought that rejects Western solutions, despite reference to Western authors in making this argument.

As befits a modernist institution, Reformist debates are carried out over the Internet, and some of these intellectuals have personal Web pages. The Reformists also publish a well-respected journal, Islamiyat, described as modernist liberal. The journal is the brainchild of Mehmet Aydin and his graduate students. The journal first appeared in 1998. Each issue is centered on a theme; some of the most influential issues have taken up Islam and democracy (1999), increasing worldliness (2001), religion and violence (2002, no. 1), and the Islamic Left (2002, no. 2). The issue on religion and violence included articles about violence in Judaism and Christianity, as well as Islam, with separate evaluations of jihad and wife-beating in light of the Qur'an. Writings by Fazlur Rahman appear in several issues, translated from English. Islamiyat is linked to a publishing house that issues Turkish-language books by reformists, including translations of contemporary Arab authors like Muhammed Âbid el-Câbirî (Restructuring Contemporary Arab-Islamic Thought), Emîn el-Hûlî (Reformist Approaches to Arab-Islamic Culture), and Ahmed en-Naîm (Reform in Islamic Law). The publication list also includes a book on semantics as a new science of meaning (by F. R.

Palmer) and a book on Islamic views on reincarnation. There is little reference to classic Arab Islamic writers. Both Aydin and Özsoy confirmed that the translation of works by Fazlur Rahman in the 1970s “started the ball rolling” and that his remains the decisive imprint on the Reformist movement. Through Rahman, Özsoy explained, “the Turks gained access to Muhammad ‘Abduh and other Arab Islamist thinkers.”

However, Aydin explained that recent transnational Islamic rethinking had little impact in Turkey “because Turkish Islamic scholars and writers haven’t traveled much and many don’t speak English or Arabic Few outsiders understand Turkish ... Professor Kirbasoglu is known in the Arab world to some extent because he taught in Saudi Arabia. However, for the most part, none of our publications have been translated into other languages I believe there are significant numbers of people who think along the same lines, but we are not aware of them.” As a result of their training at Turkish and European universities, Reformists tend to be fluent in French, English, and other European languages. Aydin, Özsoy and Akdemir told me that they read Arabic. However, their conversations were peppered with examples from the Western canon, ranging from Freud to Heidegger, not Arab sources.

The Reformists’ emphasis on Muslim interiority requires them to differentiate between religion and culture. It is here that perceived differences from Arab Islam become most apparent. Özsoy: “Since Islam has been an imperial religion from the beginning, it has the capacity to take on different cultural forms. This allows nations to preserve their characteristics after becoming Muslim. This is, in fact, the result of Islam being a humanistic and realistic religion. Of course, we should not make the mistake of equating ethnic and national character with Islam. In the final analysis, Islam is nothing but the average of what contemporary Muslims are. However, I have always weighed the significance of this. I mean, while reading the Qur’an, to what extent am I facing an Arab reality and to what extent the demands of Allah? We have to distinguish between these.”[21]

Arab Islam acts as a foil, highlighting the greater democratic potential of Turkish Islam. Salih Akdemir explained that in the Middle East religion was understood as a relationship of slavery between God and man, so no democracy was possible. Turkish Muslimhood, on the other hand, “is moderate, comfortable,” according to Mehmet Aydin. “[We have] a rooted history Ifyou ask me, religious tolerance was greater in Ottoman times than in the present ... It didn’t emerge with the Republic; there is an 800 to 900 year history.” He gave as an example the acceptance of Jews after the founding of the Republic. “Secondly, Turkish Islam was, of course, culturally influenced to some extent by its Central Asian roots. [For this reason,] in my youth relations between men and women in the villages were extremely comfortable.” He suggested that, although one says “Islam” very easily in English, in fact, for Turkey a better word might be “Muslimhood.”

Islamiyat is read by other intellectuals and has little currency beyond the circle of theologians and Islamic scholars, yet is one of the most vibrant arenas for new Islamic thinking in Turkey. This begs the question of why we should care about a group with such a limited audience. This is perhaps best answered by pointing to Aydin’s new position as minister in the prime minister’s inner circle. While disclaiming Islamism, these intellectuals have brought their Muslim approach and Muslimhood model into the government, albeit as individuals. As we shall see below, this does not solve the problem presented by Muslim ideas and practices spilling into public and political space in an entrenched secular (or laicist) system. However, it suggests new possibilities for negotiating these contradictions that would have been impossible with an overtly political Is- lamism, which would only have been able to resolve the problem by replacing the secular system with an Islamic one.

Reformist influences have been felt in the most unlikely places in the political sphere. During the election campaign, Deniz Baykal, the leader of the RPP, Turkey’s most secular, socialist-oriented party, founded by Ataturk himself, created a media stir when he said, “From Muhammad Iqbal to Sayyid Qutb, Islamic thinkers have been social democrats” (Sabah, October 28, 2002). Forced to respond to media outrage that he would put the Egyptian “founder of political Islam” on the same level as Mevlana and Haci Bektas, Baykal explained that he was not interested in Qutb’s political views, but in his ideas about social justice and anticapitalist views and belief that “social democracy is Islamic.” In his response, he referred to the Reformist Yasar Nuri Öztürk, who had translated Qutb and who was standing as an RPP candidate for parliament. Far from helping the RPP gain votes in the more orthodox countryside, Öztürk may have lost some of those votes by suggesting that the call to prayer be changed from Arabic to Turkish. Nevertheless, the party stood by him as a bearer of enlightened and modern religious knowledge (Milliyet, November 12, 2002). Another party member insisted defensively that “[i]n our youth, we didn’t just read [Qutb]; we read Marx too!” (Sabah, October 28, 2002). After the election, the presence of an Islamic scholar representing the RPP in parliament presented a slightly humorous benefit when a new independent candidate from the rural east balked at wearing the traditional gold jacket pin given him when he entered parliament. Öztürk was able to reassure him that gold was not haram, religiously forbidden (Milliyet, November 14, 2002).

The relation of Reformists to Islamic political movements varies. Özsoy takes a critical stance with respect to the conservative Islamist parties under Erbakan, but is more favorably inclined toward the AKP, not because it is Islamist, but because it is not. “In Turkey, only a fraction of the so-called Islamists regards [Erbakan’s political Islamist] tradition with sympathy. A significant portion has joined other religious communities and the larger body is loyal to the state and regards [the Ministry of] Religious Affairs highly Just as a party that defends solely the rights of Kurds or a party that promotes the Alevis is not healthy, an Islamist party is [not healthy either] AK Party [on the other hand] has votes coming from people from different walks of life [and] a diverse body of deputies in the National Assembly. For instance, we have scholars from our faculty [in parliament]. People who are very enlightened; following a reformist interpretation of Islam, and not as a fantasy but as people who have internalized this and know what they are doing ... Professor Mehmet Aydin is the most prominent of them. [This is not just] about the AK Party. The people walking down the street have a conception of Islam as well, which is partially influenced by reformist Islam. Islam never stops." Not surprisingly, Reformist ideas have faced criticism from more orthodox Muslims and Islamists, but their influence with AKP inserts their ideas into the mainstream. Their ideas also seem to find support in the general population. A national poll showed that while most Turks considered themselves to be devout Muslims and prayed regularly, most also believed that Islam had no place in politics (Çarkogu & Toprak 2000).

 Public and Private Spheres

Politics is contestation over what is private and what is public or political. That is, it is an interpretive struggle, not just an issue of control over space. How is that space defined? What are its boundaries? How are the ideas and practices that take place there evaluated? One might consider this a subset of a larger contestation over the place of "tradition" and "modernity," or Islam and secularism. In Turkey, these issues are front and center, as reformist Muslims try to bring their personal Muslimhood onto the public stage in schools, in government, in the streets, and within a laic system. While a secular system requires the separation of matters of church and state, a laic system commands secularism and forbids religion in the public and political spheres and is set up to enforce it. Özsoy describes this form of laicism, as it is practiced by the Turkish state, as a form of atheism, where religion is expected not to exist at all in certain arenas. Islamists and "public Muslims" have come up short against this seemingly immovable barrier. Erdogan's two daughters study in the United States because they would not be allowed to cover their heads in Turkish schools. Özsoy complained that "this is a faculty of theology [but] our students ... have to uncover their heads. A large number of our students can't attend classes; others attend wearing wigs. No separation between public and private sphere is left. [The classroom] is defined as public sphere." When it was founded in 2001, the AKP had been warned by the Constitutional Court that it faced closure because six of the party founders wore head scarves; it is illegal for women wearing head scarves to found a political party. Just two weeks after coming to power, the AKP government faced the first major challenge to its Muslimhood model. Protocol required Bülent Arınç, the new speaker of parliament, to see secularist President Ahmet Sezer off at the airport. Since Mrs. Sezer would be there, protocol required that Arınç bring his wife as well. The following day, the photo on the front page of all the major newspapers showed President Sezer shaking hands with a veiled Mrs. Arınç. It did not take long for Sezer to remind the AKP government that this had been an illegal act, not to be repeated. Veiling is not permitted in the political arena, whether in parliament or on the airport runway. Several days later, the heads of the branches of the military paid the new government a routine welcome visit. After spending twenty minutes with the prime minister, they spent exactly two minutes, as timed by waiting journalists, in the office of Mr. Arınç. The message was clear. AKP was not to step over the line again.

This presented an interesting dilemma and occasioned a great deal of public debate in the media and in people's homes about whether and under what circumstances religious symbols like the veil could appear in the public sphere and what exactly constituted the public sphere. Some suggested that a differentiation should be made between those who provide service on behalf of the state (like teachers and members of parliament) and those who receive services (like students and ordinary citizens), with only direct representatives of state service being required to adhere to the restrictions on religious symbolism. This debate has opened a hitherto closed door to redefining the meaning of the public arena by differentiating between society and the state. For many Turks, however, the public is irrevocably political. At present, Kemalist opposition to contracting the parameters of the public sphere retains the upper hand. The Kemalists are concerned to ensure that society remains secular, at least in its public face. The Muslimhood model provides both a challenge and an opportunity to rethink these policies. In so doing, it is useful to point out that the meanings of the concepts of public and private and veiling itself already are contested and have begun to change.

Within the Islamist movement itself, the differentiation between a public and private sphere also has become negotiable and ill-defined. Aggressive marketing has created a middle-class and elite Islamist style that sets itself off against the “unconscious” veiling of the masses. The “new Islamic woman” takes part in previously male-dominated activities in the public sphere, whether political activism or shopping. Veiled political activists from working-class backgrounds also aspire to the well-publicized role of “new Islamic woman,” dressing the part as prescribed by advertisements and Islamist magazines aimed at women. Eventually, however, many are forced by economic circumstances to retreat into seclusion within the patriarchal family and the home, an arena set off in Islamist ideology as private in opposition to public. This “private” arena itself has been valorized by the market, resulting in a new bourgeois Islamic home environment marked by certain purchased commodities. This stands in contrast to an Islamic home marked primarily by religiously supported female virtues (like virginity, motherhood, housekeeping, and seclusion). A woman may move between being a “new Islamic woman” and being a secluded housewife, depending on her class and education. Both are legitimated with reference to Islamic doctrine. Veiling itself is a powerful symbol both of Islamist women’s right to act in public as well as their duty to remain secluded in the home. Male Islamist activists are more likely than their female colleagues to emphasize the latter over the former. While the veil acts as a visible, unifying political symbol under certain circumstances, the heterogeneity of economic circumstances and motivations of its wearers indicates potential fractures within the movement, particularly along lines of social class and gender, about Islamic definitions of the proper constitution of public and private and women’s place within them.

Özsoy believes that “the differentiation of a public and private sphere may be a legal and sociological necessity, but with regard to religion, it is an anachronism There is a famous story told about the Prophet

Muhammed’s companion, Omar ... It is said that Omar, the Caliph, had two groups of candles. During working hours when he was caliph, he would use the state’s candle, but from the moment he thought he had moved to his private life, he used his private candle. Although this doesn’t give us a technical way to separate private from public sphere ... it gives us some clues that can be pursued. [We can find such clues] in the life of the Prophet (PBUH) as well.” His point is that Muslims can reconcile themselves to laicism[22] if they understand it as simply a “technology” (which candle do I use where?), rather than as an ideology (am I a laicist or Islamist?). “When laicism is presented as a paradigm against religion it is not possible to say that religious people are at peace with it. However, when it is perceived as a detail, a technique of state formation, in that sense, we don’t see that they have a problem together.” The question of who will be allowed to use both candles, however, is not addressed.

This functional view of secularism and laicism is echoed by both Tayyip Erdogan and Mehmet Aydin. “Islam is a religion, and a party is just a political institution,” Erdogan explained. “Secularism is just a style of management. When a person chooses Islam, he becomes Muslim, but he can choose secularism as a style of administration ... Secularism is an important part of democracy. [It] establishes the administrative structure of this country” (Washington Post, November 10, 2002, B1-2). Aydin agrees that secularism is compatible with democracy in a Muslim society, but insists on defining secular in a nonideological sense as working in conformity with the rule of law in a fully functioning democracy. “I do not want it in other terms. If you say, I will secularize the culture, for instance, [and impose] an educational model in which religious terminology has no place; this doesn’t work.”

Many people believe that defining public and private by differentiating between service giver and service provider might be a “technical” solution to the seemingly intractable question of whether veiled women may attend schools. Özsoy, however, does not agree. “I do not think this is right in principle because I believe dress is a fundamental right. There are definitely some criteria that will define and limit it For instance, I must not have the freedom to come here totally naked ... This can be called custom, tradition, or moral appropriateness. But it must be regulated by law. [Otherwise,] I believe such restrictions are wrong in principle, whether it be for a service provider or service taker in the public sphere."

Aydin accepts some form of laicism as necessary in a Muslim country to guard the state against a chaos of Islamic interpretation. He believes that laicism is natural to the Turkish interpretation of Islam, because a laic state, for instance, ensures that men and women are equal (as he believes they were in early Central Asian Turkic communities). He argued that the state must be laic because [otherwise] there would be too many people who would claim the right to interpret the law. The result would be a situation like that of "the Vatican and Protestants, or the Reformation and counter-Reformation." For a Muslim country like Turkey, he said, he would advocate laicism "as it is meant in Holland." By this he means a more benign and liberal definition of what is allowed in public space, rather than a redefinition of the space. I suggested the term "secularism," but he didn't like it and suggested "secularity" as something more "natural."

 Public Culture

The present debates about what form of clothing and behavior belongs where might well be less a clash of distinct secularist (or laicist) versus Islamist ideologies than the most recent manifestation of a long process of differentiation of personal experience from provincial propriety versus urban mores. As Meeker points out, as a result of continual two-directional urbanization, Turkish citizens, whether in village or city, have been required more and more to differentiate between family space and social space, social and public space, school and work, weekend and weekday, community of origin and community of migration (which could include places as far away as Germany and Saudi Arabia), and to adjust their behaviors and attitudes appropriately (1994, 40). Official Kemalism did not provide many answers to the dilemmas faced by people trying to come up with a moral roadmap for unfamiliar contexts, and left- and rightwing political ideologies of the 1960s and 1970s were suppressed. In the 1980s and 1990s, many Turks focused their hopes on developing civil society; for others, the answers lay in provincial modes of propriety that were common even in cities, unacknowledged by secular nationalist ideology. These norms and patterns of speech and behavior involved, among other things, rituals of cleanliness, distinct ideas of personal status and rights, and a focus on “intimacy, loyalty, interpersonal transparency and affection” and mutual support (Meeker 1994, 37), and were anchored in a local and oral Islamic ethic.

This widespread language and ethic, unacknowledged and even demonized by the Kemalists, served as a powerful foundation for Islamist politics. It is important to note that early Islamic parties, like the National Salvation Party (NSP) in the 1970s, did not do well in elections. Toprak (1981, 101) suggests that this is because religion by itself was not a sufficient factor for mobilization. It was not until the 1990s that an Islamic party began to organize and mobilize people on the basis of what Meeker calls a provincial “Islamic language of being” (1994, 31), rather than on the basis of local interests. (The NSP catered to provincial small businessmen fearful of big business). That change allowed Islamic politics to expand beyond specific interests to attract people across a wide spectrum who perceived in the party a familiar and time-honored strategy for dealing with life’s difficulties and change.

These developments have been exacerbated by economic decline and privatization of state industries in the 1980s and 1990s. There is a perceptible nostalgia for traditional strategies and institutions that, in retrospect, seemed to provide solutions. There is a diffuse but discernible nostalgia for a sheltering authority. This can be seen in the recent popularity of films and film series about rural aghas who are gruff and demanding, but care about their people, protect them, and meet their needs. The Ottoman Empire, moth-balled since 1923 by the Republic, has been dusted off to provide models for everything from tolerant multiculturalism to veiling styles and architectural models for summer resorts. The Welfare and Virtue Parties that preceded AKP put forward Ottoman- inspired ideas ranging from Bulaç’s scheme for millet-style religious federalism to charity programs in which wealthy families, in effect, “adopt” poor families. AKP was successful primarily because it organized and mobilized people on the basis of neighborhood networks built around the very characteristics described in Meeker’s provincial propriety. The links between neighborhood networks, civic organizations, and political party—a powerful nexus I call vernacular politics (White 2002)—created a broad national movement, flexible enough to incorporate a great variety of people. The masses, in effect, were mobilized on the basis of familiar personal ties and obligations, and their energies and interests channeled into a national political program. Vernacular politics made the line between personal and political, and between local and national, obsolete.

The rehabilitation of provincial modes of propriety as the bases for new urban, modern Muslim identities and national political mobilization became possible with the development of an aggressive media. Television and radio were effectively deregulated in the 1980s as cable and satellite television made it impossible to control. There also was a publication explosion. The Turkish-Islamic synthesis of the 1980s meant that the government allowed a great variety of Islamic ideas and material to be published and broadcast. The newly opened economy of the 1980s brought wealth to conservative and provincial entrepreneurs. The Özal government brought them into the bureaucracy. All of these things led to the development of a new Islamist public culture. Almost immediately, it came into conflict with official public culture. Veiling developed a popular, chic style and began to appear in areas of the city, particularly middleclass areas, formerly the exclusive realm of secularists, and Islamic ideas were debated in the media.

 Muslimization of the Public

There are, in other words, multiple challenges to the laicist definition of the boundaries and content of the public sphere, from media and market forces, from Muslim intellectuals and politicians, and from ordinary citizens looking for strategies for self-expression. Yet, at the same time, there is widespread concern about the social manifestations of other kinds of difference that seem to be on the rise: an acceptance of lifestyle differences only if they are segregated; a politically unmoored and intolerant Muslimhood that divides people within the same social class, the same neighborhood. A secularist friend worried that AKP’s plan to move authority for such things as education and health care from the central state into the hands of local authorities would lead to dangerous differences between, say, school districts, with one allowing head scarves and the other not. He worried it would lead to segregation, “like U.S. blacks,” but based on lifestyle. Ayse Böhürler, the Islamist writer and television personality, complained about Negrofication (zencilestirme).[23] Two relatively new terms, “white Turks” and “black Turks,” have come into wide use to refer to urban, secular, left-of-center Turks, on the one hand, and rural (or “reactionary,” uncivilized) Islamist conservatives on the other. A middle-aged desk clerk in a touristic hotel who has lived his entire life in Fatih, arguably Istanbul’s most religiously conservative neighborhood, described a creeping division between residents who are more devout and those less observant. Whereas in the past, they lived mixed together, he explained, now there is less tolerance. More religiously observant residents are disturbed by the more open clothing and lifestyles of their neighbors. They have, over time, become geographically segregated, so that those living behind the mosque tend to be more observant than those living in front of the mosque.

 Is Islamist Politics Dead? Some Questions

Many politicians and intellectuals argue that Islam has ceased to play a direct role in politics, other than inspiring direction. They claim that Islam in both the public and private spheres has become pluralist, multicultural, and modern. The meanings of Islamic symbols and practices seem to be diffusing as they are marketed and popularized. Yet society seems ever more rent by differences that people associate with differing positions with regard to Islamic lifestyle. Also, real forces (the military, the secularist/laicist establishment, beginning with the president and the courts) dispute the presence of what they consider political symbols, like the veil, in public and civic space. That is, they point to a continuation of Islam in politics. Is this simply a matter of definition—Where is the public sphere? Is the veil really a public symbol or just a personal fashion choice? Is Islamic ideology truly dead? —Or is the redefinition of public and private a sleight of hand that makes Muslim values and practices appear to be personal choices even when government ministers are seen to fast and pray together?

The Muslimhood model and Abant model of reconciliation are promising, but without a viable political framework, the problem is not solved. A young urban planner at Middle East Technical University in Ankara compared this to the conundrum of the famed Gordian Knot. Alexander the Great cut the Gordian Knot, which could not be undone, with his sword. “It’s a solution,” said the urban planner, “but a trivial one. The knot is not undone. In other words, it’s not really a solution.” This is true whether the army intervenes to keep the government free of Islamic politicians, or whether Muslim politicians bring their ideas and practices into the secular government. To undo the Gordian Knot, he said, one needs democracy. For Özsoy, this does not pose a problem. “Once a fellow citizen asked me if Islam and democracy are compatible. I answered him as follows ... If Muslims want it, it is. [This is] because there is no such abstract Islam outside of the way in which Muslims have shaped and brought it to the historical scene.” This interpretation reflects both the individualism of the Reformist position and the differentiation of religion from its traditional and cultural historical baggage, separating a Turkish from an Arab Islam. The November 2003 car bombings in Istanbul, apparently planned by Al-Qaeda with the assistance of a local, hitherto unimportant radical Islamist group, can be expected to reinforce this suspicion of Arab Islam and lead AKP to further distance itself from any radical Islamic elements that might still remain within the party.

 Can the Muslimhood Model Travel?

The Abant model is seen by many as something that can travel, if only other Muslim countries could overcome their internal barriers (attributed to culture, bad governments, etc.). The Muslimhood model, on the other hand, even though it is based on a universalist conception of human character, is perceived to be more strongly expressed in Turkey because of the characteristics of Turkish Islam (Central Asian Sufism) and Ottoman history. Aydin, however, has a more optimistic view: “If we stay in power another five years ... there are some things we need to fix in Turkey ...

Turkish society is religious. If we can put into place the best model of a democratic law state in a religious Muslim society, then it’s impossible for Syria and Iraq not to be affected by this Much radicalism derives from politics, from economic problems. If you have a very narrow definition of nationalism, ethnicity goes up in flames. If you interpret Islam as allowing only this, and all the rest is forbidden, you will have serious problems. In the Islamic world, radicalism derives from fifty years of politicians who have not solved people's economic problems and now try to use religion to clear the way before them. Also, the appearance of radicalism in the Islamic world is linked to Israel's politics, which desperately needs to be solved."

Certain elements present themselves, however, that may be less transferable. Radical Islamism in Turkey as inspired by transnational trends died because of a general realization that a shari'ah-based state was not a practicable goal due to state and military resistance, a popular lack of support for Islam in politics, and the recognition that Arab Islam differs from Turkish Islam, which is more individualistic and moderate. There was an all-around moderating effect as representatives of different groups and positions communicated at Abant meetings and in the media. These trends were reflected intellectually by theologian Renewers and politically by AKP. AKP's model of Muslimhood limits Islam in politics to ethical and moral inspiration of individual behavior and individual choice. The party supports democracy because it guarantees freedom of individual belief and expression and, thus, religious expression and its own survival.

Repression of Islamist participation in public life has not led to movement away from a civil sphere to violent radicalism because (1) the repressing mechanisms of state and military enjoy widespread legitimacy and support; the military (in polls ranked the most trusted institution) and the state are both entwined with the heroic nationalist legacy of Ataturk; (2) repressed political figures and parties generally are able to reconfigure and struggle for a new place within a competitive political system. This leads to two questions: (1) whether, in the absence of repression, the other factors mentioned above would have been sufficient to moderate the Islamist impetus; (2) whether the Muslimhood model could survive a system without such repressive mechanisms (an AKP aim). It is conceivable that Muslim ideals might become absorbed and diffused in the secular "technology" of state, or that Muslims might be outflanked by less liberal elements of society.

AKP came to power in part because its message matched religiocultural provincial ethical and behavioral norms that, despite the universalist and individualist claims of the Muslimhood theorists, are not necessarily liberal or based on individualism. Rather, rights in this social paradigm are derived from community membership and obedience to communal norms. While the provincial code protects guests and travelers, it is not particularly conducive to tolerance of behavioral aberration among fellow residents. Due to urbanization and the growth of both Islamic and non-Islamic commercial media, what had been a provincial code has become elaborated into nationally valorized identities, linked in a diffuse way to Islam, with differences among people encoded in symbols like the veil and terminology like black and white Turk. The divisiveness is expressed most obviously in a continuing battle over what constitutes public space (parliament? university classrooms? the street? state occasions?) and who controls what can and cannot appear there. This comes out in such disputes as the permissibility of veiling or, in neighborhoods like Fatih, secular dress in public places, whether women's proper place is in parliament or in the home, and whether or not alcohol sale and consumption should be prohibited in sidewalk restaurants (where nondrinking Muslim passers-by might be offended at the sight).

These dilemmas illustrate an interesting difference between social and political trends. While politics and intellectual discourse on Islam seem to be moving into the realm of democracy, tolerance, and individualism, society is becoming more polarized along the lines of perceived lifestyle differences. Speaker Arınç's protocol dilemma was the first sign of the legally entrenched nature of secularist practices and definition of the public sphere, heedless of the new government's attempts to explain Islami- cized practices as individual, rather than public, choices.

[17] Interview with author, Ankara, November 30, 2002. (Unless otherwise specified, further quotations will refer to the interview first referenced.)

[18] Interview with author, Ankara, November 25, 2002.

[19] Interview with author, Istanbul, November 23, 2002.

[20] Interview with author, Ankara, November 29, 2002.

[21] Interview with author, Ankara, November 29, 2002.

[22] The Turkish term laiklik has been translated as both “laicism” or “secularism.”

[23] Discussion with author, Istanbul, November 28, 2002.

 References Cited

Abant Platformu. 2000. Istanbul: Gazeteciler veYazarlar Vakfı Yayınlan.

Aras, Bülent. 1998. “Turkish Islam’s Moderate Face.” Middle East Quarterly 5, no. 3: 23–29.

Aydın, Mehmet. 2002. Niçin? Istanbul: Zaman Kitap.

———. 1985. Turkish Contribution to Philosophical Culture. Istanbul: AKM Yayınevi.

Çarkogu, Ali, and B. Toprak. 2000. Türkiye’de Din, Toplum ve Siyaset. Istanbul: Türkiye Ekonomik ve Sosyal Etüdler Vakfı.

Erman, Tahire, and E. Göker. 2000. “Alevi Politics in Contemporary Turkey.” Middle Eastern Studies 36, no. 4 (October): 99–118.

Erdemir, Aykan. 2002. “Alternative Modernities? ‘Modern’ Alevis and Alevi Alternatives.” Paper presented at Symposium “Local Modernities: Islamic Cultural Practices as Sites of Agency, Mediation and Change," MIT, Boston, October 5.

Massicard, Elise. 2001. "Local Productions of Alevi Knowledge." Istanbuler Almanach no. 5: 70–74.

Meeker, Michael. 1991. "The New Muslim Intellectuals in the Republic of Turkey." In Islam in Modern Turkey: Religion, Politics and Literature in a Secular State, edited by Richard Tapper, pp. 189–219. London: I. B. Tauris.

———. 1994. "Oral Culture, Media Culture, and the Islamic Resurgence in Turkey." In Exploring the Written in Anthropology, edited by Eduardo P. Archetti, pp. 31–64. Oslo: Scandinavian University Press.

Navaro-Yashin, Yael. 2002. "The Market for Identities: Secularism, Islamism, Commodities." In The Everyday of Modern Turkey, edited by Deniz Kandiyoti, pp. 153–221. London: I. B. Tauris.

Toprak, Binnaz. 1981. Islam and Political Development in Turkey. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Vorhoff, Karin. 1997. "Vom Schweigen Zum Schreiben: Alewitische Presse in der Türkei Heute." Istanbuler Almanach no. 1: 55–60.

White, Jenny B. 2002. Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

 Chapter 5: Dilemmas of Reform and Democracy in the Islamic Republic of Iran

Bahman Baktiari

In May 1997, political dark horse Mohammad Khatami surprised his clerical colleagues and international analysts with a landslide win in the presidential race over the establishment candidate, Ali Akbar Nateq-Nouri. Khatami's election signaled Iranians' expectations that their new president would ease the Islamic Republic's restrictions on cultural production and social interaction in the name of religion, execute the rule of law consistently, and strengthen civil society. Four years later, in June 2001, the electorate, skeptical about the pace of these reforms, voted in lower numbers. Nevertheless, Iranians reelected their president by an even wider margin, showing their patience with Khatami, who still confronts intense opposition from the Islamic Republic's conservatives worried about the erosion of clerical supremacy and the advent of secularism.

During both presidential campaigns, Khatami appealed to four constituencies: the middle class chafing under Islamic constraints on social life and frustrated by Iran's international economic isolation; intellectuals objecting to the ruling clergy's violations of human rights; women resisting the clerics' efforts to limit their rights and roles in Iranian society; and youths hungry for cultural and social freedoms and in need of higher education and jobs. These constituencies formed the core of the reformist movement, or Jonbesh-e Dovom-e Khordad, which captured not only the presidency twice but also majorities in the municipal council elections of February 1999 and in parliamentary races a year later. However, reformists in government have not succeeded in fully implementing their platform. They have so far been unable to guarantee freedom of expression (the centerpiece of Khatami's domestic agenda), to repair Iran's broken economy, or to take full advantage of the president's call for a "dialogue of civilization" to normalize relations with the United States.

This stalemate in Iranian politics inspires three questions: Given its victories at the ballot box, why has the reformist movement stalled? How long will Iranians—particularly youths—wait for reforms to have a tangible impact on their lives? And do Khatami’s constituents have any alternatives to waiting for the success of reforms?

Arguably, the reformist movement has stumbled over three obstacles: First, the bifurcation of executive power renders gridlock more likely in the Islamic Republic’s policy making. Furthermore, President Khatami lacks the personal qualities and skills needed to push reform past conservative opposition; he is a humanist intellectual with a passion for ideas but has sided with the system’s preservation in moments of crisis. Thus, in the marathon run toward reform, Khatami’s constituents, especially Iranian young people, are out ahead of him. Yet these constituents too have a long way to go before crossing the ever-elusive finish line— formulating policies to delineate the role of religion in public life, to democratize the procedures and substance of Iranian politics, and to engage Iran in a constructive network of foreign relations.

 Conceptualizing State-Society Relations in the Islamic Republic of Iran

State and society are important concepts in everyday life as well as in political analysis. But the concepts are elusive and hard to define. One of the most perplexing problems is distinguishing between the two. Where does the state “end” and society “begin,” and vice versa? State and society are different, yet they are not entirely separate.

Rather than trying to say that one entity is part of the state and another entity is part of society, a more fruitful approach is to think of arenas in which boundaries, rights, jurisdictions, and power distribution between state and societal agencies are debated, contested, and resolved (at least temporarily). These arenas can be within physical institutions, including those that, structurally speaking, clearly belong to the state—for example, government ministries and militaries. But the arenas can be other institutions, like parliament or universities, entities whose locations in the state structure are ambiguous. Arenas can be groups and organizations not part of a state structure yet in one degree or another are penetrated by state rules and regulations—for example, families, villages, and religious groups.

Arenas may also be problems and controversies that are not confined to a particular institution.

In the Iranian case, many questions can be raised about relations between state and society in Iran. A single chapter cannot explore them all. In this chapter I shall concentrate on relations between government authorities and people living within the jurisdiction of that government. In particular, two kinds of questions will be addressed. The first concerns how the political system works: How, if at all, does the state allow or encourage citizens to be involved in the process of setting and implementing rules and policies of the country? How, if at all, do people in society affect or try to affect what state authorities do? And to what extent do people abide by what authorities say? The second are normative questions. What should be the relations between state authorities and people in society? What involvement should the state have in people's economic, social, cultural, and political affairs? And what involvement should groups and individuals in society have in state affairs?

In Iran, a current contentious state-society issue is the role of religion and the ulema. The question is whether the ulema, as represented now by an unelected Supreme leader, should have the final word on all matters of state? Or should the final word rest with elected officials—that is, the president and the parliament? This question has gained greater significance as Iranian society has undergone significant demographic changes. More than 60 percent of the population are under twenty-five years old; they have no memory of the prerevolutionary era, or the first decade of the revolution. They aspire for greater personal and social freedom, and demand jobs and a better standard of living.

Sovereignty in the Islamic Republic—Divine or Democratic?

The Islamic Republic's Constitution, as amended in 1989, stipulates a bifurcation of executive power, which is invested in the presidency and the institution of velayat-e faqih. The president is popularly elected for a term of four years; Iranians sixteen years and older are eligible to vote. The president's responsibilities include the appointment of a cabinet to do the nation’s business, the proposal and negotiation of a legislative agenda with the parliament, and the conduct of Iran’s foreign policy.

The institution of velayat-e faqih, or guardianship of the jurisconsult, is Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini’s legacy to Shi‘i political theory and praxis. The jurisconsult, or Supreme Leader, is a highly esteemed cleric chosen by his peers on the eighty-six-member Assembly of Experts in recognition of his knowledge of fiqh, or Islamic jurisprudence, and his other religiopolitical credentials. The Supreme Leader’s role is to guide Iranians (and, in theory, other Muslims) toward the just government of God. His powers are wide ranging. He is the commander-in-chief of Iran’s armed forces, may veto the president’s decisions, and is charged with protecting the government’s Islamic character.

After Khomeini’s death in 1989 and especially since Khatami’s election in 1997, this dual executive has inspired lively debate over the meaning and workings of an Islamic republic. Iran’s government may be Islamic, it may be a republic, but can it remain both at the start of the twenty-first century? The inheritors of Khomeini’s ideological legacy have not answered this question definitively, with advocates of opposing perspectives vigorously justifying themselves and, in so doing, pushing open the space for public discourse.

In many ways, the state of political competition in Iran in recent years can be characterized in terms of the complex relationship of the so-called religious intellectuals (Roshanfekraneh Dini) and the ruling clerical establishment (Rouhaniyouneh Hokumati). The religious intellectuals’ challenge against the establishment centers on engaging the establishment clerics in debates over doctrinal, political, and sociocultural issues. The most critical component of this debate has had practical consequences on postrevolutionary Iranian polity, because by focusing on the relationship between religion and the state and the role of the clergy, these religious intellectuals seek to strengthen the cause of reform by opening the doors for other intellectuals and defenders of civil society.

 Debating the Relationship between Religion and Political Authority

The twentieth century has brought change to the world at a rapid and unprecedented rate. These changes have swept the Muslim world, leading to various responses. The struggle for reform and democracy has been a major component of Islamic resurgence in the twentieth century. As one scholar has stated, “[S]ocial change in our age has drawn great masses of Muslims onto a teeming public stage As in the nineteenth- and twentieth-century West, one response to these changes has been a call for equality, freedom, and democracy” (Hefner 2000, 8). Like citizens elsewhere, modern Muslims have had to define their relationship to the Islamic past, looking to their religion to provide some answers to the relative values of modernity and authenticity (asala). In this connection, one Western writer has drawn attention to the desire of many Muslim religious intellectuals not to “suffer” modernity but actively accept and foster modernization, and to do so in a religious context that is in harmony with the indigenous culture (Stowasser 1994, 5).

In the last half century, a variety of circumstances have forced this quest for authenticity to the center in many areas in the Islamic world, but nowhere more evidently than in Iran. At the core of the discourses among Iranian intellectuals is the perception of an anxiety-laden dichotomy between a Muslim’s individual and social life, influenced on many levels by science, technology, and Western political thought, and what is expressed as the civilization of an almost bygone era, many of whose elements continue to influence Muslim thought.

President Mohammad Khatami provides a good example of this search for cultural autonomy. Khatami considers himself a scholar and thinker. He is a man steeped in the revolution and the clerical establishment. He is related by marriage to the late Ayatollah Khomeini, served as a minister of culture in the l980s, and was a close associate of Khomeini’s son Ahmad until his death in 1995. He is a man of integrity, palpably honest, intelligent, and shrewd, as well as being well read and modest. In his intellectual development (within a Shi‘i theological framework) Khatami has signified a new brand of clerical thinking, one that is not averse to acknowledging the importance of civil society, as well as the need for a better understanding of Western civilization. He speaks English, Arabic, and German, and can converse on the works of Alexis de Tocqueville and Immanuel Kant. He has published several books, one of them on Western political thought.

There are three pillars of Khatami's thought: (1) a cosmopolitan Islam, the product of his conviction that Islam must be creatively and at times substantively reinterpreted or reformulated in order to be responsive to the demands of modern life; (2) the belief that Iranian Islam must reflect and respond to a diverse population that includes several ethnic groups; and (3) the conviction that in the postrevolutionary Iranian polity, Islam should not be the state religion but rather an inclusive religious, democratic, pluralistic force. As an ideology of government alone, Islam cannot solve the problems of a world that, for better or for worse, is dominated by the West. In one lecture, Khatami declared bluntly, "We Muslims once had a dominant civilization and were shaping human history in a way that we are no longer capable of today. We want to regain our place in history and, if possible, build a future that is different from our present and even our past, without rejecting those who are different from us, and without ignoring scientific thought and the practical achievement of humanity" (Khatami 1997, 91).

In a recent interview, Khatami stated that Iran is suffering an "identity crisis" brought on by its "failure to understand the freedoms at the heart of Western civilization The two contradictory attitudes of love and hatred toward the West have blocked us from accurately understanding the West Our identity crisis can be said to be the most serious predicament in the country in the past 200 years." As a religious thinker, Khatami is fiercely devoted to his faith and Iran, but at the same time, he attempts to realistically appraise both of their places in the modern world. He asks the question posed by so many other Islamic thinkers: How can a society whose identity is religious guarantee freedom, democracy, and social justice?

If the Iranian Revolution of 1979 solely sought a return to an earlier Islamic civilization, a golden age, then it failed because that civilization, in Khatami's eyes, is an anachronism. It no longer exists in practical terms and, if it did, it could no longer meet the needs of the modern era. In making this argument, Khatami makes a subtle but compelling distinction between Islamic traditionalists, who seek a return to what Islam once had, and Islamic reformists in Iran and elsewhere, who seek to progressively reshape the faith into a viable, modern approach to government and society. The latter, he believes, is the only option, and he envisions it as the true legacy of the revolution:

Religiosity had always existed, but a religious revolution was something else, and this took place in our time. The essence of the religion which the Imam [Khomeini] spoke about was no different to the essence of the religion which had prevailed since the early days of Islam ... However, there was a difference, and this was the factor which led to the revolution. The difference was that this time [with the Islamic revolution], this religious essence—which had been around since the advent of Islam—began to concentrate once again on the realities of society and represent the historical wishes and demands of the nation. It was in this way that this great and magnificent event took place. In their religion and in the face of their Imam, the nation saw the fulfillment of their historical wishes, which could be summed up as independence, freedom and progress. (Khatami 2001a)

In this context, Khatami's vision of Islam is not so different from that of other reformist Muslim thinkers. Abdurrahman Wahid, leader of Indonesia's Nahdatul Ulama (Renaissance of Religious Scholars), has espoused a reformist intellectual synthesis and social agenda that distinguish between unchanging religious doctrines or laws and legitimate accommodation to social change. Like Khatami, Wahid is among a generation of Muslim reformists who advocate a progressive Islam, one that is democratic, pluralistic, and tolerant. In contrast to those who have advocated the Islamization of Indonesian society, Wahid emphasizes the Indonesianization, indigenization, or contextualization of Islam (Hefner 2000, 31–36; Barton 1996, 213–14; Brumberg 2001).

Khatami and other reformist thinkers have also emphasized indige- nization. In one passage, Khatami argues that “dismantling aspects of tradition must be based on indigenous models, not imported and artificial. Indeed, Westerners at the dawn of modernity were awakened by delving deeply into their tradition. Thinkers revisited the artistic tradition of the Greeks and the social traditions of Rome. Religious believers returned to what they considered to be the most authentic aspects of Christianity, and hence the Reformation. And these returns to tradition and reappraisals ushered in the new epoch” (Khatami 1998, 33).

Hence, one does not need to opt for a solution that calls for a break with the past, accepting a secular world that rejects any constructive role for religion. The challenge is to create a balanced vision that incorporates one’s past without ignoring the complexities of modern existence: “Democracy is a vital need of today’s mankind, including Iran. In my opinion, democracy has only one alternative. That is, seeking self-interests. And no one would choose seeking self-interests over democracy. If I were to summarize the roots and essence of the people’s reformist movement for the past 100 years, I would say that the movement is aimed at the establishment of democracy” (Khatami 2001c).

Khatami is a skillful politician. He recognizes that he is venturing into uncharted territory, issuing calls for religious reform and democracy that could only come from a cleric who speaks the language of the educated clergy. Often he uses selective quotes from Khomeini to bolster his position. In one passage, Khomeini asserts that in Islamic government “there should always be room for revision. Our revolutionary system demands that various, even opposing viewpoints be allowed to surface ... It is here that traditional religious leadership prevalent in our seminaries will not suffice” (Khatami 1998, 39). In one speech, Khatami asserted that “if we limit ourselves to the appearances of and have a narrow view of religion, then the concept of ‘Islamic Republic’ itself will mean separation from Islam. Where did you ever have anything called a republic in Islam? Where in Islam—the beginnings of Islam—do you find anything called a parliament?” (Khatami 1999)

At a forum convened in June 2001 by the pro-reform Islamic Iran Participation Party (IIPP) entitled “Imam Khomeini’s Reforms and the Concept of Republicanism,” parliamentary deputy Elahe Koulahi commenced the deliberations: “The situation in the past was such that experienced pro-reform individuals did not dare to talk about reforms ... The late Imam Khomeini paid due attention to the gap between the people and the government, believing that the latter’s legitimacy depends on its relation with the people and on the good trust they have in each other” (Baktiari and Vaziri 2002, 18).

Significantly, Ayatollah Khamene’i disagrees with Khatami’s understanding of the Islamic Republic’s essence and objectives. Commemorating the twelfth anniversary of the passing of the “father of the Islamic Revolution and Founder of the Islamic Republic, the late Imam Khomeini,” the Supreme Leader claimed that his mentor was the symbol of Islam and the people, because by relying on Islamic sovereignty and power, he founded an Islamic society on the basis of spirituality and justice Like any person who is acquainted with Islam, the late Imam believed, as we continue to today, that it is Islam and Islamic principles that ensure the happiness, welfare, freedom and dignity of a nation. It is Islam that ensures that justice is upheld in society. Reliance upon the people, in the true sense of the world, is made possible only in the context of upholding Islam and Islamic principles. (Khatami 2001b)

As different as these two interpretations are, they offer a greater insight in that they speak to the prestige Ayatollah Khomeini still commands in postrevolutionary Iran. Yet, to create the flexibility in theology pursued by reformers like Khatami means to break the clergy's monopoly on religious interpretation—a right held by the ulema in Shi'i Iran to a far greater extent than by their Sunni counterparts elsewhere in the Muslim world. Despite their theological disputes, the Shi'i clergy have historically considered themselves the spiritual guardians of the community; their spiritual prestige was the foundation on which Khomeini built the Islamic state. Khatami and other reformist thinkers see a danger in that same prestige, the prospect of a single, infallible interpretation, made even more formal when it becomes an ideology of government. Nevertheless, both Shi'i and Sunni ulema have faced challenges by new Muslim intellectuals whose work and activities appeal to a broader public audience. These Muslim intellectuals engage in a discourse that presents their faith in quasi-ideological terms, as a source of practical knowledge (An- toun 1989).

The Iranian thinker Abdol Karim Soroush is an example of this sort of new Muslim intellectual. He is the most senior intellectual identified with the reform movement, having raised many of the questions mentioned by Khatami years before the elections of 1997. Soroush has been one of the most vocal critics of what he calls "the insular dogmatism of the clergy." His argument is essentially simple, but devastating. It starts by distinguishing Islam as a religion from those who interpret it, and claims that much of what has been handed down through the generations and articulated as the faith is in fact little more than human interpretation, and therefore subject to human fallibilities (Soroush 1994, 414). In a lecture entitled "What the University Expects from the Hawzeh" (religious seminaries), Soroush criticized the ulema for reproducing ideological positions to justify their political power. He called on the seminaries to "abandon the habit of stealth and concealment in matters of religious knowledge; desist from treating questions as scandalous; and refrain from expedient speech and action that subserves political power" (Soroush 2000, 174). In another work, Soroush makes the point that the association of religious scholarship with political and economic power is bound to affect that scholarship and could not be considered in the best interests of theological and philosophical investigation. He goes on to argue that "religion is greater than the ulema, that Islam as a faith is greater than jurisprudence (figh)." He adds that the ulema could not in any case be considered universally worthy of respect, because "the truth is that among the ulema (or those who call themselves ulema) those who are impious, poorly educated ... are not few” (Soroush 1997, 27). In a more direct attack on the clerics who serve in positions of power, Soroush states that “the matter of religion is too great an issue to be exclusively entrusted to the clergy. A clergy that supports itself through religion will gradually be converted to a body whose work will be aimed at preserving itself. When a person’s livelihood depends on confirming and supporting the organization of clergy, how can he think freely?”(Soroush 1995, 26).

Soroush’s project is a familiar one to those acquainted with Jamal Al-Din al-Afghani, or more recently, Ali Shari‘ati. Islam to both of these thinkers was foremost a belief in the transcendence of God and in reason. Ijtihad (independent judgment, interpretation) was a necessity, and the duty of man was to apply the principles of the Qur’an to the problems of the time. If society does not do this it will stagnate or merely imitate (authorities), and imitation corrupts society. The problem then, as Khatami and Soroush have emphasized, is a static society, one that can no longer meet the psychological, material, and social needs of the people but, more dangerous, obstinately refuses to acknowledge its failings. Iran, Khatami has suggested, falls into that category, and the dangers posed by it could undo the vision of a religious society. In another address, Khatami urges people not to follow the dictates of the clergy blindly, pointing out that even Khomeini himself was not infallible. Again and again, he remarks on the danger posed by “unenlightened religious dogma,” and, in a way, puts forth his own eclectic education, one both religious and secular, as a model. “A moral person who is a moving encyclopedia but lives outside his time,” he said, “for whom the most pressing problems are for example the second and third Islamic centuries, cannot solve even the smallest of today’s problems, for today’s problems do not interest him.” Interestingly, Khatami praises Ali Shari‘ati, an influential Iranian sociologist who tried to synthesize socialism with traditional Shi‘ism and adapt the theories of Marx, Fanon, and others to a prerevolutionary Iranian environment. Shari‘ati, who died in 1977 at the age of forty-three, was criticized by some clergy who suggested he had a poor grounding in Islamic thought and accused him of propagating anticlerical views (Mortimer 1982, 335–46). In hindsight, aspects of Shari’ati’s thought have an obvious overlap with Khatami (a cleric) and Soroush.

In making their arguments for a more pluralistic interpretation of Islam, Soroush and Khatami are joined by other thinkers from important theological centers—clerics like Mohsen Kadivar and Ayatollah Mohammad Mojtahed Shabestari. Both of these clerics are very popular among students and the educated class in Iran. These reformist thinkers do not want to do away with religion in civic and political life. They are not against the idea of an Islamic Republic. But they want to blend it with democracy, individual freedom, civil society, and tolerance. By the late 1990s they had drawn many of the revolution's staunchest defenders to their ranks. As stated eloquently by Shabestari:

The conclusion I would like to make is that if we are supposed not to take the approach suggesting that the values of democracy are something that exists in religious texts, there will remain another option and that is the true meaning of religious democracy. In this case, we will look at the issue of religious democracy from an angle which is different from the others. From this angle, Muslims living in a religious society will ask themselves, "Are our lives under a democratic system of government more compatible with our religion than our lives under a totalitarian or despotic regime?" Here we are not going to change the meaning and content of democracy or accept it from a position of noncompliance with religion. In other words, we, as committed Muslims should ask this question, "If we accept these values on a contractual basis, establish a form of democratic system of government and live with it, will this be more compatible with our Islamic faith than other methods?" (Shabastari 2002)

For Mohsen Kadivar, a popular professor and a middle-ranking cleric who was sentenced to eighteen months of prison in April 1999, "the political and cultural struggle between proponents of religious democracy and those of religious autocracy has become the most important battle in Iran" (Kian-Thiebaut 1997, 14). According to Kadivar, the dominance of the authoritarian tendency in the early stages of the revolution can be attributed to a number of factors. However, the most important was a tendency toward authoritarianism among the ulema who found themselves in powerful positions in the government, because not long prior to the revolution, these same ulema were staunch pillars of the monarchy (Kadivar 1999, 200).

As if this statement was not enough to draw the wrath of his opponents, Kadivar follows it up by saying that in the eyes of many people who had fought in the revolution for the right to make their own decisions and control their own destinies, there was little difference in their experience of the monarchical regime and that of the Islamic Republic. It was, he noted, “as if it were an Islamic monarchy.” Then, to clerics who justify their involvement in the government by saying it is their “Islamic duty to serve the people,” Kadivar poses the question, “[I]f Islam as an ideology is the only solution to a nation’s problems, political, economic, social, and of course, moral, who is to blame when the same ideology brings misery?” (Kadivar 1999, 210).

The establishment ulema have countered these arguments by accusing religious intellectuals of “sloganeering.” They maintain that these intellectuals have little understanding of their aims and ambitions, or the consequences of their words. Ayatollah Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, a member of the Assembly of Experts and a lecturer in the holy city of Qom, has responded that “the prophets of God did not believe in pluralism. They believed that only one idea was right.” He goes on to say that “the prophets believed that the right idea must be identified and promoted … And op posing ideas must be rejected through logic. However, if the opponents of the right idea were to decide to impose their own ideas to rule, then tolerance would become meaningless and they must be confronted” (Mesbah-Yazdi 2002).

Mesbah-Yazdi has been the most vocal defender of the clerics’ involvement in politics, and has not shied away even from encouraging acts of violence against religious intellectuals. In one passage he directs his comments to Khatami and the latter’s assertion that Ayatollah Khomeini supported popular sovereignty, stating that “the Imam [Khomeini] used to say that he was concerned about Islam’s future. And we see that today the old slogan of ‘independence, freedom and Islamic Republic’ is replaced with freedom and progress’ is a distortion of history and it is a lie. It is regrettable that the passage of time has made some people so presumptuous that they dare forget the fundamental principles of the state” (Mesbah- Yazdi 2002).

‘independence, freedom and progress.’ That is, the name of Islam is gradually removed from our slogans The slogan of ‘independence,

Other conservative personalities have accused the religious intellectuals of being “intoxicated with Western liberal ideas,” and simply interested in “imitating Western concepts.” Mahmaud Fathali, a midranking cleric who teaches in Qom, uses the term “pseudo-intellectuals” when referring to people like Soroush:

In my opinion, these gentlemen do not have correct and transparent bases and swallow what they get from the West without digesting it. This is due to the hunger they have for the West. Therefore they have no reform thought to put forward in the Islamic sense of the word. The tolerant ideology is very pleasant to some youths who are in the grips of emotions and physical desires and are very attractive to the liberals and the supporters of liberal thought. They think they can take advantage of the situation, but for the masses of the people, who are at one with Islam, it is very hard to accept this kind of talk and it seems that the ideology of tolerance—the way they want it —will never be established in Iran. (Fathali 2000)

If elections results are any indicator, the majority of eligible Iranian voters agree with the president’s emphasis on the republican quality of the Islamic Republic, yet during every election since 1997, the conservatives have done their best to skew the process and outcomes. The Council of Guardians disqualified prominent reformists, especially women, from the parliamentary and presidential races, and the conservatives demanded recounts of votes in localities where they lost by narrow margins. These measures seemed counterproductive, because the parliamentary contest of February 2000 gave the reformists some two-thirds of the seats.

However, if reformists have the heart and mind of most Iranians, conservatives control all the important instruments and levers of power. When the newly elected reformist deputies sought to amend restrictions on the press passed by the previous parliament, the conservatives flexed their muscle. Reformist legislators wanted to revoke a law preventing once banned publications from reopening under new names and barring the reemployment of journalists from such publications. As the reformist majority passed a bill repealing these stipulations, the conservative minority appealed to the Supreme Leader, who took the unprecedented step of intervening in the legislative process. Ayatollah Khamene'i vetoed the more liberal press law on the grounds that its text contradicted the precepts of Islam. The parliamentary majority and the popular will were trumped by the appeal to divine sovereignty. According to one scholar, these actions demonstrate that contrary to the revisionist approach of the reformists, the founding fathers of the Islamic Republic had rejected democracy. "Radical Islamists (some of whom have turned reformists today) in the early 1980s argued that there were two kinds of state, i.e., ideological and non-ideological, and placed the Islamic Republic in the former category, together with the Soviet Union. And in their political writings, the supporters of the Iranian regime argued that the main difference between democracies and the Islamic Republic is that the former laws are made by the people, whereas in the latter they were provided by God" (Chehabi 2001, 51).

During the Persian calendar year 1379 (March 2000-MarrC 2001), as Khatami's first term was ending, Iranians witnessed a campaign of repression unprecedented since Khomeini's death eleven years earlier. Conservative leader Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi went as far as to preach that recourse to violence is "obligatory" if the Islamic Republic cannot otherwise defend itself, "even if thousands of people must perish." Devout Muslims must "kill on the spot" anyone who "insults Islam or the Prophet" (Mesbah-Yazdi 2002). Ayatollah Khamene'i also declared unequivocally that violence was a legitimate tactic to oppose the flouting of Islamic precepts.

The press stood at the front lines of the conservative assault against the reformists. During ten days in April 2000, the judiciary, headed by Ayatollah Hashemi Shahrudi, closed sixteen reformist newspapers without any hearings. Conservatives forced all the pro-press officials out of the Ministry of Islamic Guidance and Culture, with the result that requests for publications were increasingly refused. Between April 2000 and March 2001, roughly two thousand requests to publish were filed with the Press Supervision Council; only sixty-two publications received licenses. In March 2000, Iran's newspapers had a total daily circulation of approximately 3.12 million, which dropped to 1.75 million a year later— a 45 percent decline.

While readers watched pro-reform newspapers disappear, other members of Iran's fledgling civil society also faced the conservatives' wrath. Academics, journalists, lawyers, liberal clerics, publishers, student leaders, and even some midlevel officials were arrested. Charged with seditious activities, some were sentenced to lengthy jail time following public or closed-door trials, while others, not yet tried, are still held in secret confinement, their whereabouts unknown to their attorneys or families.

Among those arrested was eminent theologian Hassan Yussefi-Eshkevari, for the crime of apostasy; he defended the principle of separation between mosque and state, and contended that Islam does not require women to veil. Although he was condemned to death in a closed-door trial, the Court of Appeals overturned Yussefi-Eshkevari's sentence. Mashallah Shamsolvaezin, the bold editor-in-chief of several banned dailies, is now serving a thirty-month prison term for publishing an article urging the death penalty's abolition in the name of Islam. In April 2001, the judiciary accused and jailed some forty nationalists for conspiring to overthrow the Islamic Republic, including Ezzatollah Sahabi— in his eighties and in frail health, a former member of Khomeini's Revolutionary Council, a member of the Freedom Movement (Nezat-e Azaadi), and editor of the weekly Iran-e Farda.

When the parliamentary majority argued that Ayatollah Shahrudi had violated the Islamic Republic's laws and, even worse, the constitution, he rejoined that only clerics are entitled to interpret these texts. What he meant was that only his colleagues, mostly clerics from the Haqqani theological school in Qom, were qualified to do so. Once a prestigious institution led by relatively enlightened ayatollahs, the school has more recently become a hotbed of reactionaries, scorned as "the Iranian Taliban" by other clerics.

Reformists questioned Shahrudi’s loyalty to Iran, because he was born in Iraq and was a founding member of the Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) opposing the Ba‘athist government in Baghdad. The daily Hambastegi proclaimed, “The founder of the Islamic Republic and the Commander of the Revolution (i.e., Khomeini) was opposed to the idea of employing ‘returnees’ (those of Iranian origin expelled from Iraq) in positions and areas of government responsibility.” Hambastegi was then shut down.

During this wave of repression, President Khatami was reduced to voicing his disapproval, since the reformers were powerless to protect those whom they had urged to speak freely. Khatami could only weakly protest: “Three and a half years, and still one has not enough authority for the accomplishment of such a grave responsibility!” Without sufficient authority to redress violations of the constitution, some of Khatami’s aides suggested that he may not run for reelection. “As long as the president does not have the power to carry out what he is supposed to do, he will have real reservations about contesting the elections” (Iran Daily, December 21, 2001).

 Youths Politicized—Resentment, Rebellion, and Revelry

As the presidential race of 2001 neared, reformists worried about the impact of this repression on voters. With more than two-thirds of Iranians under thirty, young people form the largest voting bloc. Youths under thirty comprise 52 percent and those fifteen to twenty comprise 22 percent of eligible voters, respectively. Most young people have little if any memory of the Islamic revolution, did not participate in the referendum establishing the Islamic Republic, and did not vote to ratify its constitution in 1979. However they have long had to deal with the consequences of these events, which their parents’ generation celebrated at least initially.

Iranians sixteen years and older have numerous reasons for being skeptical of Khatami in particular and resenting the Islamic Republic more generally. Not forgotten is the campus rioting of July 1999, sparked when police and vigilantes attacked a Tehran University dormitory as students protested the closure of a pro-reform campus newspaper. One student was killed and at least twenty were injured, igniting the most significant unrest in Tehran and other cities since the revolution in 1978–79.

Students around the country chanted pro-Khatami slogans, but the president cautioned that violence would not expedite reform, which must come slowly and deliberately. Although at first caught off guard by the students' demands, the ruling clerics quickly closed ranks. Khamene'i and Khatami authorized the suppression and arrest of student rebels while assuring the nation that the entire episode, including police misconduct and vigilantism, would be investigated. Many young people initially felt betrayed as Khatami sided with the preservation of clerical supremacy. Meanwhile, students have not shied away from politics, joining Islamist and reformist organizations. The largest student group, the pro-reform Office to Foster Unity, is some 500,000 strong.

Even without joining such organizations, however, the under-thirty generation is marked by its political consciousness. Practically every aspect of a young Iranian's daily existence is political and politicized. Youths lead a double life in Iran. Publicly, they must obey the ruling clergy's prohibitions against socializing with the opposite sex, listening to pop music, consuming alcoholic beverages, men wearing shorts, women using cosmetics, and so forth. In the privacy of their own homes, they pursue intimate relationships with the opposite sex, enjoy parties where alcoholic drinks flow and Iranian and Western pop music plays, experiment with dress and cosmetics as a form of self-expression, and the like. However, youths consistently fear being caught even behind closed doors.

Young Iranians aspiring to a university education must endure a grueling entrance examination, knowing that their prospects for matriculation are slim. Out of 1.5 million high school seniors who took this exam in 2001, the university system accepted a mere 150,000. University graduates then struggle to find employment. For every twenty-three graduates, there is one job; 85 percent of Iranians under twenty-five are unemployed. Without earning steady income, young people literally cannot afford to marry, despite the cultural value invested in matrimony.

Arguably, these bleak prospects for economic stability, self-actualization, and companionship have intensified other social maladies among youths. Psychiatrists have seen cases of depression, schizophrenia, and substance abuse multiply. Mohammad-Ali Zam, director of the Tehran Municipality Cultural and Art Organization, disclosed that roughly 5,000 kilograms of narcotics are used in Tehran daily, and that drug addiction has now even afflicted the schoolchildren. Zam also indicated that prostitution is on the rise, with the average age of a prostitute dropping from twenty-seven to twenty.

In the absence of better alternatives and still hopeful that Khatami could improve their lives, two years after the student rebellion young Iranians are still the most vocal about how Iran is governed—not just systemically, but on a daily basis. Watching Iran's promise thwarted by widespread corruption, high unemployment, global isolation, and repression, youths have demanded accountability and, ultimately, democracy from the reformists. During campaign rallies a week before the 2001 presidential race, students carried placards with such slogans as: "Khatami the hero, the hope of the young," "Freedom of thought, always, always," "We will make the crisis-makers despair by voting for Khatami again," "Human beings must be allowed to ask questions," and "We have come to renew our allegiance to reform" (Khatami 2001c).

Khatami's reelection, while hailed by young Iranians, provoked some conservatives' ire. Upon the order of judiciary chief Ayatollah Shahrudi, security forces launched a wave of public floggings targeting youths. During August-September 2001, more than four hundred people, most under twenty-five, were flogged publicly, accused of "consuming alcohol, having illicit sex, or harassing women." Outraged, Khatami warned that in a "society where discrimination, poverty and graft abound, one cannot expect youngsters not to break the law With tough punishments, you cannot remove social corruption." Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi also denounced the floggings, concerned about harm to the Islamic Republic's international image.

However, conservative clerics applauded this type of punishment. Chief Justice Ayatollah Mohammad Mohammadi-Gilani even claimed that the Supreme Leader had approved the floggings, insisting that the offenders "should be beaten to the point where the whip breaks the skin and scars the flesh underneath." Conservatives cared little about the Islamic Republic's image abroad; nor would they cave in to domestic critics of the beatings. They believe that flogging is a deterrent against un- Islamic behavior and rising crime rates. Defending this form of punishment, Ayatollah Shahrudi stated, "All should be sensitive toward the issue of the promotion of corrupt means and fight against the enemies' efforts to deprave our children" (Baktiari and Vaziri 2002, 18).

The wave of floggings heightened tensions on the streets of Iran's major cities, where youths have pushed the limits of those cultural and social freedoms that have increased during the Khatami years, despite the conservative backlash. During October-November 2001, boisterous soccer fans, mostly young men, poured into the streets, particularly in Tehran, to celebrate victories and lament losses by Iran's national football team as it struggled to qualify for the World Cup. When young women joined the men in reacting to their team's fluctuating fortunes and some revelers became rioters, the ruling clerics called on security forces to patrol the streets. The lack of occasions for young people to be simply who they should be— carefree and joyful when they are not at school or at work— creates frustration. One twenty year old reveler's comments about the ruling clerics' restrictions captured the sentiments of Iran's youths: "If they had taught us from the beginning how we can have fun, maybe it would turn out to be more constructive than breaking windows. When we only have one time every four years where we can go out and express our happiness, riots happen" (Nelson 2001).

After two of the games, fans rioted, breaking windows and shouting antigovernment slogans, mostly directed at the Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khamene'i. The security forces responded by arresting some twelve hundred youths in Tehran alone, most of them under eighteen. The mounting frustration of youths is eroding not merely the conservatives' credibility, but also the legitimacy of the theocracy as a whole. The soccerspectatorship-turned-protest provoked the daily Nowruz to sound an editorial on October 8, 2001, warning: "If we are not intent in deceiving ourselves, if we do not wish to reduce the protests of the young generation to the plots of the enemies inspired and guided from the other side of our borders, we must admit that the gulf between the desire for social freedoms and the restrictions and limitations imposed by the government has been turned into the most active form of social conflict. The generation between 15 and 25, which was born and brought up after the Islamic Revolution, is dissatisfied with the limitations and prohibitions that have been imposed on it, not on the basis of the Constitution, but rather on the basis of the wishes and demands of a small minority, and is resisting these pressures and compulsions."

Prominent pro-reform personalities have urged Khatami to change his strategy toward the conservatives, demanding that the president be more assertive or resign. Perhaps the most significant protest to Khatami's passivity was Ayatollah Jalaleddin Taheri's resignation from his post as Isfahan's Friday prayer leader in July 2002. The Ayatollah lamented watching "the flowers of virtue being crushed, and values and spirituality on the decline" among Iranians. In a scathing resignation letter, Taheri condemned the ruling clerics' corruption and greed: "[W]hen I hear that some of the privileged progeny [aqazadeh] ... some of whom don cloaks and turbans, are competing among themselves to amass the most wealth and to achieve their own ends, I recall that there are many dervish's cloaks that are best thrown into a fire" (Taheri 2002).

Reformist officials had hoped that Taheri's resignation would spark sustained demonstrations by their sympathizers. Yet after two days of rioting in Isfahan, the judiciary forbade the press from reporting any news about Taheri's letter or the rioting. When Nowruz printed the cleric's letter in full, the daily was shut down. Khatami's quiet during this controversy prompted the newspaper Etemad (July 21, 2002) to ask, "[A]mid all this, we are wondering: Where is Khatami? We are all amazed at Khatami's absence ... from the [political] scene. Clearly, a silent Khatami is a Khatami who serves the conservatives' interests."

Emboldened by Taheri's resignation, Iran's main pro-reform party threatened to quit the Islamic Republic unless the conservatives stopped undermining the elected administration. Mohammad-Reza Khatami, the president's younger brother and the Islamic Iran Participation Party (IIPP) chief warned: "We want to work towards agreement ... But if [the conservatives] do not heed the people’s demands ... then we can only withdraw the reformist presence—that it is to say the legitimate elected representation—from the regime” (Etemad, July 21, 2002).

As clerical factionalism intensified, President Khatami proposed two controversial pieces of legislation in September 2002. Directly challenging the conservatives’ power, one bill would enhance the president’s ability to take on officials who violate the Islamic Republic’s Constitution, and the other would curb the Council of Guardians’ role in vetting candidates for elections. With a reformist majority in parliament, these bills will probably become law by the end of 2002 or in 2003, increasing Khatami’s prerogatives, at least on paper.

Soon after the submissions of the bills, conservative elements attacked Khatami for “attempting to change the constitution.” Even prominent reformists doubt the initiative will bring about any significant change in the balance of power. Tehran MP Ali Reza Nouri said he expected the Council of Guardians to reject both Khatami bills. Others echoed his view. “Khamene’i may pay some lip service, but I have not heard any public statement in favour of the president,” stated another reformist MP. “Nothing is going to change” (Mesbah-Yazdi 2002).

Even if the bills are enacted, conservative officials are unlikely to pay more than lip service to these laws. More than the reformists, conservatives enjoy control over the coercive arms of the state—the judiciary and various security forces—and are willing to resort to force when they perceive their interests are at stake. Khatami is a lame duck whose presidency will end with the 2005 election. His legislative proposals will benefit his successor, but Khatami may have to resign himself to the pattern of one step forward toward reform, and two steps back as conservatives have persisted in thwarting any moves toward pluralism.

 Conclusion—From Revolution to Reform and Back Again?

Observers cannot deny that Iran's politics, and particularly the ruling clergy's interaction with society, are complex but also fascinating. The Islamic Republic is a case study of a revolutionary government attempting to reform itself in the face of increased popular appeals for participation in the country's cultural, political, and socioeconomic development.

As a reformist journalist, Hamid Reza Jalalipour remarked, "We are witnessing the decline of the fundamentalist movement in Iran. Two decades ago, we had our fundamentalist experience, and we saw the outcome. Fundamentalism is good for protest, good for revolution and good for war, but not so good for development. No country can organize its society on fundamentalism." Iranians, especially youths, may not wish to forsake religion altogether. Arguably, they hope to see religion returned to private realm, where one can worship and experience his/her relationship to God without compulsion—not necessarily a post-Islamic Iran, but rather an Iran where the citizens may decide freely what role faith plays in their lives.

However, the future of the reformist movement and its goals remain unclear and even debatable due to the interaction of structural, societal, and human factors. Structurally, the Islamic Republic is for now more Islamic than republican. The constitution enshrines both democratic and theocratic elements, but gives the latter dominance in the management of the state. The exercise of divine sovereignty has so far obstructed the democratic will. Revisions to the constitution are required to reverse this trend, and the conservatives would surely fight this suggestion.

Within society, President Khatami still enjoys support, despite weariness with the pace of reform. Even after their disappointment with the outcome of the 1999 student revolt, youths returned to Khatami, praising him in heroic terms. Yet young people, including the student movement, lack a coherent leadership and a common strategy. They belong to numerous pro-reform parties and organizations but have not come together to forge a conscious majority. Youths have engaged the conservatives in a cat-and-mouse game, because they are still not capable of orchestrating a sustained campaign for the cultural and social freedoms they desire. Young Iranians may have to endure more painful confrontations with conservative clerics on the judiciary in order to gain the experience and will needed for such a campaign.

Nevertheless, youths as well as Khatami's other constituents have gone beyond their president in their conception of reform. In a precarious position vis-â-vis his conservative rivals, the president has tried to ensure his own political survival as well as that of the Islamic Republic. He is thus more the spokesman rather than the leader of the reformist movement. A humanist intellectual with a passion for theology and philosophy, he entered the upper echelons of Iran's political arena with some reluctance and little personal ambition. In this sense, Ayatollah Khamene'i was perhaps correct when, exasperated by "illusions fostered abroad," he recently explained that Iran is not the former Soviet Union and that Khatami is not its Gorbachev.

Under President Khatami, Iran's international image has improved greatly. Iran's foreign policy has in recent years been focusing on dismantling the wall of isolation that has been built around it. However, repeated setbacks for the reformists have led to alienation and hopelessness today as pro-reform constituents outpace their president in seeking reform. Khatami may eventually have little choice but to rise to the occasion in a moment of crisis and reckoning with the conservatives. If the president does not seize the moment and conservatives continue to resist change, Iranian citizens themselves will grow increasingly impatient. Whatever the fortunes of particular government officials, Iranians have come to view reform—indeed, even democratization—as inevitable, and they no longer ask "Why reform" or "What kind of reform?" but "How?" and "When?" In a way, Iran is on a long journey of learning how to develop democratic institutions and pluralism based on its own culture, religious and historical traditions.

 References Cited

Antoun, Richard T. 1989. Muslim Preacher in the Modern World: A Jordanian Case Study in Comparative Perspective. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Baktiari, Bahman, and Haleh Vaziri. 2002. "Iran's Liberal Revolution." Current History, January 2002, 17–21.

Barton, Greg. 1996. “The Liberal, Progressive Roots of Wahid’s Thought.” In Nahdlatl Ulama; Traditional Islam and Modernity in Indonesia, edited by Greg Fealy and Greg Barton, pp. 191–223. Clayton, Australia: Monash Asia Institute.

Brumberg, Daniel. 2001. “Dissonant Politics in Iran and Indonesia.” Political Science Quarterly 116 (Fall 2001): 381–411.

Chehabi, H. E. 2001. “The Political Regime of the Islamic Republic of Iran in Comparative Perspective.” Government and Opposition 36, no. 1 (Winter 2001): 48–70

Etemad (Tehran). 2002. July 21.

Fathali, Mahmaud. 2000. “Ideology of Tolerance and Acceptance in Islam.” Foreign Broadcasting Information Service (FBIS) South Asia, December 4.

Hambastegi (Tehran). 2001.

Hefner, Robert. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Iran Daily. December 21, 2001.

Kadivar, Mohsen. 1999. Baha’ye Azadi (The price of freedom). Tehran: Ghazal Publishers.

Khatami, Mohammad. 1997. Hope and Challenge: The Iranian President Speaks. Binghamton, N.Y.: Institute of Global Cultural Studies.

———. 1998. Islam, Liberty and Development. Binghamton, N.Y.: Institute of Global Cultural Studies.

———. 1999. “Khatami on Religious Thought Renewal.” Iran Daily, June 21.

———. 2000. Religion and Intellect Trapped in Tyranny. Tehran: Tarhe Nou Press.

———. 2001a. “Speech by Mohammad Khatami to Mark the Anniversary of the Islamic Revolution.” Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA), Tehran, February 10. Translated by Foreign Broadcasting Information Service (FBIS), Near East/South Asia.

———. 2001b. “Speech at the Mausoleum of Ayatollah Khomeini.” Vision and Voice of the Islamic Republic, Tehran, June 5. Translated by the Foreign Broadcasting Information Service (FBIS).

———. 2001c. “Speech Delivered at the Annual Meeting with University Students.” Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA), Tehran, December 23.

Kian-Thiebaut, Azadeh. 1999. “Political and Social Transformations in PostIslamist Iran.” Middle East Report 212, vol. 29, no. 3 (Fall): 12–16.

Mesbah-Yazdi, Mohammad. 2002. “Speech before the Friday Prayer Gathering in Tehran.” Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA), Tehran, October 25.

Mortimer, Edward. 1982. Faith and Power: The Politics of Islam. New York: Vintage Press.

Nelson, Soraya S. 2001. “Mild Conflict Marks Street Celebration of Iran’s Soccer Victory.” Los Angeles Times, November 1.

Nowruz (Tehran). 2001. October 8.

Shabestari, Mohammad Mojtahid. 2002. “Religious Democracy: From Which Angle?” Nowruz (Tehran) 2, no. 350 (June 18).

Soroush, Abdol Karim. 1994. Qisse-yi Arbab-e ma’rifat (The story of Master Thinker). Tehran: Mu’ssasih-yi Farhangi-yi Sirat.

—. 1995. “Freedom and Clergy.” Tehran: Kiyan (Tehran) 3, no. 24 (August-September): 23--9.

———. 1997. “Saqhf Mashiat bar Sotoun Shariat.” (The roof of livelihood on the pillars of religion). Kiyan (Tehran) 5, no. 26 (August-September): 133–42.

———. 2000. “What the University Expects from the Hawzeh.” In Reason, Freedom and Democracy in Islam: Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush, translated and edited by M. Sadri and A. Sadri, pp. 171–83 Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Stowasser, Barbara F. 1994. Women in the Quran, Traditions, and Interpretation. New York: Oxford University Press.

Taheri, Jalaledin. 2002. “Resignation Letter.” Nowruz (Tehran), July 10.

 Chapter 6: THWARTED POLITICS: THE CASE OF EGYPT’S HIZB AL-WASAT

Augustus Richard Norton

What happens when Islamists go against the grain, and declare their commitment to pluralism and their acceptance, if not endorsement, of secular political principles? This is a study of exactly such a party, the Hizb al-Wasat, or Center Party, a remarkable attempt by a group of moderately oriented Islamists to play by democratic rules of the game in Egypt. The initiative was not the product of Western-designed projects of reform; to the contrary, it grew from debates within the Islamic tayyar, or current. This is a case in point for the reflexivity in ideology that one encounters routinely in Egypt and in the broader Muslim world.[24] The impediments that are routinely placed in the path of nonviolent oppositional voices are also illuminated. Finally, while the purpose of the study is not primarily prescriptive, the realms for potential reformation become obvious as the story unfolds.

Despite its failure to gain legal status, Hizb al-Wasat is noteworthy for its embrace of religious toleration and its rejection of a privileged interpretation of religion. Hizb al-Wasat was not only opposed staunchly by the Egyptian government, but the official suppression of the fledgling party was emphatically endorsed by Egypt's venerable Islamist organization, the Ikhwan al-Muslimun (the Muslim Brethren). The Ikhwan's own efforts to lawfully participate in politics have been frequently sabotaged over the past two decades by the same government apparatus. Many of the proponents of the fledgling party had roots in the Ikhwan, but, quoting a cofounder, the party was an attempt "to go beyond the slogan 'Islam is the solution'" (Murphy 2002). The motives of the Ikhwan in joining in the suppression of the party prove quite mundane—namely, to eliminate a potential political competitor. Thus, this is a spectacle of a new generation attempting to play by new rules but being held at bay by an old guard that will only retire in the grave.

In encounters with the middle-aged professionals in Egypt, it is common to hear complaints about the domination of the political system by septuagenarians and even octogenarians. The legal opposition parties, the Wafd and Tagammu, are obvious examples. In both cases, the emerging younger elites are in their seventies. Hizb al-Wasat illustrates a quest of thirty- and forty-somethings for a hand in the game, and as one supporter said, “[I]t’s about time that this middle generation carries the flag and does its duty for the nation.” He is not alone. A leading regime intellectual recalled a metaphor used by Mustafa Fikhi to observe that he was part of the “mezzanine generation,” sitting just above the ground floor filled with surging young people intent on a place in the system, but closed out of the cohort that wields power on the floors above (author’s interview with ‘Usama al-Ghazali Harb, November 7, 1999). Mustafa Bakri, the editor of al-‘Usbu‘, an independent weekly, remarked somewhat wistfully in 1998, “I think it is natural that any political party demanding that the president of the republic shouldn’t be allowed more than two terms in office should also do the same in its own party” (Schemm and Apiku 1998).

The plan of this chapter is to offer an overview of Egyptian politics that addresses patterns of control that the state has used to regulate dissent in recent years, followed by a discussion of the attempt to register Hizb al-Wasat as a lawful party. Then the reader is introduced to a collection of Egyptian personalities who either played key roles in the Hizb al-Wasat episode or offer uncommonly valuable insights on the case. These personalities include a former chief justice of Egypt’s Constitutional Court, an Islamist engineer and cofounder of the party, a Christian intellectual and cofounder of the party, the Ikhwan’s Supreme Guide, and a key political adviser and one of the most powerful men in Egypt. These materials are based on interviews conducted by the author in Egypt from 1995 to 2003. Concluding comments highlight the implications of this case study and suggest a few broader lessons that may be relevant in a period when major attention has been focused upon the challenge of political reform in the Middle East.

 Background

Since 1928, the quintessential Islamist movement in Egypt has been the Ikhwan al-Muslimun. After a period of phenomenal growth in the 1930s and 1940s, the Muslim Brethren seemed to be on the threshold of seizing power from the decrepit Egyptian monarchy. Indeed, embassy reports in the late 1940s anticipated the end of the monarchy and the emergence of the Ikhwan as the dominant political force in Egypt. In contrast to the army, the Ikhwan distinguished itself in the Arab-Israeli war of 1948–49. Indeed, years earlier the army had been described as “a decrepit thing” by none other than the Commander of the Army. As a group of unlikely young officers (led by the son of a village postmaster, Gamal Abdel Nasser) plotted to topple the monarchy, they worked hand-in-glove with the Ikhwan. Anwar Sadat, the future president, was the Free Officers’ liaison to the Ikhwan, with whom he enjoyed amiable relations (Sadat 1957). Sayyid Qutb, later to pen arguably the most accessible and most influential Islamist polemic, collaborated closely with the officers and emerged as a functionary in the new regime in 1952.

Within two years of the coup the erstwhile allies flew apart. It is striking that many educated Egyptians pointedly refer to the 1952 event as an inqilab (coup), not a thawrah (revolution). Even President Husni Mubarak’s closest political adviser emphasizes the former terminology (author’s interview with Osama al-Baz, November 11, 1999). Lieutenant Colonel Nasser remained in the shadows, deferring to General Muhammad Naguib, who was recruited to serve as nominal head of the revolutionary government. Naguib was gradually nudged aside, and then placed quietly under house arrest as Nasser emerged from the shadows to lead Egypt (Neguib 1955). Meanwhile, the Ikhwan felt its claim to power slipping away and attempted to assassinate Nasser in 1954, during a visit to Alexandria. Sadat’s friend and Ikhwan-member Abdul Monein Abdul Raouf was implicated, and the Ikhwan was outlawed.

Until Nasser’s death in 1970, the Ikhwan remained a constant target for state repression. Nasser’s conception of the state was organic-corporatist and modernist, and the Ikhwan posed a threat to the state’s hegemony. As a result, the record of the 1950s and 1960s, the Nasser years, is a disgraceful chronicle of horrendous prison camps where the Ikhwan honed their opposition to the state. The full history of this period remains to be written, but one legacy of the period is the work of Sayyid Qutb (hanged 1964), especially the lucid and polemical Ma’alim fi al-Tariq (Milestones; Qutb 1988). Jahiliyyah, the core concept of Qutb’s prison-written tract, lies at the very heart of the ideological construction of ‘Usama bin Laden. (Cf. Du’aa La Qadat or “Preachers not judges” by Hassan al-Hodeibi, the Ikhwan’s contemporaneous rejoinder to Qutb). Muhammad Qutb, the brother of the hanged writer, later taught ‘Usama bin Laden. If bin Laden later used the notion of jahiliyyah to refer to Western powers, and especially the United States, this was certainly not Qutb’s primary intent. Though Qutb was contemptuous of the United States (he was disillusioned by his exposure to the United States in the late 1940s, not least because of racial discrimination and sexual permissiveness), he very much had contemporary Egypt in mind when he honed the concept, which he borrowed from the work of Mawlana Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi, the Muslim thinker and founder of Pakistan’s Jama’at-I Islami.

Nasser’s successor, Anwar Sadat, calculated that he needed a counterweight to the Arab socialist and nationalist bedrock that extolled the late president and abhorred Sadat. His fateful decision was to build his legitimacy formula on the right, reflecting his own ties to the Ikhwan in the 1940s. The outrageous repression of the Ikhwan ended, and the Islamists moved from the shadows to the open spaces of the university and the public arena. In particular, the 1970s witnessed a rapid growth in Islamic groups (jama’aat) on the university campuses, and the jama’aat were the seedbed for the generation of Islamists that sought to create al-Wasat. Eventually, Sadat grew apprehensive of the growing criticism of his power and attempted to reverse the mobilization of dissent. However, it was too late to stem the tide, and in 1981 Sadat died in a hail of bullets provoked in significant measure by the repression born of his second thoughts.

Husni Mubarak (1981-) has long surpassed Nasser (1954–70) as the longest-serving president in the history of the Egyptian republic. Following the assassination of President Sadat in 1981, Mubarak conceded political space to the Islamists and experimented with the controlled inclusion of mainstream Islamist opposition forces in parliament. Although the Ikhwan have had no legal standing in Egypt for the past half century, Islamist candidates were permitted to use secular parties as ships of convenience in 1984 and in 1987, thereby winning an impressive number of seats in parliament.

By the early 1990s, the experiment had run its course, much to the regret of many members of the intellectual elite in Egypt, who argued that the experiment was succeeding. As one respected insider noted in a 1995 interview, “political pluralism can exist without changing the basic power structure” (author’s interview with ‘Ali al-Din Hillal Dessouki, July 9, 1995). The government was intent to maintain the upper hand, and even in the elections of 1984 and 1987, which were relatively free, there was never any doubt that the progovernment candidates would maintain a dominant voice in the People’s Assembly (the lower house of the parliament; the upper house, or Shura Council, is composed of 140 appointed members). Thus, in the May 1984 balloting, the regime’s National Democratic Party won 72.9 percent of vote and 87 percent of the seats (389 out of 448 seats). In a distant second place, the resurrected Wafd Party, running in alliance with the Ikhwan, captured 15 percent of votes and 13 percent of seats (59 seats, of which 8 were Ikhwanis) (Ayubi 1991).

In the April 1987 elections, the high point for the opposition parties in parliament, 30 percent of the voters cast their vote for the opposition candidates, and 17 percent of all votes went to the tripartite alliance of the Liberal (al-Ahrar) and Labor Parties with the Ikhwan. The coalition won 60 seats, including 36 Ikhwan and 4 Islamist independents. The Wafd captured slightly fewer than 11 percent of all votes, or thirty-five seats. Considering the extensive scope for electoral manipulation by the government, and the extremely low participation rates in middle-class urban districts where cynicism about elections runs deep, the opposition success offered a stunning riposte to one-party rule in Egypt (Ayubi 1991).

The parliamentary elections of 1990 were the beginning of the end to Mubarak’s experiment in inclusionary electoral politics. The 1990 elections were mandated by Egypt’s high court, which ruled that the 1986 electoral law discriminated against independent candidates and thus violated the constitution (Auda 1991). Although the Egyptian judiciary remains a bastion of independent thinking, it obviously lacks the power to implement its mandate. Heavy gerrymandering and the state’s refusal to accept judicial oversight of the elections prompted the major opposition parties, including the Islamic Alliance and the New Wafd party, to conclude that despite major changes of the election law the electoral system still grossly disadvantaged the opposition. As a result, the major opposition parties boycotted the election. When the elections were conducted, there were customary cases of fraud and intimidation, but the balloting was also marked by an unprecedented level of violence, leading to opposition claims that the 1990 election was “the worst in Egyptian history” (Farag 1991).

The dominant position of the NDP in the parliament should not be allowed to mask an essential weakness of the party, its fundamental lack of grassroots support. As one close observer noted, the ruling party is fictitious. It is a façade. Its structure is weak. The government has not succeeded in creating a strong party. This is one reason that the government is afraid of elections. Only with a strong progovernment party can the government permit a strong opposition (author’s interview with ‘Ali Al-Din Hillal Dessouki, July 9, 1995).

If there was any hope that 1990 was an aberration in a process of democratization, the hope was dashed in the November 1995 elections, when the opposition parties won only 14 seats in all. Opposition poll watchers were routinely harassed and detained; candidates, especially Islamists, were arrested; and ballot boxes were crammed filled to overflowing with bogus ballots. Although the government was able to engineer a sweeping electoral victory, it did not succeed in masking its extensive manipulation of the results. Though ominous attempts were made to dissuade them, three prominent secular activists, Said al-Naggar, Saad Eddin Ibrahim, and Milad Hanna, still succeeded in mounting a major monitoring effort to report on the widespread irregularities in the election. Their unofficial report highlighted electoral irregularities that discredited the government’s “victory” and led to yet another judicial overturning of an election.

At no time during Mubarak’s presidency was there any doubt that the ruling party would maintain control of parliament capable of passing virtually any law that it wished. What appeared in the 1980s to be an effective process of controlled inclusion later became an engine for cynicism and contempt as the regime became increasingly intolerant of dissent, reflecting what many Egyptians refer to as its sclerosis. In the 2000 elections, the Ikhwan managed to gain 17 seats compared to NDP’s 388, making it the largest opposition block in parliament. Notably, the Ikhwan was careful to calibrate the candidacies of its members to avoid posing too wide a challenge to the regime.

 The Battle for the Syndicates

More impressive than the limited electoral success of Islamist candidates were the inroads that they made in the professional syndicates (niqabat), which have been mainstays of the regime since the Nasser period. As the syndicates fell to Islamist control, Mubarak and company sensed that the hegemony of the regime was being challenged.

In Nasserite Egypt the syndicates were expected to be obedient appendages to the state. In contrast, the syndicates in recent years have been an arena for political debates. Unlike the associations and groups that fell under the heavy hand of the Ministry of Social Affairs and the stringent dictates of infamous Law 32 (the law of associations), the syndicates usually enjoyed considerable freedom of action and have been less subject to manipulation by the government than political parties and other overtly political organizations.

There are twenty-one professional syndicates, encompassing about 2.5 million members (Zaki 1995). The largest are the teachers and graduates of faculties of commerce, both of which tend to be supportive of government policy. The signal success was in the Medical Association, where in 1986 Islamists secured a majority of seats on the executive board of the association. In 1988 they built on their success to win in a landslide, capturing all seats except the chair, which was preserved for the NDP candidate—a calculated sop to the government. The same pattern persisted in the 1990 elections. Even in the Pharmacists' syndicate the Islamists captured all but three executive board seats, as well as the chair, despite the fact that the majority of the syndicate's members are Coptic Christians.

The Muslim Brotherhood was concurrently building a strong base in the Engineers' syndicate and among university professors, but the development that reportedly stunned Mubarak was the result of the 1992 executive board elections in the venerable Bar Association. The Islamists captured 75 percent of the seats in an election in which only 10 percent of the association membership participated.

The Islamists successes reflect the changing sociology of the syndicates, their relative autonomy of the government, and the voting behavior of their members. Perhaps most important, the youthful profile of the syndicates implies that rank-and-file members are deeply affected by the arduous economic struggle that confronts most Egyptians. In contrast to the older and established syndicate members who often benefit significantly from their connections to the state, the younger members must eke out their own economic solutions. Reliable observers estimate that about 35 percent of the members are less than thirty-five years of age. Since little was done by established syndicate members to assist their younger colleagues, there was a considerable resentment, which was exploited by the Muslim Brotherhood (Ibrahim 1996).

At the same time, only a small number of syndicate members participated in syndicate affairs, including elections. Thus, fewer than one-quarter of all members participated in the four Medical Association elections from 1980 to 1990, and, as noted above, only 10 percent of the Bar Association membership voted in the fateful 1992 elections. Islamist members of the syndicates were able to capitalize on the low turnout by mobilizing their members, some of whom were unemployed and were able to join their occupational syndicate only with financial help from the Ikhwan. Where the turnout was higher, as in the Journalists' Syndicate and the Union of Social Professions, the Islamists did not fare nearly as well.

The government responded to the Islamist foothold in the syndicates by quickly pushing a new law through the parliament in February 1993. Elections within professional syndicates would now require a quorum of 50 percent of all registered members for the first ballot, and a quorum of 30 percent of all registered members for a subsequent election to be held two weeks after the first ballot. If no quorum could be produced, then the syndicate was to be run by an appointed council of senior members, chaired by a judge. As though the government's intention was to thwart the achievement of a quorum, elections were banned on weekends or official holidays (Ibn Khaldun Center 1993; al-Sayyid 1995).

As the authoritarian state attempted to loosen the influence of the Ikhwan in the syndicates, the Islamists continued to build support on Egypt's campuses. By the early 1990s many university faculty clubs were under Islamist domination, and the Ikhwan appeared poised to extend its influence to the leadership of major universities. The state responded on May 30, 1994, with an amendment to the Universities Law that provided for an end to the practice of electing deans, despite the loud clamor of dissent from the professorate.

If the controlled opening of the 1980s offered some hope that the state would grant more political space, the evidence of the 1990s offered a different lesson. The response of Egyptians was mixed. On the one hand, resentment of the arrogant exercise of power by the state was rampant. On the other hand, extremist Islamist groups (Jihad and the Gam'at Islamiyya) embarked on a campaign of violence and terrorism, designed, in part, to interdict the tourist trade and weaken the state financially. Many Egyptians found these tactics opprobrious and supported a vicious state response. While the curtailment of the experiments in controlled inclusion and the government's autocratic riposte to the Islamists' successes in the syndicates did not seem to augur well for a new experiment in peaceful participation, this is precisely what a number of younger Islamists were pondering in the mid-1990s, both within and on the periphery of the Ikhwan.

 Hizb al-Wasat

In April 1995, the Ikhwan signaled a major departure from the teachings of its founder, Hasan al-Banna (assassinated 1949) when it declared its acceptance of a multiparty politics.[25] The Imam, as al-Banna is often called, railed against hizbiyya ("partyism") with the argument that political parties breed divisiveness (Commins 1994). (In this sense, al-Banna's perspective is consistent with the organic-corporatist bias of today's regime, which refuses to countenance a serious challenge to effective monopolization of politics by the ruling party.) Nonetheless, his successors in the Ikhwan leadership issued an important document in April 1995, which embraced parties as instruments of shura (consultation), while reiterating that power may not be taken by the sword (al-Hudeibi 2000). The statement was intended to be a clear signal of the Ikhwan's willingness to play by democratic rules, but the rejoinder from the regime was studied silence. The political climate of the mid-1990s was one in which a number of efforts were underway to find entree into the political system, especially since the regime was moving aggressively to tighten its control of the political system.

Liberal reformers, such as the respected economist Dr. Said al-Naggar, president of the Civic Forum, worked energetically to promote a "civic compact" (mithaq madani) in 1995. The compact emphasized many of the values embraced the following year by the Hizb al-Wasat, including freedom of belief, democratic participation, and women's rights. This writer (along with Farhad Kazemi) happened to be meeting with the late 'Adil Hussein (died 2001), a leading figure in the Labor Party, an ally of the Ikhwan, on July 11, 1995, when al-Naggar visited party headquarters on Port Said Street to seek Labor's endorsement of the compact.[26] The Labor Party, now suppressed by the government, has veered from left to right, and by the 1990s enjoyed an Islamist ambience, yet faded signs from the 1970s testified that these were the offices of the Socialist Labor Party. Hussein excused himself to join the negotiations, and upon return revealed that he wanted to sign the civil compact along with other members of his party. His view was that the Ikhwan "would lose, if they did not sign it." In the end, the Ikhwan refused to sign because the document did not declare that the shari'ah was the sole basis of law.

This was also a period of calibrated government persecution aimed precisely at the Ikhwan, the most potent opposition group. In 1995, the middle-level leadership was savaged by arrests. In all, fifty-four were arrested and sentenced to three-to-five year terms, including many of the rising young 'amirs ("princes"), such as 'Issam al-'Iryan. Among other motives, the government sought to eliminate many of the most credible candidates for parliament, thereby sabotaging any attempt by the Ikhwan to repeat their electoral successes of the 1980s. Intimidation at balloting sites was widespread as well.

Among younger members of the Ikhwan, many of whom were actively involved in public and professional life, especially in the syndicates of doctors, engineers, and other professions, these discussions were a culmination of many dialogues (Wickham 1996). These dialogues were part of a centrist trend that is sometimes referred to as al-wasatiyya (Baker 1997) or ‘jil al-sab’inaat (the seventies generation), as reflected in recent debates within the Ikhwan (Hamzawy 2003). It is also common to hear references to the renewal trend (al-tayyar al-tajdidi).

Against this backdrop of repression, political foment and debate, a large group broke away from the Ikhwan to form Hizb al-Wasat in late 1995. The name serves a dual purpose. Not only does it emphasize the role the party seeks to place as a mediatory element in society, but it is instantly recognizable to many Muslims because it invokes Qur’anic injunction to be an ‘umma wasat (a justly balanced community). “Thus have We made of you a justly balanced community. That ye might be witnesses over the nations” (Qur’an 2:143). The name implies the project of mediation by a younger generation intent to emphasize a connection to society and to Islam in a modern civilizational context. Of the seventy- four original founding members of al-Wasat, sixty-two came from the ranks of the Brotherhood (Stacher 2002). Many of the founding members had been active in the professional syndicates where they honed political skills and developed a taste for political struggle. By January 1996, they presented an application for legal party status to the governmental Political Parties Committee.

Mustafa Mashur (1919–20022) then newly ascended to the post of Supreme Guide (murshid) of the Ikhwan, and his associates reacted swiftly and furiously to al-Wasat’s display of independence. Mashur) by profession a meteorologist at Egypt’s National Weather Forecasting Center) joined the Ikhwan in 1938. Like many of his colleagues) Mashur had paid his dues—in his instance) eighteen years in prison. In an April 1996 interview) he simply observed that al-Wasat did not display a “pure image of Islam” (Murphy 2002). Behind the scenes, the Ikhwan moved quickly to quell the rebellion in its ranks.

Many members of the founding cohort left the new party under threat and returned to the Ikhwan's fold. In May, the government committee rejected the party's petition on the procedural grounds that they lacked the requisite fifty members to constitute a party (under the terms of Law 40/1977). For its part, the government believed that the party initiative was a scheme by the Ikhwan to find a side door into legitimate party status. Three founding members along with nine others were then arrested for attempting to reorganize the Ikhwan and for plotting against the government; the al-Wasat members were released three months later without being tried or even charged.

What followed was extraordinary. The Hizb al-Wasat filed an appeal, and in 1997 the Ikhwan openly opposed the application during formal hearings (Shadid 2001). Abu al-'Ala Madi, a founder member of Al-Wasat, complained to a newspaper:

This small group of people waged a war on us that we did not expect. We expected them to say we disagree with you or we have nothing to do with this project. But waging a comprehensive war against us on all levels was a big shock that took some time to absorb ... Their attack was even worse than what the government did with us. (Murphy 2002)

The following May, the Political Parties Tribunal rejected the application on familiar grounds. Under the terms of Law 40/1977, a new party must fulfill a legitimate purpose not met by an existing party. Since the ruling National Democratic Party claimed to do all and more that Egypt requires, the standard is virtually impossible to fulfill. The al-Wasat is one of at least thirty-two parties that have failed to meet the standard.[27]

Among leading independent Muslim thinkers, the Ikhwan's riposte to al-Wasat was described as heavy-handed and unfortunate. For instance, Shaikh Yusif al-Qaradawi, one of the leading reformist thinkers, argued that al-Wasat was a way to break the isolation that the government imposed on the Islamic movement. "I fear that the Islamic movement constrains the liberal thinkers among its children and closes windows of renewal (tajdid), interpretation (ijtihad), and stands on one side of ideas and thought while not accepting the other point of view or those holding different opinions about objectives or the means to accomplish them.” Others, such as Tawfiq al-Shawi, endorsed al-Qaradawi’s criticism and urged that rather than stifling dissent, initiatives like al-Wasat should be encouraged.[28] There is an intellectual link joining both al-Shawi and Al-Qaradawi to Sheikh Hassan al-Ashmawi, who died in 1972 in Kuwait. Al-Ashmawi had been the Ikhwan’s major link to the Free Officers, but he is remembered as an influential reformist thinker who rejected in principle the idea of religious government.

Following its first failure, the aspiring party was reorganized as the Hizb al-Wasat al-Masri (i.e., the Egyptian Center Party). Over ninety members were listed in the “new” party’s petition, of which only twenty- four were former members of the Ikhwan. The founding men and women include a number of younger professionals, teachers, students, and tradesmen. There were nineteen women listed, and a total of three Christians (‘Abd al-Karim 1998). In September 1998, this attempt to register also failed on the grounds that the new party did not contribute anything new. By June 1999, the second round of appeals ran their course.

Two years earlier, the party had filed an application with the Ministry of Culture to start a newspaper, al-Mustaqbal (The future), but the application simply disappeared into the bowels of the ministry. There has been no response whatsoever to the application.

The al-Wasat program has been published in two versions.[29] The first was authored by a leading Protestant intellectual (Habib 1996a) and the second by a former Brother and professor of aeronautical engineering at Cairo University (‘Abd al-Karim 1998). Both versions of the program are strikingly free of jargon. The program urges a modernist interpretation of Islamic law and argues that the shari‘ah should be interpreted and applied in a way that does not hinder progress. Indeed, shari‘ah is conceived as a valuable collection of flexible principles, whereas the implementation of those principles requires the crafting of laws by people. There are several novel elements of the published program. While secularism (al-’ilmaniyya) is rejected on principle, the thrust of the program is decidedly complementary to toleration, diversity, and pluralism (ta’addudiya). In particular, pluralism is understood to correspond to a society in which religion remains a fundamental component, but religious practice as well as political orientation vary as a matter of course. “National unity and religion as one unit are of extreme importance whereby each Muslim and Christian, through their own religion, would comprise this national unity. Religion is one of the strongest sources of moral commitment” (Habib 1996a, 32):

Islamic scholarship affirms that too much religion on its own does not insure justice and not enough religion does not prevent acquiring what is just. Invoking what is just in the political arena or exercising authority on behalf of a particular religious faction in a religious pluralistic country is a claim that has no judicial base. The ‘ulama emphasize that the objective of life and political participation does not come about by having too much religion but through the proper and civil behavior in order to achieve the goals and interests of the nation. With that, we emphasize that the Copts enjoy the rights of citizenship and nationality. This is an issue that is both legally and functionally decided and agreed upon without a disagreement among the nation in that regard.

The unity of religion and state is a dogmatic truth for many Islamic movements, but reformist thinkers increasingly shift from the concept of din wa dawla and emphasize that Islam is marked by din wa ‘ummah (religion and community). This is very much the focus of the al-Wasat program. In this sense, the usual Salafi focus on the period of al-Rashidun as an exemplar for contemporary Muslim societies is rejected. Thinkers such as the octogenarian Gamal al-Banna, the younger brother of the late Hasan al-Banna, are part of the tayyar. Al-Banna argues that the unity of din wa dawla was unique to the Golden Era in Islam and may not be recreated. Instead, the appropriate focus is to foster the promotion of religion and community (al-Banna 2002). What then becomes problematic is the definition of community. In the instance of al-Wasat, the community is defined inclusively so as to encompass Muslims and Christians. While secular reformers such as al-Naggar judged the party to be a significant initiative, at least a point of departure for discussion, concern remains that rather than embracing an Islamic ethos, the shari‘ah remains central in the party’s ideology (Stacher’s interview with Said al-Naggar, December 19, 1999, in Stacher 2001).

The second version of the program by ‘Abd al-Karim adds material on pluralism and representation. While substantial sections of the first program are rewritten or condensed (some general comments on freedom and human rights are omitted), the substance of the two documents is consistent. Both versions deal with widely discussed questions such as corruption and violence and both urge adherence to the constitution, free elections, and an effective parliament, concerns that link al-Wasat to a variety of opposition groups across the political spectrum. There is equal, if not greater emphasis on social justice and reducing economic inequality (during a period when the gap is actually widening). “One of the worst problems associated with unemployment is the feeling of injustice and lack of opportunity that cause depression, resentment, anger, hatred, lack of loyalty or belonging. The extravagant life lived by a certain class provokes the negative feelings of the poor and the unemployed” (‘Abd Al-Karim 1998). This signals a need to encourage charity (zakat) as a means of reducing the disparity, as well as a normative commitment to social justice that contrasts with the indifference of the government.

It is noteworthy that the role of women in society receives significant attention, and the idea that women may fill any role in the political system is remarkable by Egyptian standards. “The party emphasized the women’s equal right and equal commitment in civil and political matters.

It is therefore her right to hold any position, to vote or get elected or become a member of the parliament and to perform all public and professional functions. She is also required to commit to her participation the work force” (Habib 1996a, 58; ‘Abd al-Karim 1998, 29).

In April 2000, the government tacitly defined the boundaries of permissible opposition by permitting the establishment of an NGO (nongovernmental organization) in which many of the al-Wasat organizers were key participants. Under the terms of Law 153, since overturned, an NGO would be deemed licensed in sixty days absent an explicit disapproval by the Ministry of Social Affairs. Hence, the government permitted Misr: Lil- Thiqafa wa Hiwar (Egypt: For culture and dialogue) to emerge. A deal with the government was widely suspected, and there is certainly no reason to take seriously Muhammad Salim al-‘Awa’s claims that there is no connection between Wasat and the creation of the NGO. The new society aims to “support the culture of dialogue in a society in which violence prevails” (Cairo Times 2000). The major participants are a who’s who of respected independents, including liberals such as Atif al-Banna, editor of al-Ahram Center Strategic Report; Wahid ‘Abd al-Majid from al-Ahram; and Amani Qandil, a sui generis NGO guru and also a woman. Other members of the society include Engineers’ Syndicate member Salah ‘Abd al-Karim; author of the first al-Wasat program, Rafiq Habib; attorney ‘Issam Sultan (and, initially, chairman of the NGO); publisher Muhammad Abd al-Latif; and Abu al-‘Ala Madi. Muhammad Salim al-‘Awa, a constant intellectual presence in al-Wasat, was elected chair of the new NGO’s board at the first annual conference in May 2001 (al-‘Awa’s wife Fatima, herself a lawyer, was a founding member of al-Wasat).

Although Madi periodically declares that al-Wasat will once again apply for legal recognition, his energies and those of his colleagues appear to be largely focused on holding seminars on themes such as Islam and the West, the Islamic movement and education, or, perhaps most re- vealingly, “Professor al-Banna: Fifty Years after His Martyrdom What Remains of His Call?”

The unsuccessful attempt by Madi and his collaborators to break new political ground with al-Wasat is further unpacked in the interview vignettes that follow, each revealing a different perspective on the episode.

* The Judge

Now retired, this distinguished attorney was the chief justice of the Constitutional Court, one of two bulwarks against arbitrary rule by the state. The other is the Court of Cassation. On two recent occasions, in 1987 and 1995, the Constitutional Court ended the tenure of the parliament due to electoral irregularities or unconstitutional electoral procedures and mandated new elections.

The comments here are a composite of two interviews lasting more than four hours, one conducted in September 1999 and the other in February 2003. The judge is a contemplative and humble man. His office has none of the trappings of accumulated adulation that people of accomplishment tend to collect. His broad desk is piled high with reference works, an Egyptian text on civil society, a book on the U.S. Constitution, titles in French on free speech and assembly. He is reading a book on U.S. constitutional law, specifically First Amendment law and the right of assembly. This man loves the dignity of the law fairly administered, and he does not hide his contempt of “rubbish judges” who seek only to toe the government’s line.

One topic among many we discuss is the legal standard for the creation of political parties in Egypt. The judge’s reasoning is lucid and to the point. The people are permitted under the constitution to form associations. A political party is an association, and there is no language in the constitution that can be construed to authorize or require resort to a Political Parties Committee or Tribunal. In other words, the process that Al-Wasat has had to navigate is questionable on constitutional grounds.

As for the requirement that an aspiring party must meet a legitimate need unfulfilled by extant political parties, the judge reflects, “If a marketplace of ideas is a right, then what is the logic for this restriction? Plus, there are many different ways to reach the same aims.” To his regret, the Constitutional Court has considered this requirement to be valid. As a result, “political life is paralyzed.” Although the judge notes his conviction that the constitution protects the right of assembly, in practice the law allows any party to be barred from forming. The state imposes “undue restrictions” on political life by restricting the formation of new parties.

Legally speaking, people may gather together for political purposes even if they are not constituted in a legal party. The right to form political associations derives from the right of assembly, the judge emphasizes. Nonetheless, this is an issue that has been adjudicated on appeal by the Supreme Administrative Court in the case of Hizb al-Wasat, yet the court refused to see the clear logic of the constitution.

Before I can fully articulate the question, he anticipates it. “Why doesn’t the government open up?” “Sometimes people are haunted by fear not by hopes.” He argues that Mubarak is popular and would win a competitive election, but he is afraid of something. Mubarak believes that the answer is to be in control, to control everything. The government restricts political activity out of insecurity. “Measures are taken to tame the tiger, even though there is no tiger in Egypt.” As result, Egypt loses the opportunity to strengthen its power through democracy. “If democracy and civil society were stronger in the Middle East, the governments would be more powerful to face the USA.” This from the lips of a man who knows America well, has traveled to Washington as a VIP guest of the U.S. government, but who is pained by America’s then looming invasion of Iraq. His prime despair is reserved for his own government, which he both fears and despises. “I don’t know why some people feel safe, and we do not have that simple right. I don’t feel safe talking to you. I do not know what to do.”

* The Engineer

Al-Qasr al-Aini is a long, bustling Cairo avenue with one menagerie after another of shops, peddlers, offices, government agenices, and apartments. This is commercial Cairo, perfumed less by the scent of food and the stink of urban waste than the acrid scent of automobile exhausts. The engineer’s office is nearby a well-known pharmacy, in an apartment building that has been converted to office space. The suite is labeled “Al-markaz al-dawli lildaraasat” (the International Center for Studies) and the bustle of half a dozen clerks and assistants greets the visitor in February 2003. His is the generic office of the middle class professional. A pair of facing overstuffed chairs and a low table for water and coffee are placed in front of a desk large enough to signal that this is a man with a title, in this case, muhandis—engineer. We sit, exchange greetings, and efficiently elide into the familiar ritual of interview.

Abu al-‘Ala Madi was a university student in the 1970s in Minya, one of the upper Egyptian towns that has been a seedbed for Islamist recruitment. Like other students at Minya University, he participated in a campus Islamist group, one of many that owed their existence to Sadat’s flirtation with the Islamic right. He joined the Ikhwan in 1979, and as the Ikhwan moved into the syndicates in the 1980s, he became one of the leaders of the Engineers’ Syndicate, rising to assistant secretary general.

In one interview, Madi bluntly emphasized that his connection to the Ikhwan followed his engagement in campus politics, which had little to do with the Ikhwan either operationally or ideologically:

In order to describe the correct situation you have to know that we had an Islamic vision before we entered the Muslim brotherhood. And this point is very important. Before we were silent about this, out of courtesy and respect to the brotherhood. We remained silent when some claimed that the brotherhood were the ones who established the Islamic students’ movement in the 70s, we were silent out of respect because we later became members of the brotherhood. And the truth was that the brotherhood was completely far away and distant from this student movement. And after the Islamic factions [kawaadir] joined the brotherhood, a blending of thought took place.

And we accepted some of those ideas inside the brotherhood and rejected others. And this reaction persisted in a quiet manner but those leaderships were faced with a severe shock when we discovered the real condition of the brotherhood where we found out that the big picture we imagined the brotherhood to be was not true. And this shock kept reacting until we left the brotherhood (Madi ca. 1999)

As for the Ikhwan, there is a reform current, but the conservatives still hold sway in the leadership. While Madi claims to have very good relations with the middle leadership, where he has “secret support,” relations between him and the old guard are bad. He was taken aback by the counterattack of the old guard, which he argues is out of step with changing times. He has, of course, quit the Ikhwan.

Madi distinguishes between Hasan al-Banna's two legacies: the school and the organization: "As for the organization, it is in its worst shape due to the change in the behavioral understanding and moralities established by al-Banna. Due to the absence of freedom of expression and a freeze in the movement's intellect at the time when individual thinking and the concept of hear and obey without questioning hindered us from changing some of the teachings of al-Banna to suit our time" (Labib 1998).

He emphasizes his own links to a variety of non-Islamist intellectuals, including the lawyer 'Atif al-Banna, and several independent Muslim intellectuals, especially Muhammad Salim al-'Awa, whose wife was a founding member of the party, and Hasan Hanafi, who like al-'Awa is a respected professor at Cairo University. For the aged generation of tajdidi intellectuals, men like Gamal al-Banna, al-'Awa's name evokes enthusiasm. ("He is one of the best ones," al-Banna remarked in February 2003.) Hanafi enjoys a worldwide reputation for his prolific writings and his modernist orientation in the tradition of Muhammad 'Abduh, but his influence on al-Wasat was immanent, not strategic. In contrast, al-'Awa has lent a strong hand to the party. The party platforms are certainly consistent with his own ideas, and it is easy to imagine that he played a role in drafting al-Wasat's programmatic documents. Al-'Awa's perspective is nicely summarized in the following comment: "the problem of government resides upon two primary, complementary tenets: the belief in Divine existence and faith in individual freedom. Individual freedom must assert itself before the challenges of both the metaphysical and tangible worlds" (al-'Awa 1999).

Secularly oriented skeptics, as well as leading government officials, argue that Madi and his colleagues are simply masking their real views, namely their aim to seize power and establish a system of Islamist rule ('Abd al-Karim 1998; Abdel-Latif 1999). "We are not using taqiya," Madi insists. "We are not seeking to establish a religious party per se. We are talking about a civil party with an Islamic frame of reference We know that the hardest choice is moderation, and the easiest choice is extremism We form part of Egypt's political landscape in the coming century.”

While Nasser horribly repressed the Ikhwan, Madi, like many of his generation, reveals a wistful nostalgia for the equalitarian elements of Nasser’s programs. “The positive aspects of the Nasser era cannot be denied. Social reforms, free education and medical care allowed a new elite to emerge, one rooted in the humblest social classes” (Labidi 2002).

Simultaneously, Madi has a nuanced appreciation of the West, and like many Muslim intellectuals he was deeply impressed by the antiwar demonstrations that preceded America’s invasion of Iraq. The antiwar demonstrations in 2003 prompted him to reflect that the West is not America, and the U.S. public is not the U.S. government. He reasons that this means there must be dialogue at all levels. Madi underlines that Egypt’s relations with the United States discourage reforms, because reform would contradict U.S. interests, yet serious efforts by the United States to broker reform would be well received, he argues.

* The Party Intellectual

The son of a revered Protestant minister, the late Samuel Habib, Rafiq is one of the intellectual architects of Hizb al-Wasat, one of a handful of Christians who became founding members. His books are well known in Egypt and he has written on faith and politics, history’s legacies in Egypt, and democracy (Habib 1996b, 1996c, 1998). His office is in the headquarters of the Coptic Evangelical Organization, in al-Nuzha al-Jadida, an obscure suburb of Cairo where this interview took place on November 9, 1999. After a few moments of shared reminiscences about Reverend Habib, we launch directly into the substance of the interview.

The political problem lies with the administrative and military origins of the state. Over time there has been a decrease in the quality of political figures in the system. The country is led by a military administrator, and there is no site for real politics. The army is the source of the problem. Mubarak's only fear is that the army is not with him. He does not understand the language of reform. Habib reflects that the problem is like trying to talk about engineering to someone who only knows administration. Technical issues are reduced to management problems, which means that you never get to the root of the problem at hand:

So Egypt is left with a political system without real politics. Political space is depoliticized. After 1992 [when the Algerian Islamic Salvation Front won a sweeping electoral victory and stood on the threshold of power only to be denied by a coup], Mubarak became afraid of everything. There is no serious political thought and the government has had no real success against the opposition. Mubarak's attitude is that the Islamic parties are a threat, just as in Algeria. Thus, the Islamic movement has been suppressed and political life is frozen.

Since 1995, no new parties have been allowed, though many parties effectively exist. In fact, Islamic thinking is in flux. Hizb al-Wasat has new ideas; so does the Ikhwan. But the Ikhwan cannot deal with the emergence of the Wasat movement, so things have slowed down. In time, the fear will decline (and the old men will die) and an optimistic vision of the future would see the "silent ummah" take power from the government in a context of passive resistance. Habib argues that the successful Ikhwan businessmen, who have large constituencies, will lend their hefty weight to politics. The mentality of business is practical and the liberal wing of the business community wants a political party. Others, who are linked to the state sector, will not be enthusiastic, but an optimistic vision would point to more influence for the chambers of commerce and the power of private capital.

As for "the system," all the eggs have been put in one—reform—basket, namely, reform only within the context of state control. Habib is alluding to the discussions about Hizb al-Mustaqbal, a failed initiative to create a new party under the leadership of Gamal Mubarak, the president's son. Mubarak closed the door on this venture in 1999, perhaps after he sensed negative views emanating from the army. (Since then, Gamal Mubarak has been ensconced as chair of the NDP policy committee, and he has been warmly received on three official visits to Washington, D.C., as though he is the anointed successor to his father.)

On his role forming the Hizb al-Wasat, Habib notes that he was isolated by the move among Copts, whereas he expected to be joined by others. They need to reach more people, he notes. He observes that the first rejection noted that the party was not different from other extant parties. As for the second effort to gain recognition, which culminated in an appeals ruling on June 5, 1999, Habib argues this was handled illegally by the government. There were new ideas. Al-Wasat proposed a different government system, including two councils—one for politics, another for constitutional matters. The representatives in the council would be agents of the ‘ummah not representative of the people. The government said these were old ideas, derived from outside Egypt. They even asserted, inexplicably, that the ideas stemmed from “iqta” (feudalism).

In one of his books, al-Muqadas wa-al-Hurriyah (The sacred and freedom), Habib argues that the nation is defined by its sacred consciousness (al-muqadas) and its fixed principles (al-thawabet). The problem arises when the sulta (or authority, by which he means the government) seeks to impose beliefs (namely, secularism) by force and law. In doing so, the people’s freedom is taken away in the interests of foreign values. This leads to a situation in which groups become convinced that the only way to preserve al-muqadasat and al-thawabet is to acquire power. While people are free not to believe, not to accept the sacred truths, they may not destroy the nation and its beliefs. What is needed, he argues, is a rediscovery of the sacred and the renewal of the principles that underlie the nation. This must be done peacefully, as through parties like al-Wasat, because if it is done violently, the nation will only be weakened and will only be more vulnerable to Western interference. Egypt is a conservative society and Habib’s argument resonates with many Egyptians, whether Christian or Muslim (Habib 1998).

* The Guide

Islamic circles (nadwas) in Cairo intersect and intertwine. The interlocutor was a venerable independent thinker in Cairo, a man known for his criticism of the Ikhwan; but, knowing that an appointment with the Supreme Guide was desired, he set it up in a few hours' time. His assistant 'Adil, described warmly as a man "with one foot inside the Ikhwan and another outside it," serves as a friendly escort. The meeting is with Muhammad Ma'amoun Hudeibi, an eighty-one-year-old former judge. He has been the Ikhwan's murshid (Guide) for less than a year, though his rise to this post has been a foregone conclusion for a decade. The session is in a shabby apartment building in al-Manya, a very ordinary Cairo neighborhood. There is no doorman or policeman in sight, just a peasant woman who looks on beseechingly as we pass. Then I recall an interlude in Upper Egypt, years before in an Assiut police station, where a cast of informants, a profile of everyday Egypt, sat on narrow benches waiting to be paid. A policeman opened a desk drawer to reveal a fat pile of bank notes. Then again, this may just be an old woman.

One removes his shoes on entering the headquarters, not out of piety but respect for the premises, a common practice in old Cairo. We are ushered in to see Hudeibi almost immediately. The murshid has the physique of a snowman and the friendly smile of a grandfather.

The Guide begins by noting that Islam is belief and ritual plus shari'ah. "My religion orders me to insist that I be governed by shari'ah." But Hudeibi is intent to note that while personal status matters (such as inheritance) are fixed, and while relations between men and women are defined clearly, there are many areas where there are differences (ikhtilaf) within the Qur'an and the Sunna.

We have to be creative. "There is a difference between two hundred years ago and today." He notes that at the time of the founding of the Ikhwan only 7 percent of men were literate, and even fewer women:

Hasan al-Banna was only forty-two years old when he was martyred and he did not see his daughters grow up. We believe that women have a right to work, and to education, but they may not be forced to work. When they are married, this is an issue that is settled within the family. We recommend that children have the attention of their parents but, in fact, many women work.

“I find that eighty percent of Ikhwan are married to women who have finished their education.” Citing his own family, Hudeibi noted he had four children, all of whom are doctors. In one case, the daughter (married to an engineer) is still practicing medicine. In the other, the daughter has given up her professional work (her husband is also a doctor). “This is a family choice,” he comments.

Hudeibi notes that the husband is the head (ra’is) of the family, but when I question him on this, noting that the man might be nominal head while the wife has extensive influence, he responds with what he calls a pre-Islamic proverb from Arabia: “‘awana ammat lahu yakun ‘abdan laki” (if you are a slave for him, he will be a slave for you).

With regard to elections, “we encourage women to vote and we depend on their votes.” He stresses that “women have the right to run for election.” Hudeibi complains that were it not for the manipulation of the government in Alexandria during the 2000 elections, a sister named Jihan Khalifawi would have won a seat.

As for contemporary questions of governance for society, he emphasizes the import of shura and ‘ijma, and recalls that the first khalifa, Abu Bakr, did not force himself upon the community but was widely accepted as head of state. Applied to modern times, when literacy is much more widespread, representation requires free elections. Thus, people have the right to select the government. Principles and values determine how people vote. In contrast to questions of family law, which are more or less fixed, ijtihad suggests elections. As far back as 1936, Hassan al-Banna approved representation, but “we live in different times,” Hudeibi declares. Not only was the public less well educated, but al-Banna’s time was marked by occupation and monarchy.

The position that Hudeibi describes is an important departure from the fixed positions that prevailed for half a century until the 1980s. Hudeibi declares that “one party means dictatorship.” The hard-won lesson of the Ikhwan is that there must be a multiparty system with a turnover of representatives (“three or four year terms”) and “the will of the majority must be respected, including the peaceful transfer of power.”

The discussion then shifts to the case of al-Wasat. He listens calmly as I outline the events, more or less as summarized in this chapter. Then he responds directly: “[A]ll of the information that you have is wrong in terms of the role of the Muslim Brethren.”

The decision to form the [al-Wasat] party was not approved beforehand. As long ago as 1986 we decided to have a party. We felt that all leadership in the party should be known. We know that giving a license for a party is the will of one person [President Mubarak]. All procedures leading up to the president’s decision are just for the sake of appearance.

We knew that the president would not allow a party to be formed. Mubarak has said, “even if the Constitutional Court allows a party, I will not allow it.” We would not try to form a party because the decision would seem to be rational and fair, whereas it is the decision of one man. It leaves the deceptive impression that it is possible to form a party.

We are a political party in reality. We have our structures, we have announced policies and we are the largest party in parliament … No one said we were unethical. Hence, the issue is just applying the law to reality.

Hudeibi observes that it is natural that others will oppose the Ikhwan. “We want Muslims to have the right to practice shari‘ah.” Hudeibi recalls the parliamentary elections of 1995, when 165 Ikhwanis ran for election and not a single one won. “This event shook our confidence.” In the same year, the government was arresting brothers and sentencing them to jail terms. “People were astonished. They did not know what to do.”

“The people in al-Wasat were accused by the government of representing the Ikhwan. Some people decided to embarrass the government by claiming a party was being formed.” At the same time, he acknowledges that “within the ranks of the Ikhwan, a number of people started to ask to create a party.” He notes that there was a modified program being developed, one that kept the core values of Islam. “Always, when we see people who are enthusiastic, why not? They are our sons.”

Unfortunately, when they wrote the program we did not approve it. They took an unethical position. They communicated with other members and told people that they were acting on behalf of the Ikhwan. The murshid asked for the al-Wasat people to appear. They refused to come to the office. They went to the home of the murshid and told him that they had already written the program and submitted it to the Political Parties Committee, which [we knew] would then transmit it to intelligence. We sought to avoid guile. The murshid was shocked that seventy-five Muslim Brothers were aligned with al-Wasat. When the issue came up, especially the participation of Ikhwan, I was shocked. If you really work in politics, if you really are a politician then you have to be more professional, not amateurish. It was only by coincidence that I found out about it just before the program was submitted. If reporters had come, I would know nothing. [Hudeibi handled press relations at that time.] I took a decision to put an end to this embarrassing decision, to announce that this is a group outside the Ikhwan.

As for the al-Wasat people, Hudeibi told them:

You, if you are asked, your answer will be limited to your program, and you are not from the Ikhwan. Of course, I knew there would be talk about internal divisions. We did not want to have media looking at divisions. Unfortunately, they did talk about the Ikhwan in the press. After that, most brothers who had supported it returned to the Ikhwan when they discovered the leadership did not approve.

Reliable reports indicate that serious pressure was applied to convince al-Wasat supporters to return to the Ikhwan. “They objected to the use of their names and refused further participation. They said we are ready to do whatever you wish. We then decided to go to the Political Party Tribunal and say that the Muslim Brothers do not approve of any party. In any case, we were one hundred percent sure that the party would not be approved.” Hudeibi urged al-Wasat not to pursue an appeal. In front of the world, it would be the court that would vote against the party, whereas, in reality, it was Mubarak who vetoed the party. After the initial application was disapproved, “we were surprised to find that they had filed an appeal with the tribunal.”

“Since the people who had given names now refused, their lawyer should have said that he is representing five people.” Instead, “the lawyer said that he was representing all of the people on the list. Therefore, other people [viz, the Ikhwan] had to present their own papers.”

“We did not stand with the government. We just objected that seventy people would have their names used. We are not against any party. They were unethical.”

* The Adviser

Dr. Osama al-Baz is a thin man with a somewhat nasal voice and great power. In November 1999, I am meeting him for the third time. The interview begins punctually in the Foreign Ministry building. The spacious corner office befits one of the two or three most powerful men in Egypt. The opening comments focus on modernist trends in Islam and Al-Baz volunteers that he read al-Kitaab wa al-Qur’an (The book and the Qu’ran) by the Syrian engineer Muhammad Shahrour, which he notes was excellent. Shahrour’s rationalism appeals to established educated professionals, but few of the Islamists seem to have read Shahrour. They prefer work that is more focused on the problematics of contemporary society and politics than Shahrour’s tedious but modernist tafsir.

The conversation turns to Samuel Huntington's "clash of civilizations" thesis. Al-Baz likes Huntington's book. He especially appreciates "the acceptance of diversity," the idea that globalization is not going to erase cultural dissimilarities. He has not read the original article it seems, only the more nuanced book.

After the interruption of a phone call, marked by the use of short generic phrases intended to signal the caller that a visitor may be listening, the discussion continues and turns to Egypt. He talks about widespread complaints about deepening government corruption, even from people who are not shrill critics of the regime. He picks up on the question of decorum, not corruption. "Yes, this is very important. People must be respectable." Even as we are speaking the government is pursuing the persecution of several figures in the Islamist-aligned Labor Party, including Magdi Hussein, the editor of al-Sha'b, the party newspaper that has been doggedly attacking the then Minister of Agriculture Yusif Wali for corruption, malfeasance, and contacts with Israel. (The Labor Party has since been dismantled by the government.)

People were looking for new faces in government, but the government announced following Mubarak's reelection in September 1999 is packed with familiar faces. Al-Baz acknowledges that people feel frustrated, but he says the problem is that they themselves raised unreasonable expectations. "They were making lists of all the people they expected to see removed from the cabinet. Of course, this did not occur." What they do not realize is that some of the people they condemned were constrained in the last government. People don't realize that the ministers were often blocked. In any case, "just wait for three months," he says. "There will be very important improvement."

Although he does not mention the name of Saad Eddin Ibrahim, the activist think-tank head who created a tempest of debate by writing about discrimination against Coptic Christians, it is clear that he has Ibrahim in mind when he complains about people making broad charges of systemic discrimination. The Copts did suffer discrimination, al-Baz acknowledges, “especially in the first years following the 1952 revolution. These injustices should and must be corrected.” As for NGOs, the answer is not to engage in sweeping accusations. In his eyes, the problem lies largely with foreign-funded human rights organizations. If there are problems, he complains, these groups should identify them and they will be dealt with. Given Egypt’s dependence on U.S. assistance ($2 billion annually), it is easy to imagine that questions about Christian mistreatment would jeopardize Egypt’s standing on Capitol Hill. There is little question, based on al-Baz’s comments, that he would like to see Egyptian NGOs brought to heel. The following year, in fact, the government closed Saad Eddin Ibrahim’s Ibn Khaldun Center, and jailed Ibrahim and a score of his associates. The crackdown followed months of character assassination in the press, including accusations that Ibrahim was a spy. Only in early 2003 was Ibrahim freed from jail, after his case was overturned on appeal to the Constitutional Court, where the appeal was argued by Dr. ‘Awad al-Murr, a former president of the court.

As for the Islamists, “they want power. That is their goal.” Al-Baz recalls the earthquake of October 1992. (The earthquake killed more than 550 Cairenes.) He was in Turkey when it happened. “When there was a small earthquake here, the Islamists responded very quickly, but the government agencies were slow to react. Not surprisingly, the people said, ‘fuck the government.’ They did not do this out of the goodness of their hearts; they did it to convince people to support them so they can seek power. That is their goal.” He cites the case of Iran where the mullahs were only one of the groups that toppled the Shah, but they took over. “They want to take over.” In short, this is a zero-sum game.

As for the idea that the Islamists can form a legal party, “No way ...

I will speak to them as individuals, as I will speak to anyone, but we will not recognize them as an organization.” He gives the example of a recent funeral where he was approached by several of them, and he was willing to talk to them as individuals. On the specific case of the Hizb al-Wasat, al-Baz responds that this is just a front for the Ikhwan.

Only months before we met, there was discussion of a new party, the Hizb al-Mustaqbal, or the party of the future. Gamal Mubarak was mentioned as prospective head and al-Baz a leading member, but the possibility was squashed by no less than the president. Al-Baz dismisses these reports as rumors and emphasizes that he had nothing to do with the party. He goes on to argue that the president needs a constituency, and any new party would weaken his constituency. If President Mubarak is weakened, “what will his base be?” “I will tell you,” and he points at his shoulders, and crosses his fingers as though tracing the crossed rifles of officers’ military insignia. Even now, a half century after Lieutenant Colonel Nasser and the Free Officers rose to power, the power of the army retains a trump card. This leaves little real room for maneuver. The result is that no opposition political parties can be allowed to evolve, Islamist or otherwise.

 By Way of a Conclusion

On the face of it, Hizb al-Wasat is a case study in failure that illustrates that arduous path that any aspiring opposition group must confront in Egypt, or in many of the other authoritarian states in the Middle East.

The zero-sum mentality that often informs ruling circles permits little scope for other than decorative and tame opposition groups with narrow political bases. What is missing, alas, is reflexivity in the regime. Though some bright regime intellectuals would dearly like to see change, few new ideas bubble to the upper reaches of the regime. When new ideas do surface they are merely melded into regime rhetoric, as in 1999 when Mubarak’s embrace of “institutions” spawned momentary hope of serious reform but was quickly forgotten.

Nor is zero-sum thinking unique to those in power, as the example of the Ikhwan’s reaction to al-Wasat illustrated. In an important sense, reform needs to begin at home—namely, within the long-entrenched opposition elites who fear the dissipation of their authority and privileges.

Certainly, there has been little external pressure on the Egyptian government to embrace reform. One is left to wonder whether a well-placed nudge in 1996 might have eased the path for al-Wasat, but the focus in Western capitals at that time, and certainly in Washington, embraced static stability, not reform (Indyk 2002). Now the mood seems to have changed dramatically, spurred significantly by the horrific events of September 2001. In November 2003, President George Bush eloquently embraced the project of democratic reform in the Middle East and pointedly rejected the longstanding penchant of the U.S. government for supporting stable autocracies:

Sixty years of Western nations excusing and accommodating the lack of freedom in the Middle East did nothing to make us safe—because in the long run, stability cannot be purchased at the expense of liberty. As long as the Middle East remains a place where freedom does not flourish, it will remain a place of stagnation, resentment, and violence ready for export. (Bush 2003)

One wonders whether the embrace of democracy extends to selfconsciously Islamic groups such as al-Wasat. Important policy statements by Bush and others seem to envisage a secular model of political parties that might not only exclude the Ikhwan, but even parties like al-Wasat emphasizing the shari‘ah as a collection of principles (Powell 2002). In high profile presentations U.S. officials note warily that democratic elections will bring greater power to “parties with an Islamic character” (Haass 2003). Yet, the al-Wasat example illustrates that “parties with an Islamic character” may well invoke creative political ideas and pragmatic principles. These are parties that deserve to be embraced and encouraged, not marginalized and feared.

Al-Wasat was not a shot out of the blue, but a culmination of tajdidi trends that have been developing dramatically since the 1980s (al-Mawla 2000; Norton 2002). It is a modern manifestation of liberal Islam, but its commitment to interpret shari‘ah flexibly flows also naturally from the modernism of Muhammad ‘Abduh, almost a century ago. When he created the Ikhwan in 1928, Hassan al-Banna was more comfortable with Rashid Rida’s conservative Salafism than with ‘Abduh’s modernism. Now the paths are recrossing, as reflected even in the comments by the Supreme Guide. The emergence of al-Wasat does not mark a new azimuth as much as a new context and a new era in Islamist politics. In this sense, it is an instructive sample of modern political parties that will appear with increasing regularity throughout the Muslim world.

[24] These trends are described in a lecture broadcast on WBUR (Norton 2002a), and the contending perspectives on these trends in Islamic thinking are the subject of a Ford Foundation-funded project on Tajdid (or renewal) that the author cochaired with Bahman Baktiari in 2001. The project will resume in 2004.

[25] Four authors provide informative accounts of Hizb al-Wasat. Joshua Stacher (2001, 2002) has done yeoman service by putting together a valuable collection of factual material, as well as offering his own insights. Caryle Murphy (2002) reflects on her contemporaneous reportage of the Hizb al-Wasat and contextualizes the party in the broader Islamic debate over reform. Anthony Shadid (2001) offers crisp and thoughtful reportage, and Sa'ud al-Mawla (2000) successfully analyzes the case (in Arabic) in the broader historical context of the Ikhwan.

[26] Professor Farhad Kazemi and I collaborated on several research projects during this period, notably the Civil Society in the Middle East project at New York University, which we directed together. My conclusions from the mid-1990s reflect fieldwork that Kazemi and I conducted together, and I could not have developed some of these ideas without his inspiration.

[27] Three years after al-Wasat filed its first application, two more Islamist parties were proposed, but they had a very different pedigree from al-Wasat's. The two, respectively, were drawn from the Gama'at Islamiyya and al-Jihad, both notorious for antigovernment violence and acts of terrorism. Kamal Habib's Reform Party (al-Islah) and the Islamic Law Party (Hizb al-shari'ah) were both denied legal status in 1999 (Murphy 2002).

[28] See Islam on Line (in Arabic): [[http://www.islamonline.net/Arabic/contemporary/politic/2000/article30S.shtml][http://www.islamonline.net/Arabic/contemporary/]] [[http://www.islamonline.net/Arabic/contemporary/politic/2000/article30S.shtml][politic/2000/article30S.shtml]]. The author is indebted to Maha ‘Eid, who located some of these materials.

[29] Amani Abu-Shakra’s assistance in translating the program was indispensable, especially in those sections that stymied my ability in Arabic.

 References Cited

‘Abd al-Karim, D. S., ed. 1998. Awraq Hizb al-Wasat al-Masri. Cairo: n.p.

Abdel-Latif, Omayma. 1999. “The Hardest Choice Is Moderation.” Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo), December 16–22. ([[http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/1999/460/ramadan2.htm][http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/1999/460/]] [[http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/1999/460/ramadan2.htm][ramadan2.htm]])

Auda, Gehad. 1991. “Egypt’s Uneasy Party Politics.” Journal of Democracy 2, no. 2: 70–78.

al-‘Awa, Muhammad Salim. 1999. “A Return to the Centre.” Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo), December 9–15.

Ayubi, Nazih N. 1991. The State and Public Policies in Egypt since Sadat. Reading, Mass.: Ithaca Press.

Baker, Raymond William. 1997. “Invidious Comparisons: Realism, Postmodern Globalism, and Centrist Islamic Movements in Egypt.” In Political Islam: Revolution, Radicalism, or Reform? edited by John L. Esposito, pp. 115–33. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner.

al-Banna, Gamal. 2002. al-Islam din wa Ammah wa lisa Dinan wa Dawlah. Cairo: Dar al-Fakir al-Islami.

Bush, George. 2003. Remarks at the 20th Anniversary of the National Endowment for Democracy. Washington, D.C.

Cairo Times. 2000. “The Little NGO that Could: Members of the Would-Be Wasat Party Get a License to Form a Society.” April 13–19 ([[http://cairotimes.com/news/wasat.html][http://cairotimes.]] [[http://cairotimes.com/news/wasat.html][com/news/wasat.html]]).

Commins, David Dean. 1994. “Hasan al-Banna.” In Pioneers of Islamic Revival, edited by Ali Rahnema, pp. 125–53. London: Zed Press.

Fandy, Mamoun. 1994. “Egypt’s Islamic Group: Regional Revenge?” Middle East Journal 48, no. 4: 607–25.

Farag, Iman. 1991. “Le politique a l’egyptienne: Lecture des elections legislatives.” Monde Arabe Maghreb-Machrek 133: 19–33.

Haass, Richard. 2002. Towards Greater Democracy in the Muslim World. Washington, D.C.: Council on Foreign Relations.

Habib, Rafiq, ed. 1996a. Awraq Hizb al-Wasat al-Masri. Cairo: n.p.

———. 1996b. Misr al-Qadimah: Bayna al-taghrib wa-al-takfir. Cairo: Dar Al-Sharuq.

———. 1996c. Tafkik al-Dimuqratiah. Cairo: Dar al-Sharuq.

———. 1998. al-Muqadas wa al-hurriyah. Cairo: Dar al-Sharuq.

Hamzawy, A. 2003. “Exploring Theoretical and Programmatic Changes in Contemporary Islamist Discourse: The Journal al-Manar al-Jadid.” In Transnational Political Islam, edited by A. Karam, pp. 132–54. London: Pluto Press.

al-Hudeibi, Muhammad Ma’amoun. 2000. The Principles of Politics in Islam. Cairo: Islamic, Inc.

Ibn Khaldun Center. 1993. “Qanun al-niqabat al-Muhania al-Muhid: Yathir zuba‘a fi Fanajan.” al-Mujtama’ al-Madani, March 4–8.

Ibrahim, Saad Eddin. 1996. Egypt, Islam, and Democracy: Twelve Critical Essays. Cairo: American University of Cairo Press.

Indyk, Martin. 2002. “Back to the Bazaar.” Foreign Affairs 81, no. 1 (January-February): 75–88.

Labib, Hani. 1998. “Interview: Abu al-‘Ela Mady.” Civil Society: Democratization in the Arab World, 7, no. 82.

Labidi, Kamel. 2002. “Egypt’s Squandered Hopes.” Le Monde Diplomatique, July 11 ([[http://mondediplo.com/2002/07/11nasser][http://mondediplo.com/2002/07/11nasser]]).

Madi, Abu al-‘Ala. c. [1999]. “[Interview] la yujud lada al-ikwan rawiah siyasiah nadajah.” Al-Ahram al-‘Arabi 18.

al-Mawla, Sa’ud. 2000. Min Hasan al-Banna illa Hizb al-Wasat. Beirut: Mu’assasa al-‘Ula.

Murphy, Caryle. 2002. Passion for Islam: Shaping the Modern Middle East. The Egyptian Experience. New York: Scribner.

Neguib, M. 1955. Egypt’s Destiny. London: Victor Gollancz.

Norton, Augustus R. 2002a. “Who Speaks for Islam: A Sampling of Reformist Thinking.” Boston University World of Ideas (radio), April 10, 2002[[http://www.buwi.org/][(http://]] [[http://www.buwi.org/] [www.buwi.org/)]].

———. 2002b. “Islamic Activism and Reformism,” Current History, November, 377–81.

Powell, Colin L. 2002. “The U.S.-Middle East Partnership Initiative: Building Hope for the Years Ahead.” December 12. Washington, D.C.: Heritage Foundation.

Qutb, Sayyid. 1988. Ma’alim fi al-Tariq. Cairo: Dar al-Shuruq.

Sadat, Anwar. 1957. Revolt on the Nile. New York: John Day Co.

al-Sayyid, Mustapha Kemal. 1995. “A Civil Society in Egypt?” In Civil Society in the Middle East, edited by A. R. Norton, pp. 269–93. Leiden: Brill.

Schemm, Paul, and Simon Apiku. 1998. “The Battle of the Generations in Egypt’s Opposition.” Middle East Times, August 23 ([[http://www.metimes.com/issue98-34/eg/the_battle_of.htm][http://www.metimes.com/issue98-]] [[http://www.metimes.com/issue98-34/eg/the_battle_of.htm][34/eg/the_battle_of.htm]]).

Shadid, Anthony. 2001. Legacy of the Prophet: Despots, Democrats, and the New Politics of Islam. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

Stacher, Joshua A. 2001. “Moderate Political Islamism as a Possible New Social Movement: The Case of Egypt’s Wasat (Center) Party.” MA thesis in Political Science, American University in Cairo.

———. 2002. “Post Islamist Rumblings in Egypt: The Emergence of the Wasat Party.” Middle East Journal 56, no. 2: 415–32.

Sullivan, Denis J., and Sana Abed-Kotob. 1999. Islam in Contemporary Egypt: Civil Society versus the State. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner.

United Nations Development Program (UNDP). 2002. Arab Human Development Report. New York: UNDP Regional Bureau for Arab States (RBAS).

Wickham, Carrie R. 1996. “Political Mobilization under Authoritarian Rule: Explaining Islamic Activism in Mubarak’s Egypt.” Ph.D. dissertation in Political Science and Near Eastern Studies, Princeton University.

Zaki-,Moheb>.1995. CivilSoeiet; aıtdDemoCT0tİMtioıiiiE.g\ı{rt,l-981--1994.

Cairo: Konrad Adenauer Stiftung and Ibn Khaldun Center.

 Chapter 7: Rewriting Divorce in Egypt: Reclaiming Islam, Legal Activism, and Coalition Politics

Diane Singerman

The New Marriage Contract Initiative adopted a strategy of engaging religious discourse, based on the women's reading of their rights under the principles of Sharia. We reclaimed for the first time our right to redefine our cultural heritage, as Muslim women under the principles of Sharia. It was evident that we could not rely on modern constitutional rights of equality before the law, as these did not equally apply under Family Law, which claimed to be based on the principles of Sharia. We could not afford to shy away from the challenge and continue using solely a strategy based on constitutional and human rights. We had to prove that the religious discourse could also be used by women to defend their cause.

—Mona Zulficar, THE ISLAMIST MARRIAGE Contract in Egypt

In January 2000, after a month-long period of controversial, often vitriolic debate and media attention, the Egyptian parliament passed "The Law on Reorganization of Certain Terms and Procedures of Litigation in Personal Status Matters" (Law No. 1, 2000). Personal Status Law (PSL) regulates marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance issues, but this law only ushered in procedural changes rather than basic changes in PSL law itself. In short, this legislation was controversial because it provided a woman with the right to initiate a "no-fault" divorce against her husband, in return for giving up her financial claims upon him, including the deferred part of the dower, or mu'akhar saddaq.[30] This type of divorce is known as khul' and is religiously legitimated because of fears that a woman will not be able to “keep within the limits of the law” if she finds her husband so repulsive or incompatible. Thus, a Qur’anic verse (Surah 2:29) allows her to “give something up to her husband [the deferred dower] in exchange for her freedom” (Awde 2000, 25). Procedural changes also consolidated all disputes associated with divorce in a new Family Court system, while disallowing further appeal in khul’ divorces (reducing the period of litigation associated with divorce). The legislation also created a Sanduq al-Usr, or “Family Fund” to provide child support for impoverished families, giving authority to the government to garnish the wages of recalcitrant husbands who renege on alimony and child support. Finally, another important revision in the law provided more flexible criteria to facilitate divorce in urfi or unregistered marriages, as well as procedures for proving paternity for their offspring (Allam 2000; Shahine 1998; Ezzat 2000).

This legislation was the culmination of a fifteen-year campaign to facilitate divorce for women, orchestrated by a coalition of activists, lawyers, government officials, civic leaders, legislators, and scholars. It was but the most recent chapter of a century-long battle by women and sympathetic men to reform personal status law. The quote above, by one of the key activists in the Personal Status Law coalition, Mona Zulficar, reveals the self-conscious and strategic thinking innovative leaders developed to provide women with access to divorce. While leadership was absolutely key to the ultimate passage of Law No. 1 in 2000, along the way hundreds of meetings, interviews, conferences, strategy sessions, phone calls, lobbying efforts, and studies generated enough support across diverse constituencies for the bill to succeed.

More importantly, this coalition represented a convergence of several innovative projects within the contemporary Middle East that deserve far more attention because of the way in which they are creating new political alliances and possibilities, legitimated by an Islamic, indigenous, religious frame. These initiatives, deliberately and militantly rooted in the rule of law and sound legislative practices, may gradually be leading to the further institutionalization of democracy, while widening the spectrum of what “Islam” means to various constituencies engaged in collective action. The embrace of Islam by the PSL coalition leaves some women activists and leaders ambivalent or critical, however, because they are skeptical of the inegalitarian or patriarchal aspects of Islam. Some of these activists promote secular ideals as a solution while others promote a more progressive Islam that rearticulates fundamental concepts of belief and traditions (see Safi 2003; Ali 2003). Yet a growing number of activists in Egyptian civil society, and beyond, are making convincing popular arguments that Islam is a source of positive social and political change.

In this coalition, a divergent group of postcolonial scholars of history, law, sociology, religion, and philosophy, motivated by their professional identities and training, challenged the predominant religious discourse on women, as well as the historical record of women in the Islamic and precolonial era. They are part of a larger movement of postcolonial scholars who are reclaiming subjugated knowledge, buried and disguised or disqualified and marginalized over the centuries (Bond and Giliam 1994, 8; Foucault 1980, 78–109).

While these women are themselves the demographic and political product of an independent postcolonial Egypt that increased public education and professional opportunities for women, granted them suffrage, and encouraged them to contribute to Egypt’s development, they are nevertheless still constrained in their daily and professional lives. Women could become ambassadors, deans of Islamic philosophy, international corporate lawyers, wealthy businesswomen, leaders of organizations, scholars, and politicians, yet they still feared divorce, financial ruin, and losing the custody of their children if they worked, wanted to further their education, or traveled without the permission of their husband. Personal Status Law still allows a man to claim his wife has been “disobedient” and if she works, seeks education, or travels without his approval, he is not obligated to support her after a divorce. Thus, although much of the international and national direction of the women’s movement has been to promote female education, political rights, and equality for women, the Egyptian women’s movement and others across the Muslim world also understand the need to change the balance of power within marriage, through legal change, if they are truly to benefit from these other changes (see Sonbol 2003).

Gerda Lerner argues that although women have been enduring patriarchy for millennia, at certain moments in time the “contradiction between women’s centrality and active role in creating society and their marginality in the meaning-giving process of interpretation and explanation” encourages women to perceive deprivations that they wish to change. This “coming-into-consciousness ... becomes the dialectical force moving them into action to change their condition and to enter a new relationship to male-dominated society” (Lerner 1986, 5). The women and their male supporters in the PSL coalition not only tried to overcome the contradictions of their daily and professional lives through this campaign, but in the process they became part of a new transnational movement of Muslim intellectuals and activists that are reimagining the past and the Islamic canon, contesting dominant frames legitimated by religious authorities who often have indirect or direct ties with the more conservative Islamist groups (see Bowen; Baktiari; and Peletz in this volume).

This said, the work of the PSL coalition demonstrates that more than scholarship and ideas are needed to win a hotly contested battle where powerful constituencies have every reason to maintain the status quo. Coalitions need powerful supporters, resources, and tactical innovations to succeed, as social movement theorists remind us. “Movement entrepreneurs” not only need to motivate diverse groups to work together, but they must cast unpopular ideas in a more acceptable light, exploit political opportunities, and enlist some sector of the elite in their project (see McCarthy and Zald 1977; Tarrow 1994). This new coalition was ultimately successful because it scaled across to that part of the religious establishment that would concur with their religiously framed policies, it scaled up with political elites in the executive branch, legislators and officials in the ruling National Democratic Party, and high Ministry of Justice Officials, and it also scaled down to gain support from a variety of organizations in civil society and their memberships (see Hefner 2000, and in this volume).

This chapter tells part of the story of this coalition by exploring the innovative strategies utilized by the women’s movement in Egypt to guide the passage of important new procedural guidelines for Personal Status Law. In particular, I will highlight the prominent role of largely female lawyers, who rallied broad elite support across a number of important NGOs, the religious community, and within the government, and utilized a relatively new strategy of legal activism in the realm of administrative law to realize their objectives. A commitment to the rule of law and sound legislative practices directed the coalition to eventually take up the challenge of engineering legislative reforms of Personal Status Law through the Egyptian parliament. The unintentional consequences of this legislative initiative, which was very controversial and contested by legislators, strengthened the links and the relevance of parliament to civil society. But this case also demonstrates that working within civil society is not enough. Coalition members succeeded because they realized that they needed to play with the “big boys,” and enlist the president, the law, parliament and, most importantly, religious authorities in their campaign. We need to recognize, as Jenny White argues about the Turkish case in this volume, that meaningful change can proceed only if activists have begun to assert themselves in national politics and in legitimate arenas of political contestation. In Egypt, activists are beginning to take legislatures more seriously. They are lobbying, holding legislators accountable, and building constituent politics. Although Parliament has been constrained by authoritarian politics, the domination of the National Democratic Party, and questionable electoral practices, it is an increasingly important arena of contestation and an architect of public policy.

The coalition developed new lobbying strategies so that the legislative campaign represented a learning curve for the women’s movement in democratic and representative politics. The case also provides valuable lessons for others working for social change within the Islamic context. Of special interest is the manner in which the activists in the PSL coalition turned religion into an asset, rather than a liability, beating the religious traditionalists at their own game while engaging in civil, legal, rightful collective action that was acceptable within the constrained space of illiberal rule in Egypt. It was a campaign that could not have been successful without its Islamic frame.

 Divorce: The Egyptian Context

In Egypt, men have a unilateral right to divorce that they can exercise without being obliged to enter into a court proceeding. A woman has traditionally only been able to seek a divorce in court (tatliiq or tatfriiq) by presenting proof that her husband has “harmed” her in specific ways that qualify as grounds for divorce (desertion, imprisonment, sterility, sexual deviance, lack of financial support, “harm” due to a husband taking a second wife).[31] Most divorce cases initiated by women have languished in the courts, taking as long as eight to ten years to resolve, and husbands have had many legal and indirect ways to prolong the process, causing great anguish for the wife and often the family. Each divorce case, one study suggested, produces at least five other cases in different courts over child custody, nafaqa (financial support/alimony), obedience (ta’a), the marital abode, and dispersion of the couple’s assets and property (Zul- ficar and El-Sadda 1996, 251). In addition, due to the appeals process in Egyptian courts, some women have finalized their divorces only to have the decision reversed years later, after they have already remarried and had children. Such a reversal effectively renders the women bigamists, making them legally vulnerable in multiple ways.

Quite apart from the social costs of protracted lawsuits, the judiciary and international business interests have long expressed concern about the situation, since divorce cases and personal status disputes overwhelm the court system in Egypt’s already extremely litigious society. While caseload statistics on divorce vary, one source suggests that 1.5 million divorce cases are filed each year in a population of 64 million (Shah 2000; Hammond 2000). A quarter of a million Egyptian women visit the courts annually (Tadros 2000a; Sakr and Hakim 2001) producing a huge caseload of approximately 5 million cases before the Egyptian courts (Soliman and Saleh el-Diin 2002). One estimate suggested that in 1997, 14 million lawsuits were in the court system and only four thousand judges were available to review them.[32] Another source claimed that 12 million new cases were brought before various Egyptian courts each year, or that the number of new court cases a year approaches one per household! (Brown 1997, 189–99) The judiciary is paralyzed by these cases and the backlog they produce, and political forces have been disappointed by the lack of “judicial reform” in Egypt, which they see as an essential precondition for and component of Egypt’s growing involvement in the global economic order.

Even with the presence of these concerns, large-scale changes to personal status laws have been slow in coming. While Personal Status Law has been codified since 1929 (though a law of procedure was codified earlier, in 1897), modest reforms were achieved in 1979 and 1985 after popular controversy and vigorous debate (Brown 1996; al-Atraqchi 2992). The legal and historical dimensions of this debate are complicated and fascinating; new scholarship continues to emerge to explain the changing nature and context of this body of law and practice (see Sonbol 1996; Brown 1997; Afifi 1996; Zilfi 1997; Abu-Odeh 2992, n.d.; Ali 2993). These historical debates will barely be discussed here, but it is critical to understand that debates on personal status law since the nineteenth century have been framed around Islam, the religious community, and Westernization. At the same time, as Moors explains, family law is “central to the reproduction of the social and cultural order: it arranges for the transfer of material resources from one generation to the next (succession), it organizes the care for and socialization of the next generation (custody and guardianship), and it regulates sexual relations (marriage and its effects)” (2993, forthcoming).

The inroads of centralizing Ottoman codes and colonial, Western, secular law made religious authorities and indigenous political elites guard even more jealously the terrain of Personal Status law. While criminal and civil codes were greatly influenced by European codes, despite the abolishment of separate Personal Status courts in 1955 after the Free Officers Revolution, shari’a remained the source of law for Personal Status issues. “Bits and pieces of Western law” and interpretations from various madhahib (schools of law) were merged together to create “a new system” bundled into a “legitimate Islamic package” (Sonbol 1996, 277). This link between personal status law and religious legitimacy made changing these laws particularly difficult. And while female employment, education, and economic activity gradually improved, personal status laws remained discriminatory toward women. Furthermore, when women challenged those laws they were derided as secular, westernized, or immoral (see al-Ali 2999; Badran 1995).

 A Strategy Emerges

It was against this complex backdrop that a broad coalition formed to usher Law No. 1 of 2000 through the Egyptian parliament. From the outset, key activists recognized the importance of the challenge presented by the overtly religious basis for Personal Status Law. It was understood that if women were to change the laws, they had to formulate their legal and ideological challenge on Islamic grounds as well. Each Egyptian man, according to one key activist, walks around with a little pyramid inside of him, thinking and acting as if he is a pharaoh, and Islamic law can restore the balance in the Egyptian family that has been unfairly tipped toward patriarchy. Their position was simple: in Egypt, tradition and custom are stronger than religion, and a patriarchal Islamic tradition has deprived women of the protections and rights that Islamic law is supposed to give them. The coalition argued that Personal Status Law has already been distorted by secular, customary, Western, and Ottoman influences, and that Muslim women should reexamine the historical record of this body of law and restore the rights that Islam really affords them. Husn Shah, whose film Uridu Halan (I want a solution) brought the legal limbo of divorced women "out of the closet" and provoked widespread public debate in the 1970s, argued more recently in an interview that "people act like they understand Islam or they act like they don't, but people don't know Islam; they say we must do this and that, but really they are very selective in what they identify as Islamic." The coalition thought they might as well turn the selective interpretation of Islam to their own advantage.

The dual need to base a strategy for change on legal and religious grounds, incorporating a subtle critique of Western colonial or imperial Ottoman influences on national traditions, places this coalition within a much broader international movement of activists "reclaiming Islam." Like many of their counterparts in Morocco, Iran, Palestine, Bangladesh, India, Pakistan, or Malaysia, this coalition continued to promote a "rights discourse" but veered away from the liberal, individualistic, secular framework of feminism associated with the West and women's "liberation" (see Peletz in this volume on the efforts of Sisters in Islam in Malaysia). Rather, they utilized the sacred texts of the Qur'an, the hadith (the "sayings" of the Prophet), and Islamic jurisprudence to legitimize their actions. "Re-imagining foundational narratives" lies at the center of what Cooke calls Islamic feminism (Cooke 2001, xxv). Joining a transnational movement of women who are reinterpreting Islamic texts and traditions (Carroll and Kapoor 1996), Egyptian women have begun to legitimize their activism by studying the Prophet Muhammad's life and the women around him who were important figures in Islamic history; engaging directly in Qur'anic textual analysis, adopting a historicist perspective to critique patriarchal trends that negatively influenced Islamic traditions and texts, and reconsidering the appropriate application of the Qur'an to the contemporary situation; and finally, and most radically, engaging in ijtihad (relying on independent reasoning on issues which are not clear from the text) (Cooke 2001, 62; Abou El Fadl 2001).

Zainab Redwan, the dean of the College of Philosophy at Cairo University, Fayoum branch, member of the Shura Council (upper body of the Egyptian parliament), and scholar of Islamic philosophy, was a critically important and publicly prominent member of this coalition. As she explained, women realized that if they sought change from a religious foundation, based on religious principles, the change could not be refused. This new idea and new strategy became the grounds for a reform movement that was legitimate and far more popular, or acceptable, than earlier approaches of the women's movement (Redwan 2000). Another activist in this coalition outlined the strategy this way: "Many female elites used the rhetoric and language of fiqh discourse (the Islamic canon) in their defense of khul', as a way of preventing objections to the bill. They did this to give people 'no excuse to object' to the new law." While one can debate whether this "strategic move" was only tactical and instrumental or whether it represented a deeper commitment to Islamic tenets and values by these activists, it was indisputably a successful strategy. Hoda El-Sadda, a key activist in the coalition, professor of English literature at Cairo University and daughter of a professor of Islamic law, emphasized in her account of this coalition that she and others recognized there is a "Big Middle" of practicing Muslims in Egypt who are the majority. These women and men are ordinary, faithful people who want freedom, but they get lost between two radical poles. This silent majority, she and others believed, would welcome further freedom and opportunities for women (and men) if they were religiously legitimate.

The Personal Status Law coalition used both Qur'anic texts and hadith to legitimize the new law. Khul' is referred to in hadith collections in the story of Gamila, the wife of Thaabit ibn Qais, who went to the Prophet and explained that she simply hated her husband and could not fulfill her [sexual] obligations to him, although he was not an immoral or horrible person. The Prophet, in accordance with the Qur'anic verse, asked her to return her dower of a garden to her husband and she was divorced (Awde 2000, 25).

The coalition activists commissioned studies of the historical record of shari’a courts, marriage contracts, and divorce disputes in Egypt and other Muslim countries to understand how earlier periods had afforded women more rights, or at least more room to contest their situations, than were currently available and/or socially acceptable. Scholars met in international conferences and exchanged ideas and research, making alliances while refining and articulating their theory so it could emerge as “praxis.” By presenting the historical record of women’s greater access to divorce and the courts’ greater flexibility and more sympathetic tolerance for the dissolution of marriages in earlier historical periods, they questioned common perceptions of Egyptian “progress” and “development” over the last century (Sonbol 1996, 1995; Hanna 1995). Furthermore, they demonstrated that the historical record was diverse and complex, and argued that if women may have fared better centuries ago, then surely there was not a single, fixed, essentialist religious or legal “position” on Personal Status issues. At the very least, there was room to reinterpret their own traditions to restore the rights that women had enjoyed in earlier period of Islamic history.

 Legal Activism

Before moving to a specific discussion of the substance of changes under Law No. 1, 2000, it is important to note that this coalition could not have succeeded without the participation of trained lawyers (both women and men) and an explicit strategy of legal activism. This strategy is becoming more important as a political weapon throughout the Middle East as tentative experiences with illiberal democracy gradually yield a modicum of political space (Kienle 2001). As with many other women’s movements around the globe, the Egyptian movement faced a hostile public in a nation where women are politically and economically underrepresented. Even in this environment, the passage of the Personal Status Legislation demonstrates that “legal activism” can produce substantial change.

Useful comparisons can be made with American women and African Americans in the 1960s, and gays and lesbians in the 1970s and 1980s, who also faced overwhelming institutional, legal, and cultural discrimination and held little electoral power. With only a small elite of highly successful, experienced, professionals (particularly lawyers) to wage their battle, activists were able to effect radical change through a civil campaign that used the courts to end discriminatory laws and practices, eventually forcing legislators to enact new laws (O'Connor 1980; Mueller 1997).

In Egypt, parliamentary politics has remained very constrained by executive influence over the dominant party, the National Democratic Party (NDP). Yet despite the record of authoritarian politics in Egypt and political repression stoked by the challenge of radical Islamists, Makram-Ebeid argued recently that "the judiciary has replaced the opposition." It has been the judiciary that has issued a spate of court rulings enhancing democratization, as its decisions have reigned in executive authority and protected legislative and bureaucratic authority and procedure (2001, 7). It was the judiciary that the PSL strategically incorporated into its coalition.

The coalition's activities showed the efficacy of a legal challenge as a "rightful" form of resistance, within the bounds of law, articulated by some of the most respected members of the local legal community and state bureaucracy (O'Brien 1996). Legal challenges have been used in a variety of fashions by a wide range of political movements, from contemporary challenges to centralized communist party elites from rural Chinese villages, to the Charter 77 movement in Czechoslovakia, which demanded that the communist government in the 1980s follow its own laws. In Egypt, ironically, the success of Islamist lawyers in promoting their cause through controversial and sensationalist court cases inspired lawyers in the PSL coalition to try a similar strategy of legal activism. Resisting political authority on its own terms and grounds can offer greater protection and legitimacy to political activists, particularly in contexts where many varieties of "normal" politics are constrained by authoritarian policies and violence. It is also difficult for the government to strike out against respected members of the judiciary who may have issued decisions that the government dislikes because these same lawyers also often work on behalf of the government to mediate political conflict or represent the government before various international bodies.

O’Connor’s discussion of amicus curiae (friend of the court) litigation seems to most closely resemble the strategy used by Egyptian women activists and lawyers in the PSL coalition. In this strategy, experts submit extensive and well-reasoned amicus curiae briefs to fully inform the court of the legal challenge’s implications and validity (1980, 3). The PSL coalition’s particular legal strategy was to operate not just through the courts, but to work together in a coalition with government sympathizers and the Ministry of Justice to rewrite administrative law and personal status law. The presentation of historical, religious, and strategic arguments and evidence convinced government insiders to join their effort. This strategy of organizing “talking shows” and nadwat (seminars and conferences) encourages informal networking, politicking, and alliance-formation (Al-Ali 2000). The state regulates the establishment, finances, and activities of associations very strictly in Egypt, so that forming fluid, ad hoc, temporary “single-issue” coalitions is more appropriate and less risky (see Norton in this volume). The Group of Seven, which published a booklet in 1988 outlining women’s rights in Egypt and promoted the initial marriage contract project, is a great example of an ad hoc coalition that circumvented the lengthy, bureaucratic, and politically delicate task of building a new organization, since the main players already had a well- established associational or professional base. The negative side of “conference politics” is that discussions can alienate potential coalition members, personality and leadership conflicts can worsen, and the coalition actors may not contribute sufficient financial and organizational resources from their groups to the coalition’s goal (al-Ali 2000, 171–72; Costain and Costain 1983).

The PSL coalition began this new tack after Law No. 44 of 1979 was declared unconstitutional in 1984 due to procedural irregularities, and a largely hostile parliament refused to reinstate the controversial articles in the new Law No. 100 of 1985. In an interview, Mona Zulficar described her disappointment when the 1979 reforms were abrogated, recognizing that Egyptian men continued to benefit from a long patriarchal tradition where they simply had more control over women. Women’s advocacy and organizations needed to break that control. However, in 1984, the gains of the recent past were suddenly and easily obliterated on “procedural” grounds that were difficult to contest (and in fact, many supporters of the 1979 reforms were themselves distressed by Sadat’s abuse of executive authority). Zulficar realized that advocates could no longer take shortcuts and that they had to be “consistent” and make sound laws that could withstand legal challenges.

The women’s movement learned in the 1980s that their plans for reform were not only thwarted by traditional ‘ulama (religious scholars and jurists) from Al-Azhar university but also from what Zhegal has called “peripheral” ‘ulama, who were critical of Anwar Sadat’s supposed commitment to reconcile Egyptian law with the shari’a and who had become increasingly allied with various popular Islamist movements in Egypt. By the time the Supreme Constitutional Court declared the 1979 reforms unconstitutional after Sadat’s assassination in 1981, Islamists had gained more ground in the parliament; in an alliance with the Wafd Party, they were able to weaken the provisions of the substitute 1985 reforms.

 A New Strategy: The Marriage Contract Project

With neither a presence in parliament nor popular support for reforms, several women activists hatched a new approach that concentrated on legal and bureaucratic changes, circumventing the parliamentary process in order to avoid the vocal Islamist element. In 1985, a small group of women decided to pursue the idea of drafting a new marriage contract that would allow room for a couple to “check-off” certain voluntary stipulations. This new marriage contract, they reasoned, would replace the standard contract (unchanged since 1931) that each couple signs before the ma’zun (marriage registrar). Because the Ministry of Justice issues the standard contract (aqd al-jawaz), the coalition soon began to work with the Ministry of Justice, particularly a high-ranking official who is currently chief justice of the Supreme Constitutional Court, Fathi Naguib (see Zulficar 1999, 9). He is recognized by many activists in the coalition as one of its prime “architects” and strategists, who for a variety of reasons that are both professionally and personally motivated, believed that women should have greater access to divorce and that Personal Status Law needed substantial reform on a variety of fronts. Naguib argued:

When we assess the benefit of the law we have to consider the position of those women who were trapped either in a miserable marriage or in the vicious circle of court procedures over the years, before and after the new law. Khul' cannot be assessed through the eyes of those who suffer no problems and yet disapprove of its use by the ones who are suffering. All this results from the culture that regards women as inferior to men and not entitled to the same rights. This same culture blocked the legalisation of khul' for a long time although it is compatible with Shari'a. Islam is fair and balanced in the rights and duties it stipulates. (Sakr and Hakim 2001)

The marriage contract "project," as it was referred to by its proponents, was designed as a consciousness-raising tool. The idea was not only to educate women about rights that they were already entitled to, but also to encourage them to insert new stipulations in the contract that enhanced their power in the marriage. Activists hoped that a discussion before the marriage of each partner's expectations and registration of them in the contract would avoid problems farther down the road, and if divorce ensued, this new contract would allow women to easily extricate themselves from the marriage and avoid complicated, costly legal battles.

A small group of women, already linked by professional, political, family, educational, and economic networks, published a pamphlet in 1988 entitled the "Legal Rights of Egyptian Women in Theory and Practice." The document discussed the status of women in Egypt and the problems they faced, and made a series of recommendations, including the proposed new marriage contract. Social historians and legal historians had laid the groundwork for this endeavor by engaging in archival studies of the courts and the evolution of Personal Status Law (see Son- bol 1995, 1996; Zulficar 1999; Zilfi 1997; Hanna 1995). They then networked with other activists, academics, and lawyers to ensure that their efforts would not be summarily rejected by their traditional antagonists: the religious establishment, Islamist groups, and a government that abhorred public controversy.

The religious justification for the project was clear: throughout Islamic history, from its very beginning, women have included conditions in their marriage contracts that have been widely recognized as legitimate, if at times uncommon. The most famous historical example is the marriage contract of Sakina, the daughter of Hussein ibn 'Ali Talib, who stipulated conditions in her marriage contract that her husband could not restrict her freedom, could not marry another woman, and could not prohibit her from attending poetry and literary salons (Zulficar and El-Sadda 1996).

The new draft marriage contract included a “recommended” list of conditions that would be part of the contract and simply “checked” if mutually agreed upon. These recommendations included the couple’s agreement on the possession of the furniture in case of divorce, and the inclusion of the bride’s rights to education, to work, and to travel without her husband’s permission. The bride could also stipulate that she retained the right to divorce herself in her “hand” (‘isma bi-iidiha). One study suggested that only 325,000 women out of 18 million women of marriageable age in Egypt had included this right to divorce in their marriage contracts (Ezzat 2000, 43). If a woman stipulates this right in her marriage contract, it does not cancel the man’s right to unilateral divorce, but only facilitates the divorce procedures for wives since it alleviates the wife from the burden of proving legal “harm” before a court (Zulficar and El-Sadda 1996, 253). The second relevant clause in the list of recommendations that had a central role in the PSL coalition’s eventual, and successful, legislative strategy, was khul’ divorce. Many other Arab and Muslim countries have historically allowed khul’ and ‘ibraa’ divorces, but these have necessitated gaining the consent of the husband (Welchman 2000; Moors 1995; Haeri 1990; and Mir-Hosseini 1999, 1993).

While activists worked closely with religious authorities, lawyers, professors of Islamic law and philosophy and government officials to promote this new marriage contract, the project itself was eventually postponed, for three reasons. First, activists realized that even if these conditions were legally accessible to any woman, social convention still prevented women from using them. These new conditions in the marriage contract were only voluntary, and if it was scandalous actually to utilize them, then immense political capital and strategic efforts would be wasted on only a few women. The vast majority of Egyptian men would never accept these conditions, and even if a groom might consider them, their families (who are intimately involved with, if not orchestrating, their marriages) would not allow it, since they invest huge financial resources in a marriage.[33] As one ma’zun working in Imbaba (a poor area of Cairo) argued, “No man who deserves to be called a man can accept this: a woman to decide for him or to divorce him” (Ezzat 2000, 43).

Second, many women’s groups and activists objected to including a right of work, education, and travel for women in the marriage contract, because they believed they were already protected under the Egyptian constitution’s protection of equality and they did not want to be party to weakening their claim to formal legal authority under national and international law, particularly the U.N. Convention on Eliminating Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), which Egypt signed in 1981.

The third reason that the coalition abandoned the Marriage Contract initiative was the largely negative nature of the public discourse surrounding it, particularly from conservative religious forces. By 1991, the Ministry of Justice and Fathi Naguib had already become deeply involved in the project and revised the recommendations for the new contract. Supporters of the project had received tentative positive responses to the basic model of the new marriage contract from some religious authorities; the Grand Mufti, Shaykh Mohamed Sayed El-Tantawi, approved the third draft of the marriage contract. Despite his approval, others criticized it, and some who approved of the religious legitimation for the new contract still opposed it on other grounds. For example, after fierce attacks by more conservative ‘ulama both inside and outside of Al-Azhar, the Shaykh al-Azhar, Gad al-Haqq, rejected the marriage contract idea—not on religious or legal grounds, but because he argued it would discourage marriage between young people and cause social problems (Zulficar 1999, 9).[34] The support for the project was waning as opposition to it arose from various quarters.

 Scaling Up: A Turn toward the Legislative and Executive Branches

By 1993, preparations were already under way for the 1994 U.N. Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) to be held in Cairo. In Egypt, Aziza Hussein, a longtime activist, sociologist, and head of the Family Planning Association (and also a relative of Mona Zulficar’s) was chosen to head the National Preparatory Committee for NGOs for the ICPD. Informants suggest that she ran the forum in a very inclusive manner, encouraging activists and their organizations to cooperate and strategize cooperatively about promoting their agenda before the ICPD and the Egyptian government.

The Egyptian government was pleased to have Cairo chosen as the site of the ICPD and saw this conference as an opportunity to play a leadership role in the international community. At the same time, it wanted to counter the image in the West that Egyptian women were oppressed. The forum created a Gender Equality Committee, which organized symposiums and commissioned a number of legal and social studies, eventually embracing the new marriage contract as its own. One study demonstrated that most men and women were not aware that including stipulations in the marriage contract was legitimate under shari'a principles (Zulficar and El-Sadda 1996, 255–59). It is at this juncture that the "social imaginations" designed for the marriage draft law project were appropriated for a larger, more ambitious project (Zakaria 2002). As one activist explained, "Women thought law—wow! We should target the Personal Status Law itself, but that was too big of a project and perhaps we should begin with something small, with which we had some experience, and it was here that the procedures surrounding Personal Status Law were targeted. We really needed something that was 'doable.' Just to succeed in anything would be great, but we needed some achievable goal, some success, something concrete." A focus on procedural changes in Personal Status Law involved only administrative changes, rather than changes in the basic law, and could be "marketed" as such. It was doable, it could be historically and religiously legitimated, and at the same time, the debate and discussion that the new law would provoke could be useful as "consciousness raising."

Although the new marriage contract project was not abandoned (and many of its provisions were eventually included in the new marriage contract issued by the Ministry of Justice in June 2000), the focus of the coalition turned toward rewriting the procedural regulations for Personal Status issues (Leila 2000). New support came from a very important quarter: Suzanne Mubarak, Egypt's First Lady. Partially as a response to the renewed attention on women and development sparked by the ICPD, as well as her own commitments to gender equality and development, the National Commission for Women, originally established in 1978, was revitalized in 1993 under the leadership of Suzanne Mubarak. A series of well-publicized national conferences were held in succeeding years, and this new commission embraced the procedural law changes and the new marriage contract.

This support from the First Lady was critical to the PSL coalition, providing protection and an indirect message to all other government actors that the president was behind the reform effort, and thus the campaign could now move to the parliamentary realm. Some activists critiqued the PSL coalition for being too close to the government and even condemned activists for "selling out." While it is clear that the coalition had the personal support of Suzanne Mubarak and probably the president, the First Lady remained discreetly behind the scenes. The more visible role of mobilizing supporters for the initiative was played by prominent and well- respected lawyers such as Mona Zulficar, Tehani El-Gebali, Fathi Naguib, former parliamentarian Fawziyya Abdel-Sattar, and Amira Bahieldin, as well as leaders such as Aziza Hussein and Iman Bibars, and academics such as Zainab Redwan and Hoda El-Sadda. The "liberal" Islam promoted by the PSL coalition strengthened the government's centrist position and even demonstrated to its critics in civil society that gradual change was possible if groups would only agree to work with the government, rather than against it. Yet, the organized and activist conservative religious forces had not yet finished their attack.

 The Parliamentary Surge

The ability of this coalition to weave Law No. 1 of 2000 through parliament, I would argue, represents not only a significant legislative victory but also an important learning process for women's rights activists and NGO leaders. While the coalition's gradualist approach might have frustrated many of its supporters, it carefully laid the groundwork for success by outmaneuvering and anticipating its opponents' moves and enlisting the support of the leadership of the People's Assembly and National Democratic Party. The coalition benefited particularly from Dr. Fawziyya Abdel-Sattar's leadership, since she was a respected professor of law at Cairo University, had served in the People's Assembly from 1990 to 1995, and was the first female chair of its legislative committee. This gave her essential experience and the respect of her colleagues in parliament— key attributes that the coalition was able to utilize. Abdel-Sattar argued that women, who had first entered parliament in 1975, were now becoming experienced enough to attempt such initiatives even though their members were still small and only 7 women deputies (out of 444) had won office in the last national election (Elbendary 2000a, 2000b). Most of the women in parliament remained silent on this issue, maintaining, as another activist put it, their status as "decor." But since she was no longer in parliament, Dr. Abdel-Sattar was probably more valuable to the coalition, since she could plan parliamentary maneuvers and run interference for the coalition with her former colleagues.

The bill was presented on January 16 to an unusually packed house with 70 percent of the representatives in attendance. The session was opened by Justice Minister Farouq Seif al-Nasr, who declared that “marriage should not be a prison for women, but a blessing” (Abdel Hamid 2000, 10). The Grand Imam of Al-Azhar, Shaykh Mohammed Sayed El- Tantawi, was also present; he reminded the Assembly that the bill had been thoroughly examined by the Academy for Islamic Research and that it had been approved by thirty-five of the Academy’s forty members (Atiya 2000). Despite these efforts to publicly demonstrate the ‘ulama’s support of the bill, opposition to the legislation was intense and came from a wide array of legislators. While the controlling National Democratic Party was supposed to support the legislation, most members of the party still fought it in the People’s Assembly. This legislation, according to one source, represented only the second time that the NDP seriously opposed government policy, but in the end, party discipline won the day and the bill passed by a majority. A newspaper that presents the Islamist perspective complained that “only a few members were allowed to criticize the law while the majority had to stick to the government’s position while voting” (Khalil 2002). At one point, the Wafd Party, objecting to the NDP’s attempt to limit and cut off debate and force a vote, walked out of the parliament. Since it has been increasingly aligned with Islamists, the Wafd stated it would not take part in this “crime against Egyptian society,” arguing that the legislation was contrary to shari’a, and that it would only help rich women who could afford to give up their financial claims in a divorce (Al-Abd 2000). The leader of the Wafd party, Isma’il Serag El-Din, accused the government of lying about how many members of the Academy of Islamic Research in Al-Azhar had approved the draft legislation (the government said thirty-five out of forty had; he suggested it was only twenty-three and thus not a majority) and accused the government of following improper procedures when the upper house of parliament, the Shura Council, vetted the legislation (al-Abd 2000). One column in the Wafd Party’s newspaper argued that “it is strange that the government ignored the ‘ulama and the legislators and left the task of reform to a female Egyptian lawyer,” clearly a negative reference to Mona Zulficar (al-Hayawaan 2000). In general, and along with other legislators opposing the bill, the Wafd objected to the haste with which the government guided the bill through parliament. (This is a typical ruse of the government to avoid public contestation and the limited maneuverability that the small opposition forces have at their disposal.) One member of parliament accused the Minister of Justice of implementing the law, interfering in the domain of the parliament, but of course the Minister of Justice denied the charge (Fikry 2002). The Nasserists and the Left were silent in parliament, though they ultimately supported the bill. One impassioned newspaper columnist criticized the parliament for its double standards—despite their demands to impose the shari'a and give religious authorities more political power, these same MPs attacked this legislation even though it had been vetted by the Shaykh al-Azhar and the Academy for Islamic Research. He suggested, "I fear that some of those opposed to khul' are the ones who walked the ways of corruption and escaped with what they had earned illegally [haram] and are therefore afraid that their wives would take it and go" (Hammouda 2000).

The nature of the debate was quite misogynist in tone, revealing the fear, if not terror, that many men associate with women's rights. Constant references to the fickle, impressionable, emotional nature of women, and women as betrayers (kha'iina) were made, which derided their ability to make as important a decision as filing for divorce, according to Hoda Zakaria's analysis of the legislative sessions. For example, even Dr. Aisha Rateb, the former Minister of Insurance and Social Affairs and one of the few women to reach Cabinet rank in the government, questioned the legislation, stating, "Some might say that this gives women from a certain class the right to change their husbands the same way they change their dresses. We have to make sure that this is going to benefit a lot of middle class women, and even the lower class" (Abdel Kader 2000, 3). In addition, legislators were alarmed by a provision in the bill to allow women to travel abroad without the approval of a male guardian. Resistance to this clause was so intense that it was ultimately sacrificed for the sake of compromise and the bill's passage. One member of parliament from Upper Egypt, a traditionally more conservative part of Egypt, said that male and female equality was like ignoring the differences between a turkey and a chicken. Ali Nasr, a member of parliament from Beni Suef in Upper Egypt, objected to the draft law, asserting the supremacy of men over women and citing an example from the animal world: "A rooster can have 40 hens and a lion marries more than four wives, but it has never happened that a hen married two roosters” (Tadros 2000b). Saad Eddin Ibrahim suggested that “the fears of the Sheikhs [and parliamentarians] is nothing but classical authoritarian Masculine fear from the partial equality that is advocated by the new law” (2000). Fayda Kamel was one of few women parliamentarians who spoke up on behalf of women. She reminded her male colleagues about the vital roles that women played at the birth of Islam, when they served in battle, yet their position had deteriorated since then and change was needed.

Fathi Surour used the derisive descriptions of women as an excuse to halt debate on the bill, arguing that parliament should not be in the business of “punishing” women. Closing off debate certainly enhanced the bill’s chances to survive a vote. As another concession to mollify the bill’s critics, a clause was written into the procedural law that mandated a twomonth period to reconcile the couple with the aid of court-appointed social workers and family representatives. If the couple had children, mediation would be mandated for a four-month period. While divorce would not be immediate, Law No. 1 did not allow any appeal for khul’ divorce.

Clearly, the most vociferous attacks still came from diverse groups inside and outside the religious establishment, despite the long history of Al-Azhar’s involvement with this project and coalition. Members of parliament looked to their allies among the ‘ulama to sanction their critiques and tried unsuccessfully to send back the legislation to the Academy of Islamic Research, an official body within Al-Azhar University, for further study. Although information about some of the details is contradictory in the press, the publication of a “Manifesto” by “High Ranking ‘Ulama from Al-Azhar” laid out a complex rationale to reject the draft law. It was published as a letter to President Mubarak and suggested that the government was rushing through the legislation; it claimed that “khul’ is not supported by evidence from God’s book, from the sunna or from the Islamic schools of law”; it argued that the irrevocable nature of khul’ divorce and the lack of appeal was contrary to shari’a; that the law canceled the husband’s will and ignored his “guardianship” over women; and that khul’ necessitated the husband’s consent and could not be a unilateral act by the wife. Finally, the “Manifesto” linked the current Personal Status Laws to the colonial era, suggesting that this reform was similar to earlier Western manipulation of shari’a law, even if it was done in the name of religion (Al-Usbu’a 2000). One of the scholars who signed the plea, Yehya Halboush, argued that the Shaykh of Al-Azhar did not adequately discuss the law with Islamic scholars, “especially when many of the forty members of the Academy [for Islamic Research] are not shari’a experts” (Tadros 2000b). The authors of this Manifesto have a long history of critiquing both the government’s commitment to Islam and leaders among the religious establishment who have close ties to the government and are not as radical as they are (see El-Nahhas 2002; Moustafa 2000, 16; and Zeghal 1999).

There are clearly multiple claimants for religious authority in Egypt, though they do battle with vastly different war chests, supporters, and alliances. As Zaman notes, “[A]mbiguities about the place of Islam in the polity have ... contributed to strengthening the ‘ulama’s public roles” even though both the state and the ‘ulama “regularly fail to live up to the logic of their own premises” (Zaman 2002, 151; and in this volume). The PSL coalition and its project of reinterpretation of the Islamic canon is a new claimant to religious authority, but this approach can only work hand-in-hand with more traditional authorities while treading very carefully. There are others in the women’s movement who are still very skeptical of this approach, fearing it will only give more power to religious authorities. As Nadia Wassef, an Egyptian women’s activist and anthropologist argued, “You can play their game, but you’ll never win, because it’s their game” (Gauch 1998 as quoted in Pavalko 2002).

 Civil Islam in the Public Interest?

A final and more general consequence of the coalition’s activity was that women activists and some NGOs began to take parliament, legal activism, and rightful resistance more seriously. While many women’s organizations and activists felt that this law did not go nearly far enough and worried that the women’s movement had wasted precious political capital on so marginal a return, other organizations realized the potential of engaging the parliament and sympathetic legislators. Iman Bibars, director of the Association for the Development and Enhancement of Women (ADEWS), praised Mona Zulficar’s efforts to direct organizations, like her own, to lobby some legislators who were sitting on the fence. Their efforts had an effect as, eventually, more legislators supported the law, perhaps as a result of pressure from the NDP or due to these modest lobbying efforts. Iman Bibars emphasized that the experience in lobbying for Law No. 1 in 2000 was a model for successive legislative initiatives, particularly in support of the Citizenship Law that would give Egyptian citizenship to the children of Egyptian women married to foreign men. In this other struggle, which is currently winding its way in a positive fashion through the government and parliamentary arenas, ADEWS and other NGOs orchestrated a full-scale lobbying effort, sending literature, films, and constituent letters to members of parliament. They also began organizing constituents to lobby their parliamentary representatives directly, which was also a fairly new development. While it would be excessive to read too much into these parliamentary initiatives, since Egypt remains tightly controlled by its executive and its political life is still highly constrained, they remain credible examples of the possibilities for legal activism and coalition politics in Egypt. In other countries of the Islamic world, such as Jordan, it is already possible to perceive a demonstration effect from the Egyptian PSL coalition as other legislative initiatives use Law No. 1 and its provisions for khul’ as their model (Sonbol 2003).

As in all political coalitions that mobilize a considerable array of interests behind them, this campaign took advantage of a particular time in Egypt’s political, social, and demographic history. Here, it is important to recognize the fruits of the Nasserist revolution, which greatly increased public educational opportunities for all, but particularly for women. While female illiteracy rates remain almost twice as high as male illiteracy (50 percent female illiteracy, 29 percent male) younger urban women are drawing much closer to their male counterparts and 45 percent of all university graduates from nine disciplines in 1996–97 were women (Shafey 1999, 11). The push for public education in the 1950s and 1960s, as well as the opportunities for more lucrative international networking and business opportunities after Egypt opened up its economy in the 1970s and 1980s, have produced a generation of highly successful, prominent, middle-class and wealthy female leaders. Many of these women, including activists from the PSL coalition, were invited by the government and its chair, Suzanne Mubarak, to join the National Council of Women, established by Presidential Decree 90, shortly after the passage of Law No. 1 in 2000.

Tehani El-Gebali, one of the lawyers involved in the coalition, notes that 23 percent of all lawyers in Egypt are women, and some of them hold high positions in the government and the judiciary, in corporate law practices, in the media, in human rights organizations, and in civil society. A new generation of female lawyers, concerned with development and women, she argued, want to work on concrete solutions and are available as allies to the women's movement, working from both within government and civil society. As one obvious manifestation of this trend, young lawyers can now volunteer in legal literacy programs sponsored by a range of institutions or help produce pamphlets on legal literacy, such as the one on khul' in the "The A, B, [Cs] of Law" series from the Egyptian Center for Women's Rights (Mohsen and Abu al-Komsan 2000; Al-Ali 2000, 166). The role of prominent female lawyers in the PSL coalition is critical to the women's movement's growing ability to engage in legal activism through the courts and political activism in the legislature.

While women schooled in Islamic sciences are far less numerous in the coalition and among leading women activists, their knowledge of Islamic law and tradition means that they are nevertheless essential players in the coalition. They provide the expertise to argue about the space within Islam for women's rights and can, more importantly, defend their rationale in front of the well-organized and more traditional conservative religious forces and political groups who use their notion of Islam for quite different ends. Very slowly, women are also entering the ranks of Al-Azhar jurists and have begun to participate in councils such as the Dar Al-Ifta' which issues fatwas, or religious opinions (Abou Bakr 2002).

The same forces represented in the PSL coalition are now attempting to push the envelope of legal reforms and administrative changes in other ways in Egypt. Another provision of Law No. 1 in 2000 was to consolidate all cases related to divorce and place them in a new Family Court. While the court has yet to be established as of early 2003, activists had suggested that this might be the first court where female judges would be appointed. There were no female judges in Egypt, though they preside over courts in many other Arab and Muslim countries. In January 2003, however, Tehani El-Gebali became the first female judge, appointed not to the Family Court but to the highest court in Egypt, the Supreme Constitutional Court, where her PSL coalition ally Fathi Naguib serves as the Chief Judge (Leila 2003). Their interaction in the coalition was no doubt germane to El-Gebali's appointment, which was warmly welcomed by the government, the women's movement, and international human rights and women's organizations.

Despite this appointment, the courts still remain a somewhat hostile environment for women seeking a khul' divorce. Recent studies of the implementation and consequences of Law No. 1 are disquieting, since they describe the sexism and bias of many judges toward women. In some courts, particularly in rural areas, judges have put pressure on women to withdraw their khul' cases by suggesting that they will have to give their husbands the deferred dower, return their shabka, generally increasing their financial losses beyond the intention of the law (Soliman and Saleh el-Diin 2002).

Social movement theorists underscore the importance of the link between identity and activism (Melucci 1995). They note that submerged networks of people from different communities can utilize "weak ties" to build a new sense of identity as well as their own capabilities to enact change. It is always easier to build movements among people who know each other as long as they bring their communities and networks into the mix. Knowing someone engaged in activism is the clearest route to involvement (see McAdam 1988; McAdam and Paulsen 1997; and Melucci 1995). At the same time, activists' commitments are reinforced by their own sense of self, and in the case of the PSL coalition, it is largely the professional commitments of activists that motivate them. In other words, there is a strong link between their professional identity and their role as activists. They are only doing what they have been trained to do: moving into higher and higher ranks of law, development, the academy, and parliament, for example. This coalition thrived on these weak ties, reinforced by the commitments of the scholars to public education, by the historians' motivation to set the historical record straight, by the philosophers' need to reaffirm the equity and equality of Islam, and by the lawyers' commitment to the rule of law and its transformative potential. Islamist politicians use the slogan "Islam, huwwa haal" (Islam is the solution) for their political agenda in elections, and the PSL coalition seems to have been inspired by it, as they used Islam as a solution to their problems. The lessons of politics that direct activists to seize new opportunities and imagine a different order can be drawn from anywhere, but within the Islamic world, Egypt and the PSL coalition may serve as a successful model, whose modest aims and innovative legitimating strategy to improve the power and position of women finally prevailed.

 Notes

This research is based on fieldwork in Egypt that included elite interviews and the collection of primary and secondary source materials in English and Arabic during October 2002. I am greatly indebted to the following people for their candid and insightful analysis: Dr. Fawziyya Abdel-Sattar, Nehad Abu al-Komsan, Dr. Iman Bibars, Tehani El-Gebali, Heba Raouf Ezzat, Mohammed Hakim, Dr. Mona Makram-Ebeid, Dr. Mustapha Kamel al-Sayed, Dr. Maye Kassem, Dr. Zainab Redwan, Dr. Hoda El Sada, Atef Shahat Sayed, Husn Shah, Azza Soliman, Dr. Hoda Zakariyya, and Mona Zulficar. In addition, I am deeply appreciative of the research assistance of Dina Bishara from the American University in Cairo, Seda Demiralp and Nida al-Ahmad at American University in Washington, D.C., and Shimaa' Hatab from Cairo University, as well as to Leila al-Atraqchi for generously sharing information with me. Finally, I would like to acknowledge my collaboration with Dr. Barbara Ibrahim and support of MEAwards from the Population Council in Cairo for a related project on the costs of marriage in Egypt and the support and comments of Robert Hefner and other participants in the "Civic Pluralist Islam: Prospects and Policies for a Changing Muslim World" project, funded by the Pew Charitable Trusts.

[30] Typically, a divorced woman is entitled to whatever property she brought into the marriage as well as the mu'akhar saddaq, or the deferred part of the dower that is stipulated as a payment to the wife in the advent of divorce or death of the husband (Welchman 2000, 247).

[31] According to the 1979 Personal Status Law reforms, orchestrated through a coalition of women and the leadership of Jihan Sadat, a wife would have the automatic right to divorce when her husband informed her of his intent to marry a second woman. However, Law No. 100 in 1985 forced a wife to prove “harm” before a court from the second marriage in order to gain a divorce (Al-Atraqchi 2002).

[32] Interview with Atef Shahat Sayed, American University in Cairo, October 2002.

[33] The national cost of marriage in Egypt, according to a 1999 survey, equals four and a half times per capita GNP (gross national product) or $5,957 (Singerman and Ibrahim 2001, 92).

[34] The Shaykh al-Azhar, Gad al-Haqq, had by this time grown more critical of the President’s policies and the Egyptian government’s position at the United Nations’ International Conference on Population and Development. He had allied himself with some of the more activist radical ‘ulama and against the Mufti, Shaykh El-Tantawi, whose fatwas legitimated controversial government policies. The former Mufti is now the Shaykh al-Azhar himself, which has ushered in warmer relations between the government and Al-Azhar, thereby setting the ground for the passage of Law No. 1 in 2000 (Zeghal 1999, 388; Moustafa 2000, 13).

 References Cited

al-Abd, Sharif. 2000. “Munaqashat fii Jalsa Maglis al-Sha’b” (Conversation in the parliamentary session). Al-Ahram, January 26.

Abdel Hamid, Mohammed. 2000. “Preliminary Approval for Personal Status Draft.” Cairo Times, January 20–22: 3.

Abdel Kader, Sayed. 2000. “Qanun al-Ahwaal al-Shakhsiya al-Jadud Bayn Al-Mar’at wal-Rajul” (The new personal status law between women and men). Akbar Al-Yom, January 17, 3.

Abou Bakr, Omaima. 2002. “Gender and Islamic Texts.” Paper presented at the Annual Meeting of Middle East Studies Association, Washington D.C., November 25.

Abou El Fadl, Khaled. 2001. Speaking in God’s Name. Oxford: OneWorld Publications.

Abu-Odeh, Lama. n.d. “Egyptian Feminism: Trapped in the Identity Debate.” Manuscript.

———. 2002. “Legislating the Family in the Arab World.” Paper presented at the Annual Meeting of Middle East Studies Association, Washington D.C., November 24.

Afifi, Mohamad. 1996. “Reflections on the Personal Laws of Egyptian Copts.” In Women, the Family, and Divorce Laws in Islamic History, edited by Amira El Azhary Sonbol, pp. 202–18. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Ali, Kecia. 2003. “Progressive Muslims and Islamic Jurisprudence: The Necessity for Critical Engagement with Marriage and Divorce Law.” In Progressive Muslims: On Justice, Gender, and Pluralism, edited by Omid Safi, pp. 163–89. Oxford: OneWorld Publications.

al-Ali, Nadje. 2000. Secularism, Gender, and the State in the Middle East: The Egyptian Women’s Movement. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Al-Atraqchi, Leila. 2002. “The Women’s Movement and the Mobilization for Legal Change in Egypt: A Century of Personal Status Law Reform.” Ph.D. dissertation. Department of Humanities. Concordia University, Montreal, October.

Allam, Abeer. 2000. “Urfi Delivers the Goods, at Half Price.” Middle East Times, February 18.

Atiya, Ahmed. 2000. “Arba’in Min ‘Ulama’ Al-Azhar Yu‘akidunn al-Khul’ Qunbila Mawquta Tuhadid Binhiyar al-Buyut” (Forty Al-Azhar scholars confirm: Khul’ is a time bomb, which threatens the destruction of homes). Ahrar, January 28.

Awde, Nicholas, ed. 2000. Women in Islam: An Anthology from the Quran and Hadiths. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Badran, Margot. 1995. Feminists, Islam, and Nation: Gender and the Making of Modern Egypt. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Bond, George C., and Angela Giliam, eds. 1994. “Introduction.” In Social Construction of the Past, edited by George C. Bond and Angela Giliam, pp. 1–22. New York: Routledge.

Brown, Nathan J. 1997. The Rule of Law in the Arab World: Courts in Egypt and the Gulf. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1996. Women and Law in the Arab World. Unpublished paper ([[http://www.geocities.com/nathanbrown1/WomenLaw.htm][http://]] [[http://www.geocities.com/nathanbrown1/WomenLaw.htm] [www.geocities.com/nathanbrown1/WomenLaw.htm]]) (visited May 1, 2003).

Carroll, Lucy, and Harsh Kapoor. 1996. “Talaq-i-Tafwid: The Muslim Woman’s Contractual Access to Divorce. An Information Kit.” Women Living under Muslim Laws, London.

Cooke, Miriam. 2001. Women Claim Islam: Creating Islamic Feminism through Literature. New York: Routledge.

Costain, Anne, and Douglas Costain. 1983. “The Women’s Lobby: Impact of a Movement on Congress.” In Interest Group Politics, edited by Allan Cigler and Burdett, pp. 191–217. Washington D.C.: Congressional Quarterly Press.

Elbendary, Amina. 2000a. “A Voice of Their Own.” Al-Ahram Weekly, October 19–25[[http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2000/504/el2.htm][(http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2000/504/el2.htm)]](visited December 3, 2001).

———. 2000b. “The Meaning of Success.” Al-Ahram Weekly, November 23–29 ([[http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2000/509/eg4.htm][http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2000/509/eg4.htm]]) (visited December 3, 2001).

Ezzat, Dina. 2000. “Sacred Knots and Unholy Deals: The Road towards ProWomen Legal Reform in Egypt.” In No Paradise Yet, edited by Judith Mirsky and Marty Radlett, pp. 39–60. London: Panos/Zed Press.

Fikry, Zakariyah. 2002. “‘Udwa Bi Majlis al-Sha‘b Yatahim Wizarat al-‘Adl Bi Tabakh Qanun al-Khul‘ wal-Wizara Tatabara’” (A member of Parliament accuses the Minister of Justice of Passing the Khul’ Law: The Minister declares his innocence). Al-Wafd, April 23.

Foucault, Michel. 1980. “Two Lectures.” In Power/Knowledge: Selected Interviews and Other Writings, 1972–1977, edited Colin Gordon, pp. 78–108. New York: Pantheon Books.

Gauch, Sarah. 1998. “New Views of Islamic Law Elevate Women: Cairo.” In “Where Women Stand (Part 5): Around the World, Women Find Very Different Roads to Wider Rights,” by Linda Feldmann, Christian Science Monitor, July 22, 1–9.

Haeri, Shahla. 1990. “Divorce in Contemporary Iran: A Male Prerogative in SelfWill.” In Islamic Family Law, edited by Chibli Mallat and Jane Connors, pp. 55–69. London: Graham & Trotman.

Hammond, Andrew. 2000. “Personal Status Law Not a Personal Choice.” Middle East Times, January 21 ([[http://metimes.com/2K/issue2000-3/eg/personal_status_law.htm][http://metimes.com/2K/issue2000-3/eg/personal_]] [[http://metimes.com/2K/issue2000-3/eg/personal_status_law.htm][status_law.htm]]) (visited November 18, 2002).

Hammouda, Adel. 2000. “Al-Khul‘ Qanun Li Tahrir al-Rajul Aydhan” [Khul’ is a law for the emancipation of the men too]. Al-Ahram, January 8.

Hanna, Nelly. 1995. “Marriage and Family in Seventeenth-Century Cairo.” In Histoire Economique et Sociale de l’Empire Ottoman et de la Turquie (13261960): Actes du Sixieme Congres International tenu a Aix-en-Provence du 1er au 4 Juillet 1992, edited by Daniel Panczac, pp. 349–58. Paris: Peeters.

al-Hayawaan, Muhammad. 2000. “Kalimat Hub” (A word of love). Al-Wafd, January 24.

Hefner, Robert. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Ibrahim, Saad Eddin. 2000. “The Masculine Mentality and the Personal Status Law.” Civil Society: Democratization in the Arab World 9 (February).

Khalil, Ashraf. 2000. “Majlis al-Sha‘b Yabsum ‘Ala Ta‘dilat al-Hukuma Lil Qanun Mutajahilan Tahdhirat Mukhalafatahuw Lil Shari‘a Wa ‘Adham Dusturiyatahu” (The People’s Assembly rubber-stamps the government’s revisions to the law, ignoring warnings of its violation of Shari’a and its unconstitutionality]. Al-Shaab, January 14.

Kienle, Eberhard. 2001. A Grand Delusion: Democracy and Economic Reform in Egypt. London: I. B. Taurus.

Leila, Reem. 2000. “The Terms of Engagement.” Al-Ahram Weekly 484, June 1–7.

———. 2003. “A Family Affair.” Al-Ahram Weekly 621, January 16–22 [[http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/print/2003/621/fe1.htm][(http://]] [[http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/print/2003/621/fe1.htm][weekly.ahram.org.eg/print/2003/621/fe1.htm]]) (visited January 18, 2003).

Lerner, Gerda. 1986. The Creation of Patriarchy. New York: Oxford University Press.

Makram-Ebeid, Mona. 2001. “Egypt’s 2000 Parliamentary Elections.” Middle East Policy, June, 41.

McAdam, Doug. 1988. Freedom Summer. New York: Oxford University Press.

McAdam, Doug, and Ronnelle Paulsen. 1997. “Specifying the Relationship between Social Ties and Activism.” In Social Movements: Readings on Their Emergence, Mobilization, and Dynamics, edited by Doug McAdam and David A. Snow, pp. 145–58. Los Angeles: Roxbury Publishing.

McCarthy, John, and Mayer Zald. 1977. “Resource Mobilization and Social Movements.” American Journal of Sociology 82:1212–41.

Melucci, Alberto. 1995. “The Process of Collective Identity.” In Social Movements and Culture, edited by Hank Johnston and Bert Klandermans, pp. 41–63. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Mir-Hosseini, Ziba. 1993. Marriage on Trial: A Study of Islamic Family Law. Iran and Morocco Compared. London: I. B. Tauris.

———. 1999. Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate in Contemporary Iran. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Mohsen, Ahmed, and Nehad Abu al-Komsan. 2000. Al-Khul' Wa Ahkam Ukhra (Khul' and other rulings). Egyptian Center for Women's Rights A B Law Series. Cairo: Egyptian Center for Women's Rights.

Moors, Annelies. 1995. Women, Property, and Islam: Palestinian Experiences, 1920–1990. Cambridge University Press.

———. 2003 (forthcoming). "Public Debates on Family Law Reform: Participants, Positions, and Styles of Argumentation in the 1990s." Journal of Islamic Law and Culture.

Moustafa, Tamir. 2000. "Conflict and Cooperation between the State and Religious Institutions in Egypt." International Journal of Middle East Studies 32:3–22.

Mueller, Carol. 1997. "Conflict Networks and the Origins of Women's Liberation." In Social Movements: Readings on Their Emergence, Mobilization, and Dynamics, edited by Doug McAdam and David A. Snow, pp. 158–71. Los Angeles: Roxbury Publishing.

El-Nahhas, Mona. 2002. "Defying Al-Azhar." Al-Ahram Weekly, August 29-September 4 [[http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2002/601/eg3.htm][(http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2002/601/eg3.htm]]) (visited September 5, 2002).

O’Brien, Kevin J. 1996. “Rightful Resistance.” World Politics 49:31–55.

O’Connor, Karen. 1980. Women’s Organizations’ Use of the Courts. Washington, D.C.: D.C. Heath and Company.

Pavalko, Rima. 2002. “Within Borders: Transnationalism and Women’s Rights in the Middle East.” Paper presented at the Annual Meeting of Middle East Studies Association, Washington D.C., November 24.

Redwan, Zainib. 2000. “The Islamic Treatment of Problems in Marital Life.” In Personal Status in Egypt: A Study of the Legal and Social Dimension of the Procedures of Personal Status Law, edited by Leila Abdel Gouad and Muhammed Hakim, pp. 111–14. Cairo: National Center For Sociological and Criminological Studies.

Safi, Omid, ed. 2003. Progressive Muslims: On Justice, Gender, and Pluralism. Oxford: OneWorld Publications.

Sakr, Hala, and Mohamed Hakim. 2001. “One Law for All.” Al-Ahram Weekly 523, March 1–7 ([[http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2001/523/sc1k.htm] [http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2001/523/sc1k.htm]]) (visited January 5, 2003).

Shafey, Halla, ed. 1999. “Gender and Development 2—Gender Statistics.” Vol. 2.

In Gender and Development: An Information Kit for Egypt, 5 vols. Cairo: DAG Sub-Group for Gender and Development.

Shah, Hosn. 2000. “Si Al Sayed Ya‘tarid Ala Al-Qanun Al-Jadid” (‘Si El Sayed’ ... Objects to the new law!). Akhbar Al-Yom, January 9.

Shahine, Gihan. 1998. “The Double Bind.” Al-Ahram Weekly 397, October 1–7.

Singerman, Diane, and Barbara Ibrahim. 2001. “The Costs of Marriage in Egypt: A Hidden Dimension in the New Arab Demography.” In “The New Arab Family,” edited by Nicholas Hopkins, Cairo Papers in the Social Sciences, (Spring/ Summer): 80–117. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press.

Soliman, Azza, and Azza Saleh el-Diin. 2002. “Critical View from the Inside of the Law on Khul’.” Paper presented at the conference “Reaping What You Sow: Two Years after Khul’,” Center For Egyptian Women’s Legal Assistance, Cairo, October 22.

Sonbol, Amira El Azhary. 1995. “Modernity, Standardization, and Marriage Contracts in Nineteenth-Century Egypt.” In Histoire Economique et Sociale de l’Empire Ottoman et de la Turquie (1326–1960): Actes du Sixieme Congres International tenu a Aix-en-Provence du 1er au 4 Juillet 1992, edited by Daniel Panczac, pp. 485–96. Paris: Peeters.

———. 2003. Women of Jorcan: Islam, Labor, anc the Law. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

———, ed. 1996. Women, the Family, anc Divorce Laws in Islamic History. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Tadros, Mariz. 2000a. “One Step Forward, a Hundred to Go.” Al-Ahram Weekly 464, January 13–19 ([[http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2000/464/spec1.htm] [www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/2000/464/spec1.htm]]) (visited December 3, 2001).

———. 2000b. “Roosters’ Wrath.” Al-Ahram Weekly 465, January 20–26 ([[http://www.weekly.ahram.org.eg/2000/465/eg4.htm] [www.weekly.ahram.org.eg/2000/465/eg4.htm]]) (visited January 5, 2003).

Tarrow, Sidney. 1994. Power in Movement: Social Movements, Collective Action, anc Politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Al-Usbu’a (Egypt). 2003. “A Manifesto by High Ranking ‘Ulama from Al-Azhar: The Law Does Not Comply with Sharia and We Ask President Mubarak to Postpone Its Issuing.” January 17.

Welchman, Lynn. 2000. Beyonc the Coce: Muslim Family Law anc the Shari’a Juciciary in the Palestinian West Bank. The Hague: Kluwer Law International.

Zakaria, Hoda. 2002. “Khul’: Its Legal and Social Dimensions.” Paper presented at the conference “Reaping What You Sow: Two Years after Khul’,” Center For Egyptian Women’s Legal Assistance, Cairo, October 22.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim. 2002. The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custoci- ans of Change. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Zeghal, Malika. 1999. “Religion and Politics in Egypt: Al-Azhar, Radical Islam, and the State.” International Journal of Miccle East Stucies 31:371–99.

Zilfi, Madeline C. 1997. “We Don’t Get Along: Women and Hul Divorce in the Eighteenth Century.” In Women in the Ottoman Empire: Miccle Eastern Women in the Early Mocern Era, edited by Madeline Zilfi, pp. 264–96. Leiden: Brill.

Zulficar, Mona. 1999. “The Islamic Marriage Contract in Egypt.” Paper presented at the International Conference on the Islamic Marriage Contract, Harvard Law School: Islamic Legal Studies Program, Cambridge, January 29–31.

Zulficar, Mona, and Hoda El-Sadda. 1996. “Hawl Mashru’ Tatawiir Namuzhij Aqd al-Jawaz” (About the project to develop models of marriage contracts). Hagar: On Women’s Issues 3–4:251–59.

 Chapter 8: Empowering Civility Through Nationalism: Reformist Islam and Belonging in Saudi Arabia

Gwenn Okruhlik

A Moment of Opportunity: Finding Civility in Crisis

The politics of Islam and reform in Saudi Arabia generate enormous interest. Though its internal landscape is rich with nuance, one would think otherwise when viewed through the lens of the mainstream narrative within the United States in the aftermath of September 11, 2001. This narrative has not always been helpful because much of it merely skims along the surface of Saudi Arabia’s political waters, which is a mistake. Internal contests are not simply about a choice between revolutionary theocracy and royal absolutism. Political struggles are more complex than that, reflecting a large and diverse population. My purpose here is to look more deeply at the internal context of Saudi Arabian politics to better understand the roots and repercussions of Islamist dissent there.

It is a time of serious ferment in Saudi Arabia. This has been a turbulent year of petitions presented to the Crown Prince, shootouts throughout the country, protests in the streets of Riyadh, a new dialogue of tolerance among people who usually do not even acknowledge one another, massive arrests, and the discovery of arsenals of weapons in every nook and cranny of the country. Political, economic, and social problems in the country have provided a fertile field for dissent; it can no longer be “managed” from above. If problems are addressed in a meaningful manner, the attraction of the radical flank of Islamists is likely to diminish in the presence of credible alternatives. If serious structural reforms are not implemented, the call from the most radical flank will almost certainly find an audience among the population. This is a defining moment, and the task is not an easy one. It is incumbent upon the al-Saud to accept political expression that is critical and vibrant in order to provide an alternative to the militants. In this time of ferment, political space and voice must be given to social forces that are reformist in nature.

Many Saudi Arabians hope that the tragedy of September 11 accelerates meaningful and difficult domestic reforms. The country faces formidable challenges, all of which have been further complicated by the war in Iraq. Internally, the country must implement serious reforms in politics, economics, and social relations, reforms that have been studiously avoided for two decades. Grievances include authoritarianism, maldistribution, and exclusion. Externally, Saudi Arabia also faces challenges from the United States and United Kingdom for allegedly funding terrorism, from global capital interests to throw open its economy, and from transnational groups that seek to promote human rights.

More than anything, the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon prompted a period of intense and critical self-scrutiny in the kingdom, with Saudi Arabians confronting the harsh reality that many of the hijackers came from within their own borders. As ordinary Saudis and prominent spokespeople alike turn their attentions inward, this is an opportunity to redefine the contours of what it means to be a good Muslim in Saudi Arabia. This is a “moment” for believers in civil, tolerant Islam to assert their positions in national debates. It is, after all, the Islam of millions of Saudis.

 Promoting Reform without Backlash

Contentious social and political voices resonate in Saudi Arabia because the exclusionary structure of governance does not reflect the reality of a diverse population. From above, the sprawling religious and political bureaucracies do not represent the heterogeneity of ordinary Saudis, but the hegemony of an empowered minority. From below, there is precious little room for social forces to organize, debate, or contest the state. In between, the old social contracts that implicitly linked ruling family to citizenry are now deemed irrelevant. All of this is further complicated by demographic, economic, and social problems. For two decades, there has not existed a safe political space for civil Islam to assert itself or selves.

Crown Prince Abdullah, the de facto ruler of the country, must contain the radical religious right as he simultaneously institutes reform. This is key. He must move quickly enough to satisfy the many disgruntled elements in the country, yet with enough sensitivity to prevent a far-right backlash and thereby enhance the power of the religious extremists. This is no easy task given that the al-Saud historically based their right to rule largely on Islamic legitimacy. Indeed, the al-Saud walk a fine line: pushing the religious right too far may destabilize the regime, but not pushing at all will surely do so. [35] Even a hereditary monarch must respond to the contests among different domestic constituencies that seek to influence national policy. But Abdullah also has competitors within the ruling family who seek to stave off reform, cater to the religious right, and contain his power.

The social carriers and the cultural resources that could promote civil Islam permeate the country. The problem is that civil Islam is not politically empowered. The carriers must be politically and institutionally empowered. A fruitful way to do this is to thoroughly integrate civil Islam into the debate over “who we are” so that civility is part of the newly emerging, but still embryonic, national identity that is taking shape. I address this opportunity for “scaling up and across” in the conclusion to this chapter. First, however, I explain the relationship between religion and state, and how a very narrow practice of Islam became empowered in the first place. Political debates must be understood within their fuller context.

 The Myth of Homogeneity

The central developmental challenge in Saudi Arabia is that the exclusionary structure of governance does not incorporate the diversity of the population. Contrary to popular images, Saudi Arabia is not a homogeneous country in religion, ethnicity, or class. Saudis are not all tribal, Najdi, rich, male, and “Wahhabi.”[36]

* Religious Practice

The vast majority of the Saudi population is Sunni Muslim. But the plurality of Sunni religious practice, while long denied, is rich, including mainstream Hanbali, Wahhabi orthodoxy, Maliki, Hanafi, and Shafi’i. There are Sufi communities throughout the Hejaz. The largest Shi’a community is in the Eastern Province, but there are other Shi’a communities in Mecca and Medina. The southern region of Najran is overwhelmingly Ismaili. The challenge is not, as many Westerners believe, to promote tolerance for Christianity in Saudi Arabia. The first challenge is to promote tolerance for non-Wahhabi Muslims in Saudi Arabia. The problem is that only Wahhabis have been rewarded with institutional and bureaucratic positions of authority. This very narrow, and often intolerant, practice of Islam dominates the public discourse even as private practice is diverse. Islam will continue to be a part of private and public life in Saudi Arabia. The key to reform is an emphasis on a more tolerant, plural Islam. Wahhabi doctrine will continue to be important among parts of the population, but if alternative political space grows, Wahhabism may return to private socioreligious expression rather than the explicitly political manifestations of recent years.

* Ethnicity

Despite increasing internal mobility, the different regions of Saudi Arabia are still characterized by ethnic distinctions among local populations. The population and economy of the Eastern Province have for centuries been related to merchant activities, and later to the oil industry, as families from Iran, Bahrain, and India migrated to the east with work. Concomitant with this, Shi’i religious affiliation is prominent in the east, unlike in the rest of the Sunni affiliated country. In the west, the Hejaz is noted for a multiplicity of ethnic identities for two reasons: a long history as the center of commerce and as the site of the annual religious pilgrimage, the hajj. Families that came to the region to perform religious rituals stayed over and established thriving businesses. Some of the most prominent Hejazi families are from Persia, Indonesia, India, or other Arab states. In addition, there is a notable and fairly cohesive Hadrami community in the Hejaz, originally derived from the Hadramawt region of Yemen. In the southwest of the country, the Asir region shares more in common culturally, ethnically, geographically, and architecturally with the neighboring state of Yemen than with others parts of Saudi Arabia. Finally, the central region, the Najd, is home to many indigenous tribes. It was less common for foreign families to settle in the heartland than in the coastal regions and as such, the Najd remained insulated from migration flows for a longer period of time. This rich ethnic diversity is permeated as well by distinctions and barriers between people of tribal and nontribal lineage. Of course, approximately one-third of Saudi Arabia's total population is foreign labor, made up of people from diverse ethnic and national backgrounds.

* Class

There are also new class distinctions among the Saudi population. Historically, class lines were clearly demarcated—between citizen and foreigner. The underclass was composed of the millions of foreign laborers imported to staff the oil-driven economy. Today, however, there is poverty among Saudi citizens. Crown Prince Abdullah's now famous walk through impoverished slums of Riyadh in November 2002 was the first public acknowledgment of the breadth of the problem. This poverty is coupled with significant cuts in state subsidies for many basic goods, subsidies upon which Saudis rely. Unemployment is high and sustained.

This complex diversity of people must be incorporated into governance. This means that men and women, rural and urban, rich and poor, bureaucrats and shop owners, Shi'a and Sunni (of all practices), and people from all the regions of the country must be represented in government, in the economy, and in the sprawling religious bureaucracy. The regime in Saudi Arabia must respond to multiple domestic constituencies—Islamists, women, the unemployed, intellectuals, nationalists, and business people, many of whom have competing interests. How did such a richly diverse country come to empower a very narrow strand of religion?

 Contextualizing Islam: Power, Religion, and State

The foundation on which contemporary political contests rest did not form suddenly. The al-Saud base their contemporary claim to legitimacy on the success of military conquests in the 1920s and 1930s and on their alliance with religious authorities. They rule in an uneasy symbiosis with the clergy. This relationship dates back to the 1744 “alliance” between Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab and Muhammad ibn Saud, a sort of merger of religious legitimacy and military might that has been lionized in the country’s civic mythology. The descendants of al-Wahhab, now known as the al-Shaykh family, still dominate the official religious institutions of the state. But Islam remains a double-edged sword for the Al-Saud. It grants them legitimacy as protectors of the faith, yet it constrains their behavior to that which is compatible with religious law. When members of the family deviate from that straight path, they are open to criticism, since the regime’s “right to rule” rests largely on the alliance with the al-Wahhab family.

Today, the “alliance” between the regime and official clergy is much contested by dissidents because the parties no longer serve as “checks” on each other. The official clergy are said to be dependent upon the Al-Saud for their existence. They regularly issue fatwas (religious judicial opinions) that justify the policies of the al-Saud in Islamic vocabulary, even when such policies are deplored by the people. Although the ruling family still needs the legitimation conferred by the clergy, the clergy have become subservient and bureaucratized in the last twenty-five years.

Resentment of abuse of state authority has long simmered just beneath the surface in Saudi Arabia, but the regime has historically been denounced only in private conversation, with criticism rarely erupting into public confrontation. But two important historic moments of opposition provide striking parallels with today’s Islamist opposition movement: the 1929 Ikhwan rebellion and the 1979 seizure of the great mosque in Mecca. In both instances, the Islamic legitimacy of the al-Saud family was seriously challenged by movements that emanated from the heartland of their traditional support, the Najd. This meant that both movements were composed of “Wahhabis,” who follow a particularly austere and puritanical belief system.[37] In both uprisings, opposition was justified because the regime deviated from the straight path of the Qur’an and Sunna. Corruption was a common theme, as was dependence on the West.

During the conquests of the peninsula in the early part of the twentieth century, the founder of Saudi Arabia, Abdulaziz, depended on the formidable fighting force of the Ikhwan, tribal muwahhidun warriors, to extend the borders of his kingdom. When the strength on which he had depended turned against his leadership, Abdulaziz crushed the Ikhwan as a military force at the Battle of Sabalah in 1930. Nearly fifty years later, in 1979, Juhaiman al-Utaibi and his followers forcibly took control of the sacred mosque in Mecca in an effort to topple the ruling family. He was the grandson of an Ikhwan warrior; his charges against King Fahd of corruption, deviation, and dependence on the West echoed his grandfather’s charges against Abdulaziz. Al-Utaibi did not garner much popular support because he chose a holy venue rather than a palace, but the incident exposed the vulnerability of the regime. It took several weeks and the assistance of French special units to root the rebels from the mosque.

 Resistance and the Empowerment of the Religious Right

There are deep historic roots to the empowerment of the religious right, but the contemporary turning point was 1979. The takeover of the Great Mosque was coupled with other tumultuous events. The Islamic Revolution in Iran had just toppled the shah’s government and initiated new institutions in the country. The long-oppressed Shi’a minority in the Eastern Province of Saudi Arabia organized open demonstrations (known as the intifada, or uprising) in the streets of several towns. The confluence of these three important developments led to greater surveillance over the populations, more power for the mutawwa (a sort of “police” responsible for enforcing public virtue), new constraints on mobility and expression, and simultaneous promises of reform.

The panicked response of the regime produced two decades of political paralysis in the country. The regime responded first by executing the rebels and then by instituting ever-tighter controls over social and political life in the country. Since they had been accused of deviating from Islam, the regime sought to justify itself by allowing the religious right ever more maneuver in Saudi life. Rather than confronting the religious right, King Fahd wrapped himself ever more securely in the mantle of official Islam, changing his title from Your Majesty King Fahd to Custodian of the Two Holy Cities, King Fahd. He sought to bolster the legitimacy of the ruling family by appropriating the power of Islam. Religious educational institutions were funded throughout the country, even during the oil bust of the mid-eighties when other projects were scaled back. There were new restrictions on women's mobility and employment. Women covered more, ventured forth less, and were prohibited from appearing in newspapers or on television. Gender segregation was profound and enforced in public. There were "men" and "family" sections established in restaurants and parks. The black paint that had covered the windows of girls' school buses had been removed in the mid-seventies, but the windows were repainted after 1979. Women were barred from their old jobs in shops and salons. Scholarships for women to study abroad were severely cut back. The mutawwa were granted more leeway in their oversight of behavior in the public realm. Tiny shops and fancy malls closed tightly several times a day for prayer. Music could be played only in the privacy of homes. The heavily censored media became a mouthpiece for the government. Always and everywhere, the mutawwa were ubiquitous. A narrow and intolerant interpretation of Islam dominated the national discourse. Sulaiman al-Hattlan explained: "Different groups ended up competing with fundamentalists over who can appear more conservative in the public eye." After 1979, only one very particular practice of Islam was empowered. Excluded from public discourse were the many Sufi, mainstream Sunni, and Shi'i populations.

During the 1980s, an expanded Islamic education system fostered a new generation of sheikhs, professors, and students. The regime sought to legitimate itself during hard times by binding religion and state institutionally. Imam Mohamed bin Saud University in Riyadh, the Islamic University in Medina, and Umm Al Qura University in Mecca continued to grow even as other programs were cut back. By 1986, over 16,000 of the kingdom's 100,000 students were pursuing Islamic Studies. By the early 1990s, one-fourth of all university students were enrolled in religious institutions. They had ideas and resources: intellectuals, computers, fax machines, libraries and everything necessary for mobilization. This generation of students serves as bureaucrats, policemen, mutawwa, shari’ah (religious law) judges, or preachers in some of the twenty thousand mosques in the country.

An Islamic resurgence swept the country during the 1980s. It was not about politics nor was it directed against the regime. This resurgence was about private belief systems and the comprehensive message of Islam. Several nonviolent, nonpolitical Islamist groups took root during this time. The embrace of Islam that they advocated was about a spiritual awakening. They were not formal organizations but they did inculcate a sense of group identity. What began as small closed circles grew gradually into large loose underground groups. The resurgence was also propagated by the newly returned Arab Afghan mujahidin (holy warriors). About twelve thousand young men from Saudi Arabia went to Afghanistan to fight the Soviets; perhaps five thousand were properly trained and saw combat. At the time, no one ever thought the mujahidin would fight their own regime; the state had supported them. All of this cultivated a fertile field for political dissent into which Islamism effectively tapped. Empowered during the 1980s, the religious right was further transformed with the Gulf War.

 Islam and the Gulf War

These developments culminated in the rise of an Islamist opposition movement during the Gulf War (Okruhlik 2003). The 1990s were a difficult decade in Saudi Arabia. Festering anger suddenly exploded with the stationing of U.S. troops in the country. Opposition groups organized domestically and abroad, most under the rubric of Islamism. For decades, there had been sporadic resistance, but with the war it changed to continuous resistance. Individuals emerged as symbols of resistance to the corruption of the al-Saud. The resistance accelerated the debates that were long under way in private. A new generation of clerics voiced strident political opinion in sermons, calling for the removal of U.S. troops and the overthrow of the ruling family. Friday sermons became an occasion for political criticism. Tapes of sermons and underground leaflets were circulated in the streets, schools, and mosques. Opposition to the presence of U.S. military bases reached a fever pitch.

Several prominent preachers were jailed. Salman al-Awdah, an influential leader in Buraydah, was arrested by police for criticism of government policy. He was forbidden to deliver sermons. In Riyadh, a popular preacher, ‘Aidh al-Qarni, was detained for criticizing the foreign military presence. Safr al-Hawali, an intellectual from Imam Mohamad bin Saud University, was harassed and eventually jailed for publicly arguing that the al-Saud had deviated from the straight path of the Qur’an and sunna. During this turmoil, Islamists charged King Fahd with deviation from the straight path of Islam. He was criticized for his personal behavior, methods of governance, domestic and foreign policies, and, of course, his decision to allow the stationing of American troops. Such criticisms echo the historic predecessors of 1929 and 1979.

Popular imams offered fatwas that effectively countered the fatwas of the official clergy. For example, when the official, state-appointed clergy issued a fatwa that justified the presence of U.S. troops in Islamic vocabulary, the popular clergy responded with fatwas that condemned the presence of U.S. troops, also grounded in Islamic vocabulary and reasoning. The popular opinions often carried more credibility than did the official opinions. The alternative clergy decried waste and imprudence in government expenditures; it highlighted the absence of a capable military despite massive expenditures on weaponry. This charge resonated among the population.

Several petitions were presented to King Fahd that demanded structural reforms in the kingdom. The very dialogue of political intercourse changed. Before the war, criticism could be offered only in private and on a one-to-one verbal basis. Now it was transformed into a public discussion—much of it written, signed, and documented. The most influential petitions were from opposition Sunni clergy. In spring 1991, religious scholars, judges, and university professors issued a petition that in strong and direct language called for a restoration of Islamic values. The petition asked for twelve political reforms, focused on the judiciary, foreign policy, a redistribution of wealth, an end to corruption, and above all, the primacy of religious law.

In September 1992, 107 religious scholars signed a “memorandum of advice (muzakharat al-nasiha) to King Fahd. He refused at first to receive the forty-six-page document. It was even bolder and more defiant than the petition drafted the previous year. Its tone was straightforward; its charges, specific. The petitioners deplored the “total chaos in the economy and society ... widespread bribery, favoritism, and the extreme feebleness of the courts”; criticized virtually every aspect of domestic and foreign policy; and demanded a more rigorous application of Islamic law. The government was shaken because the people thought to be its pillar of support had endorsed such sweeping changes. The ruling family was concerned not only by the petition’s content, but also by the very public way in which it was circulated, making the rounds of schools and mosques before the king saw it. Because it abrogated the norm for privacy in political discussion, the Supreme Council of Scholars, the elite of the official clergy, condemned the publication and circulation of the petition (but not its substance).

Pressures for reform were not limited to Sunni Islamists. Representatives of the Shi’a Reform Movement (an umbrella organization of several Shi’a opposition groups that press for the rights of the minority Shi’a community) continued to call for a consultative council that included representatives of their community. The business community submitted a so-called liberal petition that demanded structural reforms. Forty-seven women kicked their foreign male drivers out of their cars and drove through the streets of Riyadh.

 From Wahhabism to Neo-Wahhabism: The Socioreligious Becomes Political

By 1993, numerous organizations had been formed to disseminate the opposition message. Demonstrations—largely unheard of under this authoritarian regime—erupted to demand the release of the imprisoned sheikhs, the most significant occurring in Buraydah in September 1994, the very heartland of the ruling family’s support. The al-Saud regime simultaneously denied the existence of an opposition movement, co-opted semiloyalists, and initiated a massive crackdown on dissent.

Though the universities closed for much of the Gulf War, the mosques became centers of sermons, ideological debate, and political opposition. Mosques and private homes served as safe havens for opposition activists during this turmoil. In their sanctuary, people wove narratives that provided them with a vocabulary to utilize in distilling their discontent. The dominant history and prevailing ideology could be questioned in these safe spaces, and oppositional alternatives could be constructed. Social intercourse and sermons provided alternative historic narratives that made sense to people and empowered them.

Although Islam has often been used by the ruling family to bolster the prevailing order, it can also be used to oppose that order. During the Gulf War, the call to Islam was especially vibrant and empowered sympathizers. Islamists are by far more coherent, powerful, and organized than any other social force in Saudi Arabia, including those based on nationalism, liberalism, regional identity, or business activity. Islamism provided the vocabulary, symbols, and historic reference points that resonated with the population. A coherent set of ideas provides the populace with common scripts and symbols to utilize when confronting the overwhelming power of state and social institutions (Swidler 1995). Only Islamism did so in Saudi Arabia. It is the only movement able to cut across multiple cleavages there.

With the stationing of U.S. troops during and after the Gulf War, what had been an inchoate resurgence of Islam was transformed into an organized and explicitly political movement. In short, many Wahhabi believers became neo-Wahhabi activists.[38] The resurgence of Wahhabism in the previous decade was largely private, inwardly focused, and concerned with the purity of religious practice and social norms. Believers were identified by short thobes (the customary dress for men), beards, and the lack of an agal (rope) to hold their ghutra (head cloth) in place. The women of their families likely covered more and were strictly segregated, often even within the home. Now the private became public; the spiritual became political; the intrafamilial norms became enforced on others; and the individual became organized. What was an inward focus on the just believer became an outward vision of the just state and just society. The Wahhabi da'wa (call) that had been social and religious became political with the Gulf War.

The social origins of radical Islamists remains a sensitive topic within Saudi Arabia. The subject is avoided as it is potentially explosive. Some liberal intellectuals suggest privately that the members of Najdi religious groups are primarily from a nontribal (non-asil or khadiri) background.

Thus, they cannot demand things through a tribal identity, as so many others are able. But they can demand things through Islam. Islam is a protective umbrella and an equalizing force that allows them to compete with the tribes in Saudi Arabia. An observer explained: "Buraydah has too many sheikhs. So I asked myself, Where do all these sheikhs come from? These are men who needed Islam as a power base. They are khadiri. Unsure of their social roots, they seek authority and respect through Islam. Politicizing Islam gave them influence. Radical Islam has become a tribe for the tribeless."

 Possibilities for Pluralism

Believers in a civil and tolerant Islam can take advantage of the existence of multiple clergies, socioeconomic distress, and the convergence of dissent to position themselves as the voice(s) of the wide middle ground, and the future, of Saudi Arabia.

* Multiple Clergies

Historically, the king dealt primarily with the official clergy (ulama). During the Gulf War, the state-appointed official clergy were supplemented by an empowered popular-level alternative clergy that was vocal and articulate. A dissident explained: "The previous al-Saud regimes had legitimacy conferred on them by one religious establishment [the state appointed]. The regime [of Fahd], though, has two religious establishments to contend with." It is even more complicated now as Crown Prince Abdullah has the official clergy and multiple layers of alternative clergy with which to contend. The multiple clergy complicates governance for the al-Saud. The divide between official Islamic authorities and popular Islamic leaders is great. The dissident continued: “The old clergy believe that the ruler is the vice-regent of God on earth. Advice can only be given in private and in confidence. The new clergy reject the idea of vice-regency. Rather, it is the duty of the clergy to criticize the ruler and work for change.” Popular fatwas that counter the official fatwas are a means to do so.

Many Islamists argue that the official clergy should be abolished or that it should include representatives of all Muslim practice in Saudi Arabia. They advocate the existence of contending clerical voices in the country. They argue that debate would be healthy and that each believer could choose to abide by the clergy he or she considers most legitimate. The point is that the ruling family would not control the clergy through the appointment of a single nonrepresentative official voice.

The rhetoric of jihadis and of salafis does fall on sympathetic ears. Nevertheless, though zealots exist, most people long for leaders who offer them hope for the future, that have an impact on their everyday lives. It is a hope devoid of both royal and religious authoritarianism.

* Social and Economic Distress

Islamism taps into an already distressed social and economic environment. Demographic problems are well documented: high and sustained unemployment, a very high birth rate, a youth bulge, the exclusion of women, dependence on foreign labor, and declining per capita income. The economy is still overwhelmingly dependent on oil, foreign labor, and state support. It must be made more diverse, local, and private. Since the heyday of the oil boom, per capita income has plummeted by two-thirds, from about $18,800 in 1981 to $6,700 in 1995. For a long time, the birth rate was a very high 3–3.5 percent, though it is said to be declining now. There is an age bulge, with the majority of the population under fifteen. These young adults will register their demands for education, jobs, and housing at the same time. But the kingdom’s once fabulous infrastructure, constructed during the boom, is now crumbling. This is especially true in schools, hospitals, and municipal services, things that touch the everyday life of people. Unemployment in the general male population hovers around 10 percent, but it soars to around 30 percent among recent male college graduates. Yet Saudi Arabia remains utterly dependent on foreign workers, who constitute perhaps 90 percent of the private sector and 70 percent of the public sector labor force. Social norms militate against the participation of local women in many economic activities; women constitute over half of the local population. While there is a glut of university graduates, only 49 percent of the appropriate school age population enrolls at the high school level. Despite an extensive, impressive, and free public education system, 37 percent of the population was illiterate in 1995. There are reports of new social problems such as guns, drugs, and crime. Also troublesome is the apparent alienation or anomie that many young Saudis feel, made evident in rampages after football games, roaming street thugs after eid celebrations, and women being heckled at shopping malls. Civil Islamists can position themselves as problem solvers, and creators of a moral economy, an attractive option in an oil economy.

* Convergence of Dissent

Despite their very significant differences in ultimate agenda, many social sources of dissent now converge on three central points: calls for the redistribution of wealth, procedural social justice, and regime accountability — in essence, the rule of law. Thus, the state can no longer resort to its time-honored strategy of playing one group against another and thereby avoid all reform. This convergence cuts across cleavages of region, gender, class, school of Islam, ethnicity, ideology, and rural-urban settings. Private businessmen and public bureaucrats, industrialists and mom-and- pop shop owners, Islamists and secularists, Sunnis and Shi’as, men and women share core grievances. People are weary of ad hoc and arbitrary personal rule. There is a pervasive sense of frustration.

The incremental response of King Fahd to popular dissent satisfied no one. In 1992, he appointed a nonlegislative consultative council and gave more power to provincial governments, where other family members ruled. These “reforms” disappointed some and angered others. They had the effect of consolidating the ruling family’s centrality to political life, rather than broadening meaningful participation. Civil Islamists can champion meaningful and enduring reform.

 Social Opponents and Structural Obstacles to Civil Islam

The obstacles to civil society and representative governance in Saudi Arabia are many. Of course, most obvious is the rise of the jihadi movement, or the radical religious right, in the country. There are other problems as well.

First and foremost is the entrenchment of the religious right in institutional positions throughout the country. From low to high bureaucracy, from education to the judiciary to the mutawwa, the religious right is overrepresented. Certainly, the idea of having a single state-appointed ‘ulama that is granted vast authority (the official ‘ulama) stifles social and religious debate. The many layers of alternative clergy must be heard.

Second, a potential obstacle to civil Islam are power struggles within the al-Saud. The country is fortunate that Abdullah is a strong nationalist. He is also relatively unblemished by charges of deviation, and is thus able to confront, theoretically at least, the religious right. Abdullah has the personal legitimacy to reign in the radicals and initiate reform that will empower civil Islam. He has such instincts, but for now, he lacks the capability. He is hemmed in by less-reformist members of the al-Saud (such as Prince Nayef), who use the religious right to solidify their own power base in governance, and that of their sons. The intolerant right may be solidified in future succession struggles that empower less-reformist members of the al-Saud family.

Third, though the ongoing domestic debate indicates that there is indeed an important opening in Saudi Arabia, the reforms are not yet institutionalized.

In the end, this new leniency is dependent upon the person and leadership of Abdullah. He is cognizant of the importance of national development. He is also one person and is elderly. As a Saudi remarked, “We are capable of identifying the problems. But solving them will require more than a reform minded sovereign. It will require an army of reformers.” If reforms are to endure beyond Abdullah and if they are to survive extremist backlashes, then they must be given institutional grounding. Otherwise, the effort may backfire.

But institutional grounding will backfire if not accompanied by normative foundations. In short, norms must accompany forms. Norms of tolerance must be the foundation for various forms of social and political organizations. Too often, the inculcation of norms is left behind in the rush to create organizational form. For example, the current majlis Al-shura (consultative assembly) is not broadly representative, and it has no legislative power. The majlis is indicative of organizational form without a foundational norm of pluralism. In Saudi Arabia, norms of tolerance for diversity are central to the civil society project because otherwise it cannot be sustained when challenged. Diversity is the reality of the Saudi Arabia population. It must be appreciated as a strength of the nationstate rather than perceived as a threat to it.

Fourth, international imbroglios deflect attention away from pressing domestic concerns and particularly from the empowerment of civil Islam. Such things as Israeli aggression against Palestinians, the U.S.-led war in Iraq, and the incessant Saudi-bashing in the United States tend to divert energies from reform of politics, economics, and society in Saudi Arabia. Instead, such actions fuel anger and humiliation, a dangerous combination that propels young people to the jihadist cause.

Fifth, a backlash from the religious right will immediately inflict damage in two realms: the status of women and in education. Women are especially vulnerable during times of crisis, as evidenced in both 1979 and 1991. Each time there is a serious domestic or international crisis, the position of women deteriorates. Women are symbolic markers of much larger political issues in Saudi Arabia. Also, the intense international pressure for reform of the education system in the wake of September 11 (sometimes misguided) first resulted in the affirmation of the health of the current national educational system rather than renewed efforts to evaluate it.

Sixth, the unyielding pressure to join the World Trade Organization is not helpful to the development of a strong local economy at this time. The local private sector, composed primarily of small- and medium-sized businesses, will be eaten alive should unfettered foreign investment be welcomed in Saudi Arabia. They simply are not yet competitive, though vital to a vibrant civil society.

Seventh, and importantly, the religious right has an organizational base that liberals lack. Even if it is fluid, the right has leadership and organizations that allow it to promote an agenda. Their social connections, through mosque and family networks, are also stronger than the social connections of liberal reformists. The assertiveness of the religious right was long matched by the hesitancy of the liberals. Only now are the liberals beginning to coalesce and construct leadership.

Finally, a further complicating variable in the reformist movement in Saudi Arabia is that—even if they attain success in implementing social, political and economic reforms for Saudi citizens—the peculiar nature of an oil-based rentier economy means that about one-third of the total population is still left out of such reforms. The massive population of foreign laborers will remain largely unaffected by such reforms in the short term.

 Prospects for a Civil Society

The prospects for a vibrant civil society in Saudi Arabia are quite good, though it is not likely to “fit” the standard definition. Civil society is often defined in terms of voluntary associations, business organizations, labor unions, and other entities that are located between the household and the apparatus of the state. In Saudi Arabia, familial and religious networks are part and parcel of civil society and will not wither as more formal organizations take root. The rich cultural resources of Saudi Arabia—what may be called social capital—must be harnessed to nurture civil society. This means using the fluidity and strength of family and religion to construct a strong civil society, and thus a strong nation-state. Though highly patriarchal, family and religion are otherwise quite civil and tolerant.

Civil society exists in homes, mosques, and suqs (traditional markets), and increasingly in professional associations of lawyers and journalists, chambers of commerce, philanthropic organizations, universities, and the media. Many observers of the developing world believe that religious and familial (or tribal) identities threaten civil society. Such identities do not necessarily do so in Saudi Arabia because they will continue to coexist alongside newer affiliations rather than be supplanted by them. If religion and family were ever threatened in Saudi Arabia by more anonymous organizations, the backlash would be swift and sure. Some liberal Saudis report a fear of joining civil associations after the experience of Saad Eddin Ibrahim in Egypt (see the essay by Richard Norton in this volume). Whether his release emboldens people remains to be seen.

Saudi Arabia has long been an intensely private society in which behavior is severely circumscribed in order to protect the ideals of consensus and familial loyalty. Newly emerging is a small but broadening public sphere in which ideas can be traded and people can simply talk without threatening the integrity of the family unit or state. The very idea of a public space or public culture is a welcome and radical innovation in Saudi Arabia.

The Internet may ultimately be a transformational tool in Saudi Arabia but for now, it is both liberating and limited. Activists and intellectuals regularly disseminate information on a number of popular Web sites and participate in discussion groups. Chat rooms are quite popular, especially among the young. In general however, it is not distributed widely enough and it is censored, although code-breaking is a lucrative job. Users remain solitary and anonymous; many are automatically suspicious of political Web sites. The print and broadcast media, however, create a community of public discourse—citizens who share a common image or word. It may be more powerful in the near term as editors and writers continue to take risks in their work. Satellite television has clearly reinforced a pan-Arab identity among viewers and promoted a larger community of discourse. This new opening is not a direct consequence of September 11. While that may have accelerated the pace, a process of critical self-examination began unfolding in Saudi Arabia in late 1998, once Abdullah found his footing.

 Public Carriers and Sociopolitical Supports of Civil Islam

In order to promote a healthy civil society, the social carriers of civility that already exist must be empowered in institutions so they gain the confidence necessary to challenge the entrenched religious right. The social carriers of civility are already there, including outspoken journalists, women, large and small business owners who are tired of politics as usual, artists, and writers who continually push the envelope, academics who test the waters, mothers and fathers who recognize that the world of their teenagers is quite different from their own historic memory, and civil sheikhs. The key is whether the social carriers who value the norms of tolerance, criticism, and inclusion are rewarded. They also need the religio- normative backing of clergy, whether dissenting or official, to lend them social weight so they may speak out consistently and without retribution.

* Clergy

Interestingly, the clerics called “radical” before September 11 turned out to be “reformists” after September 11. For example, Sheikh Salman Al-Awdah, a fiery opposition preacher who spent five years in a Riyadh prison after the Gulf War turmoil, denounced the attacks and admonished Saudi youths against heeding calls for jihad. Rather than calling for the overthrow of the al-Saud, he now calls for “more avenues for people to express their opinions, and more opportunities available ... to engage in fruitful and constructive dialogue.” Sheikh Safar al-Hawali, out of jail for three years, also now speaks of reforming the system rather than overthrowing it. He also released a six-page, single-spaced “Open Letter to President Bush” in October 2001. To be fair, many Saudis charge that some of the former radicals turned reformists have come full circle, and are now simply co-opted by the government and have become a tool of the regime. Because some individuals appear to be opportunists, it is unclear what role they will play in Saudi political development.

The Gulf War sahwaeen[39] were bypassed by a more radical, fiery group of jihadi sheikhs including Nasser al Fahd, Ali al Khodair, and Ahmad al Khalidi, whose fatwas inspired many young people to violence. In the wake of terror, the government instituted a program to rationalize and professionalize the mutawwa and removed hundreds of sheikhs from the mosques. The government now allows the reformists in Saudi Arabia to speak with relative freedom in the media (direct criticism of the ruling family is still off limits). The al-Saud realized, too late, that exclusion promotes radicalization; inclusion may moderate political positions. For meaningful reform to blunt the call of the radical flank, it requires that the regime allow a vibrant political space to grow, a space that can be filled by tolerance.

There is much discussion about limiting the power and scope of the religious authorities in Saudi Arabia. There are people who call themselves secularists, but secular humanism, however compelling, remains for now on the fringe of the discussion. Clergy, even if circumscribed and disempowered in some activities, will continue to play an influential role in Saudi life. They cannot be ignored, as they have followers and influence. The debate over the future of Saudi Arabia is not about whether or not Islam is an important part of the country. That is an artificial argument that plays into the fears of everybody and empowers the religious right, and is disseminated by them for that purpose. There are many sheikhs and thoughtful Islamists who are not jihadi, neo-Wahhabi, or sahwaeen. The rich array of civil Islamists must be a part of the new dialogue in Saudi Arabia. The National Dialogue Forum, a state-sponsored meeting of Moslem leaders, was a first step toward tolerance, but participation must be expanded further to encompass civil Moslems who are openly critical of authoritarianism.

* Educators

Curricular reform will occur. Contrary to the wishes of some strident foreign observers, the government cannot (and should not) simply delete Islamic subjects from the curriculum. It can, however, mandate inclusion of the richness and diversity of Islam in order to promote greater social tolerance. It is also critical, in my view, that the formal curriculum be reformed so that Islam is not positioned as antithetical to the nurturing of national pride. Further, in the emphasis on curricular reform, other pressing issues are overlooked: teaching pedagogy, dropout rates, teacher attitudes, and an inadequate infrastructure. They are at least as important. Children are still taught by rote memorization and repetition rather than problem solving and creative analysis.

* Women

Changing stringent social norms that mandate gender segregation, the covering of women, and sometimes their seclusion in the domestic realm will require sensitivity and time. Abdullah, a champion of women's rights in the Saudi context, has moved cautiously to grant women a bit more mobility and a few more rights while avoiding a backlash from the religious right. After the tragic fire in a girl's school that claimed fifteen young lives, a cleric was sacked and educational bureaucracies were reorganized so that the same authority now administers both male and female education. Control over girls' education was one of the last bastions of unfettered religious authority. It may be that this incident was so heinous and indefensible that it actually provided Abdullah the space to rein in the religious right. It remains to be seen if any substantive changes follow the administrative reorganization.

Importantly, the issues that matter to Saudi Arabian women are less about covering and segregation (though still important to some) and more about equal resources in education and employment; training the next generation of girls; reining in the religious police because they degrade and humiliate women; equality in legal proceedings (e.g., appointing women attorneys to represent women clients); mandatory premarital genetic testing and counseling; and abolishing the requirement that businesswomen have a male representative (wakeel) to conduct business. Women who seek empowerment now utilize the traditional philanthropic associations (which can be quite untraditional); stipulations to marriage contracts to protect themselves; computers to bypass concerns about physical interaction; and the women's sections of chambers of commerce to network among themselves.

* Business

The mega-issues of the WTO and foreign investment opportunities do not insure a sustainable future for Saudi Arabia. More important is an emphasis on building a local private sector that is competitive. More of the economy is composed of small- and medium-size firms (70–80 percent of trading, services, and industry). They are not well represented in the chambers of commerce nor in discussion with the World Trade Organization. There are no linkages between the multisectoral megaconglomerates and the plethora of smaller businesses that are the reality of the economy. Small and medium businesses need new resources in management, technology, marketing, and financing. As is, they will be severely hit when globalization hits full force, as they are unable to withstand rigorous competition without linkages. Yet small and medium business networks are vital for building a civil society.

Further, though the fact that the chambers of commerce do not really represent “the little guy in the suq,” they are the site of the only protodemocratic elections in the country. For several years, part of each board of directors has been elected by secret ballot after contested campaigns. “Parties” declare themselves with agendas and followers. These elections are the closest that Saudi Arabia comes to the common expectations of democracy. Though friends tend to conglomerate together and the positions of some groupings are not in conflict, these bodies may represent an embryonic democratic form in an authoritarian state. Unfortunately, electoral activities were circumscribed recently.

* Intellectuals and Media

There are many Saudi journalists and writers who take risks each week to push the boundaries of permissible expression ever further. Writing from a variety of perspectives, there are many critical voices of civility and reform during a time of crisis including Mohamed al Salahudin, Jamal al-Khashoggi, Khaled Batarfi, Hussein al Shobokshi, Mansur al Nugaidan, Nawal al Yousef, Mishari Zaydi, Abdelaziz al Gassem, Jameel al Farsi, Sulaiman al-Hattlan, and Alia al Fraid. At universities, there are fewer brave voices today to speak up for civil rights because earlier they were severely reprimanded when they spoke out. If there is any silver lining to the tragedies of September 11 and the war in Iraq, it is that many Saudi scholars now also write strong articles in the local newspapers (e.g., Matrook al-Faleh, Turki al-Hamad, Fowzia Abu Khaled). There is more crossover between the universities and the media than previously. Of course, it is “safer” to speak about Palestine, the U.S., or Iraq than about local politics.

Nevertheless, in January 2003, 104 Saudis, representing different regions, occupations, and ideologies, signed a petition to Crown Prince Abdullah that sought liberalizing domestic political reforms. Within the year, the National Reform Document was followed by four other petitions to Abdullah, each seeking reform. There are new human rights groups and regionally based political groups that demand the rule of law in Saudi Arabia. Among Islamist scholars and activists, it is imperative to allow and reward the voice of tolerant, plural, reformist Islam. There must be a countervailing force to the weight of intolerant extremism that has become entrenched in institutions.

 Negotiating a Social Contract

An Irrelevant Triad

The al-Saud have historically based their “right to rule” on a triad of legitimizing factors: victory in military conquests (coercion), Wahhabism, and, much later, the distribution of oil revenues. In retrospect, we understand today that conquest bred resentment, Wahhabism never reflected the diversity of the population, and oil revenues shrank as the population mushroomed.

Likewise, the traditional social contracts (or political pacts) that Saudis refer to in conversation have lost their relevance. These are the agreements made between Abdulaziz, the founder of modern Saudi Arabia, and the Hejazi notables; between Abdulaziz and the ‘ulama of the Najd; and between Abdulaziz and representatives of major families, sects, and tribes in the eastern and southern regions. These pacts were thought to define the relationship between religion, state, and society. They protected private citizens and clergy from the reach of the state by providing a separate space for them. In the eyes of many Saudis, all three pacts have been violated. Later in the country’s development, a fourth “pact” was added to the mix, an implicit understanding that the ruling family would administer and distribute oil revenues in return for political acquiescence (though this pact was always more important to foreign theorists than to ordinary Saudis). The old triad and the old pacts are no longer sufficient to govern a complex, smart, and diverse population.

At this time, a pacted transition to civility and pluralism cannot simply be assumed. The radical religious right has far more organization and ideological attraction than any other social force. At this writing, they are the only viable alternative to the al-Saud (though the emerging coalition of reformists is gaining ground). The reverberations of the war in Iraq will surely affect the domestic struggles. If there is a pacted transition to civility, participation, and pluralism, then the radical right will diminish in its magnetism. If there is no pacted transition, then Saudi Arabians are left in the unenviable position of either an unacceptable status quo (an authoritarian ruling family) or the triumph of the radical right. The middle ground must be empowered.

A healthy civil society will have a direct and positive effect on the prospects for more representative governance. Some analysts contend that a strong civil society would oust the al-Saud family. For now, it is more likely that the al-Saud will continue in some positions of authority, but their authoritarian tendencies will be countered. Their ostentatious behavior will almost certainly be curtailed. The ruling family may continue to rule but increasingly make compromises with the demands of social forces. If the al-Saud are to retain their power, the government must become more representative and inclusive of the diversity of the population. Simply put, if the al-Saud wish to retain power, they must relinquish power. The conundrum is that if the al-Saud do allow greater diversity, the far right backlash will be difficult to counter. It is, indeed, a difficult period in national development.

While the al-Saud will likely continue as primary decision makers for quite a while, they must now bargain with civil forces over the nature and degree of representative governance. Eventually the family as a unit may serve to symbolize the unity of the nation-state while individual family members still function in government alongside other citizens. It is ironic that liberals who used to stridently criticize the ruling family (and even call for their ouster) now begrudgingly acknowledge their position, in fear of the ascent of the religious right. And it is the al-Saud who empowered the religious right!

Absent upheaval (a big assumption), the al-Saud are not going away, though they must answer to the full population in ways they have not been expected to previously. That is, if civil Islam is empowered, we should expect a transition from subjects to citizens in the coming years. It is in this transition that the voices of civil Islam can have the greatest impact. The pull of radical Islam would likely diminish in the presence of meaningful participation and reform. It is not yet clear whether the ruling family has the skill or desire to empower civil Islam in the same way that it empowered the religious right after the tumultuous events of 1979.

* What Many Saudis Want

It is not that the majority of Saudis are clamoring for full-fledged, partybased competitive electoral democracy. They are, however, clamoring for freedom of expression, freedom of assembly, and representation. They resent the exclusionary nature of governance. Toward this end, political institutions and religious bureaucracies must be reformed to incorporate different regions, ethnicities, religious branches, and both genders in order to cultivate the wide middle ground between the extremes of radical Islam and royal authoritarianism. Neither extreme reflects the aspirations of most Saudis. Ordinary Saudis want to participate in the development of their country, particularly in meeting the needs of a young, booming population for education, housing, and employment.

The turbulent debate that unfolds is over the proper relationship between state, ruling family, clergy, and citizen. This is a struggle to constitute a social contract in Saudi Arabia. What many ordinary Saudis want are a negotiation of the social contract and a definition of the rules of the game. The process is just beginning. It is a contest over the terms of “belonging” to the nation-state. The contest over the terms of the emerging social contract is mediated by region, sect, gender, age, class, and principled beliefs. The terms of the contract would be written differently by, for example, clergy, liberals, jihadis, or princes.

The new pact will require that the al-Saud broaden the basis of their “right to rule” by ensuring at least four things: the representation of divergent social forces, some form of meaningful participation, regularity and predictability in the conduct of business and politics, and the guarantee of new civil rights such as mobility, expression, and assembly. In exchange, the al-Saud retain their roles as representatives of the unity of the nation and the unity of the Islamic community (umma). The al-Saud are not irrelevant in the new pact by any stretch of the imagination. In the longer term, the contract will delineate the proper relations between religion and state, a hotly debated subject. I expect it to be more inclusive of non-Wahhabi Muslims.

 Conclusion—Scaling up and across Cultural Resources:

A National Conversation about Identity and Citizenship

Any sense of national identity in Saudi Arabia is embryonic. People have always identified themselves by other, multiple layers of identity based on region, religion, and family. With the oil boom and the influx of foreign workers in the 1970s and 1980s, “being Saudi” became defined by what it was not (a foreign laborer). Thus, identity and citizenship had a negative referent. There is now an effort to define “being Saudi” in terms of what it is, or by a positive referent.

Today—after the turmoil of 1979, the rise of the radical right in the 1980s, the politicization of Wahhabism with the Gulf War, the events of September 2001, and the war in Iraq—Saudis from all regions and walks of life are actively engaged in debate about their future. The larger debates in Saudi Arabia today are about the construction of meaning as a nation. People are talking about the terms and content of their belonging together, and about the right to talk about such sensitive topics. The contemporary debate is about what it means to "be Saudi," that is, the meaning of citizenship. What does it mean, if anything, to belong to this nation-state called Saudi Arabia? What do we share in common; why are we together? What is our relationship to the larger Arab and Islamic world? The tremendous political ferment that exists in Saudi Arabia today is part of an effort to define the proper relations between religion, state, ruling family, and citizenry.

Social forces are vibrant and engaged in Saudi Arabia. People talk passionately about religion and politics, corruption, the economy, their children not working, and the future of their daughters. It was the Islamists who began this national conversation about what it means to belong and about the relationship of ruling family, state, citizen, and religion. This is no small accomplishment in Saudi Arabia, where only a decade ago, the most controversial criticism that could be published in the papers were parental complaints about school lunches. But this conversation must occur on multiple levels between different kinds of people. There must be collaborations between state and social forces for the rich cultural resources of Saudi Arabia to be harnessed. Civility and tolerance must be "scaled up" to bridge state and society and included in any construction of citizenship and belonging to the nation-state. The Saudi Arabian case is further complicated because civility and tolerance must simultaneously be "scaled across" populations that historically do not interact much— across genders, regions, sects, tribal and nontribal, and across principled beliefs.

From this critical self-examination and debate will likely emerge a new sense of national identity. The manner in which Saudi civil Islamists assert themselves (or do not) and the coalitions they forge (or do not) will help shape the contours of this new identity. If they gain political voice and space, then the national identity is more likely to be Islamic, tolerant, plural, and representative. Though it may not be exactly democratic, it can be increasingly capable of fostering pluralist and democratic ideas. The new social contract will define the relationship between religion, state, ruling family, and citizenry.

[35] The term “religious right” incorporates two groups in Saudi Arabia; the radical, violent jihadists and the traditional state-appointed ulama (religious authorities), the very conservative men who have written many social absurdities into law and routinely write fatwas that further restrict social life. Both are religious right, and both are problematical, but they are very different.

[36] A linguistic note: “Wahhabi” seems to have taken on a hegemonic meaning in the international press that does not accurately reflect its usage in Saudi Arabia prior to September 11. Believers would never refer to themselves as Wahhabi, as that implies worshiping someone, Muhammad ibn ‘Abd Al-Wahhab, other than God. They prefer instead to call themselves muwah- hidun or ahl al-tawhid, to emphasize the centrality of monotheism, or Salafi, to emphasize the purity of their beliefs based on the precedent of the Prophet. Usually, Salafi is a broader category than Wahhabi, and the latter implies less tolerance of diversity than the former. The term “Wahhabi” was used by “liberals” in a derogatory manner, but it now appears that the word Wahhabi is entering the Saudi Arabian vocabulary and press in fairly regular usage. It does not necessarily imply links to al-Qaeda, as is often implied in Western media. It is a confusing state of affairs, as the term means different things to different people. It may be useful to think of three meanings of Wahhabism: as a religious practice grounded in time and place; as a set of social norms dominant in the Najd; and as broader political aspirations directed against the hegemony of the West.

[37] Wahhabism has existed in Saudi Arabia for centuries and is most prevalent in the Najd, the central region of the country. It is an offshoot of the Sunni Han- bali school of Islam that assumed a local specificity. Muhammad ibn ‘Abd Al-Wahhab (d. 1792) drew his inspiration from Hanbali scholars Ibn Tamiyya (d. 1328) and his disciple, Ibn al-Qayyim (d. 1350). Monotheism is carefully defined by what it is not, i.e., there is an emphasis on what actions are prohibited (haram) or bid’a (innovations). Wahhabism is opposed to extreme Sufism, saint worship, and folk religious traditions. It is exclusionary, carefully delineating boundaries that distinguish believers from others. Believers reject sectarian divisions and perceive Wahhabism as the one, true Islam.

[38] Contemporary political activists who draw inspiration from Wahhabi traditions are often referred to as either neo-Wahhabi or neo-Salafi to capture their explicitly political orientation.

[39] The sahwaeen are those sheikhs who “awoke” at the time of the Gulf War and became openly critical of the regime (e.g., al Awdah, al Hawali).

 References Cited

Okruhlik, Gwenn. 2003. “Making Conversation Permissible: Islamism and Reform in Saudi Arabia.” In Islamic Activism: A Social Movement Theory Approach, edited by Quintan Wiktorowicz, pp. 354–84. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Swidler, Ann. 1995. “Cultural Power and Social Movement.” In Social Movements and Culture, edited by Hank Johnston and Bert Klandermans, pp. 2550. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

 Chapter 9: an Islamic State is a State Run by Good Muslims: Religion as a Way of Life and Not an Ideology in Afghanistan

Thomas Barfield

Few places in the Muslim world present more paradoxes than Afghanistan. The country has one of the most thoroughly Islamic societies in the world, but has no significant institutions of Islamic learning. It has experienced failed governments driven both by radical socialists and puritanical Islamists and yet has a population that has never been moved by ideologies of any sort. It is place where the concept of Islamic politics is little debated, but only because its people assume there can be no other type. It was home for many years to Osama bin Laden's Al-Qaeda training camps, yet almost no native-born Afghans ever participated in the movement's terrorist actions abroad. It is a country that fought a ten-year jihad to expel the Soviet Union but then deserted the Islamic Taliban within weeks to support an American invasion.

One explanation for this is that Afghanistan represents an older form of Islamic society in which religion is not considered a form of ideology but remains an all-encompassing way of life. Issues that spark debate in other Islamic countries that originated in experiences of their colonial pasts, mass education, urbanization, rapid economic changes, and mass mobilization through explicitly political parties had little resonance in Afghanistan. Afghanistan was never a colony, has low levels of literacy, has an economy that is still overwhelmingly rural, and is a country where kinship and ethnic ties have always trumped political relations based on ideologies.

In this context a pluralist Islam is not likely to emerge in Afghanistan as part of a formal political structure or through an intellectual debate. It may emerge through negotiation among all the different regional and ethnic groups that are currently seeking to share power in a new government. Since each has its own variety of Islam, and the government lacks the power to define or enforce a single set of beliefs, then pluralism will be a natural by-product. On the other hand this will not be a secularized civil society in which religion is compartmentalized and accepted as an individual's voluntary choice. Liberalism in the immediate Afghan context will be the acceptance and noninterference among the different types of Islam in the country. It will not go as far as allowing individuals to choose non-Muslim faiths or atheism, forms of apostasy that will remain criminal offenses.

 Background: Geography and Economy

Afghanistan is a mountainous semiarid country in Central Asia about the size of France, divided north and south by the Hindu Kush and Pamir mountain ranges. Before the Soviet invasion of 1979 it had an estimated population of 16 million people, almost exclusively Muslim, about 85 percent of whom were Sunni. The vast majority of the population was rural, engaged in subsistence agriculture and pastoralism, and there was historically poor integration between local and national institutions. The capital, Kabul, was (and remains) home to the largest urban population and the center of national politics. Other important cities such as Herat in the west, Kandahar in the south, and Mazar-i-sharif in the north were given little autonomy until recently but now have become centers of regional power.

Afghanistan’s lack of integration was in part the result of geographic obstacles. Its mountain ranges bisect the middle of the country, and much of the south is desert. The country’s transportation system consists of little more than a single two-lane all-seasons paved road that links most major towns, but it was not completed until the mid-1960s and now lies in partial ruin. The country has never had a rail system and has only minimal air transport facilities. Being landlocked, it has no ports, although a few ferry landings and a bridge cross the Amu Darya north to Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. Its social structure has been resistant to political integration because no overarching national identity or ideology has ever supplanted regional tribal and ethnic identities.

 Cultural, Religious, and Ethnic Factors

Few peoples in the world, particularly the third world, have maintained such a strong and unproblematic sense of themselves and their culture as the Afghans. In abstract terms all foreigners, particularly non-Muslims, are viewed as inferior to Afghans. Although the great powers might be militarily, technologically and economically stronger, as nonbelievers and infidels, their values and way of life are naturally suspect. Afghanistan’s Muslim neighbors, however, fare only slightly better in Afghan eyes. The Uzbeks must have been asleep to allow the Russians to occupy Central Asia for more than a century; Pakistan is a land of recent Muslim converts from Hinduism that never should have become a nation; and Iran is a nest of Shi’ite heretics who speak Persian with a ludicrous accent. This sense of commonality against the outside world is leavened by the fact that Afghanistan is itself divided among a large number of different ethnic, religious, and regional groups.

* Ethnic Groups

The most important ethnic groups in Afghanistan are the Pashtuns, Tajiks, Hazaras, Uzbeks, and Turkmen, although a number of smaller ethnic groups have regionally important roles (most notably the Nuristani and Baluch). However, the range of diversity at the local level, where social organization is based on smaller kinship groups or regional communities, reduces the utility of the major national ethnic labels as clear units of political analysis because these large groups do not act in a unitary fashion.

The country’s Pashtuns, about 40 percent of the population, historically inhabit the area south of the Hindu Kush. Some were later resettled (or deported) north of the Hindu Kush Mountains to increase Pashtun representation in border areas of Afghan Turkestan. The imposition of the so-called Durand Line divided the Pashtuns between British India and Afghanistan in the late-nineteenth century, and so a larger number of ethnic Pashtuns probably reside in Pakistan in the Northwest Frontier Province and Baluchistan. The Pashtuns are tribally organized, all claiming descent from a common ancestor, but they are divided into a large number of clans and lineages. The largest division among Pashtuns in Afghanistan is between the Ghilzai, who straddle the Pakistan border, and the Durrani, who are settled between Kandahar and Herat. Although the Ghilzais have historically been the larger group, for most of the country’s history the Durrranis have been politically preeminent. They maintained an exclusive hold on political leadership through the Muhammadzai dynasty that was only displaced by the communist coup of 1978. Even at that time, however, power remained primarily in the hands of the Ghilzai Pashtun faction of the Afghan communist party. With few exceptions Pashtuns are exclusively Sunni Muslims. In rural areas, however, there is such melding of their tribal law (the Pashtunwali) with Islamic religious law that the two are often viewed as inseparable and mutually supportive. Local charismatic religious leaders, known as pirs, played important roles in politics historically because they and their disciples crossed tribal lines and could act as counterweights to the landowning tribal khans who dominated Pashtun clans and lineages.

The Tajiks are Persian speaking Sunni Muslims who make up about 30 percent of Afghanistan's population. They do not have a tribal organization and identify themselves by locality. They make up the bulk of Kabul's urban population and dominate the mountainous regions of the northeast, where their co-ethnics inhabit Tajikistan and parts of Uzbekistan. Persian speakers also dominate western Afghanistan, but they have closer cultural and economic links to Iran. The Afghan Tajiks were particularly important as a group historically because Persian was both the lingua franca of Afghanistan and the language of government. If the Pashtuns dominated the leadership positions, it was the Tajiks who ran the bureaucracy. As a more urbanized and literate population, they were also more strongly represented in the ranks of the 'ulama who received state stipends or held state positions. They also tended to dominate the ranks of clergy who had received advanced religious training.

Uzbeks and Turkmen of northern Afghanistan are the two major Turkish-speaking groups in Afghanistan. They are extensions of ethnic groups that now dominate the adjacent Central Asian states of Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan. The Turkmen, like the Pashtuns, are tribally organized and maintain elaborate genealogies that divide them into a series of named clans. The Uzbeks, by contrast, have a weaker tribal organization with less political significance. Both groups are Sunni Muslims but were influenced by the Sufi orders of Central Asia, such as the Naqsh- bandiyah. Before the Soviet war these Turkish populations had little visibility nationally.

Non-Sunni populations inhabit very mountainous regions of central Afghanistan and urban enclaves in major cities, particularly Kabul and Mazar-i-sharif. The largest are the Shi'i Hazaras, but there are some Is- mailis as well. Although Persian speaking, they claim descent from the Mongol armies that invaded the region in the thirteenth century and now constitute perhaps 15 percent of Afghanistan’s total population. Before 1978 they made up about one-third of Kabul’s population. They traditionally had hostile relations with the Pashtuns and faced considerable discrimination from Pashtun-dominated governments. Iran developed close ties to the Hazaras during the Soviet period and has retained considerable influence among some groups there. A small population of Is- maili Muslims inhabit a series of valleys in the remote Pamir regions of northeastern Afghanistan. Often referred to in the Russian literature as “mountain Tajiks,” in fact they speak a number of old Iranian languages, not Persian. Through the leadership of the Aga Khan they have more links to the outside world and neighboring communities in northern Pakistan and Tajikistan than one would normally expect for people living in such isolated locations.

* Religion in Government

Sunni Muslims have led all of Afghanistan’s governments, and the Hanafi legal tradition set the country’s legal framework (Kamali 1985). The religious establishment consisted of orthodox clerics who served on the government payroll as qazis (judges) or were supported by religious foundations (waqf) and less orthodox Sufi pirs who were supported by donations to their orders or individual Sufi saints. Historically clerics who wished to receive advanced religious training went abroad to study in madrasas in Delhi, Bukhara, or Cairo. Afghanistan itself had no traditional centers of advanced learning. This is not surprising since the country was the borderland that separated Central Asia and India, places that had long been centers of Islamic higher learning. Shi’i clerics usually studied in Iran but were generally excluded from Sunni government posts. Village mullahs, the bulk of the religious class, were supported and recruited by local communities and had a relatively low social status and poor religious educations.

Attempts to bring the ‘ulama under tight state control began with Amir Abdur Rahman (1890–1901), who created the modern Afghan state. The most powerful tool at his disposal was financial. He nationalized the formerly independent waqfs and administered them himself. This undercut the autonomy of the clergy and allowed the Afghan government to decide who would get support. He also put the qazis on the state payroll as a means of controlling them and their decisions. He was at odds with the Sufi saints because they remained beyond his direct control, and he saw them as instigators of opposition against government policies and even fomenters of revolt (Kakar 1979). It was Sufi orders and their saintly leaders who were most independent of Afghan governments and who often wielded considerable political influence. They were particularly popular in rural regions, but some of the established saintly lines had many urban followers (Olesen 1995). One reason for their political importance was their ability to transcend tribal boundaries, particularly among the Pashtuns.

Historically Islam was used among Pashtuns as a way to get around the structural problems inherent in getting rival tribes to cooperate. There were two patterns. In the first rival tribes would agree to cooperate in the name of Islam to expel non-Islamic invaders. Resistance fighters became known generically as mujahidin, or holy warriors, a title that obscured tribal differences. Though their rhetoric was Islamic, the key leaders were not themselves clerics. However, there was a second religious model of warfare practiced by Pashtuns in which clerics, usually Sufi saints (pirs), took command and organized armies in which they were the leaders. They could work around the tribal system because they owed their power to religious charisma, and could claim their authority was through God and not any tribal affiliation. These groups arose primarily to lead rural revolts against the Kabul government’s attempts to centralize power and in frontier areas before 1947 against the British (who labeled them “mad mullahs”). The first type of war was approved by the state because it served to keep the country free of foreign occupiers. The second was treated much more unfavorably because these revolts were directed against its own authority. Such revolts rarely proved successful when the central government was strong and could suppress uprisings with a regular army. But when governments were weak (such as during the civil war against King Amanullah in the late 1920s) they had better success. It was the first tradition that underlay the Afghan resistance against the Soviet Union’s occupation and it was the second that created the climate for the emergence of the Taliban.

 Modernists versus Islamists

For the past one hundred years Afghan politics has been split between those who wished to see Afghanistan transformed and those who opposed the process. While this has often been portrayed as a battle between modernists and Islamists, the division was more complex. It has had as much to do with conflict over the limits of power of the central government, the cultural gap between elites in Kabul and the inhabitants of the countryside, and questions of taxation and conscription. It is this very crosscutting set of issues that prevented Islam from becoming a distinct ideology. Factions that would raise the Islamic banner in one context would ignore it in another. For example, rural revolts against changes in the legal status of women imposed by urban-based Kabul governments would be decried as un-Islamic. But the same people studiously ignored complaints by orthodox clergy that many their own tribal customs concerning women's inheritance rights and marriage procedures violated shari'ah law.

Neither the status of Islamic tradition nor social change was a pressing issue when Abdur Rahman created the Afghan state in the late-nineteenth century by building a strong national army equipped with modern weapons: he was interested in building state power, not transforming the Afghan people. He centralized Afghanistan to an extent never seen before, and over the twenty years of his reign he crushed all opposition to his government. While reining in the autonomy of the 'ulama, he carefully portrayed himself as a defender of Islam because he had kept Russia and Britain out of Afghanistan. He was also careful to have the 'ulama issue fatwas giving justification for all of his acts, including wars of conquest against the Shi'i Hazara in central Afghanistan. In contrast to his active state building (Kakar 1971), Abdur Rahman was keen to see that his modernizations have as little impact on the population as possible. He imported foreign experts into Afghanistan to provide technical aid but did not introduce Western styles of education into Afghanistan itself. The economy actually declined as a consequence of the Amir's policies of taxing and controlling international transit trade and banking himself. He had a deliberate policy of keeping the country's natural resources undeveloped and refused to allow railroads in order to keep Afghanistan isolated (Hanifi 2001). By the end of his reign the former crossroads of Central Asia had developed the reputation of a hermit kingdom.

Although isolated, Afghanistan was caught up in the ferment of the Islamic world after the First World War and the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire. Under King Amanullah (1919–28) Afghanistan saw itself in two different ways. As the only Muslim state not under colonial domination (the country had gained complete independence from the British Raj in 1919), the religiously minded pushed Amanullah to proclaim himself successor to the Ottoman sultan as leader of world's Sunni Muslims. On the other hand, the world around Afghanistan was presenting new models. A revolution had destroyed the czars and created a new Soviet Union to the north. Turkey and Iran in the west had new leaders who declared that Islam was not the solution but the problem that had led to the region's loss of power. It was these latter movements that soon fascinated Amanullah. Following the lead of Ataturk and Reza Shah, Amanullah decided that Afghanistan needed to be modernized. By contrast with Ataturk's radical secularism that attempted to expel Islam from the public sphere in the Turkish Republic or Reza Shah's use of the military and economic projects to transform Iran, changes in Afghanistan were minimal but significant. Amanullah declared that state law would supersede religious law in his new law code, he sent Afghan students abroad for Western education, and he began some economic development programs. Religious opponents argued that his changes to family law were un- Islamic and he was abandoning his role as defender of the religion. Such social issues figured prominently in a revolt by the eastern Pashtuns in 1924 that forced Amanullah to pull his reforms when the army proved too weak to put down the revolt without mobilizing the tribes for help (Nawid 1999). It should be noted, however, that these reforms were never implemented in the rural areas and that new taxes, as opposed to social issues, were more likely the spark of the revolt. While issues of taxation may also have sparked the American revolution, in Afghanistan the religious justification for revolts always took precedence even when the fundamental issue was in fact economic or political.

Amanullah was inspired to make another attempt at reforms immediately after he took a world tour in 1928 that included stops in India, Egypt, Britain, Italy, Germany, Turkey, the Soviet Union, and Iran. Upon his return he declared a whole host of reforms but was immediately faced with revolts by the eastern Pashtuns. This time he was unable to put down the rebels, and as other ethnic groups rose up to oppose his government, he abdicated the throne (Poullada 1973). A bandit Tajik rebel from north of Kabul, Habibullah, took the throne for nine months and rescinded the former king's attempts at modernization. This was seen as a victory for conservative elements in the country, but the old elite reasserted itself when Nadir Khan deposed Habibullah in 1929 and restored the royal dynasty to power with himself as king. During his short reign (he was assassinated in 1933) he took a more conservative approach, putting contentious reforms aside and rebuilding the state's armed forces. Only when the state power was more secure in the 1950s did reforms begin again.

During the long reign of Zahir Shah (1933–73) government power was largely in the hands of his father's brothers and his cousin Daud Khan, who was prime minister from 1963 to 1973. It was during this period that Afghanistan underwent a major transition. The Cold War conflict provided the Afghan government with aid from both the Soviet Union and the United States. The army was modernized by the Soviets and the West provided aid in the fields of education. Both helped build the first paved roads in Afghanistan and created its first system of communications. Daud's policy was to make changes quietly, beginning in Kabul, and then see them spread to the provincial cities and rural areas over time. For example, policies that encouraged the end of veiling in the 1960s protected women who dropped them and jailed clerics that openly opposed the policy, but did not make veiling a political issue as had been done in Iran and Turkey. Similarly, Western-style education was expanded and included women, but this was voluntary. In dealing with the clerics, the state began to demand certification through training at the state-run Kabul University if they wished to be employed by the government. The 1964 constitution also exemplified the gradual policy of modernization by declaring that all state laws must be compatible with Islam, but that in the event of a disagreement, the state laws would take precedence. But no court had the power to nullify state laws on the grounds that they violated Islamic principles (Dupree 1978, 559–69).

It was at Kabul University where these policies were most hotly debated. Afghanistan has always had a very small elite, and while the expansion of education brought many new people into politics, the numbers involved were only in the thousands and almost all of them resided in the capital. At the university politically active students divided into two opposing factions. The leftist faction favored faster reform and a greater break with Afghanistan's past. They formed two parties, Khalq (Masses) and Parcham (Banner), which became the core of the future People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA). Islamist students who wanted to move the government in a more religious direction opposed them. Given Afghanistan's history Daud's government was more concerned about opposition from the religious right than the secular left. In 1973 when Daud overthrew Zahir Shah in a coup and declared himself president of a new Republic of Afghanistan, the leftists initially supported him. The Islamists attempted to move against him in 1975 by mounting some small revolts against the government in the rural areas. Because they had no local support these quickly failed and the most prominent Islamists fled to Pakistan while others were jailed. However, the leftist parties were soon disappointed in Daud and his failure to take more radical steps to change Afghanistan. In 1978 they mounted their own coup, murdered Daud, and declared their intention to create a new socialist Afghanistan (Dupree 1978, 761–68).

 The Soviet Invasion, Defeat, and Its Aftermath

The radical Khalq party was the dominant faction in new PDPA government, and they were not just interested in ruling Afghanistan but in transforming the country through revolutionary policies of land reform, education, and changes in family law. They moved to destroy all who opposed them, including many of their leftist Parcham rivals, the traditional rural landowners, the old military establishment, and the Islamic clergy. They abandoned Afghanistan's historic policy of neutrality for a direct alliance with the Soviet Union. The regime also rejected the country's traditional Islamic symbols of legitimacy by striking religious salutations from their speeches and decrees and changing the color of the flag to red. As revolutionaries they justified themselves and the legitimacy of their government in Marxist terms. This rhetoric was alien to most of the rural population, except in the north, where it was all too familiar to the descendants of refugees who had originally fled from Soviet Central Asia in Stalin's time. The Khalq regime was the first (and only) Afghan government to explicitly reject Islam within its governing framework. This proved an unwise move since the PDPA membership numbered fewer than ten thousand countrywide and made it an easy target to attack not just by Islamist parties but by ordinary Afghans for whom no government was legitimate if it was not run by believing Muslims (Arnold 1983).

When the PDPA went beyond policy pronouncements and attempted to implement its policies in the countryside, it met with resistance. The government responded with military force and the country's provinces erupted in rebellion. These uprisings were uncoordinated and tended to focus on local rather than national issues, but they soon became widespread (Shahrani and Canfield 1984). The Soviet Union, which distrusted the Khalq leadership and had attempted to remove it, became concerned that the situation was getting so out of control that the regime itself was in danger of collapse. In an attempt to restore stability the Soviet Union invaded at the end of 1979, deposed the ruling Khalq faction after murdering its leader, Hafizullah Amin, and installing a Parchami, Babrak Karmal, as his replacement. The Soviets then engaged in a wholesale war against the Afghan population in an attempt to force it into submission or to run the resistance out of the country. Eventually 3 million Afghans fled to Pakistan and Iran, over 1 million were killed, and millions of others were displaced internally. In spite of having no centralized command, being divided by ethnic and sectarian differences, and being hopelessly outmatched in equipment by Soviet and Afghan government forces, a war of resistance—financed with billions of dollars in aid and training obtained from the United States and Saudi Arabia and administered by Pakistan—wore down the Soviets, and in 1989 they withdrew. Their regime in Kabul collapsed three years later.

The Soviet invasion created a national opposition unlike any seen before. The collapse of central authority and the rise of locally based resistance groups transferred real power into the hands of local communities previously ruled by distant officials assigned by the central government. By framing the conflict as a jihad, a holy war, it was possible to unite a very large number of people and to deprive the Kabul government of legitimacy. While the Afghan resistance was unable to win set-piece battles against its Soviet enemy because of its better organization, firepower, and air superiority, the Russians found it impossible to permanently suppress the opposition in spite of inflicting heavy casualties. Since the Afghan definition of victory consisted of a Soviet withdrawal, all the resistance needed to do was to make the country ungovernable and a drain on Soviet resources. With the acquisition of American-supplied Stinger antiaircraft missiles in 1986, the rebels were able to reduce a key Soviet advantage and drive the price for staying even higher. By the late 1980s losses in men and material were enough to make the war profoundly unpopular in Moscow. The Soviets under Gorbachev concluded that the best policy was just to let the Afghans keep their country and bring the troops home (Hyman 1992).

The Soviet occupation lasted a decade and did immense damage to the country and its people (Kakar 1995). More significantly, both sides in the anti-Soviet war were to a large extent creations of their funders rather than mass indigenous political movements. The PDPA received its support from the Soviet Union, a cost estimated at about $5 billion a year during its occupation period. The mujahidin would not have been competitive without access to similarly large sums of money and arms, which were supplied by the United States and Saudi Arabia. This meant that the Afghan resistance was as dependent on international aid as its Soviet supported rival was. As a result the Afghan mujahidin found themselves sucked into two larger conflicts: the ongoing Cold War struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union, and a new struggle by Saudi Wahhabis to make the war in Afghanistan the vanguard of a transnational jihad that they hoped would bring about Islamic revolutions in the Sunni Arab world and beyond. Unfortunately for their patrons, the Afghans had little interest in either struggle. In particular the only jihad the Afghans were willing to fight was in Afghanistan itself, and that would end when the Soviets withdrew.

The interference of outsiders was clear in the organization of the resistance. While there was a broad coalition of Afghan parties opposed to the Soviet invasion that included royalists, nationalists, and regional groups and even non-PDPA leftists, only the Islamist parties had access to money and arms. This was because foreign aid to the resistance was distributed through the Pakistan government, and only the seven Sunni Islamist parties it formally recognized were eligible for support. (The Shi’i parties received aid from Iran’s Islamic government.) These parties had not been particularly influential inside Afghanistan before the Soviet invasion. Indeed, many of their leaders had been living in exile in Pakistan because of their participation in a series of failed Islamic uprisings against the Daud government in the mid-1970s that had received little or no popular support. By making them conduits of aid, Pakistan raised their profile and power. Local resistance groups within Afghanistan had to affiliate with one of these Islamist parties in order to get weapons. Because the groups fighting in Afghanistan had little or no interest in the political ideologies of these parties or their leaders, party affiliation was most often based on personal relationships or regional and ethnic ties. Thus in choosing between the two most powerful parties, the Tajiks and northerners in general tended to align them themselves with Rabbani’s Jamiat- i-Islami while Pashtuns and others in the south and east joined more often with Hekmatyar’s Hizb-i-Islami. But given the complex nature of Afghan politics, locally rival groups would often join different mujahidin parties regardless of ethnic ties or would defect from one party to another if they could get a better deal (Roy 1990).

Because outsiders financed the war, they naturally interpreted the struggle in Afghanistan as a Manichaean conflict of competing ideologies (e.g., Islam vs. atheism, socialism vs. capitalism, freedom vs. oppression, feudal reactionaries vs. progressive patriots, modernists vs. traditionalists).

The lack of ideology that underlay traditional Afghan politics was thereby hidden. The mujahidin parties, for example, had good connections with Kabul government bureaucrats throughout the war and could generally get any information they needed from them. PDPA troops struck deals with local resistance groups to avoid fighting. Even at the national level the philosophical differences between the resistance and the Kabul regime that had originally sparked the war were soon blurred. The PDPA government itself denounced its earlier radical policies as mistakes after the Soviet invasion. They rid themselves of the Soviet style red flag, pointedly reintroduced Islamic phrases into their decrees and speeches, and made sure their leaders were seen at prayer with supportive clergy. But the continuing opposition to the legitimacy of the PDPA government was not based on its policies but because it allowed the occupation of the country by Soviet troops who remained actively at war with the population.

When the Soviet Union withdrew in 1989 this bedrock objection to the PDPA’s legitimacy was removed but so also was the protection of their troops. At the time it was assumed (even by the Russians themselves) that the Kabul regime would fall within weeks or months. However, its leader, Najibullah (who had replaced Karmal in 1986), proved surprisingly successful at keeping his troops intact and holding the regime together. This support was based not on ideology but on Najibullah’s continuing access to Soviet money, weapons, and food that he could distribute to his followers. This included a large growth in the regime’s rural militias that numbered over 100,000 people. Many former mujahidin groups defected in return for arms and money. They saw little reason to fight against his regime if their own needs were met and the Soviets were gone. Najibul- lah even reorganized his administration by opening it up to noncommunists and proposed reserving positions for mujahidin leaders in a future coalition government (Giustozzi 2000).

Pakistan and the United States, both of which wanted to see an outright mujahidin military victory, rejected Najibullah’s overture. But although they had expected to topple the PDPA government easily when the Russians withdrew, the mujahidin proved unable to take fixed military positions and that failure produced a stalemate. With the Soviets gone, far fewer Afghans were willing to take up arms against the government as long it did not trouble them. It was only when the Soviet Union disintegrated and Russia refused to continue large-scale aid that Najibul- lah’s government collapsed in April 1992. Although it was still well armed, had its forces intact, and had enough stored supplies to survive in the short term, factions within the PDPA decided that their long-term prospects were bad. Now was the opportune moment to negotiate their futures from a position of strength, and they all cut deals and switched sides largely on the basis of ethnic ties. Thus the PDPA regime was less defeated militarily than reorganized as its components defected to various mujahidin factions.

With the fall of the Kabul regime the last remaining thread that had bound the mujahidin into a marriage of convenience snapped. Their leaders had no clear goals because their unity had been based on resistance against the Soviet Union and its client Afghan government, not on any common political platform (Roy 1995). Perhaps more important, none of the seven recognized faction party leaders who were supposed to form a new government had done any significant fighting inside Afghanistan themselves or created a national political base. They were naturally opposed to any open system of government that might expose their unpopularity or narrow base of support. They were particularly vehement in their insistence that the former king, Zahir Shah, should play no role in government, not even a symbolic one. Royal legitimacy through recognized tribal lineage still held enough sway among ordinary Afghans so that it threatened to undermine the Pakistani backed mujahidin party leaders because the most powerful of them (Rabbani, Hekmatyar, and Sayyaf) lacked prestigious social origins.

A mujahidin power struggle was therefore inevitable once the PDPA dissolved. Each faction leader realized that if he did not obtain power now, he never would. And since the parties were based more on personality than ideology, there was very little basis for compromise, particularly since the rise of a predominate leader would mean an end to all the smaller factions. Thus the agreed-upon distribution of power failed almost immediately. The “prime minister,” Hekmatyar, refused to enter the capital and remained encamped on the hills south of Kabul from where he shelled the city, and the troops of his “president,” Rabbani. Kabul, which had been spared any fighting during the war because of its many lines of defenses, was devastated over the next three years and large parts of the city were reduced to rubble. As a result many of its residents fled the city seeking safety elsewhere and twenty-five thousand people were believed to have died as a result of the fighting. A stalemate ensued in which neither side was able to dislodge the other. In an attempt to break the deadlock Hekmatyar cut a deal in January 1994 with the Uzbek leader Dostam, who once again betrayed former allies to join what he hoped would be the winning side. This was an odd couple: the most fundamentalist mujahidin commander embracing the former communist general. The venture failed to bring down Rabbani’s government, and the fighting in and around Kabul intensified as the Tajiks led by Masud in one part of the city continued to fight bitter battles with the Hazaras led by Ali Mazari in the other (Barfield 1996).

The inability of the factions to find any common agreement about what a future government should look like, let alone who should run it, made it impossible to unify the country politically. And because each of the factions was strong only in its home region and could not displace its rivals elsewhere, there was no real prospect of unifying the country militarily. Nor did the any of the factions have the same access to resources as they did during the anti-Soviet war for coalition building. The swift end of Najibullah’s regime after the Soviet Union collapsed demonstrated dramatically how dependent he was on outside funding to stay in power. Less well noticed was that the victorious mujahidin parties soon faced the same problem. The United States, which had been matching Soviet aid to Kabul with its own support to the mujahidin (negative symmetry), was only interested in funding a Cold War struggle that had suddenly been rendered moot. Saudi Arabia was generous in funding a jihad against unbelieving invaders, but showed little interest in the civil war that was now raging among fellow Muslims. The international community that might have stepped in to help with rebuilding the country instead focused on the more the immediate problem of relieving the suffering caused by faction fighting in the country (Rubin 1995, 2002).

 The Rise and Demise of the Taliban

In previous periods of turmoil Afghan leaders had arisen to reestablish political order in the country by combining some recognized claim of political legitimacy with substantial aid from the outside world. Because Afghanistan had been a rentier state whose successive central governments (regardless of ideology) had all been dependent on extracting outside resources to maintain their stability for close to two centuries, attempting to create a new central government without substantial outside aid would have been a daunting task under the best of circumstances. In their absence it proved impossible.

The Taliban leader, Mullah (later Amir) Omar, was a local cleric in Kandahar with an honorable war record in the anti-Soviet jihad, but he was neither an important figure in that war nor a player in any of the postwar factions. In 1994 a group of Pashtun Islamic students, trained in Pakistan but having moved to Kandahar, complained to Mullah Omar about the local warlords who had abused the population by committing crimes that included robbery, rape, and extortion. Omar instructed his student followers (or taliban, hence the name) to confront these bands and disarm them. After capturing and executing some of the most notorious of these groups they then unblocked the roads around Kandahar, seized power from other local warlords, and brought a high degree of order to the territories they took under their control. The movement was widely popular locally because it promised security of life and property to a region that lacked both. Its ideology was of secondary importance. Upon seeing the Taliban’s strength among the Pashtuns, Pakistan switched its backing to the new movement with the hope that it would have more success than its previous clients. After helping them take control of Kandahar, the Taliban expanded quickly with additional Pakistani aid and destroyed Hekmatyar's Hizb-i-Islami to become the dominant Pashtun faction in 1995. A year later they seized Kabul, and by 1998 all but northeastern Afghanistan was under their control. While the Taliban were initially lauded for bringing peace and security to the regions they captured, their social and religious policies were widely unpopular. In some ways they were a mirror image of the PDPA, intent on imposing radical doctrines of foreign origin (this time religious) on a population that was strongly opposed to them (Rashid 2001).

Although the Taliban was a religious movement, its attraction to the Pashtuns as opposed to other ethnic groups was not surprising. While their emergence was sudden, their movement's dynamic followed a well- worn path: scholars have long noted that religious leaders could transcend tribal boundaries and unite people in the name of religion who would not otherwise cooperate. Commenting on the structurally similar Bedouin tribes (in the thirteenth century!), Ibn Khaldun argued that religion was uniquely suited to bringing tribes together:

The Bedouins are the least willing of nations to subordinate themselves to each other, as they are rude, proud, ambitious, and eager to be leaders. Their individual aspirations rarely coincide. But when there is religion [among them] through prophethood or sainthood, then they have some restraining influence on themselves. The qualities of haughtiness and jealousy leave them. It is, then, easy for them to subordinate themselves and unite (as a social organization). (Ibn Khaldun 1967, 120)

The Taliban had used the failures of the mujahidin warlords to attract a wide following among the Pashtuns. An advantage of a religious movement for rival Pashtun leaders was that there was no honor or prestige lost in subordinating oneself to the will of God or God's agents. The movement also served to give the Pashtuns the dominant role they expected to play in Afghan politics without having to cede any ground to rival tribes. The Taliban expansion into Pashtun areas was largely peaceful, with tribal leaders and local mujahidin commanders defecting to their cause in return for maintaining their local power under a Taliban administration. When they moved out of Pashtun regions they relied more on force. But, after losing a series of battles in 1995 that forced them to retreat back almost to the gates of Kandahar, they reverted to a policy of co-optation and bribery that resulted in the rapid fall of such major centers as Herat, Kabul, and then Mazar-i-sharif without major fighting. Their attempts to implement policies based on genuine military coercion generally failed, as when their heavy-handed occupation of Mazar in 1997 led to a disastrous defeat in which they were driven out of the region with the loss of an estimated three thousand troops. Their second occupation in 1998 was much more cautious and successful. However, even with outside support they were unable to completely displace Ahmad Shah Masud's Northern Alliance in northeastern Afghanistan in the years that followed (Goodson 2001).

 The Taliban in Historical Perspective

The Taliban brought something new to the Afghan scene. Although they proclaimed themselves to be the defenders of traditional Islamic values, their movement marked a clear break with the past in that it was the first successful political movement in the country led by clerics. All previous Afghan regimes of whatever orientation had secular leaders.

Two types of charismatic leaders had led previous Afghan religious movements. The first were long established holy figures, sometimes representing a long lineage, who could draw on a network of disciples and relationships with particular tribes or ethnic groups to become the focus for organizing opposition to a central government. Visionaries who claimed to be acting on God's command to bring about some radical and divinely inspired change led the second type of more ephemeral movement. The leaders of the first type of movements held recognized positions of influence that persisted regardless of whether their opposition was successful. The leaders of the second had no such recognized positions (indeed, their socially marginal origins often were taken as a sign that they must be inspired by God). Failure of their movements ended their careers and often their lives. The Taliban was a larger and unusual variety of the second category. They began not in opposition to a central government or an invader but rather in response to the anarchy that enveloped Afghanistan with the fall of the PDPA regime.

 Breaks with the Afghan Past

The Taliban broke with Afghan tradition not only in the clerical origin of its leaders, but perhaps most importantly in its refugee origins. The Soviet war lasted for so long and the refugee flow into neighboring countries was so great that over time it created a new class of people: refugee Afghans born in Pakistan or Iran who had never seen the country or experienced life there. Refugee camps are notorious hotbeds for radical movements of all types because they are generally poor, they provide few opportunities for young people, and the political factions that control them can manipulate their populations. The hope of recovering a lost homeland is a particularly powerful ideal, but as time passes the view of this homeland becomes more and more mythic because refugee children know of it only by hearsay. The past is idealized because the present is so miserable and the future is so uncertain. Groups with extreme messages, whether their ideologies are political, ethnic, or religious, galvanize their followers not only with the visions of reclaiming a lost homeland but of then transforming those followers. Examples of such movements are numerous and include the radical political movements of the PLO among the Palestinians, exile-based movements of both the Tutsi and Hutu in Central Africa, or sectarian movements such as the Taliban. In all of these cases, the groups involved focused on what they had lost because they were not incorporated into the areas to which they had fled. They sustained a separate and distinct identity in part because the world community isolated them and fixed them in space and time with permanent refugee or alien labels that may have been appropriate initially but that became more problematic as the decades wore on.

Refugees in Afghanistan did better than most: they experienced a tactical victory when the Soviets withdrew and, in theory, they could return to their homeland. But the fighting among the mujahidin meant that for most the option of returning home was difficult. Even when they did arrive, the homeland was not what they had known when they left it. Although poor before the war, the Afghan economy at least functioned and there was general security for life and property. Now there was none. The mujahidin, who had been heroes in the anti-Soviet jihad, lost respect when they became faction leaders engaged in self-interested and violent struggles for power with other similar groups. The Taliban drew on this discontent in two ways. First, they recruited young men who had been too young to participate in the anti-Soviet war and gave them an opportunity to participate in a new jihad, one that would bring a “truer version” of Islam to Afghanistan. Jihad had been the focal experience for young men throughout the Soviet war, and those too young to participate were looking for a goal that was equally as idealistic. That the Taliban’s view of Islam was far more radical and conservative than any existing in Afghanistan previously meant little to people who had nothing to compare it with. For them it was far easier to imagine an ideal Afghan way of life, and to enforce it on others, because they drew their lessons from religious schools and not the give and take of everyday life. Second, the Taliban drew on the discontent of the population at large with the continuing anarchy in the country. Any ideology and regime that promised stability would be given the benefit of the doubt if it could bring about that stability. For most Afghans, it was the success of the Taliban in bringing about order that mitigated the fact that it was both a clerical movement and one whose vision of Islam (particularly its puritanical banning of practically all forms of entertainment) was not widely shared or appreciated.

The Soviet war and the mujahidin civil war that followed left Afghanistan devastated, not only physically but also in its social and political structure. Before the war it would have been very difficult for any movement of the Taliban type to cover so much territory so easily. The power of local landed elites, rival tribes, and the power of a functioning central government prevented the easy spread of any national movements. The war and the massive outflow of refugees disrupted traditional Afghan society to such an extent that it was now vulnerable to rapid changes because the local power structures now lacked cohesion. To use an ecological analogy, the old Afghan system was a climax state: a selfperpetuating stable set of political relationships in which rival forces in the country remained in equilibrium until they were disrupted by an outside force. Such climax states, once destroyed, take a long time to rebuild or reach a new climax state. The Taliban represented a political movement characteristic of such a transitory phases where anarchy is the greatest problem and political power is weak. Although in power for more than five years they did little to transform themselves into a government. The only new institution they introduced was a religious police force that took charge of enforcing the regime’s draconian policies.

 Continuities with the Afghan Past

If the Taliban did represent one great continuity, it was in continuing the long-standing struggle for power between Afghan modernists and the Afghan traditionalists. The modernists were primarily urban based and sought a more secular and socially liberal environment that would integrate Afghanistan into the larger world community. The traditionalists had a more conservative vision based on a combination of deeply rooted rural values and traditional religious beliefs. The twentieth century was a continuing struggle between them in which neither was able to eradicate the other, and over time each got more extreme. The communist parties that overthrew Daud in 1978 argued that he had not been radical enough in pursuing a modernist vision. When their own attempts at a radical transformation of society failed and the Soviet Union invaded to keep Afghanistan socialist, the modernists were discredited in the eyes of most Afghans. Islamist parties that had failed to arouse much sympathy when they were persecuted by Daud’s government rode high in opposition to the Soviets and reinvigorated Islam as a political force in Afghan national politics. But both sides had in common a mission to transform a population that had no desire to be transformed. The opposition between the Taliban and the local populations was therefore most intense in cities such as Kabul and Mazar that were the strongholds of the modernists, in part because Taliban policies drew as much inspiration from rural Pashtun Afghan values as they did from Islam.

 The Taliban and JIHAD

The Taliban made jihad one of the strongest elements of their struggle. It provided a religious justification for warfare against their enemies. But the Taliban were quite careful to restrict their jihad to one country: Afghanistan. They attempted to reassure the secular post-Soviet Central Asian states that they had no intention of spreading their struggle northward. While such a promise might seem simple good politics (the Taliban were isolated enough without making new enemies), it also reflected an Afghan ethnocentrism. They had contempt for most of their neighbors and did not really care what they did. It was certainly not their responsibility to change them. And far from identifying with the many Muslim foreigners who fought in Afghanistan, the Taliban appeared to take the view that if they wanted to conduct a jihad against their own governments that was their own affair, but it had nothing to do with the Afghans. Indeed the only place that a Taliban style jihad was likely to spread outside of Afghanistan with Taliban support was Pakistan because that was where it had originated. Because Pakistan had its own large population of co-ethnic Pashtuns, there was a close connection with Islamist parties there who were part of an existing debate within Pakistan itself on how much more Islamic the country needed to become. Successive Pakistani governments played with fire by so closely identifying themselves with such a radical Islamist movement in order to influence Afghanistan’s politics when its own society was more vulnerable to its spread than any of the other neighboring states.

 Islam as the Only Way

The Taliban saw Islam and its shari‘ah law as the fundamental basis for proper social life. They also believed that since God’s law was superior to state law, the state itself was not ultimately sovereign. Thus to their way of thinking, only Islamic principles could be used to judge rights. If these came into conflict with internationally recognized norms, such as the treatment of women, the Taliban argued that Islam must be followed. The difficulty was that Islamic scholars in other countries did not accord their interpretation of Islam much validity. Their interpretations were often idiosyncratic and tended to dress local custom in the guise of religion. On the other hand, many aspects of Taliban policy were not local custom at all. The puritanical strain of Wahhabism that induced them to ban all forms of entertainment, seclude women, enforce beard codes, and demand the harshest forms of Islamic punishments were all alien to Afghanistan. It was here that the influence of foreign Muslims, conservative Pakistani madrasas where the Taliban had been trained, and the financial support of the movement by the Gulf Arabs introduced an ideological edge to the movement that ultimately undermined its legitimacy.

This could be seen when the Taliban ordered the destruction of the standing Buddhas in central Afghanistan in March 2001 (Barfield 2001). The decree was issued by an assembly of clerics and confirmed by Mullah Omar as a religious issue and did not appear to have been run past any Taliban government officials before it was announced. The logic behind the decision was explained in a Taliban newspaper editorial in Shari'at (February 28, 2001) published just after the edict was issued. It stated that "the objects of worship, which had been considered as sacred and worshipped in their time in the past, are filthier than everything else and thus it is necessary that our beloved country should be cleansed of the existence of such false objects." That other Islamic scholars rejected this line of interpretation had no impact on Mullah Omar. When informed that of their objections he boasted that "Muslims should be proud of smashing idols. It has given praise to God that we have destroyed them" (Times, March 6, 2001). But the Taliban regime's inability to justify their action in strict Islamic legal terms undermined their claim. A set of Egyptian clerics who went to visit Mullah Omar in Kandahar were later scathing in their opinion of Taliban legal reasoning and condemned the decree as fundamentally flawed:

because of [the Taliban's] circumstances and their incomplete knowledge of jurisprudence they were not able to formulate rulings backed by theological evidence. The issue is a cultural issue. We detected that their knowledge of religion and jurisprudence is lacking because they have no knowledge of the Arabic language, linguistics, and literature and hence they did not learn the true Islam. (Al-Sharq al-Awsat, March 23, 2001)

But who were they to tell Mullah Omar, the man who named himself Amir-ul Momineen, or Commander of the Faithful, that he did not know his business? Omar's only overt response to all the criticism was to order the sacrifice of one hundred cattle and to give the meat to the poor to express his regret for taking too long to get the job done and not having done it earlier.

The Taliban were also hostile to other religions. Earlier, in December 2000, they had issued a decree declaring that that "any Afghan who converts to the rescinded religion of Christianity will be sentenced to death.” The Afghan newspaper Hewad (January 13, 2001) had gone on to warn, “Anyone caught selling literature promoting Christianity or Judaism or degrading Islam, its personalities would be subjected to five years’ imprisonment.” After they had destroyed the Buddhist monuments, the Taliban turned their attention to the small Kabul Hindu community in May 2001 and demanded that they wear a badge to distinguish themselves as non-Muslims. In June the Taliban announced that at all non-Muslim international aid workers and journalists must agree to abide by their version of Islamic law (including punishments such as stoning for adultery) and accept the authority of the Taliban religious police. In August they arrested a group of foreign aid workers and charged them with being Christian missionaries. But in September 2001 the Taliban found themselves confronted by an enraged United States when its Arab Afghan allies launched attacks on Washington and New York and they were driven from power before the year ended.

 The End of the Taliban

Over the course of their rule in Afghanistan the Taliban had become more and more dependent on al-Qaeda and the Pakistani government for financial and military support. Unlike other Afghan factions, the Taliban was willing to lose large numbers of men in battle. This created a manpower shortage as losses mounted and they found it harder to recruit Afghans into their ranks. Instead they depended more and more on the so-called Arab Afghans (foreign Muslims mostly from the Arab Gulf states and Central Asia) and Pakistanis. The use of these troops in an Afghan civil war alienated the local population. They saw these troops as foreigners who had no business in Afghanistan. Because they were engaged in a war of Muslims against other Muslims, the Taliban portrayal of their struggle as a type of jihad was seen as illegitimate. Pakistan’s role was particularly distrusted because they were seen as invaders keen to incorporate Afghanistan into Pakistan.

On a cultural level the Taliban’s increasing adoption of Wahhabi interpretations of Islam also alienated the population. Afghan Islam had never been dogmatic. Strong Sufi influences, the veneration of saints and their tombs, and poor religious education gave Islam in Afghanistan an eclectic flavor. Even the Taliban had difficulties in sorting out what was religiously based and what came from Pashtun custom because they rarely bothered to learn Arabic. The success of the Wahhabist movements in other countries had played on people's insecurity and the role that religion should play in society. In Afghanistan, where religion was still seen as a natural way of life and not a political ideology, attempts by visiting Arabs to tell the Afghans how to be better Muslims fell on deaf ears. Afghans were so secure in their faith that they could not be bullied into believing that they needed to be better Muslims. And their contempt for foreigners meant that they were least likely to take advice from Arabs or Pakistanis on what they saw as their own religion.

The roots of this cultural certainty, that they knew Islam better than anyone else, went deep, and I had often observed it during my own anthropological fieldwork in Afghanistan during the 1970s. One small example I remembered vividly occurred when I was living in a summer nomad camp and discussing religion with a young shepherd because there was nothing else to do and this was always considered a good subject for conversation. We were debating the comparative advantages of Islam over other religions when he moved into a favorite topic of plural marriage. "Yes," he declared, "one of the advantages of Islam is that a man can have seven wives." And I replied, "No you can't; the shari'ah limits a man to only four wives." "No, you're wrong," he objected. We continued to argue back and forth with no resolution when who should happen along the trail but a mullah whom we immediately invited to drink tea with us. The shepherd then said, "Mullah, sir, this foreigner says that a Muslim can't have seven wives! Go on. Tell him he is wrong." But the mullah replied, "Well he can't. The foreigner is right. You can only have four." Now, you might have thought that an answer by an authoritative religious figure would have ended the argument, but it did not. The shepherd paused only to sip some more tea and then countered by declaring that Haji so-and-so had seven wives. The mullah said he must be mistaken, "Perhaps some died or he divorced some, but I am sure he has no more than four wives." The shepherd was not deterred. "No, no, I know it to be true. Besides, it is well known that those Muslims who may have to fight jihad are allowed three extra wives." Now, the mullah practically choked on his tea and said, "No, there is no jihad exception in shari'ah!" But the shepherd simply declared, "Oh yes there is," and that ended the discussion. The shepherd was illiterate and had no formal religious education, but he was quite sure of what he knew about his own religion, and having a mullah contradict him was merely an annoyance that had no effect on his belief.

Thus although the Taliban were known to the outside world for their imposition of a puritanical Islam, the assertion that only their interpretation of Islam had validity did not take root in Afghanistan. Instead people looked upon these new rules as a form of oppression. This was reinforced by the traditional Afghan prejudice against village mullahs, who generally lacked social prestige, and the ruling Taliban councils consisted almost entirely of ill-educated mullahs whose knowledge of Islamic theology and the wider world was very limited. Had they had better information, they would likely have been more aware of the risks they took in allowing Osama bin Laden to use Afghanistan as a base for his international jihad against the United States and the West in general. However, the Taliban had shown little interest in the affairs of al-Qaeda. Although it was the training base for that movement, few Afghans were involved. Afghans were willing to die in a jihad to free their own country, but they were unwilling to die in other people's jihads. Also, because they saw martyrdom as a consolation prize and not a goal to be sought, they had no use for plots that were suicidal.

Even before the 9–11 attacks on the United States, the Taliban were isolated by the world community for harboring terrorists and their dependence on revenue from the international drug trade. As a result they became even more dependent on financial and political support from Pakistan and Osama bin Laden. This was to prove their undoing following the September 11 attacks on the United States. Pakistan immediately deserted them, and their alliance with al-Qaeda made them a direct target of the United States. At the beginning of the war Mullah Omar threatened the United States with the same fate as the Russians and British if they dared to enter Afghanistan and called on the Afghan people to rise up against an American attack. The Western press ran many stories of "unconquerable Afghanistan" and the invincibility of Afghan guerillas. However, within weeks of war's beginning, Taliban positions unraveled completely. They first collapsed in the north and west, where Pashtun control had always been most resented. Kabul fell immediately after the Taliban abandoned the city, hoping to regroup in the Pashtun heartland. But this proved no sanctuary when the traditional Pashtun tribal leaders used the opportunity to regain power and expel the Taliban from Kandahar. While Mullah Omar has attempted to rally Taliban remnants who fled to Pakistan, their major tactic has been one of terror: to disrupt attempts to reconstruct Afghanistan and prevent the return of civil order. Far from heeding the Taliban call to rise up en masse against the infidels and demanding the foreign troops leave, the Afghan population appeared more inclined to ask for a larger international force to ensure stability and prevent the country's return to anarchy and civil war.

One reason that United States forces failed to draw the same level of resentment that Soviet troops had received was that the Taliban had already introduced foreign forces into the county: those of the so-called Afghan Arabs and Pakistanis. These groups were widely resented in Afghanistan, so it was not hard for the United States to build a coalition against them. The American invasion also exposed the weakness of the Taliban even in the Pashtun region. At the time the Taliban collapsed there were probably fewer than a thousand American troops actually inside Afghanistan. In a very real sense this was merely a continuation of an Afghan fight where the winning side now had access to enough American cash to buy out most of its opponents and enough American air power to decimate the Arab Afghans and Pakistanis who chose to fight. Using one foreign invader to rid the country of another fell well within the Afghan political tradition. And the Americans could be counted upon to leave the country at some point, while it was widely feared that Pakistanis and Arabs would not, so in this case using a non-Muslim power to rid the country of unwelcome foreign Muslims was deemed acceptable. In the short run at least the pragmatism of the Afghans proved more significant than any religious ideology.

 Rebuilding Afghanistan

In spite of its many problems, the current political leadership of the Afghanistan has proved remarkably pragmatic. The Bonn Accord meetings and the subsequent Loya Jirga in 2002 laid the foundation for a government that incorporated all major ethnic and regional groups. In this process, choosing cooperation rather than conflict was not a vote for idealism.

Rather, the decision was forged by necessity: in nearly a quarter century no faction ever proved capable of dominating the whole country on its own militarily, even with outside help. This experienced reality means that the chances of actually creating a broad-based government are much better than they were in 1992 when the Soviet-backed Najibullah regime collapsed and each faction struggled for supremacy. What will be the role of Islam or Islamists in this process?

Although the number of clerics was far fewer than in previous national Loya Jirgas, conservative Islamists still demanded explicit recognition of shari‘ah law and the creation of Afghanistan as an Islamic state. Their demands were not rejected outright but instead were finessed. Of course the government could be called an Islamic state; was it not a nation of Muslims? As to shari‘ah law, the new government pointed to the 1964 constitution, which had been reinstated and had already declared that all national laws would be in accord with Islam, so that issue was moot as well. Both in the 1964 constitution and in the new draft constitution, this assertion that a government run by Muslims is an Islamic government remains a typically Afghan way of avoiding conflict on this issue. The reason that it serves as an acceptable compromise is rooted in Afghanistan’s maintenance of an older form of Islamic society in which it is not easy to tease out separate strands of religious belief from other aspects of life. The very importance of Islam as parts of people’s everyday identity paradoxically reduces the power of the ‘ulama because most Afghans reject their claim of having a monopoly on defining religious orthodoxy to the rest of society. This allows political leaders, as long as they stay within the broad outlines of the faith, considerable flexibility in the policies they pursue. For example, for the first time in Afghan history, Shia legal schools are recognized in the draft Afghan constitution for disputes among Shias where no national law applies, although the Hanafi legal interpretation retains its dominance elsewhere. This increased recognition of minority rights, however, has less to do with a newfound tolerance than a recognition of the de facto autonomy of the country’s regions and religious minorities.

There are great difficulties, however, in looking at the prospects for democratic pluralism because the one set of key players in civil society, political parties, are still lacking. Political factions of course exist, but these are based primarily on personal, regional, or ethnic interests. There is a striking absence of the intellectuals who formerly played a strong role in laying out their visions for an Afghan future, and the former political elite in Kabul that used the ideological party model is all but defunct. While parties will emerge in time, they are not players now. And with all current factions claiming some Islamic justification for their actions, Islam itself becomes a locus of contest and not the basis of a distinct political ideology. As a result, civil society in Afghanistan is still very much a work in progress. The idea of popular sovereignty and individual civil rights are far from being accepted as a given, let alone firmly established. In this regard most Afghans are more in sympathy with the traditional ‘ulama view that no democratic majority, however large, can change laws established by God (Zaman, this volume). But precisely because of the wide variety of crosscutting ties that make politics in the country so complex, this respect for God’s authority does not immediately transfer itself to the Islamic parties or leaders as God’s agents. As long as Islam is seen as bound into Afghan life at every level, it will be difficult to tell any individual Muslim how to live his life. While respect for individual autonomy is far from the extensive sets of individual rights embodied in various international human rights conventions, the Afghan view of the individual’s role in society does provide a space for debate and contest that is very real.

However the country develops, Afghanistan is likely to march to its own drummer to a tune of its own making.

 References Cited

Arnold, Anthony. 1983. Afghanistan’s Two-Party communism: Parcham and Khalq. Stanford, Calif.: Hoover Institution Press, Stanford University.

Barfield, Thomas. 1996. “The Afghan Morass.” Current History 95, no. 597: 38–43.

———. 2001. “Idol Threats.” Religion in the News 4, no. 2: 4–7.

Dupree, Louis. 1978. Afghanistan. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Economist, The (London). 2001. “The Monster.” May 26, p. 12 (U.S. edition).

GusrozziAntonro. 2.00Ö. [,]Wai■, Po‹itandSocejtyiiAfghanii a,1978— 999.. London: Hurst.

Goodson, Larry. 2001. Afghanistan’s Endless War: State Failure, Regional Politics, and the Rise of the Taliban. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Hanifi, Shah Mahmoud. 2001. Inter-regional Trade and Colonial State Formation in Nineteenth-century Afghanistan. Ph.D. dissertation, University of Michigan.

Hewad (Kabul). 2001. “Afghan Taleban: Conversion to Christianity in Muslim society against UN charter.” Translated by BBC Worldwide Monitoring. January 13, pp. 1–2.

Hyman, Anthony. 1992. Afghanistan under Soviet domination, 1964–1991, 3rd ed. Hampshire, U.K.: Macmillan Academic and Professional.

Ibn Khaldun, ‘Abd al-Rahman b. Muhammad. 1967. The Muqaddimah: An Introduction to History. Translated by Franz Rosenthal. Abridged ed. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Kakar, M. Hasan. 1971. Afghanistan: A Study in International Political Developments, 1880–1896. Kabul: Government Printing House.

———. 1979. Government and Society in Afghanistan: The Reign of Amir ‘Abd al-Rahman Khan. Austin: University of Texas Press.

———. 1995. Afghanistan: The Soviet Invasion and the Afghan Response, 1979–1982. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Kamali, Mohammad Hashim. 1985. Law in Afghanistan. Leiden: Brill.

Nawid, Senzil K. 1999. Religious Response to Social Change in Afghanistan, 1919–1929: King Aman-Allah and the Afghan Ulema. Costa Mesa, Calif.: Mazda Publishers.

Olesen, Asta. 1995. Islam and Politics in Afghanistan. Richmond, U.K.: Curzon.

Poullada, Leon. 1973. Reform and Rebellion in Afghanistan, 1919–1929; King Amanullah’s Failure to Modernize a Tribal Society. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

Rashid, Ahmed. 2000. Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil, and Fundamentalism in Central Asia. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Roy, Olivier. 1990. Afghanistan: Islam and Resistance in Afghanistan. 2nd ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1995. Afghanistan: From Holy War to Civil War. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Rubin, Barnett R. 1995. The Search for Peace in Afghanistan: From Buffer State to Failed State. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

———. 2002. The Fragmentation of Afghanistan: State Formation and Collapse in the International System. 2nd ed. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Shahrani, M. Nazif, and Robert L. Canfield, eds. 1984. Revolutions and Rebellions in Afghanistan: Anthropological Perspectives. Berkeley: Institute of International Studies, University of California Press.

Shari’at (Kabul). 2001. Editorial. Translated by BBC Worldwide Monitoring.

February 28, pp. 1–2.

Al-Sharq al-Awsat (London). 2001. “Egypt’s Mufti Wasil Interviewed on Recent Visit to Afghanistan.” Translated by BBC Summary of World Broadcasts. March 20.

Times (London). 2001. “Taleban Boasts of Smashing ‘Idols.’” March 6.

 Chapter 10: Islam and the Cultural Politics of Legitimacy: Malaysia in the Aftermath of September 11

Michael G. Peletz

Four weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon that occurred on September 11, 2001, the American government began a massive bombing campaign in Afghanistan to dislodge the Taliban and root out and destroy the al-Qaeda network that was believed to be responsible for the September 11 carnage. As was widely expected, the days immediately following the beginning of the U.S. bombing saw major protests throughout the Muslim world. October 12, for example, witnessed a demonstration involving over three thousand people in front of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy in Kuala Lumpur, the federal capital of the Muslim- majority nation of Malaysia. By the time the demonstrators attained a critical mass, they were dispersed with water cannons and the threat of rubber bullets and other forms of retaliation by security forces under the direction of Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, a (relatively) secular nationalist who is well known throughout the world for his liberal economic reasoning and authoritarian governance. Also by this time, leaders of the major Islamist opposition party (the pan-Malaysian Islamic party, or PAS), whose supporters include over a million registered voters, had called for a jihad or “holy war” against the United States. Not surprisingly, sidewalk vendors in certain parts of the country boasted brisk sales of T-shirts bearing Osama bin Laden’s face and the phrase “Man of the World.”

Many Americans who followed these stories on CNN or through sen- sationalistic reports in the New York Times and other media outlets experienced an unsettling sense of dejâ vu. To them—and of course to many others—it seemed that with regard to attitudes toward the West and America specifically, Muslims in Malaysia partake of the same sensibilities as “fundamentalist” or “extremist” Muslims associated with al-Qaeda, the Taliban, Hamas, Hezbollah, and the like.

These impressions were reinforced in the months that followed when intelligence experts and media specialists repeatedly referred to Malaysia in the Western press as a “staging area” or “launching pad” for terrorist attacks against the United States. To bolster this claim, Western intelligence officials invariably point to the existence of (classified) photographic evidence of a January 2000 meeting in Kuala Lumpur at the condominium owned by a Malay Muslim (Yazid Sufaat) and his wife (Se- jahratul Dursina). The thirty-eight-year-old Yazid, a biochemist turned businessman trained at California State University-Sacramento as well as a former captain in the Malaysian army, is believed to be a local supporter of al-Qaeda and to have hosted a meeting in his condominium with at least three al-Qaeda operatives. Two of these latter men (Nawak Alhazmi and Khalid al-Midhar) were among the hijackers of American Airlines Flight 66, which crashed into the Pentagon. The third, Zacarias Moussaoui, is the Moroccan-born French citizen who is assumed to have been “the twentieth hijacker” and is currently on trial in the United States on charges of conspiring in the September 11 attacks.

Yazid, who was arrested in Malaysia in December 2001 and has been in detention ever since, is often referred to as the “money man,” since he is believed to have supplied Moussaoui with the funds and official papers that enabled him to travel to the United States and collaborate with the other hijackers. Yazid’s wife was arrested along with thirteen others in April 2002, in a series of raids by Malaysian authorities that are said to have turned up military training notes, computers, and a map of Malaysia’s largest port (Port Klang). These arrests were widely reported in the Western media. So, too, were the arrests of alleged Islamic militants in neighboring Singapore in December 2001 and August 2002, which yielded information suggesting they intended to bomb U.S. interests and a variety of “soft targets” in Singapore, Malaysia, and beyond.

The sense one might get from afar that Malaysia is a hotbed of terrorist activity and that large numbers of Malaysia’s Muslims are violent militants is bolstered by government accounts of the organization known as Jemaah Islamiyah, roughly, “the Islamic group” (see Hefner, this volume). The sixty-five-year-old Indonesian-born cleric who is the spiritual leader of this group, Abu Bakar Bashir, is an unabashed admirer of Osama bin Laden. Perhaps more germane is that he seeks the creation, by whatever means necessary, of a territorially expansive Islamic state in Southeast Asia that includes southern Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, Brunei, Indonesia, and the southern Philippines. Abu Bakar Bashir fled his Indonesian homeland during the early 1980s, at which point he settled in Malaysia, where he is believed to have begun recruiting local Malays, Indonesians, and others—some of whom fought alongside Mujahidin forces against the Soviets in Afghanistan—and training them in the basics of guerrilla warfare and terrorism. The fact that Abu Bakar Bashir lived in Malaysia for some fourteen years has taken on new meaning following the deadly blasts in Bali on October 12, 2002, which many authorities in Southeast Asia and the West attribute to his organization (Jemaah Islamiyah). Indeed, it is widely assumed, at least in government circles, that Jemaah Islamiyah has numerous cells in Malaysia, and that the months and years ahead could see bombings in Malaysia on a scale as devastating as those in Bali.

The accounts of government officials and journalists are by no means the only phenomena that might give the outside observer cause for alarm. Even the casual traveler to Kuala Lumpur will come across bookshops and sidewalk vendors selling pamphlets, books, audiocassettes, and CDs depicting Osama bin Laden in heroic terms. Similarly, anyone wandering around the Masjid India area of Kuala Lumpur is likely to encounter sidewalk merchants selling Osama bin Laden T-shirts emblazed with images of the fiery explosion and collapse of the World Trade Center. Amid the endless variety of cell-phone holders and other cheap plastic goods hawked on sidewalks throughout the city, one can also find toy tanks marketed as replicas of the tanks used by the Taliban. Impressions along these lines are likely to be reinforced if one journeys to the east coast state of Terengganu, which, like the neighboring state of Kelantan, is under the control of PAS. In Terengganu one cannot miss the billboards along the roadside that endorse the local government's efforts to implement laws known as hudud. These laws entail the harsh punishments specified in the Qur'an for certain criminal offenses, such as amputation of limbs for theft, flogging and imprisonment for fornication, stoning to death for adultery, and so on.

Appearances, though, are not always what they seem. One of the main points I emphasize in this chapter is that despite the embassy demonstration and other external signs that might suggest a radicalization of Islamic sensibilities in Malaysia in the wake of September 11, most Muslims in Malaysia continue to be quite moderate and democratically oriented. A second point is that global dynamics set in motion by the events of September 11 have altered the political playing fields in Malaysia in a variety of deeply significant ways, some rather predictable, others definitely not. On the one hand, they greatly strengthened Prime Minister Mahathir's hand vis-â-vis his political opponents, including PAS supporters and others committed to the creation of an Islamic state as well as those of a more liberal and cosmopolitan bent who have focused their reformist energy on restoring the integrity of the secular judiciary and expanding the space of civil society. In the process these dynamics have undercut opportunities for the expansion of civil society and the pluralistic sensibilities underlying them. On the other hand, dynamics associated with September 11 and its aftermath have enhanced the legitimacy of increasingly high-profile Muslim feminist organizations, such as Sisters in Islam, who have worked to bring about reforms in the Islamic courts and other Islamic institutions so as to improve the legal options and overall living standards of Muslim women. This is an exceedingly important development, but it has come at considerable cost to the most visible spokespersons of such groups and others who have questioned one or another official version of Islam.

A third point I underscore is that analysis of the larger context in which the embassy demonstrations occurred indicates that Muslims in Malaysia are not all that concerned with positioning themselves against the West. More pressing than any such “inter-civilizational” clashes, to invoke Samuel Huntington’s (1996) highly problematic terminology and prophecy, are the struggles over which contested visions of Islam should prevail in Malaysia in the present and the future. The key debates—and certainly the ones that are most intensely felt—in other words, bear on intra-civilizational clashes, not those of an inter-civilizational variety. The same is true of neighboring Indonesia and many other parts of the Islamic world (Hefner 2000; Eickelman and Piscatori 1996; Lawrence 1998; Kepel 2002).

To put some of this in slightly different terms, the politics of legitimacy has reached unprecedented levels of intensity in Malaysia. One result has been the intensification of discursive wars of position built around Manichaean contrasts between “good Muslims” on the one side and “bad Muslims” on the other. Partly because certain categories of “bad Muslims” are defined as apostates, infidels, or both, these wars of position have heightened the salience of divides between Muslims and nonMuslims. More generally, all such dynamics make clear that the main challenges to the state come not from territorial or other claims made by ethnic or religious minorities, but from competing claims within the de- mographically and politically dominant Malay Muslim community.

 Background and Context

Malaysia is frequently described in travel brochures and academic treatises as “the crossroads of Asia,” owing to the country’s rich cultural and ethnic diversity. The ethnic mosaic is usually discussed in terms of four major categories.[40] “Malays,” all of whom are Muslims, make up about 51 percent of the total population. “Chinese,” who are usually described as practicing a syncretistic blend of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism, compose about 26 percent. “Indians,” most of whom are Hindus, though some are Sikh, Christian, or Muslim, account for about 7 percent. And “Others,” including hill-dwelling aborigines, Eurasians, and the like, make up the remaining 16 percent (Government of Malaysia 2000).

The legal system is frequently glossed as pluralistic to highlight the diversity and variegated provenance of its three major traditions of law: Malay customary law (adat), which pertains only to Malays; Islamic law (Malay, syariah, Arabic, shari’a), which is relevant to Malays and all other Muslims, albeit to a limited range of their affairs; and national (statutory) law introduced by British colonists in the nineteenth century, which bears on all citizens and others in Malaysia. Malaysia’s political institutions include a system of parliamentary democracy and a constitutional monarchy, much like the British system upon which it is modeled. They also include an indigenous (Malay) polity of precolonial origin, which has been stripped of most of its power but is formally intact.

Malaysia has a population of some 24 million people. I would argue, though, that the Malaysian case is of much greater significance than the country’s demographic girth might suggest at first glance. One set of reasons for this is that Malaysia is among the most successful of the “non-Confucian” Asian tigers and has also sustained a pace of rapid development that is probably second to none in the Muslim world. Another is that Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir (r. 1981–20033) far more than any of his predecessors, successfully projected both the Malaysian case and his particular ideas on political-economic modernization as an emulable model for other regions of the world. The seventy-eight-year- old Mahathir has frequently claimed) for example) that the Malaysian model of growth-led development that is simultaneously informed by transcendent Islamic values and “smart partnerships” linking the civil service) the private sector) and political leaders is a preferred alternative to Western-style development in other Muslim-majority nations and in much of the southern hemisphere as a whole. In his “role as ‘emissary’ for the South)” Mahathir has also offered “a post-Bandung discourse of Malaysian-style ‘economic nationalism’ for peripheral states to follow [that is] fashioned around themes of political solidarity with poor and developing countries” (Hilley 2001) 99). Mahathir’s messages have been well received in many quarters) both at home and abroad. This is partly because in the course of a mere generation or so Malaysia has catapulted itself into the slender ranks of Muslim countries with appreciable middle classes and burgeoning if still precarious civil societies (Abdul Rahman Embong 2002). Circumstances such as these help explain why Malaysia has become a locus of nationalist) transnational) and academic discourses concerning “Muslim modernities)” “Asian modernities)” and “alternative modernities” generally (Ong 1999; Peletz 2002; see also Appadurai 1996; Eickelman and Piscatori 1996; Rofel 1999; Hefner 2000).

It remains to emphasize that ethnic distinctions and antagonisms in Malaysia are infused with far-reaching religious) political) and economic significance and have been exacerbated by development strategies of the postcolonial government. This is most evident with the New Economic Policy (NEP, 1971–90), which sought to eradicate poverty among all Malaysians and to “restructure society” by undermining the material and symbolic connections between ethnic categories on the one hand and economic standing and function on the other. By pursuing policies to help the predominantly rural and agricultural Malays “catch up” economically with Chinese and Indians, the government has placed tremendous emphasis on “race” (on being a Malay or a non-Malay) as a criterion in allocating government loans and subsidies and other scarce resources (university scholarships, contractors’ licenses, start-up funds for businesses, etc.). These policies have heightened the awareness of distinctions between Malays and non-Malays and made them all the more politically and economically salient.

The NEP also exacerbated class antagonisms within the Malay community. Although its programs helped create a Malay middle class and enriched some Malays quite substantially, they left other Malays no better (and, in some cases, relatively worse) off than before in terms of material standing and access to social justice. Reactions to the NEP have taken many forms, including active and passive resistance to the Green Revolution implemented as a key feature of the NEP in many areas, and disaffection from the central clique of the ruling political party and from the party in its entirety.

Dissatisfaction with the government’s commitment to modernity and the NEP in particular has fueled Malaysia’s Islamic resurgence. The resurgence is known as the dakwah (Arabic da’wa) movement. The term dakwah means to invite or call one to the Islamic cause, or to respond to the invitation or call, hence missionary work, including making Muslims better Muslims. The resurgence is usually said to date from the early 1970s, even though it is most appropriately viewed as an outgrowth of earlier developments in Islamic nationalism and reform, such as those associated with the Kaum Muda (Young Group) movement of the 1920s and 1930s (Roff 1967). The dakwah movement is thoroughly homegrown but has also been inspired by Islamist groups and Islamic revivalism in Indonesia, Pakistan, Egypt, Libya, and other parts of the Muslim world.

Most scholars approach the resurgence as response, indeed a form of resistance, to one or more of the following analytically related and culturally interlocked sets of developments. The first development concerns the postcolonial state’s Western-oriented modernization policies (noted above), which entail a heavily interventionist role for the state with respect to economic planning, distribution, and capitalist processes as a whole. These policies are widely seen as contributing to Malaysia’s overdependence on Western capital; to the economic success of Chinese and Indians relative to Malays; and to upper-class corruption as well as deracination and moral and spiritual bankruptcy throughout the Malay community. The second development involves the simultaneous shifting and hardening of class interests and animosities, especially between the newly emerged middle class and an entrenched (aristocratic) ruling class. The third development is the tightening of ethnic boundaries, particularly those separating Malays and Chinese. These boundaries have become increasingly pronounced and freighted in recent decades, owing largely to NEP-era practices highlighting race in the allocation of scarce government resources. The NEP is commonly regarded as having encouraged cultural assertiveness—some would say chauvinism—among Malays (Chandra Muzaffar 1987; Zainah Anwar 1987). This cultural assertiveness is especially evident as regards Islam, the practice of which, along with speaking the Malay language and observing Malay “custom” (adat), is a defining feature, and increasingly the key symbol, of Malay- ness. More broadly, scholars generally view the dakwah movement as a powerful vehicle for the articulation of moral opposition to government development policies, traditional as well as emergent class structures, other ethnic groups, or some combination of these or related phenomena (Shamsul A.B. 1983; Nagata 1984; Chandra Muzaffar 1987; Zainah Anwar 1987; Muhammad Abu Bakar 1987; Husin Mutalib 1993; Peletz 1997, 2002).

Dakwah organizations are highly diverse and their objectives are in certain respects mutually incompatible. However, they all share an overriding concern to revitalize or reactualize (local) Islam and the (local) Muslim community by encouraging stronger commitment to the teachings of the Qur’an and the hadith, in order to effect a more Islamic way of life (din). The main groups have included the following: (1) Darul Arqam, a communal, land-based organization that enjoined its members to emulate the life of the Prophet and that strove for economic selfsufficiency by establishing its own schools, clinics, mosques, business enterprises, and shopping centers; it was banned by the government in 1994; (2) Jamaat Tabligh, a loosely structured Delhi-based missionary organization seeking to revitalize the spirit of Islam by means of one-on- one contacts, informal discussion groups, and the personal examples set by its itinerant missionaries; and (3) ABIM (Angkatan Belia Islam Malaysia; the Muslim Youth Movement of Malaysia), which emphasizes formal education and is extremely popular among university students, former student leaders, and youth generally, and encourages lobbying efforts, active participation in party politics, and otherwise “working within the system.”

Also worthy of mention here is the major opposition party, PAS (Parti Islam Se-Malaysia; the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party), the successor to the Hizbul Muslimin (Islamic Party) formally inaugurated in 1948, which has a decidedly populist orientation and has been a key player in Malaysian politics since shortly after its formation in 1951 (Kessler 1978; Safie bin Ibrahim 1981; Firdaus Haji Abdullah 1985). Strictly speaking, PAS is not part of the dakwah movement, though many of its objectives are espoused by some segments of the movement. The most basic of these objectives is the creation of an Islamic state with the Qur’an and the Sunnah as its constitution.

The relationships between the various segments of the movement and the state merit careful consideration, for they have fueled many political and religious dynamics in contemporary Malaysia. As far as most scholars are concerned, Darul Arqam has never posed an appreciable threat to the state (its banning by the government in 1994 notwithstanding). But ABIM and PAS clearly have, particularly since their leaders have frequently charged the ruling party (UMNO, the United Malays National Organization) with failing to safeguard the interests and well-being of the Malay community, especially with regard to Islam. PAS in particular has also claimed that the ruling party has sold out to local Chinese and Indians as well as foreign capitalists, all of whom are seen as having contributed both to Malaysia's underdevelopment and dependence on foreign markets and to its moral decadence and spiritual bankruptcy.

In such a religious and political climate the ruling party has to work overtime to validate its Islamic credentials—relegitimize the party and the state—and thus co-opt, or at least undercut, both the Islamic resurgents and the opposition party. This means going forward with its own far-reaching but ultimately rather moderate Islamization program, which is simultaneously a consequence of the dakwah phenomenon and a key factor in its promotion along state- and regime-friendly lines. This program to "out-Islamicize" the opposition, which does at times have those qualities of an arms race that Gregory Bateson (1936), in a very different context, referred to as "schismogenesis," has included: the creation of an international Islamic university, an Islamic stock market, and a nationwide system of Islamic banking and insurance (all geared ultimately toward meeting the material and other needs of the urban middle classes and assuring them that one can be both authentic Muslims and members of a modern middle class); the building and refurbishing of prayer houses and mosques; and the passage of myriad legislative measures bearing on Islam and Islamic law specifically. The government's Islamization program has also entailed the co-optation of charismatic Muslim intellectuals, partly by offering them influential posts in the administration. The most stunning success in this regard occurred in 1982 when Mahathir succeeded in converting then ABIM President Anwar Ibrahim to the cause of UMNO, thus fracturing the Islamist opposition. (In subsequent years Anwar rose through the ranks to become deputy prime minister, a position he held until he was ousted and jailed in 1998). Broadly speaking, state strategies overseen by Mahathir have succeeded in undercutting PAS and ABIM, and in retaining the support of urban middle-class Malays who are most responsive to dakwah appeals. But they have also seriously alienated non-Malays, who make up nearly half of Malaysia's multiethnic population, just as they have intensified ethnic antagonism. Indeed, Chinese and Indians see the Islamic resurgence as an overtly political movement with strong xenophobic overtones bent on eroding the rights of non-Muslims and subjecting them to the dictates of Islam.

As should be clear, many of the organizations associated with Malaysia's Islamic resurgence are embroiled in struggles with different groups of national elites concerning the role, scope, and force of Islam in Malaysia's modernity project, as is the main Islamic opposition party (PAS). Also centrally involved or directly implicated in such struggles are activist-oriented Muslim feminists who reject PAS-style Islamization as misguided and misogynist; and "ordinary Muslims" (or "ordinary Malays"; the two terms are used here interchangeably), who are not in the forefront of contemporary religious or political developments but are among the more enduring targets of resurgents' efforts at cultural cleansing. Ordinary Muslims compose the majority of the Muslim population and are most directly affected by the changes sought in Islamic law, though the themes of broader significance are the pluralistic nature of Malaysian Islam and the highly contested nature of Islamic legal institutions and their role in modernity in contemporary Malaysia.

 The Aftermath of September 11

I noted earlier that the events of September 11 greatly strengthened Mahathir's hand vis-â-vis his political opponents, especially the Malay Muslims among them. This is largely because in the weeks and months following September 11, Mahathir and his ruling party deftly painted their PAS adversaries as "extremists" with Taliban, if not al-Qaedastyle, sensibilities and aspirations. In addition, Mahathir and other UMNO elites engineered the high-profile arrests of dozens of political opponents—nearly all of them Malay Muslims—who were detained under the dreaded Internal Security Act (ISA), on the grounds of "national security." Some of those arrested may have been passive supporters or active members of Jemaah Islamiyah or a shadowy organization known as the Malaysian Militant/Mujahidin Group (Kumpulan Mili- tan/Mujahidin Malaysia, KMM), whose professed goals resonate in important ways with those of al-Qaeda (Abuza 2003). But many of the arrests seemed to have had little if anything to do with real or imagined threats to national security and everything to do with Mahathir's obsessive concerns to undercut his political rivals and silence the rest of the population via self-censorship.

Overall, Mahathir's actions helped convince the electorate that PAS supporters are dangerous, violent extremists capable of harboring if not working directly with groups such as al-Qaeda. But UMNO still has to work very hard to win elections. Indeed, some knowledgeable observers contend that they must work ever more strenuously—by hook or by crook—in each election in order to emerge victorious. So the point here is not that because of September 11 and its aftermath the ruling party has been in a position to sit back and coast. It is, rather, that the dynamics of September 11 enabled UMNO to stem the electoral shift toward PAS that occurred as a result of the enduring crises that Mahathir created in the latter part of 1998 by his sacking, jailing, and pillorying of his former heir apparent, Anwar Ibrahim, on largely trumped-up charges of sodomy, corruption, and bribery. As many readers may recall, Anwar was convicted in the secular courts and sentenced to fifteen years in prison after a mockery of a trial characterized by gross irregularities on the part of government prosecutors and judges. The Anwar trial and the ensuing crises it created dealt a serious blow to the independence and integrity of the judiciary, and were partly responsible for the electoral shift toward PAS—and the growth of a multiparty opposition coalition consisting of PAS, the National Justice Party (Parti Keadilan Nasional, headed by Anwar's wife, Wan Azizah Wan Ismail), the (predominantly Chinese) Democratic Action Party, and the socialist-oriented People's Party of Malaysia (Parti Rakyat Malaysia, or PRM)—that was evident in the national elections of November 1999. But the more relevant point, to repeat, is that September 11 halted the electoral shift toward PAS just as it undercut the opposition alliance and the reformasi (reform) movement associated with it. The paramount dilemma for PAS, as one of the party's intellectuals expressed it to me in an interview in August 2002, is that "people are afraid of us now." The understandably triumphant UMNO perspective is succinctly conveyed in the words of the press secretary of an

UMNO politician from Kelantan whom I interviewed (in August 2002 as well); “September 11 was a godsend for us.”

UMNO’s ascendancy since September 11 has contributed to heightened political stability, at least in the short run. It also signals the willingness of Malaysians to work with the United States in pursuing policies of mutual interest, some of which reflects the more pervasive sense that UMNO and its national leaders speak for the majority of Malays and the majority of Malaysians; and that the fortunes of Malays and Malaysians as a whole are very much intertwined with those of the United States. The United States is Malaysia’s largest trading partner and largest foreign investor, and many people in Malaysia are well aware that they benefit directly from the stability and strength of America’s economy and other institutions.

There is, however, a major downside to the closer relationship that has developed between U.S. leaders and Mahathir since September 11. The unprecedented coziness that now characterizes relations between Washington and Kuala Lumpur has dealt a terrible blow to local and international campaigns geared toward pressuring Malaysian authorities to reduce corruption, restore the integrity of the judiciary, and clean up their record on human rights. One of the consistent themes that emerged from my (August 2002) interviews with lawyers, judges, and other professionals is that when it comes to Malaysia, U.S. policy makers are single-mindedly preoccupied with insuring that its leaders join the U.S. “war against terror.” Consequently, the United States stopped exerting pressure on Mahathir to reestablish the autonomy and integrity of the judiciary and to expand human rights and civil society. Haji Suleiman Abdullah, who is one of the most prominent legal experts in the country as well as the head of the Syariah Bar Council and former head of the Malaysian Bar Association, told me quite emphatically that with little or no U.S. pressure on the prime minister to “clean up his act,” the judiciary will be further eroded and human rights will continue to suffer. He added that in the aftermath of the Anwar affair, reformers had attained a critical momentum, which had dissipated in the wake of September 11. Worse, though, is what Suleiman and some of his colleagues ruefully refer to as the “ASEANization” of basic Malaysian institutions. What is meant by this turn of phrase is that once reputable Malaysian institutions like the judiciary and the civil service have deteriorated to the levels characteristic of their counterparts in neighboring ASEAN countries such as Indonesia and the Philippines.

Suleiman and many others see the U.S. Patriot Act as a complete vindication of Mahathir's heavy-handed use of the dreaded ISA to deal with his critics. One pro-Mahathir line of reasoning I encountered runs as follows: "The United States has been a democracy for over two hundred years and you still need these kinds of laws. Malaysia has only been independent and democratic for about fifty years, so of course we still need them." Mahathir was in fact emboldened by U.S. policy to the point of claiming that the Patriot Act is modeled on Malaysia's ISA! Many Malaysians, moreover, see the Patriot Act and related measures as profoundly hypocritical, and as one more example of U.S. hostility toward Muslims. Perhaps more important, they emphasize that the prolonged detentions of Muslim minorities, without trial or specific charges, sets an abysmal example and sends a terribly disheartening message to those throughout the world who are engaged in struggles to enhance pluralistic sensibilities and democratic institutions. With regard to these issues, then, and perhaps more obviously U.S. cocreation and support of Israeli policies toward Palestinians, the U.S. bombing of Afghanistan, and the U.S.- led war against Iraq, Muslim professionals and others in Malaysia evince significant hostility toward the United States that could easily grow and solidify in the months and years ahead. This is all the more likely if the United States proceeds with the establishment of a regional counterterrorism center on Malaysian soil and the promotion throughout the Muslim world and beyond of Mahathir as an exemplary Muslim leader who represents the best of Islam and modernity if not "the shining light of moderate Islam" (Shamsul A.B. 2001, 4709, emphasis added).

* Muslim Feminists and the PUM Controversy

I mentioned earlier that events since September 11 have augmented the legitimacy of high-profile Muslim feminist organizations like Sisters in Islam. In the process these events have drawn positive attention to the activities and agendas of such groups, which are geared toward improving the legal options and living standards of Muslim women in accordance with contemporary reinterpretations of sacred religious texts. The enhanced legitimacy has come about partly because organizations like Sisters in Islam have long been highly critical of PAS and other Islamist groups on the grounds that they are backward-looking, intolerant, misogynist, extremist, and otherwise dangerous. As a result of post-September 11 developments, Muslims and non-Muslims alike are listening more carefully to what the Sisters in Islam have to say about the Qur'an, Islam, and policies toward women, as well as issues of equality, justice, and democracy generally. Dynamics such as these bode well for Muslim and other women in Malaysia, particularly since they are drawing women into public and specifically political arenas in new and productive ways.

Like university-educated Muslim feminists in many other parts of the world (Ahmed 1992; Afkhami 1995), the women involved in Sisters in Islam have endeavored to promote alternative readings of foundational Islamic texts such as the Qur'an and the hadith. These scholarly efforts are aimed at recuperating the egalitarian ethical and legal sensibilities of early Islam that were stifled by more hierarchical readings of classic texts, the latter of which gained ascendancy in the course of the formal codification and official elaboration of Islamic law and "custom" that occurred in the centuries after the deaths of the Prophet and his companions. Drawing also on the liberal sensibilities of global feminism and transnational NGOs concerned with women's issues and human rights, Sisters in Islam have campaigned vigorously to insure greater legal and basic human rights for Muslim women. They have done so mostly by organizing high-profile workshops and conferences, by writing letters to the editors of major dailies, by publishing pamphlets and books (with titles such as Are Muslim Men Allowed to Beat Their Wives?), and by formal and informal lobbying efforts of various kinds. Much of their energy has been devoted to ameliorating problems associated with polygyny, abandonment, and the mistreatment of women in the context of marriage and divorce. They have also forced the government to respond with various legislative and policy measures, including the passage in 1994 of a national law against domestic violence that has informed judicial process in the Islamic courts and has also had salutary effects in Malaysian society as a whole.

Sisters in Islam is a very small organization with perhaps only a dozen or so formal members (part of a deal struck with the government that they would not attempt to create a mass movement). Despite their small numbers, the Sisters in Islam have extensive networks with other progressive NGOs, both local and transnational, and are frequently featured in the local media. The bottom line is that because of their adept engagement in coalitional politics, their influence is enormous (see also Singerman, this volume). They work closely with officials in various ministries, including but not limited to the Ministry of Women and Family Development, and they are in direct communication with the prime minister himself on legislative and policy matters concerning women and religion. The Sisters in Islam are also taken quite seriously by high-ranking officials in the indigenous polity, like the Sultan of Selangor, though some ordinary Muslims regard them as too radical, too feminist, and/or too Western in their approaches to textual interpretation, advocacy, and reform. More generally, the Sisters in Islam promote a vision of Islam that is highly principled, inclusive, and pluralistic. In these and other ways they have contributed a great deal to the cultivation and "scaling up" of sentiments and dispositions that are conducive to the expansion of civil society. In all likelihood, they will continue to do so in the months and years ahead.

To better appreciate where the Sisters in Islam are situated in the playing fields of contemporary Malaysian Islam, we might consider some of the points that emerged in interviews I conducted with members of the organization in August 2002. One of the program directors, Ruzana Udin, underscored that the Sisters in Islam is the only group in Malaysia that is fighting within an Islamic framework for women's rights; that they are caught in the middle of the struggle between UMNO and PAS; and that Mahathir and UMNO are not really "pro-women" but are quite liberal compared to PAS. Mahathir "gave space" to Sisters in Islam partly because the government needs moderate voices like theirs to help them undercut PAS. This relationship leads moderate Muslims to support Sisters in Islam, but it also contributes to the view that Sisters in Islam is "linked to" (managed by) the government.

My conversation with Zainah Anwar, the extremely articulate and highly personable executive director of the organization, focused largely on PAS. This is not surprising since like many others involved with Muslim feminist groups and progressive NGOs, she sees PAS as the chief impediment to the realization of her objectives to win the hearts and minds of the new Muslim middle classes. “We were against the World Trade Center bombings, but we are also against the U.S. bombing in Afghanistan. [That said,] most moderate Muslims do not support PAS’s call to jihad against the U.S.” By way of contextualizing PAS’s foreign policy views in more expansive terms, she mentioned that “Harakah [the PAS newspaper] is very anti-American,” to which she added, “PAS felt that the Taliban were a good Islamic government, partly because they ‘protected’ women”:

Since September 11, many human rights NGOs that had been allied with PAS have abandoned them [because] much that PAS has done has backfired: the declaration of jihad against the U.S.; the PUM controversy [about which more below]; and the hudud law issue ... Their positions on music, women, culture, dance, hudud—all of this puts them on the intolerant, extremist side of Islam. They have unleashed and helped legitimize a [Malay] mindset of ‘everyone has to defend Islam,’ that ‘Islam is under siege.’ They don’t believe in ijtihad [independent reasoning], ... have medieval, ahistorical minds ... [and] no ability to deal with differences of opinion within Islam.

Turning to some of the broader issues, Zainah observed that “there is a huge middle class here. With so much at stake, they don’t want to take to the streets [like Indonesia]; they’re committed to the democratic process ... [even though] both PAS and UMNO have in different ways tried to break the social contract ... The Sisters in Islam want a consis tent, principled, liberal, progressive Islam,” a goal shared by some in the government. The problem, though, is that due to “police abuse, corruption, the ISA,” and the like, “the government lacks the moral authority to bring about change.” So “we are building a broad base through public education, working with single mothers, Puteri UMNO [the wing of UMNO devoted to young women], young lawyers, religious people, and others, and targeting future leaders.”

Despite their enhanced legitimacy in many circles, the leaders of groups like Sisters in Islam have paid a heavy price for their high-profile critiques of the Islamic courts and various other contemporary Islamic institutions that they see as having developed in ways that are out of keeping with the egalitarian sensibilities of the Prophet’s original message. Zainah Anwar in particular has come under repeated fire from PAS leadership as well as the Persatuan Ulama Malaysia (Association of Malaysian Ulama; PUM), which claims to be a national organization of ‘ulama, or religious scholars. In the early part of 2002, leaders of the PUM—the majority of whom appear to be PAS stalwarts—accused her and five other public intellectuals of insulting the Prophet and disgracing Islam, both of which are grave offenses according to Islamic doctrine and Malaysian state law alike and could result in lengthy prison sentences.[41] In addition, the PUM petitioned the sultans, who are the official heads of Islamic affairs in their respective states, to have religious experts issue an authoritative legal opinion, or fatwa, that would condemn all six of the individuals involved and declare that the five of them who are Muslims are guilty of apostasy, an offense that many Muslims in Malaysia and elsewhere feel should result in the death penalty. The individuals thus targeted include (in addition to Zainah Anwar): Patricia Martinez, a well regarded scholar of Islam; Kas- sim Ahmad and Akbar Ali, both of whom are respected journalists; Malik Imtiaz Sarwar, an accomplished lawyer specializing in human rights; as well as Farish Noor, an incisive and outspoken political scientist, human rights activist, and journalist who perhaps more than any of the others has been vilified for his controversial remarks about the need for an Islamic reformation in Malaysia and elsewhere in the Muslim world. Some of these individuals have had their cars vandalized and have received anonymous threats that they will be raped or killed or both if they persist in their criticisms of official views of Islam. Needless to say, this kind of retaliation has taken a tremendous toll. Certain of the individuals thus targeted are understandably loath to remain in Malaysia, and at least one of them has become despondent to the point of contemplating suicide.

* Hudud Law and Moral Reasoning

A related but analytically distinct dynamic has to do with the previously noted fact that in the aftermath of September 11, Mahathir along with other UMNO leaders and the heads of various NGOs including but not limited to Sisters in Islam have successfully painted PAS and other Islamists into a corner. One consequence has been a hardening of PAS’s positions on many fronts, including the necessity of creating a state apparatus of Islamic design (an “Islamic state”). As a step in the direction of establishing a system of Islamic government and spirituality in Malaysia, the PAS-controlled state government of Terengganu passed legislation in July 2002 to implement hudud law, much as the PAS-controlled state government of Kelantan did in 1993. Hudud law deals with crimes and punishments that Muslim jurists have conventionally viewed as derived from foundational Islamic texts such as the Qur'an and the hadith. In Malaysia, the main crimes include theft, highway robbery, fornication, adultery, and apostasy. The key punishments are corporal: amputation of limbs for theft, whipping and imprisonment for fornication that does not involve adultery, stoning to death for adultery, and so forth.

The current hudud controversy is exceedingly complex, partly because many textual, interpretive, procedural, evidentiary, and jurisdictional issues are both unsettled and very much contested (An-Na'im 1990; Rose Ismail 1995; Mohammad Hashim Kamali 1995, 2000). Most important to bear in mind here is that the Terengganu legislation to introduce hudud law is state-level legislation; in order for it to become effective law, it must be approved by the federal government. The federal government vehemently opposes PAS's version of hudud for all sorts of reasons; hence the situation is stalemated, with a showdown likely to develop between the state and federal governments that could well trigger a constitutional crisis.

The hudud controversy is also contributing to a politicization of the otherwise generally nonpoliticized police forces. This is because PAS officials in Terengganu have made clear to local police that they must enforce all religious and other laws passed by the state. Federal officials, for their part, have reminded the police in no uncertain terms that they are federal employees and thus beholden to the federal government's laws and directives, which forbid them enforcing hudud laws. PAS leaders have declared amid much fanfare that they expect the cooperation of local-level police and prison officials, and that if such cooperation is not forthcoming, they will train and deputize volunteer forces both to enforce the law and to build the jails necessary to hold suspects and convicted criminals.

The building of such new penal facilities seems unlikely; but not surprisingly, proclamations pro and con hudud laws are in the papers daily and very much on people’s minds. The more general point is that the largely politically driven circulation of impassioned and dichotomous discourses on hudud is contributing to further polarization within the Muslim community. The cultural political situation that has developed in this community is such that one’s stance on hudud law has become the litmus test of whether or not an individual is, depending on one’s perspective, either an authentic or legitimate Muslim or a backward-looking, dogmatic, and bigoted one.

To refer as I have to the largely politically driven circulation of impassioned discourses on hudud is not to reduce one’s position on hudud to a narrow political calculus. Powerful moral sensibilities animate many of the debates at issue. Both for this reason and because there is a significant and perhaps growing minority of Muslims—both among PAS supporters and among Malays who do not necessarily line up behind PAS platforms—who endorse the implementation of hudud law, it is important to understand hudud’s moral appeal, especially the symbols and idioms in which it is cast and interpreted.

Consider, for example, the views of a middle-aged Malay taxi driver, whom I shall refer to as Ahmad. Concerning Ahmad’s background and social location, I know only a few of the basics: that he served for many years in and is now retired from the armed forces, that he earns a living driving a taxi in and around Kota Baru (Kelantan’s capital), that he has two wives and ten children, and that he solemnized his second marriage across the border in Thailand so as to circumvent state laws requiring that he obtain the permission of the local Islamic court to take a second wife. He was later fined M $300 (U.S. $79) for this breach of state law, but in recounting the circumstances of this marriage to me, he shrugged off the fine as a token fee. More relevant in the broader scheme of things is that his violation of the law did not invalidate the second marriage—a situation that is particularly distressing to Muslim feminists and others who have sought, with mixed success, to reform laws bearing on polygyny (Peletz 2002).

Ahmad, who identifies with and votes for PAS, welcomes the implementation of hudud law primarily because “these are God’s laws, not human laws; they are written in the Qur’an and people cannot tinker with them.” More generally, according to Ahmad, he and others support the laws for two reasons. The first is that “this is what God wants; hence the laws must be followed.” The second is that introduction of the laws will help eliminate corruption and vice. He added that women are safer under hudud, presumably because of the deterrent effect of harsh penalties for rape, but we did not pursue this matter. When I asked about UMNO’s stance against hudud, Ahmad replied that many “ministers, rich guys, and big shots,” including Prime Minister Mahathir, do not back the introduction of hudud laws because the enforcement of such laws would result in their being arrested and punished for the crimes they habitually commit, like adultery (zina) and drinking alcohol.

One of the basic topoi that emerged from our conversation is that UMNO is an organization of “ministers, big guys, big shots,” corruption, and vice, and that PAS takes a principled stand against corruption, vice, and abuse of privilege. The populist critique that runs throughout these comments merits note (Kessler 1978, 1980), as does the fact that such critiques have broad resonance in areas like Kelantan and Terengganu that have been marginalized or largely bypassed by state-sponsored modernity. “Per capita income in Kelantan [is] only a quarter that of the national average, and foreign investment one-tenth the size of adjoining Perlis” (Hilley 2001, 190); things are not much better in Terengganu. The broader theme is that the climate of corruption, vice, and abuse of privilege created by UMNO politicians and their policies goes a long way toward helping to explain why so many Malays support PAS candidates and/or the Islamic resurgence, and the implementation of hudud laws in particular.

Let us proceed to a consideration of the perspectives of an extremely urbane up-and-coming PAS politician, Haji Husam Musa. The forty- four-year-old Husam graduated from the University of Malaya (with a degree in economics), is a member of parliament from a rural district of Kelantan as well as political secretary to Haji Nik Aziz bin Haji Nik Mat (chief minister of Kelantan) and chief of PAS Youth in Kelantan, who occasionally writes for Harakah, PAS’s bimonthly newspaper. When I asked Husam to describe PAS’s major objectives, his short answer was “justice and brotherhood [keadilan and persaudaraan] throughout society.” He went on to explain that “justice must be based on divine instruction, and that the Almighty is the most just in the universe." People "must base their struggle on the Holy Books ... be they the Qur'an, the Bible, or the Old Testament; ... for Muslims [it must be] the Qur'an." Husam added that in contemporary Malaysia, corruption and other crime are endemic; hence there can be no justice. "Look at all the rapes and murder reported in the newspapers. The existing laws do nothing; they are rubbish ...

There is no justice without hudud ... The idea of deterrence is very im portant here; [hudud laws] put fear in the hearts of criminals." Husam also spoke of protection, of the protection that Islam affords to nonMuslims: "liberty, freedom of belief, the right to speak, the right to lead social lives [to socialize and fraternize] as they wish. Mutual respect. We want to establish that again. Brotherhood and justice have been destroyed by UMNO ... because of its emphasis on pragmatism, nationalism, racial sensibilities, and discriminatory affirmative-action policies. The Chinese, for example, have suffered greatly ... But we all come from Adam."

Husam's belief that the existing laws "do nothing" and "are rubbish," coupled with his view that corruption and crime are endemic in Malaysia partly because extant laws have no bite, is obviously key to his support of hudud, which he sees as a gift from God that can serve as a powerful deterrent to corruption and criminality of other kinds. Support for hudud is all the more critical since criminality precludes the development of the peace, justice, ("pan-racial") brotherhood, and universalistic mutual respect that God offers not just to those who have submitted to Islam but to the human community in its entirety.

A broadly congruent set of rationales for the support of hudud is espoused by Haji Suleiman Abdullah who is in his early sixties and, as mentioned earlier, is the former head of the Malaysian Bar Council and one of Malaysia's most respected lawyers. Our conversation turned to hudud law after a discussion of what Suleiman sees as overwhelmingly negative developments in the secular judiciary since the Anwar crisis and September 11 in particular. This context must be borne in mind, for as Husam Musa's previously noted comments make clear, one's position on hudud needs to be examined in the light of one's perspectives concerning the relative integrity of the secular judiciary and the state apparatus in its entirety, including its capacity to create a social and spiritual climate conducive to a moral reign of "law and order."

Hudud "is a covenant with God; if you question it, you're an apostate The adultery and theft provisions of hudud address the sanctity of the family and property, the security of an individual in society, which are core values in most if not all societies. The penalties are not all that severe if they are viewed in light of the damages to society that would occur if the crimes [they are meant to deter] were committed." The crimes are "a major outrage to society, hence you must have a punishment that is comparable Drug use, incest—in Malaysia, these are highest among Muslims ... [They are an] index of 'progress.' ... Our leaders see privatization and economic development ... [but] I worry about the future of society, the drift, and deculturalization, ... [the consequences of] policies of unmitigated economic development." To understand support for hudud we need to bear in mind that "most [people] prefer the framework and certainties of religion; it provides answers and enables people to be part of a community of believers [In Malaysia] most people are basically good, but [we] must strengthen [that]; society needs reminders."

At this juncture I would like to step back from the specifics of the three sets of comments discussed here and draw attention to the strong emphases

(however variably inflected) on restorative—as opposed to retributive—justice. I underscore this theme for three (related) reasons. First, it is of central importance both in Islamic doctrine bearing on jurisprudence and in the actual workings of Islamic law “on the ground,” in Islamic courts (Rosen 1989; Hirsch 1998; Sachedina 2001; Peletz 2002). Second, it is usually overlooked in Western discussions of Islamic law, which typically focus on vengeful, maiming retribution. And third, if we fail to appreciate the moral appeal of restorative justice, we will also fail to grasp why Muslims in Malaysia and elsewhere are increasingly supportive of local and transnational programs aimed at introducing Islamic laws and Islamic states apparatuses in their entirety.

Some of the more general dynamics at issue here have been well described in a recent article on Islam and globalization by Farish Noor (who, as we have seen, has been targeted by the PUM and others owing to his outspoken views on the need for Islamic reformation). Since Far- ish’s commentary is relevant both to Malaysia and far beyond, I quote at length:

Sharia laws and hudud criminal punishments [are] finding increasing appeal in the Islamic world ... [due to] the collapse of the secular development paradigm in so many post-colonial Muslim states. Despite the economic gains from globalization in many countries, in some post-colonial states globalization has taken a toll on the state’s capacity to govern and manage society Externally imposed structural-adjustment policies, a growing dependence on foreign capital and relentless pressure on local governments by global agents have all helped to discredit many Muslim governments—because they failed to reform domestic arrangements adequately to address the ... issues that globalization demands. The net result is they are no longer able to cater to the interests and welfare of their respective constituencies... The encroachment of market forces and neoliberalism turns the secular legal system into a market for goods and services ... Moreover, corruption endemic in poorer countries takes a large bite out of justice.

By contrast, traditional religious courts appear accessible, cheap, reliable, and consistent. The beauty of sharia law—as seen by many ordinary Muslims—is that it at least offers some legal protection with clear verdicts. While many ordinary Muslims will not agree with the actual punishments, and few would relish the thought of ... watch[ing] convicted criminals whipped, stoned, or mutilated, the fact remains that sharia is seen as a credible alternative to a civil/secular legal system alienated from the masses.

This, then, is the predicament faced by many Muslim governments and activists who want to hold back the calls for strict sharia laws and hudud punishments. By failing to improve on the secular legal system ... , they find themselves bereft of an alternative when confronted by ... hardline Islamists who call for religious law The way out of this impasse is obvi ous: reform the civil-law apparatus and make courts open, transparent, just and accessible This in turn should be linked to the wider project of re forming the structures of the post-colonial state itself, so that the other institutions of government—the police, legislature and executive—all perform their respective duties as well Failure to reform would mean opening the way for more demands for an alternative paradigm. The rise of political Islam, which was an urban, global, and modern phenomenon from the beginning, reads as an index to the failure of many modern post-colonial Muslim states. Rather than demonizing hudud, the political elites of much of the Muslim world would do well to take care of the mess in their own backyards. Only then will faith in the civil legal system be restored. (Farish Noor 2002, 23)

The essay by Farish quoted here makes no specific reference to Malaysia, even though the Malaysian-born Farish has written much about cultural politics and religion in his homeland. The essay is framed instead in relation to Pakistan, Iran, Sudan, Nigeria, and the Muslim world as a whole. That said, there is much in Farish’s social scientific framing of the globalizing dynamics at issue that resonates with the remarks of the three Malaysian Muslims cited earlier (Ahmad, Husam Musa, Suleiman Abdullah)—though the latter individuals also invoke issues of sanctity, divine will, God’s covenant, and so forth whereas the more secular Farish does not.

* Hudud, Apostasy, and the Cultural Politics of Legitimacy and Enforced Quietism

As should be clear, there is much heartfelt and powerful debate in Malaysia on the subject of hudud. Somewhat less obvious but no less crucial to appreciate is that most of the public debates concern certain issues and dynamics but not others. The focus is typically on one or more of the following themes: whether the laws should be introduced; why they should or should not be introduced; how and when they might be effectively implemented; what the implications of the laws will be for Muslim women; whether non-Muslims should or will come under their jurisdiction; and why certain groups and broad sectors of society support or oppose the laws. Conspicuously absent from (or at least rather far down toward the bottom of) this list are debates on the ontological status of the laws in quintessentially foundational Islamic texts such as the Qur’an.[42]

There are many reasons for this absence. One has to do with the fact that the Qur’an tends to be available in Malaysia only in Arabic, which the vast majority of Malays cannot actually read (as opposed to recite). Another exceedingly important one in terms of its cultural salience is suggested by Suleiman’s remark that to question God’s covenant in the form of hudud is to be guilty of apostasy (keridahan, kemurtadan), a crime of such gravity that (as noted earlier) it merits the death penalty as far as many Muslims in Malaysia and beyond are concerned. The irony here, though, is that while apostasy is invariably subsumed under the rubric of hudud, scholars of Islam do not universally agree on the precise entailments of apostasy or whether the Qur’an specifies in unqualified terms that apostasy is (or should be) a capital offense. Some learned scholars of Islam in Malaysia and elsewhere, for instance, contend that the Prophet’s message on the latter issue has been distorted by centuries of conservative juristic interpretation and political expediency, and that the Prophet intended the death penalty for apostasy only when it also involved “blasphemy and rebellion against the [Islamic] community and its legitimate leadership” (Mohammad Hashim Kamali 2000, 29, passim). According to this view, the death penalty is not mandated by the Qur’an or any other Islamic source if apostasy does not entail such blasphemy and rebellion, especially if the only transgression at issue involves philosophical or other questioning of one or another conventional or official interpretation of Islam. That said, there is a strong current throughout the entire Muslim community in Malaysia that questioning any aspect of Islam could well lead to divisions within the ummah, and that exposing or widening divisions of the latter sort amounts to “letting down the side” and thus an erosion of Muslim (hence Malay) sovereignty, which is necessarily tantamount to treason. The scope and force of this constrictive current are amplified by the secular policies and strategies of UMNO, including not only Mahathir’s use of the ISA to quell real or imagined dissent cast in religious or other terms, but also the government’s well-honed strategy of convincing the Muslim electorate that Malaysian Islam is always under siege and that extraordinary policing measures are perforce always justified. This is to say that there is an overdetermined reluctance to debate the ontological status of apostasy and many other issues linked to religion.

Another reason for the general absence of debate in Malaysia about the ontological status of hudud in sources such as the Qur’an has to do with matters of intellectual and moral authority and legitimacy. These themes suffused an interview that I conducted in August 2002 with Syed Muhammad Naquib Al-Attas, one of the leading intellectuals in Southeast Asia and one of the world’s most accomplished and respected scholars specializing in Islamic philosophy and metaphysics, Islamic education, and “the Islamization of knowledge.”

Al-Attas is the founder and director of the Kuala Lumpur-based International Institute for Islamic Thought and Understanding (ISTAC), a highly influential (and architecturally stunning) degree-granting institution whose daily classes, weekly seminars, and other activities are devoted to “analysing, clarifying, [and] elaborating ... the key terms ‘relevant to the cultural, educational, scientific, and espistemological problems encountered by Muslims in the present age’ ” (Wan Mohd. Nor Wan Daud 1998, 99–100). He is also the main spiritual and intellectual inspiration for the Islamic Youth Movement of Malaysia (ABIM), which has been one of the most powerful and high-profile of the organizations promoting Islamic resurgence in Malaysia since its founding in the early 1970s. In this connection it warrants emphasis that ABIM provided the institutional context in which a steady stream of charismatic Muslim intellectuals who went on to make their mark in national political arenas honed their organizational and other skills and otherwise "cut their teeth." Such intellectuals include: Anwar Ibrahim, who (as mentioned earlier) was head of ABIM before Mahathir recruited him to UMNO and rewarded him with a succession of prestigious political posts; Fadzil Mohamed Noor, the longtime leader of PAS and the head of the opposition alliance in its entirety at the time of his death in June 2002; Haji Abdul Hadi Awang, the chief minister of Terengganu who assumed the mantle of PAS leadership on the death of Fadzil Mohamed Noor; and scores of other nationally prominent Muslim intellectuals who command important positions both within and outside state-run (or state-friendly) Islamic institutions. In sum, Al-Attas's ideas and sensibilities have played a dominant role in shaping the intellectual and political contours of contemporary Malaysian Islam.

The author of more than two dozen books and monographs and scores of articles (many translated into Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Urdu, French, German, Russian, etc.), the seventy-two-year old Al-Attas has a commanding presence but is also both charming and avuncular. Among the first questions he put to me after confirming that I had written scholarly works about Islam in Malaysia were, "Who are your authorities? Which authorities have you been speaking to? And why have you never come to see me until now?"

While Al-Attas was extremely cordial and generous with his time, he spent most of the interview railing against the West, specifically "the Orientalists, positivists, relativists, secularists, post-modernists, and social scientists, all of whom distort and diminish Islam" and presumably religion, spirituality, and ethics in general. His main objection to positivism has to do with "its insistence that God can only be known or proven to exist through the senses," though he added that "we oppose positivistic, post-modern, and secular perspectives that view religion as nothing more than culture. It is not modernity per se [that we oppose].”

One of his initial remarks had to do with Westerners trying to understand why “we [Muslims] behave the way we do; it’s not because we are ‘fundamentalists’ or ‘hate the West.’ ” He went on to say, “It’s not our problem, it’s your problem, a Christian problem,” the “it” here referring to Westerners’ difficulties understanding “the lack of separation between church and state in Islam,” which from Al-Attas’s perspective means primarily that “there can be no separation of the ethical and the political.”

The conversation turned to September 11. “The moment it happened your president started talking about [the need for] a crusade; he’s an idiot, and so is Margaret Thatcher [And then there is] the Italian Prime Minister who said we’ve produced no Cellinis, no Michelangelos, no Mozarts.” Mentioning that he had heard something about Michelangelo being homosexual, Al-Attas remarked, “Your church ... , the robes, the music; so much paganism, isn’t it?” adding “[Western] scholars are spreading much of the havoc You need to ask the right authorities. Otherwise, you confuse and destroy and set up false authorities among Muslims ... The scholars one should study and respect are the al-Ghazalis, the Sufis—the higher ones—[and] Ibn Khaldun, the father of modern sociology,” though he was quick to underscore that “too many books can also confuse.”

“There are [in any case] different kinds of knowledge: true knowledge, useful knowledge, and dangerous knowledge. We want to concentrate on useful knowledge. We [humans] are only here for a few years. Some knowledge is for one’s own salvation; some is for development in subsequent generations. Muslims must know about their history [and] civilization, and culture, [about] what happened to them. It’s all been confused by the colonialists. [But] we oppose extremism.”

Al-Attas brought up the idea of “Islams” (in the plural), rejecting outright that any such phenomena exist. By way of illustration he insisted “there is no such thing as a Malaysian Islam that is distinct from other kinds of Islam. There are only different levels of intelligence.” In an effort to more thoroughly address the relationships that exist in different societal contexts between local culture on the one hand and Islam on the other, I cited an aphorism I heard many times in the course of fieldwork in the state of Negeri Sembilan during the late 1970s and 1980s: adat bersendi hukum, hukum bersendi kitabullah, which means (roughly) “custom/tradition” hinges or depends on [God’s] law, just as [God’s] law hinges or depends on the book or word of God. This aphorism was often cited by villagers as a way of asserting what they took to be the broad compatibility between their matrilineally inflected kinship institutions and the basic values (if not specific legal injunctions) of a patricentric Islam. While much ink has been spilled on such matters (see Peletz 1988), the most germane issue here is that the vast majority if not all of the villagers I encountered in over two years of fieldwork consider themselves to be “good Muslims,” despite what their detractors may say. Yet Al-Attas’s reactions to my invocation of this expression was unequivocal and altogether dismissive: “These people don’t understand.” He proceeded with a critique of British and Dutch colonial scholars, and of Orientalism generally, intimating that any local variation in the practice, experience, or understanding of Islam was due to Orientalist distortion. Implicitly acknowledging that not all such distortion need be intentional, he delineated some of the challenges of translation in the study of religion, adding that “academics, journalists, and politicians” are also part of the problem, as are “lax Muslims.” Al-Attas went on to register an exceedingly important point, which he effectively retracted a few moments later (as we shall see): “But as long as they don’t actually deny they’re Muslims, then they’re still Muslims,” to which he added, it’s “not like ... [your] Inquisition.”

Al-Attas’s solution to these problems and to the dilemmas of marginalization and injustice encountered by Muslims the world over is to promote the development of sound pedagogy and scholarship: to provide the Muslim community, especially at the university level, with “an education that is religiously self-conscious and conservative, yet prescriptive, practical and futuristic” (Wan Mohd. Nor Wan Daud 1998, 169); to decolonize knowledge and create truly Islamic understandings of metaphysics, ontology, and epistemology; and thus to restore adab, which he defines as recognition “that knowledge and being are ordered hierarchically according to their various grades and degrees of rank, and ... [that one has a] proper place in relation to that reality and to one’s physical, intellectual and spiritual capacities and potentials” (137). These goals are not surprising, given Al-Attas’s life’s work and the nature of the teaching and research institutes into which he has poured so much of himself. Education clearly has the potential to liberate Muslims in Malaysia and elsewhere from the circumstances in which they find themselves, but the relationship between education and liberation or freedom is complicated, partly because, in Al-Attas's opinion, those who lack education should not be accorded the same basic freedoms as those who are educated. Justice, not equality, is his overriding concern, and a reign of justice defined in terms of adab and things being in their "right and proper place" need not entail equality as understood in the West. He elaborated briefly on whether "an ignorant person" had a right to speak and whether a journalist would have enough sense to recognize that such an individual did not deserve a forum. Though he did not state explicitly that those without religious knowledge of the sort he deemed legitimate should be prevented or discouraged from expressing their views in public, his position on such matters was obvious: "Yes, there should be freedom of expression, but not on certain matters," the bottom line being, "and if you're in doubt, you're not a Muslim."

What is especially revealing about this latter statement is not that it contradicts Al-Attas's earlier contention that "as long as Muslims don't deny they're Muslims, they're still Muslims." It is, rather, its illustration of the tension and exceedingly thin line between religiously or existentially inflected doubt on the one hand and denial and renunciation of one's faith, loyalty, identity and membership in a moral community (defined both locally and transnationally) on the other. Of particular interest here are the remarks Al-Attas offered to help convey his position: even "to pose the question, 'How do I know that God exists?' requires proper understanding—a proper understanding of who God is, of what knowing is, and of what existence means." These remarks were followed by, "If people are honest and sincere, they will stop asking such questions."

To summarize these perspectives: anyone who asks questions of the latter ("doubting") sort risks being considered an apostate (murtad) and a dishonest and insincere one at that. Dynamics such as these help explain why many members of the Muslim community in Malaysia display a marked reluctance to engage in debate concerning the ontological status of hudud laws in the Qur'an or to question other aspects of conventional or official interpretations of Islam. So too of course do mutually reinforcing dynamics of govermentality emanating from the upper echelons of the executive branch, such as the well-documented willingness of Mahathir and his supporters to define “unorthodox” religious beliefs and practices as treasonous, seditious, or simply “deviationist” and thus best dealt with through the use of the ISA, which can result in indefinite detention without specific charges or even the pretense of a trial.

It remains to underscore that the themes to which Al-Attas returned again and again were those bearing on knowledge and power; more precisely, the key theme that Al-Attas emphasized in our conversation was that textually based knowledge of Islam is a prerequisite for the authority to speak. To this I would add two points. First, that Al-Attas’s scholarship and teachings have played an extremely influential role in the development of the variably inflected organizations and movements whose institutional structures and ideologies help define the contours of contemporary Malaysian Islam—the Islamic Youth Movement of Malaysia, the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party, the Association of Malaysian Ulama, and the International Institute for Islamic Thought and Civilization, among others. The second point is more general and more directly relevant to the central thesis of this chapter: most of the struggles over Malaysian Islam that we see at present are being waged via pen, discourse, and debate, not through physical coercion or violence. This has always been true of Malaysia and has not changed since September 11, notwithstanding recent media and intelligence reports depicting angry demonstrators at the U.S. embassy in Kuala Lumpur and suggesting that Malaysia is a “staging ground” or “launching pad” for terrorist actions against the US.

* Mahathir’s Islamic State

No account of changes in the fields of Malaysian cultural politics since September 11 would be complete without brief mention of the now famous comments about Malaysia being an Islamic state that were made by Prime Minister Mahathir on September 29, 2001, just a few weeks after the attacks of September 11. Mahathir’s pronouncements were intended partly as a response to President Bush’s derogatory and inflammatory generalizations concerning the extremism and other dangers of Muslim regimes, rogue states, and the like. The gist of Mahathir’s remarks was that Malaysia is a predominantly Muslim nation that embraces a moderate, forward-looking, and inclusive Islam, and that Bush's generalizations were thus both empirically problematic and deeply offensive to Malaysian Muslims and moderate Muslims the world over. The problem, though, is that Mahathir's comments included the arguably ambiguous assertion that "Malaysia is an Islamic state." The latter assertion was immediately reported by local and international media and quickly became the focus of intense, overdetermined debates among Malaysia's public intellectuals, as well as political and religious elites, and ordinary Muslims and non-Muslims from all walks of life. Many of the Muslims who participated in the debates at issue are not recognized as traditional 'ulama and do not have extensive scholarly familiarity with Islamic religious texts or the Arabic language, which religious experts and scholars of Islam (like Al-Attas) generally regard as an absolute necessity if one is going to offer legitimate perspectives on Islam. The views of all such individuals are thus deeply suspect as far as 'ulama and other religious scholars are concerned—as of course are the commentaries and analyses of all non-Muslims (such as Patricia Martinez) who have weighed in on the issues. Worse, since all such views have the potential to create divisions within the ummah or Muslim community, they raise the twin specters of sedition and treason. The more encompassing dynamic here is what Eickelman and Piscatori (1996) refer to as the "fragmentation of authority," which, as they make clear, has occurred throughout the Muslim world during the twentieth century. In the Malaysian case, as elsewhere, this fragmentation of authority is a consequence of the erosion of traditional class and religious hierarchies coupled with the spread of mass education and modern media and technology that have gone hand in hand with the ascendance of new, predominantly urban middle classes and the attendant emergence of new loci of power, prestige, and moral anchorage.

Mahathir's pronouncements about Malaysia being an Islamic state signaled a major watershed in Malaysian politics. The comments themselves, along with the discourses they spawned, exacerbated fears and anxieties among non-Muslims in particular that the ruling party is willing to abandon its support of long-established multicultural and multireligious practices in its efforts to fend off Western rhetoric and outmaneuver PAS. In some ways far more distressing to non-Muslims is their feeling that the social contract among the major ethnic groups that was engineered with the help of the British as they relinquished their colony in 1957 might be tossed to the wind for the sake of political expediency.

To convey a sense of non-Muslims' feelings of distress concerning their secondary status vis-â-vis Muslims I might mention the thoughts expressed to me in the course of a two-day conference by a distinguished Sikh gentleman whose extensive engagement in civic affairs includes high-level involvement in the Malaysian Consultative Council of Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism, as well as leadership roles in various NGOs concerned with the educational well-being of the Sikh community. A highly respected religious official who is thoroughly conversant in Malay, English, Punjabi, Hindi, and Urdu, Mr. Singh (as I shall call him) spoke to me in whispers, all the while looking over his shoulder to make sure that no one else could hear what he was saying. "I'm a taxpayer and citizen too. But we [Sikhs and non-Muslims generally] get no airtime In America, Muslims [religious minorities] have outlets, the government supports them. In Malaysia there is nothing like that. Once a year we can have cultural events, but we can't talk about religion ...

And the government has admitted that most of the tax revenue comes from non-Muslims [Do they give us] land and money for temples?

No. But the government will contribute how many hundreds of thousands [of ringgit] for mosques in places like New Zealand? The Muslims want equality and justice, but where is the justice?"

Singh's heavily freighted misgivings are all the more instructive when we bear in mind that he is decrying a state of affairs under a relatively secular (but nonetheless strongly pro-Malay Muslim) regime. Given the justifiable concern on the part of non-Muslims that the imposition of hudud law and the creation of an Islamic state will exacerbate NEP-type policies that discriminate against all non-Muslims, it stands to reason that there is virtually no support among non-Muslims for hudud law or the creation of an Islamic state. Sensibilities expressed along the following lines are typical: the “DAP [the predominantly Chinese Democratic Action Party] fervently opposes the setting up of an Islamic state. We will never assist PAS in the setting up of an Islamic state”; and “If we allow these Islamic fanatics to rule the country, the peaceful and harmonious country ... built by our predecessors will be destroyed.”[43]

One could easily provide numerous other examples of non-Muslims’ views in the same vein, but this seems unnecessary. Suffice it to say that the fallout from Mahathir’s remarks about Malaysia being an Islamic state (along with other dynamics described here) have sharpened the lines and antagonisms between Muslims and non-Muslims. They have also helped bring about a situation in which distinctions between Muslims and non-Muslims have come to override all other axes of difference and inequality, including those cast in ethnic, racial, and class terms. This is all the more significant since by most accounts the last few decades, and the last few years in particular, have seen an increased segregation and polarization of Malays, Chinese, and Indians. Owing to September 11 and its aftermath, the pronounced racialist discourses that long framed all such dynamics have given way to deeply divisive discourses of Muslim versus non-Muslim, many of which are animated by contestations among different groups of Malays over which deeply contested version of Islam should be accorded legitimacy.

 Conclusion

On October 31, 2003, as this essay was moving toward publication, Mahathir made good on his pledge (variably articulated since mid-2002) that before the general elections scheduled for 2004 he would step down as Malaysia’s head of state and hand the reins of governance to Deputy Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, the soft-spoken, nationally prominent career civil servant (and former head of the ministries of defense and foreign affairs, among others) whom Mahathir had carefully groomed as his successor since the sacking of Anwar in September 1998. In some ways the formal retirement from public life of one of the longest serving elected leaders that the world has ever seen marks the end of a truly remarkable era in the history of Malaysia and the broader region. It is obviously too soon to tell, though, if the ritualized transfer of authority signals a real passing of the baton let alone a true changing of the guard. For Mahathir may well remain on (or behind) the scene as an extremely influential player, assuming a role analogous perhaps to that played by Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew, who after relinquishing the post of prime minister, which he held for over three decades, became "senior minister" in the famed city-state.

It is clear, however, that the direction of future political and religious developments in Malaysia will depend a good deal on how sixty-four- year-old Prime Minister Abdullah and his entourage and successors handle the challenges to their authority that arise in the months and years ahead. This in turn will depend in no small measure on U.S. policies in the region, including those associated with our current administration's "war on terror." These latter policies could well prompt ruling elites in Indonesia, the Philippines, and elsewhere to introduce sweeping versions of Malaysia's ISA, thus further emboldening both their Malaysian counterparts and their supporters and successors.

Another set of variables figuring into the future in rather unpredictable ways has to do with the existence of an estimated 2.1 million Malaysian youth who are eligible to vote but are currently unregistered (New Sunday Times, August 11, 2002). Large numbers of these youth live in the multiethnic and heavily urban Klang Valley region, which includes Kuala Lumpur, and which tends to benefit more from state-driven development than PAS-controlled areas of the Malay heartlands, such as Kelantan and Terengganu. All things being equal, one might therefore expect this critically important group of young Malaysians to lean toward UMNO rather than an opposition party like PAS, which has long derived much of its support from predominantly Malay rural areas (such as Kelantan and Terengganu) that are marginalized or largely bypassed by state-sponsored modernity. On the other hand, the massive increase since September 11 of Muslim tourists visiting Malaysia from Middle Eastern countries like Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Syria, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Oman, and the like (Prystay 2002), could result in a partial "radicalization" of youthful sensibilities, especially if, as has occurred in neighboring Indonesia since the fall of Suharto in 1998, well-connected proponents of one or another variant of Salafi-Wahhabism are able to make common cause with groups of disaffected youth.

As for the recent past and the present, it is worth stepping back from all the discursive and other divisiveness that I have outlined here in order to appreciate an exceedingly important generalization bearing on the major carriers of Malaysian Islam (UMNO, PAS, ABIM, Sisters in Islam, Al-Attas/ISTAC, etc.). The majority (though clearly not all) of the contests over Islam and other key symbols and institutional resources that we see in Malaysia are occurring in relatively democratic ways: through elections, court battles, weekly seminars and educational outreach, legitimate lobbying efforts, PR blitzes, letters to the editors of local newspapers, and so on, not through disappearances, torture, assassinations, suicide or other bombings, coup d'etat, and the like. PAS, for example, which promotes and seeks to instantiate a very conservative "syariah- oriented" vision of Muslim society and politics and has enjoyed successes at the polls partly because of a reputation for clean government, fair play, and relative transparency, tends rather consistently to play by the rules of the electoral game, though this is not to suggest that party leadership has embraced—or in the future would seek to nourish—a culture of democratic pluralism. Some of these generalizations also apply to Al-Attas/ ISTAC and ABIM, who are strongly committed to education and justice, though not necessarily to equality as commonly understood in the West. The Sisters in Islam, for their part, as well as many of the other NGOs and political parties that I have glossed over here, have established viable working relationships with the ruling party and have capitalized on the administration's efforts to portray itself as the carrier of a progressive Islam. The more salient point, though, is that these organizations have pledged themselves both to electoral politics and to the "scaling up" of values and sensibilities conducive to democratic pluralism. The same cannot always be said of UMNO, or at least of Mahathir and his inner circle, which in recent years has certainly included Abdullah, who now stands at the helm of the ship of state. While Mahathir deserves much credit for Malaysia's stunning economic transformation and merits inclusion among the burgeoning ranks of the Muslim world's relatively progressive prodevelopment modernist leaders, he and his inner circle have a well-deserved reputation for ruthlessness both in their dealings with rivals and detractors and in their willingness to subvert democratic systems of checks and balances when they feel the need to do so. One can hope that newly anointed Prime Minister Abdullah will build on Mahathir's reputation as the proponent of a relatively progressive Islam and simultaneously distance himself from the antidemocratic practices for which Mahathir has also long been well known.

There is no simple black and white here, and as in many other parts of the Muslim world (Indonesia, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Kuwait, Egypt, and Turkey come quickly to mind), the main obstacles to the expansion and strengthening of pluralist sensibilities and democratic institutions have little if anything to do with Islam per se. Scholars and others concerned with identifying impediments to reform-oriented policies might thus focus their attention elsewhere. It might be most productive to begin with questions about the institutionalized arrangements that enable political elites in control of top-heavy executive branches to manipulate overwhelmingly secular organs of governance and all varieties of cultural phenomena. One part of the puzzle is the critically important symbolic capital and institutional support provided to such elites by American and other Western allies. Without such capital and support, things would look very different. But that is another essay.

 Notes

This essay draws on extensive fieldwork (1978–80, 1987–88) and subsequent research in Malaysia (1993, 1998, 2001, and 2002). Robert Hefner and Shamsul A.B. provided helpful comments on an earlier draft of this essay, for which I am most grateful. I spell Malay terms in accordance with the conventions of standard Malay, but alternative spellings are still found in the literature and in contemporary Malaysia. Thus syariah (Islamic law) is sometimes rendered as shari‘a, syari‘ah, or shari‘at. When quoting published material, I retain the author’s original spelling.

[40] Some of the material in this section is adapted from Peletz 2002.

[41] Many of the charges are outlined in PUM/PUK 2002.

[42] See An-Na’im 1990, chap. 5; cf. Rose Ismail 1995 and Mohammad Hashim Kamali 2000.

[43] The first quote is from Chen Man Hin, DAP Chairman (1991); the second is from Chan Kong Choy, MCA [Malaysian Chinese Association] Youth President (1992); they appear, along with mostly similar views, in an anonymous (1999) pamphlet, “Islamic State”: What Are We Afraid Of?

 References Cited

Abdul Rahman Embong, ed. 2002. State-Led Modernization and the New Middle Class in Malaysia. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

Abuza, Zachary. 2003. Militant Islam in Southeast Asia: Crucible of Terror.

Boulder, Colo.: Lynn Rienner.

Afkhami, Mahnaz, ed. 1995. Faith and Freedom: Women’s Human Rights in the Muslim World. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Ahmed, Leila. 1992. Women and Gender in Islam: Historical Roots of a Modern Debate. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

An-Na’im, Abdullahi Ahmed. 1990. Toward an Islamic Reformation: Civil Liberties, Human Rights, and International Law. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

Appadurai, Arjun. 1996. Modernity at Large: Cultural Dimensions of Globalization. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Bateson, Gregory. 1936. Naven: A Survey of the Problems Suggested by a Composite Picture of a New Guinea Tribe Drawn from Three Points of View. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press.

Chandra Muzaffar. 1987. Islamic Resurgence in Malaysia. Kuala Lumpur: Fajar Bakti.

Eickelman, Dale, and James Piscatori. 1996. Muslim Politics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Farish Noor. 2002. “Negotiating Islamic Law.” Far Eastern Economic Review, September 19, p. 23.

Firdaus Haji Abdullah. 1985. Radical Malay Politics: Its Origins and Early Development. Petaling Jaya: Pelanduk Publications.

Government of Malaysia. 2000. Buku Tahunan Perangkaan Malaysia (Yearbook of statistics, Malaysia). 2000. Kuala Lumpur: Jabatan Perangkaan Malaysia/ Government of Malaysia.

Hefner, Robert W. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Hilley, John. 2001. Malaysia: Mahathirism, Hegemony, and the New Opposition. London: Zed.

Hirsch, Susan. 1998. Pronouncing and Persevering: Gender and the Discourses of Disputing in an African Islamic Court. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

Huntington, Samuel. 1996. The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order. New York: Simon and Schuster.

Husin Mutalib. 1993. Islam in Malaysia: From Revivalism to Islamic State? Singapore: Singapore University Press.

“Islamic State”: What Are We Afraid Of? 1999. Kuala Lumpur: Vinlin Press.

Kepel, Gilles. 2002. Jihad: The Trail of Political Islam. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

Kessler,Cliwe. 1978. ɪsːarnaɪɪdPoːitɪɪɪaNɪɪaːaɪɪStat-.K6::ːaɪɪtaɪɪ,1839–1969. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

———. 1980. “Malaysia: Islamic Revivalism and Political Disaffection in a Divided Society.” Southeast Asia Chronicle 75:3–11.

Lawrence, Bruce B. 1998. Shattering the Myth: Islam beyond Violence. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Mohammad Hashim Kamali. 1995. Punishment in Islamic Law: An Enquiry into the Hudud Bill of Kelantan. Kuala Lumpur: Ilmiah Publishers.

———. 2000. Islamic Law in Malaysia: Issues and Developments. Kuala Lumpur: Ilmiah Publishers.

Muhammad Abu Bakar. 1987. Penghayatan Sebuah Ideal: Suatu Tafsiran Ten-tang Islam Semasa (Appreciation of an ideal: An interpretation of contemporary Islam). Kuala Lumpur: Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka.

Nagata, Judith. 1984. The Reflowering of Malaysian Islam: Modern Religious Radicals and Their Roots. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press.

New Sunday Times. 2002. “Only 10,000 of 2.1 Million Youths Registered as Voters.” August 11.

Ong, Aihwa. 1999. Flexible Citizenship: The Cultural Logics of Transnationality. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press.

Peletz, Michael G. 1988. A Share of the Harvest: Kinship, Property, and Social History among the Malays of Rembau. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

———. 1997. “‘Ordinary Muslims’ and Muslim Resurgents in Contemporary Malaysia: Notes on an Ambivalent Relationship.” In Islam in an Era of NationStates: Politics and Religious Renewal in Muslim Southeast Asia, edited by Robert W. Hefner and Patricia Horvath, pp. 231–73. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

———. 2002. Islamic Modern: Religious Courts and Cultural Politics in Malaysia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

PUM/PUK (Persatuan Ulama Malaysia and Persatuan Ulama Kedah/Malaysian; Ulama Association and Kedah Ulama Association). 2002. Kontroversi Mengenai M-tjwtoKtjpadaMajfis Ra a-Raa M-tjfa^m-fsfamDicabar, Raanfat sa. dan Ulama Dihina (Controversy concerning the memo to the Malay rulers—Islam challenged and the Prophet and ulama insulted/degraded). Pinang: Jutaprint.

Prystay, Chris. 2002. “Malaysia Pitches Itself as a Safe Place for Mideast Tourists.” Asian Wall Street Journal, August 28.

Rofel, Lisa. 1999. Other Modernities: Gendered Yearnings in China after Socialism. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Roff, William. 1967. The Origins of Malay Nationalism. Kuala Lumpur: University of Malaya Press.

Rose Ismail, ed. 1995. Hudud in Malaysia: The Issues at Stake. Kuala Lumpur: SIS Forum.

Rosen, Lawrence. 1989. The Anthropology of Justice: Lat as Culture in Islamic Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Sachedina, Abdulaziz. 2001. The Islamic Roots of Democratic Pluralism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Safie bin Ibrahim. 1981. The Islamic Party of Malaysia: Its Formative Stages and Ideology. Kuala Lumpur: Nuawi bin Ismail/University of Malaya Press.

Shamsul A.B. 1983. “A Revival in the Study of Islam in Malaysia”. Man, n.s., 18, no. 2:399–404.

———. 2001. “Shadow of Afghan War.” Economic and Political Weekly, December 22, pp. 4708–9.

Wan Mohd. Nor Wan Daud. 1998. The Educational Philosophy and Practice of Syed Muhammad Naquib Al-Attas: An Exposition of the Original Concept of Islamization. Kuala Lumpur: ISTAC.

Zainah Anwar. 1987. Islamic Revivalism in Malaysia: Daktah among the Students. Kuala Lumpur: Pelanduk Publications.

 Chapter 11: Muslim Democrats and Islamist Violence in Post-soeharto Indonesia

Robert W. Hefner

When, in another generation, historians look back at the end of the twentieth century in search of historical antecedents to Muslim democratization, Indonesia probably deserves to be given a pride of place on par with countries like post-Khomeini Iran and contemporary Turkey. Although often overlooked in surveys of the Muslim world, the Southeast Asian country of Indonesia is the largest Muslim-majority country in the world, with some 88.7 percent of its 215 million people professing Islam. Equally important, in the final years of the authoritarian Soeharto regime (1966–98; see Elson 2001), Indonesia witnessed the creation of a movement for a democratic Muslim politics that was second only to postKhomeini Iran in scale and intellectual vigor. The coalition that united to topple President Soeharto in May 1998 included Indonesians from varied religious backgrounds (Forrester and May 1999; Hefner 2000). Among its Muslim proponents, however, a key role was played by a new class of intellectuals intent on devising solid Islamic grounds for democracy and civil society (see Abdillah 1997; Barton 2002; Effendy 1994). Although philosophical materialists may dismiss such things, a key feature of Muslim politics everywhere is that, at some point, political initiatives must be justified in relation to religious discourses that comprise the “underlying framework that, while subject to contextualized nuances, is common to Muslims throughout the world” (Eickelman and Piscatori 1996, 5).

Indonesia in the 1990s had a wealth of activists and intellectuals involved in this effort to effect a foundational reorientation of Muslim politics. Moreover, the initiative showed one of the main features political theorists like Guillermo O’Donnell and Philippe Schmitter identify as most important for a successful transition to democracy: a coalitional structure linking “exemplary individuals” and intellectuals to massbased organizations in society (O’Donnnell and Schmitter 1986, 48–56). By these measures, Indonesia in the late 1990s was one of the most important centers of Muslim reformation in the world.

Sadly, Indonesia’s achievement may never be widely recognized because the movement for a democratic Muslim politics was soon overshadowed by a rash of sectarian violence. From 1999 to 2002, battles between Christians and Muslims in the eastern province of Maluku took some eight thousand lives (Klinken 2001). During roughly the same period, the central highlands on the nearby island of Sulawesi saw bloody skirmishes between Muslim and Christian gangs, causing a thousand deaths (Aragon 2001; Human Rights Watch 2002). Equally alarming, in the months following Soeharto’s resignation in May 1998, radical Islamist paramilitaries sprang up in cities and towns across Indonesia. Although democratic Muslims and progressive nationalists had hoped to press for deeper reforms after Soeharto’s resignation, by late 1998 they found themselves outflanked and outgunned by the radicals. Many of the latter made no secret of their ties to powerful patrons from the ancien regime.

Although the Islamist paramilitaries were best known in the international press for vandalizing bars, discotheques, and other alleged centers of vice, their more decisive political effect was to take back the streets from democratic Muslims and blunt the drive for political reform. In November 1998, the armed forces commander, General Wiranto (a Soeharto ally), worked with radical ulama to mobilize 100,000 Islamist militiamen, in an effort to prevent prodemocracy students from disrupting the special session of the People’s Consultative Assembly, which had convened to set the ground rules for special parliamentary elections to be held the following year (Dijk 2001, 340–50). On June 23, 2000, hundreds of activists from one of the largest paramilitaries, the Islamic Defenders Front (FPI), ransacked the headquarters of the National Commission on Human Rights. Their action just happened to coincide with the commission’s opening of investigations into the involvement of the Indonesian military in the 1999 violence in East Timor. On other occasions, the paramilitaries raided bookstores for left-wing literature, intimidated unveiled women, and used machetes to break up prodemocracy meetings. Although the sectarian violence in eastern Indonesia showed that non-Muslims too played a major part in post-Soeharto violence, the ascendance of the Islamist paramilitaries, and the seeming inability of the country’s large moderate groupings to contain them, greatly tarnished Indonesia’s reputation as a center of civic-pluralist Islam. The Bali bombings in October, 2002, in which two hundred people died, and the bombing of the Marriott Hotel in Jakarta in August 2003, in which thirteen more were killed, seemed only to confirm the impression that Indonesia was no center for progressive Islam, but was on the verge of becoming a second front for Osama bin Laden's al-Qa'ida (Abuza 2002, 2003).

In this chapter, I will suggest that things were not quite so grim as the second-front thesis implies. However, although relatively small compared to their mainstream rivals, parmilitarized Islamists did seize the initiative from moderate and prodemocracy Muslims in the months following Soeharto's overthrow. This chapter aims to examine just why this occurred, and why a country with such a promising legacy of democratic Muslim politics has had such difficulty in its post-Soeharto transition. The example of armed Islamists outflanking a moderate majority has relevance for the study of Muslim politics in other parts of the world as well.

The evidence I present here suggests that the most critical obstacle to the democratic transition has had as much to do with the legacies of Indonesian state and society as it has any specific quality of Muslim politics. Certainly, some features of contemporary Indonesian politics, such as the ideals of the jihadi movement, can only be fully explained with reference to the pluralism and contests of Muslim politics. But the specific effect of these variables was determined by two more general features of state-society relations: the relative weakness and segmentary divisions of civil society, and the habit of some in the political elite (both at the national and provincial level) of neutralizing their opposition by inflaming sectarian passions and mobilizing supporters along ethnoreligious lines. During the post-Soeharto period, this sectarian trawling across the statesociety divide, as I shall call it, allowed otherwise small groups of armed militants to exercise a political influence disproportionate to their numbers in society.

Since the late 1990s the struggle for the hearts and minds of Indonesian Muslims has been complicated by a third development: the expansion of armed Islamist groupings with ties to the al-Qa'ida into the country. Reports in the Western media have made much of al-Qa'ida's infiltration into the Southeast Asia region. There is such a presence, and, as was amply demonstrated by the Bali and Jakarta bombings, some of its promoters have the desire and capacity to make bloody mischief indeed. Nonetheless, in Indonesia if not the southern Philippines (cf. Chalk 2002), al-Qa‘ida has until recently been a secondary influence on Islamist paramilitarism by comparison with the paramilitarists’ domestic sponsors. The rapid spread of religious violence and the state’s inability to contain it caught the mainstream Muslim leadership off guard and momentarily allowed the radicals to scale up their influence in society. But this contest is far from over.

Ironically, the Bali and Jakarta bombings may prove to have been a blunder as far as the radicals are concerned. The attacks were linked to one of the smaller paramilitaries, the Jema‘ah Islamiyah, an organization that, as my own interviews in Central Java have indicated, has indeed had contacts with al-Qa‘ida. By unleashing a bombing campaign, however, the Jema‘ah Islamiyah galvanized the moderate Muslim leadership into action and dispelled moderates’ reluctance to accept U.S. claims that terrorist networks were operating in Southeast Asia. Whether this shift proves to be enduring and allows a sustained scaling up of Muslim resources for civil peace and pluralism, however, will depend on domestic political developments, as well as the outcome of ongoing international conflicts.

 Sectarian Trawling, Unsolidary Surges

In their Transitions from Authoritarian Rule, Guillermo O’Donnell and Philippe Schmitter (1986, 54) have noted that some transitions from authoritarianism are eased by a “popular upsurge” in which interest groups in society put aside their differences and rally to the idea that they are a people united by a common commitment to democratic reform. In Indonesia after the fall of President Soeharto, observers had hoped for just such a solidary surge. However, the hope was dashed with the outbreak of bitter factional squabbles among members of the political elite and, shortly thereafter, of communal violence between Christians and Muslims in several parts of the country.

The elite factionalism and communal tensions had complex genealogies, elements of which date back to the colonial period and imbalances between Muslims and non-Muslims, as well as Javanese (Indonesia’s largest and most politically influential ethnic group) and non-Javanese. However, the more immediate influence on these tensions was the fact that rather than building a consensus on the terms of citizenship or the procedures of public politics, Soeharto's "New Order" regime (1966–98) kept contenders for power off balance by playing rival ethnic, religious, and ideological groups against each other. From this perspective, there was a vast difference between the inclusively pluralist spirit of the country's official doctrine, the Pancasila (Five Principles), of which Soeharto was an avid promoter, and the blatantly sectarian practice of state politics (see Aragon 2000, 309–13; Bowen 1993, 125; Kipp 1990). The Soeharto regime played ethnoreligious groups against each other, moreover, at a time when migration, population growth, and economic development were straining ethnic relations in several provinces. In Maluku, Central Kalimantan, Central Sulawesi, and Papua, in particular, hardworking Muslim migrants from Java and Sulawesi displaced indigenous people, many of whom were non-Muslim, from their once-dominant position in the marketplace and society. This displacement caused great resentment among indigenous peoples, Christian as well as Muslim, and in some provinces fueled tensions that were to figure in the post-Soeharto violence.

Another influence on this volatile mix of elite factionalism and communal tension was that the New Order government also conducted much of its political business offstage and extralegally rather than through official channels, relying on an odd assortment of gangsters, local toughs, and paramilitaries (see, e.g., Cribb 2000; Ryter 1998). Soeharto and his allies had first honed this tactic during their rise to power in 1965–66, in the aftermath of a failed left-wing junior officers' coup against the country's senior military leadership. The Soeharto group portrayed the coup as an irreligious communist plot against the nation, and mobilized the country's Muslim organizations, as well as smaller groupings of Christians and Hindus, into an efficient campaign of mass killing (Cribb 1990; Hefner 1990, 193–227; Robinson 1995). No sooner had Soeharto come to power, however, than he marginalized the Muslim parties on whom he had earlier relied, surrounding himself with advisers drawn from the secular Muslim, Christian, Chinese, and Javanese mystical communities. Western analysts were so struck by this preference that they concluded Soeharto was a nominal Muslim or "Hindu-Buddhist," more interested in a conservative variant of Javanese tradition than in Islam (see Emmerson 1978; Pemberton 1994).

Although he dabbled in Javanese mystical arts, however, Soeharto's primary concern was never Javanese tradition as such, even in its conservative forms. His passion was power, and he showed considerable ideological flexibility in pursuit of that end. When political circumstances demanded he change his public religious garb, he did so unhesitatingly. In the late 1980s, the Roman Catholic commander of the armed forces, Benny Moer- dani, expressed reservations about the scale of first-family corruption. The challenge infuriated Soeharto, and, true to his divide-and-conquer manner, he responded by ousting the Catholic general and promoting conservative Islamic officers in place of Moerdani's secular Muslim and Christian allies (Schwarz 2000, 146, 175). During these same years, an Islamic resurgence gathered momentum across Indonesia. My interviews with Soeharto advisers during these years showed that the president was keenly aware of the change, as well as the news of radical Islamist challenges in Iran, Algeria, and Egypt. The president responded by throwing himself into Qur'anic study, deserting his Javanese-mystical friends, and launching a series of cooptative ventures in the Muslim community (Hefner 2000, 19, 71).

When, in the course of the president's outreach to the Muslim community, some in the moderate Muslim leadership indicated they were as interested in democratic reforms as they were in Soeharto patronage, the president again changed tack. Rather than wooing moderate Muslims, he reached out to hardline Islamist groups, including some that had been previously among Soeharto's most virulent Muslim opponents (Bruines- sen 2002; Hefner 2000, 59–93, 167–207). In addition to keeping his opponents in the armed forces and moderate Muslim elite off guard, the president's turn to conservative Islam had the additional benefit of throwing an obstacle in the path of the country's fledgling democracy movement. In the 1990s, that movement was gaining momentum, buoyed by the end of the Cold War and transitions under way in East Asia and Eastern Europe. Although its leading lights were Muslim, the Indonesian movement was exuberantly pluralist in spirit. The president and his allies responded by portraying the democracy movement as the creation of an international cabal of Jews and Christians. The sectarian trawling for an uncivil Islam had taken a new and darker turn.

The president's new alliance with conservative Islamists caused great unease in elite political circles, including the ruling party, Golkar. Although for most of its history Golkar had been a broad alliance that included Christians and secular nationalists as well as pious Muslims, in 1994 President Soeharto awarded control of the party's powerful "strategy bureau" (Litbang Golkar) to conservative hardliners who, not coincidentally, had close ties to the small Islamist faction in the armed forces. In collaboration with these commanders, the strategy bureau helped craft the most spectacularly sectarian propaganda tracts ever deployed by the Soeharto regime. Several widely circulated documents accused the United States, the Vatican, Israel's Mossad, nominal Muslims, and Chinese Indonesians of engineering the 1997–98 financial crisis so as to ruin the economy and drive Soeharto from power. In the final months of the Soe- harto era, Chinese Indonesians were the target of fierce attacks, with several Soeharto aides describing Chinese Indonesians as "disloyal rats"; one regime document called for the Chinese to be driven from Indonesia once and for all. During the riots of May 13–14, 1998, Chinese Indonesians were the victims of awful social violence, including mass rapes and killing (Hefner 2000, 201–7). An independent commission established in the aftermath of the violence accused a cabal in the armed forces of having played a role in the organization of the violence (TGPF 1998).

If indeed it was organized by Soeharto supporters, the May violence proved to be a serious strategic blunder. The riots provoked mass resignations by unhappy members of the Soeharto cabinet, and eventually led to the president's resignation on May 21, 1998. But the president's ouster did not put an end to elite factionalism or sectarian trawling. No sooner had the president stepped down than street battles broke out between prodemocracy students and ultraconservative Islamists; some of the latter had direct ties to military hardliners. Moderate Muslims and the democracy students soon discovered that, however broad their support in the Indonesian public, they were no match for the urban toughs mobilized by conservative Islamists.

 The Great Hope

In June 1999, Indonesia held its first parliamentary elections since Soe- harto's fall. The results of the elections showed that there was still little public support for conservative Islamism. Only about 16 percent of the national vote went to parties advocating the establishment of an Islamic state. By comparison, during the country's last free and fair elections in 1955, 44 percent of the electorate cast their vote for parties advocating some form of Islamic state (Feith 1957).

The contrast in the outcome of the two elections is all the more interesting when one recalls that the Muslim public in contemporary Indonesia is, by most measures, considerably more pious than in the 1950s, when Clifford Geertz and Robert Jay carried out their pioneering research on Islam and politics (Geertz 1960; Jay 1963). In an important unpublished survey of several thousand voters taken just after the 1999 elections, the political scientists William Liddle and Saiful Mujani (2000) found that only 3.6 percent of those surveyed self-identified as syncretic or nominal Muslims (known as abangan in Javanese). In the 1950s about half of the country, and a full two-thirds of all Javanese, were thought to be nominal or syncretic Muslims. An additional 17.3 percent of the Muslims in the 1999 survey identify themselves as secularists who never or rarely perform Islamic devotions. Conversely, a full 81 percent of respondents claimed to be faithful in the performance of religious obligations. These data resonate with ethnographic studies that confirm that there has been a resurgence in public piety since the late 1970s (see Bowen 1993; Bruinessen 2002; Hefner 1987, 2000; Woodward 1989).

Notwithstanding this great change in religious attitudes, Liddle and Mujani (2000, 17) found that some 60 percent of pious Muslims cast their vote for non-Islamic or secular parties. Indeed, a full two-thirds of the voters who chose the biggest vote getter in the 1999 elections, Megawati Sukarnoputri's secular nationalist Democratic Party-Struggle, identified themselves as pious Muslims (Liddle and Mujani 2000, 37). This information suggests that the elite squabbling and street fighting taking place in late 1998 and early 1999, pitting conservative Islamists against Muslim democrats and progressive nationalists, did not reflect an equally pervasive sectarianism in the public as a whole.

The People's Consultative Assembly's election of Abdurrahman Wahid to the presidency in October 1999 raised hopes that this factional divide might yet be bridged and the moderation reflected in the elections could be channeled into a revived program of political reform. Leader of the prodemocracy Democracy Forum during the 1990s, Wahid had long been regarded as a democratic nationalist and Soeharto opponent. Eccentric in manner and independent in spirit, the near-blind leader was also popular among Chinese, Christians, and Hindus as a result of his statements on ethnoreligious tolerance (Barton 2002). What made Wahid an especially attractive choice for the presidency, however, was that he was also the chief executive of the country's largest Muslim organization, the 35 million strong Nahdlatul Ulama, a traditionalist organization with roots in the country's great network of Qur'anic schools (pesantren; see Feillard 1995). In the MPR elections of October 1999, then, Wahid edged out Megawati Sukarnoputri, the leader of the secular-nationalist Indonesian Democracy Party-Struggle. He did so in part because, after the defeat of Soeharto's hand-picked successor (B. J. Habibie), conservative Muslims opted to cast their votes for Wahid rather than Megawati, a secularnationalist and a woman (Barton 2002, 264–84; Doorn-Harder 2002).

Rather than abating, however, infighting among the political elite only increased after Wahid's election, as Muslim conservatives joined forces with remnants of the ancien regime to scuttle Wahid's efforts at political reform. Tactical blunders by the new president helped to solidify the antiWahid alliance. Three measures had a particularly deleterious impact. First, the president's plan to establish limited commercial relations with Israel infuriated even moderate Muslims. Second, his effort to lift the ban on the Indonesian Communist Party mobilized old regime conservatives and even many moderate Muslims, for whom fierce anticommunism had long been a guiding principle. And third, his unsuccessful effort to reform the armed forces, beginning with the removal of the powerful armed forces commander (and Soeharto ally), General Wiranto, stiffened antireform resistance in the military. Combined with the president's intemperate habit of taking swipes at even his own allies, these measures cemented the anti-Wahid alliance of Islamists, old-regime anticommunists, and antireform military commanders. Well before the People's Consultative Assembly formally ousted him in July 2001, Wahid's coalition had disintegrated, and he had effectively ceased to govern.

With the democracy movement stalled, efforts to reform the political establishment weakened, and most of the old regime remained securely in place. This was especially true in the provinces, most of which had experienced less reformist tumult than Jakarta. Despite the continuity in the state apparatus, however, the impact of Soeharto’s departure and continuing discord in the armed forces heightened tensions among rival provincial elites. Rather than strengthening “civil” society, local bosses took to squabbling among themselves for the spoils of state and market. More alarming yet, in regions divided along ethnoreligious lines, some leaders exploited sectarian tensions to mobilize their base. In this way, the sectarian trawling already practiced in the New Order came to be deployed in an even more pervasive and destabilizing form—not just by Jakarta actors and “the state,” but by provincial elites and nonstate actors.

This, then, was the background to the ethnic and religious violence that broke out in parts of Indonesia in the early post-Soeharto period. In a few provinces, like Yogyakarta and East Kalimantan, local administrators worked hard to keep the populist rivalry within bounds, and incidents of violence were few. However, in regions that had experienced widespread immigration and demographic change, like Maluku, Central Kalimantan, and Central Sulawesi, many contenders for power showed no such hesitation, exploiting ethnic and religious tensions with a verve that made Soeharto look like a moderate.

The populist sectarianism was exacerbated by local bosses’ reliance on another category of actor to have come of age during the Soeharto era: the organized gangsters known as preman. Soeharto and his allies had made regular use of preman throughout the New Order period. Most groupings were given an ideological makeover so as to look like ardent regime supporters, but their underworld ties remained operative just the same. It is notable that whereas the dominant gangs in the early New Order were nationalist (Ryter 1998), by the end of the region the largest groups were radical Islamist (Yunanto 2003). Where, as in Maluku or Central Sulawesi, post-Soeharto contention involved this flammable mixture of elite factionalism, gangsterism, and ethnoreligious tensions, the result could be deadly indeed.

 Uncivil Society

One reason it is important to understand this background to the recent spate of violence in Indonesia is that, in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, some foreign analysts have assumed that Indonesia's main problem is radical Islam, and that the most important influence on radical Islam was al-Qa'ida. Armed Islamist radicals have indeed been part of post-Soeharto Indonesia's problem. As the above discussion indicates, however, many (though not all; see below) of the radicals had initially benefited from the support of regional bosses and remnants of the Soeharto regime more than they had any international Islamist network.

Equally important, the politics of divide and conquer (known in Indonesian as politik pecah-belah, lit., "slice and separate" politics) did not just have a baleful effect on political Islam. This uncivil legacy also reinforced paramilitarist tendencies among Christians and other minorities in provinces like Maluku, Central Kalimantan, Central Sulawesi, and Irian (Papua). Indeed, in the first three of these provinces, non-Muslim paramilitaries sprang into action shortly after Soeharto's departure. One of the worst initial outbreaks of violence took place in the province of Central Kalimantan on the island of Borneo, where hundreds of hapless Madurese immigrants, who happened to be Muslim, were massacred by gangs of indigenous Dayaks, who happen to be nominal Christians or animists (ICG 2001; see Schiller 1997 for background). The fact that Dayaks involved in the campaign did not drive Muslim Malays from these same territories shows that the violence was not primarily a Christian-Muslim conflict. In fact, in some instances Malays joined Dayaks in attacking Madurese villages.

The worst violence pitting Muslims against Christians occurred in the eastern Indonesian province of Maluku. In the beginning, this conflict looked as if it might avoid the abyss of Christian-Muslim communalism, and unfold according to a more complex ethnic logic, similar to that seen in Central Kalimantan. During the first phase of the Maluku violence, for example, Catholics were able to hold themselves apart from the conflict, which pitted local Protestants against Muslim immigrants. In the northern portion of the old province, local Protestants had become involved in conflicts over land with Muslim refugees from Makian Island, recently relocated to the region. However, illustrating the crosscutting nature of local alliances, the Protestants were themselves longtime supporters of the Muslim Sultan of Ternate (see Klinken 2001, 6).

Sadly, however, as the Maluku conflict escalated, local bosses discovered that it was easier to mobilize large followings by portraying the conflict in religious terms, rather than political-economic. The resulting communalization of the violence was, of course, not an entirely empty invention. Tensions between Christians and Muslims had long been growing in the province, especially around the capital city of Ambon. As Gerry van Klinken (2001) has shown, these tensions had risen steadily in the 1980s and 1990s with the migration of Muslim Buginese, Butonese, and Makassarese to the once-Christian territory. In the late-nineteenth century the province was almost exclusively Christian; it was still majority Christian as late as 1971. By the early 1990s, however, the influx of migrants had created a Muslim majority. Worse yet in the eyes of indigenous Christians, the hardworking immigrants had the networks and commercial acumen to displace locals in the marketplace. By 1990, it was only in government and the police that local Christians still enjoyed an edge over Muslims. With the Soeharto regime's shift toward a more pro- Islamic policy during the 1990s, however, even this changed. The appointment of the first Muslim Ambonese to the governorship of Maluku in 1992 "coincided with a new readiness on the Part of President Soe- harto, who felt under pressure from the armed forces, to play the religious card" (Klinken 2001, 18).

In his study of ethnonationalist conflicts and collective violence in South Asia, the Harvard anthropologist Stanley J. Tambiah has observed that if scattered incidents of local violence are to become full-blown communal wars, the tensions and resentments of everyday life must be removed from their place of origin and generalized into encompassing narratives of ethnic victimization and enmity. Tambiah refers to this process as "focalization" and "transvaluation." "Focalization progressively denudes local incidents and disputes of their contextual particulars, and transvaluations distorts, abstracts, and aggregates those incidents into larger collective issues of national or ethnic interest" (Tambiah 1996, 81). It is precisely this process that gave the conflict in Maluku such an incendiary quality after 1999. What had begun as local grievances and a patchwork of alliances was gradually abstracted and focalized into a narrative of a clash of religious civilizations.

In Maluku as in South Asia, state officials played a central role in some of the violence, but it would be a gross oversimplification to ascribe the conflict to an all-powerful state. Such blame-the-state generalizations are especially unhelpful here in Indonesia, because a key symptom of the post-Soeharto crisis was that the state itself had lost its cohesiveness, as opposed factional elites struck coalitional bargains with rival entities in society. A similar segmentary fissioning of state and society, known in Indonesian as aliranisasi (lit., “streaming”), had taken place earlier in the country’s history, in the period leading up to the mass killings of 1965–66 (see Hefner 2000; Schrauwers 2000).

Equally important, and contrary to a certain romanticism widespread in the 1990s (see chap. 1), it is clear that actors in “civil” society were also complicit in the violence. Whether in Indonesia, India, Rwanda, or the United States, real-and-existing civil societies—the realm of voluntary associations between the household and the state (Hall 1995; Hefner 1998)—are always, not merely occasionally, crosscut by ethnic, religious, class, and gender tensions (see Hansen 1999; Hefner 2001; Keane 1996, 10). Although in the 1980s democratic activists had hoped that civil society might provide a kinder and gentler road to democratization, civil society is no more capable of fulfilling the democratic dream on its own than the communities earlier assigned that same mythically heroic role: the community of believers, the proletariat, the middle class, the nation.

If elements of both state and society were complicit in the Indonesian violence, the role of the Islamist paramilitaries nonetheless merits special mention. This is so not because the Islamist paramilitaries played a larger role in the violence than non-Muslim bosses, but because the former dealt such a severe blow to the hopes of democratic Muslims. Tambiah’s remarks on focalization and transvaluation are again helpful in this regard (see also Hansen 1999). Focalization and transvaluation require the active presence of agents who have the discursive resources and social authority to disseminate a metanarrative of communal peril and riposte. This discursive legerdemain also requires that voices of moderation within the target community be silenced. What made the Islamist paramilitaries such a potent force in post-Soeharto Indonesia is that, for a while, they seemed close to meeting both of these conditions.

* The JIHADI Advance

In the months following Soeharto’s fall, hundreds of Islamist paramilitaries sprang up in cities and towns across Indonesia. In the city of Solo alone (a hotbed of political activity in Central Java), there were more than seventy militias operating by late 1999. Most of these paramilitaries had no more than a few dozen members recruited from among neighborhood youth. The largest, however, mobilized tens of thousands of followers in cities and towns across the country. Armed Muslim activism on this scale had not been seen since the anticommunist killings of 1965–66. Unlike the mobilization during that period, however, state patrons had direct influence over only the largest paramilitaries. Many smaller paramilitaries rejected the post-Soeharto state outright, demanding it be replaced with an Islamic state.

The three largest paramilitaries of the post-Soeharto period provide a clear illustration of the varied ideologies and alliances that underlay Islamist paramilitarism. The three are the Islamic Defenders Front (FPI, Front Pembela Islam), the Jihad Paramilitary, or Laskar Jihad, and the Laskar Mujahidin, the paramilitary wing of the Council of Indonesian Mujahidin (MMI, Majelis Mujahidin Indonesia).[44] In early 2003, the leader (emir) of the last group, Abu Bakar Ba‘asyir, was accused by Indonesian authorities of complicity in the Bali bombings, as well as earlier attacks on dozens of Christian churches on Christmas eve 2000. Although he was eventually cleared of these charges (though convicted for a lesser infraction), activists linked to his organization were found guilty of the Bali bombings. The bombings and subsequent trials were eventually to bring about a tectonic shift in the paramilitarists’ public fortunes.

* The Islamic Defenders Front

Until its suspension in October 2002, the Islamic Defenders Front, or FPI, was the largest of Indonesia’s Islamist paramilitaries. On several occasions the FPI leadership boasted that they had a half million fighters, but my own observations suggest the active membership was actually closer to forty thousand to fifty thousand, most of it concentrated in a handful of large cities. Five thousand of the best-coordinated and aggressive FPI units, however, operated in and around the capital city of Jakarta. From its founding on August 17, 1998, to its “suspension” in October 2002 (see below), the Jakarta FPI was the most potent paramilitary force in the capital, striking fear even among the local police.

Unlike their Jakarta counterparts, FPI units outside the capital had a reputation for militancy combined with poor coordination and indiscipline. The provincial units’ recklessness reflected the fact that the national organization was stitched together in the months following Soe- harto’s downfall through alliances between bosses from already-existing paramilitaries, many of which had only nominal ties to the FPI’s Jakarta leadership. Another complicating influence on the FPI was that, unlike the Laskar Mujahidin and the Laskar Jihad, the FPI recruited much of its membership from poor urban neighborhoods and, in particular, from the ranks of petty gangsters and ready-for-hire political hooligans. The FPI leadership made no secret of its rank and file’s populist background, since this only enhanced the militia’s image as a formidable street force. But the gangland reputation also fueled allegations that some of the organization’s celebrated attacks on bars, discotheques, and brothels were as much concerned with securing protection money as they were controlling vice.

Although the rank and file come from lumpenproletariat backgrounds, the FPI’s national leadership consists of middle-age religious scholars of Hadrami-Arab background. The FPI’s founder, Al-Habib Muhammad Rizieq bin Hussein Syihab, is a Hadrami Arab, as are his lieutenants. The supreme commanders of the other two large paramilitaries, the Laskar Jihad and the Laskar Mujahidin, also happen to be Hadrami Indonesians. However, unlike the FPI, these organizations recruit most of their officers from among people of non-Arab background.

Of all Indonesia’s large paramilitaries, the FPI has also been the least reluctant to advertise its ties to high-ranking security officials, including the commander of the post-Soeharto armed forces, General Wiranto, and the police chief for the capital district, Nugroho Jayussman. Jakarta journalists whom I interviewed in 1999 and 2000 stated flatly that Wiranto and Jayussman were responsible for creating the FPI. Wiranto and Jayussman themselves, however, have repeatedly denied having any more than a friendly relationship with Rizieq.

Despite the denials, there is ample evidence of elite backing for at least some of the FPI's actions. It was at the invitation of General Wiranto, for example, that the FPI in November 1998 helped to mobilize a 100,000-strong "voluntary security force" (pam swakarsa) to protect the Consultative Assembly and the Habibie government from prodemocracy demonstrators (Dijk 2001, 341). In June 2000, the FPI ransacked the headquarters of the National Commission on Human Rights when the latter body issued statements implicating members of the armed forces command in the 1999 violence in East Timor. Police stood by during the attack, and later made no attempt to arrest the action's organizers, although their identity was widely known. In March and April 2001, finally, the FPI joined with conservative members of the military and former ruling party, Golkar, in a campaign of "anticommunist" actions that attacked leftist students and ransacked bookstores selling socialist literature, accusing President Wahid of sanctioning both.

However extensive the FPI's ties to military and civilian elites, it is nonetheless clear that the FPI leadership always had its own interests and ambitions. On November 2, 1999, several hundred FPI activists burned a Protestant church south of the capital. On December 13, 1999, four thousand FPI militants broke into and occupied Jakarta City Hall, demanding that the city government close discos, cinemas, restaurants, and massage parlors during the Muslim fasting month. On October 10, 2000, hundreds of FPI militants announced their intention to kill a delegation of Israelis scheduled to visit Indonesia for the 104th Inter-Parliamentary Union conference. (The Israelis withdrew from the conference.) The FPI also spearheaded fierce demonstrations against the United States after the attacks of September 11, 2001. In October 2001, the FPI chief even threatened to shut down the American embassy and conduct sweepings of hotels to flush out Americans and British "spies."

These latter actions led to several violent confrontations with the police. In December 2000, the police command in Jakarta announced that it would no longer tolerate FPI’s unilateral actions against cafes, restaurants, and bars. A day later, machete-wielding FPI members invaded a government housing complex in North Jakarta, only to be repelled by its residents. On December 11, 2000, the police took firmer measures, firing bullets into the tires of a van carrying attackers who had just ransacked four entertainment centers in West Jakarta and were hauling away booty (five air conditioners). Angered by the police action, on December 13 hundreds of FPI militants attacked a police station east of the capital, seriously injuring three officers. The next day FPI members attacked a prostitution complex in Subang, West Java, killing a guard. Angry locals reacted by burning down the house of the district FPI leader.

As police pressure increased in early 2001, the FPI scaled back its attacks on alleged centers of vice, concentrating its energies on the campaign against President Wahid. Once Wahid was forced from power in July 2001, however, the FPI ratcheted up its public actions again, sponsoring demonstrations in support of the implementation of Islamic law. In the weeks following September 11, 2001, the FPI also led the fiercest demonstrations against U.S. actions in Afghanistan, and publicly declared its willingness to attack Americans. By this time, however, it was becoming clear that many government officials were growing tired of FPI recklessness. When, in early 2002, American officials raised the issue of renewing limited collaboration with the Indonesian armed forces (contacts that had been frozen for several years), many Jakartan observers predicted—rightly, as it would turn out—that the FPI’s days were numbered.

* The Laskar Jihad

The Yogyakarta-based Laskar Jihad (jihad militia) has had a similar history of on-again-off-again cooperation with establishment figures. Until its sudden dissolution three days after the Bali bombings in October 2002, the Laskar Jihad (LJ) was the second largest of Indonesia’s paramilitaries. It was also the best funded and best coordinated, and it was well armed. Although the LJ cooperated with other paramilitaries in attacking alleged centers of vice, its primary concern was always to respond to what were described as Christian acts of aggression against Muslims in Maluku and Central Sulawesi. When I interviewed the Laskar Jihad leader, Jafar Umar

Thalib, at the end of July 2001, he said quite bluntly that he intended to extend this armed jihad to other areas of the archipelago, including Central Kalimantan, Aceh, Papua, and “anywhere else the enemies of Islam have not learned they must relent.” At its peak in September 2001, the organization had two thousand fighters in Maluku, eight hundred to one thousand in Central Sulawesi, and several hundred operating under a different Islamist uniform in Papua.[45]

The Laskar Jihad grew out of an earlier conservative religious movement known as the Sunna Communication Forum (FKAWJ, Forum Ko- munikasi Ahlus Sunnah wal Jamaah), founded in Yogyakarta in 1994. The founder and spiritual leader of the FKAWJ was a young (b. December 1961) Arab Indonesian by the name of Jafar Umar Thalib. Thalib’s career began in Saudi-backed Salafiyah organizations, including the Institute for Islamic and Arabic Studies (LIPIA) in Jakarta, where Thalib studied in the early 1980s, and the Indonesian Council for Islamic Predication (DDII), where he worked in 1983–84.[46]

Awarded a scholarship by the DDII, Thalib traveled in 1986 to Saudi Arabia. From there, under the sponsorship of the Saudi-based Muslim World League, he traveled to Afghanistan, where he met briefly with Osama bin Laden. In his interview with me, Thalib insisted he never directly collaborated with bin Laden, choosing instead to join a faction of the Afghan mujahidin with ties to the Saudi government. After the events of September 11, 2001, Thalib publicly distanced himself from bin Laden. He did so, however, not because of the attacks on the United States, but because of bin Laden’s opposition to the Saudi government.

Between 1989 and 1993, Thalib made several trips back to Yemen to continue his salafiyah studies. Upon returning to Indonesia in 1993, he founded a religious boarding school (pesantren) north of the city of Yogyakarta. Unlike most pesantren, Thalib’s school catered not to adolescent youth, but to the middle-class university students active in the Islamic study circles (halaqah) for which Yogyakarta was famous. The more radical among these students were organized into not only religious study groups, but secretive political cells known as usrah (lit., “family”). Modeled on the radical wing of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood (Mitchell 1969; Wickham 2002), the usrah were small operational cells consisting of five to fifteen people linked to a vertical command structure. The senior command coordinated the usrah that made up any single organization; they also directed the membership's weekly religious and political lessons. Some groups also engaged in paramilitary training. The usrah movement as a whole instilled a spirit of militancy and exclusivity, emphasizing that Islam is a total way of life. Members dressed in a distinctive South Asian salafiyah style, and shunned contact with "nonbelievers," an expansive category that included ordinary Muslims regarded as insufficiently pious. Although their memberships were distinct, both the Laskar Jihad and the Laskar Mujahidin (below) mobilized their membership using this pattern of secretive usrah cells.

Although some writers have insisted that Thalib was "nonpolitical" until he founded the Laskar Jihad in February 2000, in separate interviews with me, he and one of his chief lieutenants, Ustadh Umar Budi- hargo, acknowledged their ambitions were political as well as religious from the start. Their purpose, both said, was to counteract the stream of "deviationist" thinking being propagated by Muslim democrats in the university town. Yogyakarta in these years was second only to Jakarta as a center of prodemocracy Muslim activism. During 1999, when I lived in the city, no Muslim activists with whom I spoke had any illusions about Thalib being apolitical. Thalib was known not only for his opposition to democratic Muslims, but for his cordial ties to hardline patrons in Jakarta. The more specific charge leveled at Thalib was that a member of the Soeharto family, who also happens to own a home near Yogyakarta's sultan's palace, had provided the financing for Thalib's pesantren in 1994. In his interview with me, Thalib flatly denied this charge.

Whatever the truth of this accusation, what is clear is that from late 1999 on there were regular and high-level meetings between Thalib and representatives of a faction of the armed forces. A former midlevel field commander of the Laskar Jihad, whom I interviewed on August 3, 2001, just after he had left the organization, explained that discussions had increased in January 2000, when retired members of the armed forces, with ties to a still-active commander, approached Thalib indicating they were prepared to support his efforts to mobilize Muslims to respond to Christian attacks in Maluku. Like Thalib, these agents blamed President Wahid for the Maluku conflict and accused the embattled president of being a communist sympathizer. The terms of cooperation were agreed on in February 2000. Soon thereafter a campaign was launched among leading Muslim families in Jakarta, directed by two former Soeharto ministers, to raise money for arms and medical supplies.

The International Crisis Group's report on the violence in Maluku, "Indonesia: The Search for Peace in Maluku" (issued on February 8, 2002), notes that after the founding of the Laskar Jihad in February 2000, out-of-uniform members of the Indonesian National Military (TNI) helped to train its fighters at a camp outside of Bogor, West Java. Tactical support of this sort was also apparent in the Laskar Jihad's startling display of weapons in front of the presidential palace on April 7, 2000, as well as the militants' unimpeded travel across Java to the port of Surabaya several weeks later. Although the president, minister of defense, and governor of Maluku province all appealed to security officials to stop the militia from traveling to Maluku, the militants not only moved freely but were given security escorts along much of the route. In Surabaya they boarded state-owned ferries for Maluku. A Muhammadiyah activist who was in the province at the time told me in July 2000 that upon their arrival in Maluku, the fighters were escorted into the port city of Ambon and provided with weapons shipped in separate containers from Surabaya. Showing once again that there was no consensus among security officials on policy toward the Laskar Jihad, however, provincial police seized one of the weapons containers upon its arrival in the port.

Tactical collaboration between factions of the elite and the Laskar Jihad was also apparent in the "antivice" campaigns in which the organization participated in Yogyakarta during early 2001. As with the FPI's attacks in Jakarta, the Yogyakarta campaign targeted discotheques, bars, brothels—as well as meetings of prodemocracy activists. By July 2001, attacks by machete-wielding militants had paralyzed the local democracy movement. In their antivice actions, Laskar Jihad militants were joined by militants from the Movement of Ka'abah Youth (GPK), an affiliate of one of the country's largest Muslim parties, the United Development Party, or PPP. In Yogyakarta in August 2001, a former officer of the GPK who disagreed with the campaign's targeting of democracy activists described its origins:

The whole strategy to use the GPK to attack places of immorality and the democracy movement wasn’t something simply tolerated by security officials. It was designed by district officials in a series of meetings I attended during early 2001. The meetings involved officials from Golkar, military officials, Laskar Jihad, and the PPP [the Islamic party]. The campaign’s purpose wasn’t just to combat vice. It was also intended to mobilize conservative Islamists and undermine support for Abdurrahman Wahid and the democracy movement.

If there is evidence of a coordinate relationship between the Laskar Jihad and at least some members of the security elite, the organization’s three- year history also offered numerous examples of conflict with security officials. In June 2000, responding to what it claimed was police bias, the Laskar Jihad mounted an armed assault on a mobile police armory in the Tantui region of Ambon, Maluku, seizing ammunition and seven hundred automatic weapons. In August 2000, a special “Joint Battalion” made up of soldiers drawn from the army, marines, and the air force exchanged gunfire with Laskar Jihad fighters. Other clashes took place in January 2001 and, most seriously, June 14, 2001, when Joint Battalion soldiers attacked a Jihad polyclinic, killing twenty-three militants. Thalib responded to this incident by posting a fatwa on the Laskar Jihad Web site calling for the Maluku military commander to be killed. Shortly thereafter, the commander was transferred and the Joint Battalion was replaced by army special forces (KOPASSUS) regarded as more sympathetic to the Laskar Jihad.

Despite these last actions, official opposition to the Laskar Jihad continued to grow. On May 4, 2001, Thalib was arrested after returning from Maluku, on grounds of inciting religious hatred (a prosecutable offense in Indonesia) and condoning the execution by stoning of a Laskar Jihad fighter accused of adultery (the militant had conceded the accusation and agreed to the punishment). In the face of protests from Muslim conservatives, Thalib was quickly released. A year later, however, he was arrested again. This time Thalib was charged with defaming the president and fomenting hatred, in relation to remarks that he had made opposing a recently negotiated peace settlement for Maluku.

Thalib’s arrest sparked bitter accusations in the Muslim community that Indonesian authorities were caving in to U.S. pressures. But the incident also revealed growing divisions in the Laskar Jihad leadership itself. These pitted a hard core determined to press forward with the jihad campaign against accommodationists, including Thalib, who insisted that there was no point to armed struggle if the group no longer enjoyed the backing of politicians and military officials. In the aftermath of the Bali bombings in October 2002, this split grew, with hardliners deserting Thalib’s organization to form militias dedicated to continuing jihad. By July 2003, Thalib was speaking openly of his disenchantment with politics and his determination to dedicate himself to religious education. My interviews with former Laskar Jihad militants in that month indicated that militant defectors from Thalib’s organization had regrouped into separate usrah cells. They made no secret of their determination to renew armed jihad when circumstances allowed, with or without Jafar Umar Thalib.

* The Laskar Mujahidin

Unlike the Laskar Jihad and the Islamic Defenders front, the leadership of the third and smallest of the Islamist paramilitaries to be discussed here, the Laskar Mujahidin, has long had an antagonistic relationship with Indonesia’s armed forces and political establishment. The Laskar Mujahidin is the armed wing of the Indonesian Mujahidin Council (Ma- jelis Mujahidin Indonesia, MMI). The MMI was founded in Yogyakarta in August 2000, and is dedicated to the implementation of Islamic law and the establishment of an Islamic state. The council includes among its leadership a heterogeneous assortment of intellectuals and politicians from mainstream pro-shari‘a groupings as well as armed militants. However, some officials in the organization are regarded as having sympathies for the Jema‘ah Islamiyah, a group with ties to al-Qa‘ida and blamed for the Bali and Marriott bombings.

In their earlier years, the men who were to become the leaders of the MMI were associated with the Darul Islam (DI, “abode of Islam”) movement. The DI is an old armed Islamist movement that declared an Islamic state in 1948, and then did battle with government forces until 1962 (Dijk 1981). In military circles, even pro-Islamic ones, the Darul Islam has long been regarded as a traitor to the national cause because it turned against the Republican government when the latter was struggling against the Dutch. This legacy did not prevent the military from making occasional use of DI activists. In the anticommunist campaign of 196566, DI veterans were recruited to assist in the roundup and killing of communists in West Java. As anticommunist forces in Vietnam teetered toward collapse in the early 1970s, Soeharto's intelligence chief, Ali Mo- ertopo, sponsored the revival of clandestine DI networks, with an eye toward mobilizing them should there be a renewed communist threat (Feillard 1995, 119; ICG 2002, 5). During the 1970s and early 1980s, there were allegations that several bombings blamed by the government on a shadowy Islamist group, the Komando Jihad, may really have been the work of Ali Moertopo double agents working with the DI.

During the 1970s and 1980s, a new network of DI activists gradually came into existence, organized around the activities of an influential Qur'anic boarding school, the Pesantren al-Mu'im, in the village of Ngruki outside of Solo, Central Java. The school was founded in 1973 by two ulama of Hadrami-Arab descent, Abdullah Sungkar and Abu Bakar Ba'asyir. Neither man had been directly involved in the Darul Islam rebellions, but both shared that movement's ambition of replacing Indonesia's existing government with an Islamic state. In the 1970s, both men threw themselves into the task of creating communities of believers, or jema'ah, dedicated to the implementation of Islamic law. Much like the founders of the Laskar Jihad, the two men relied on an underground network of training cells (usrah) to achieve this aim. As the Soeharto regime ratcheted up its pressure on Islamic groupings in late 1978, both men were arrested and accused of involvement in Komando Jihad violence. Held in prison for four years, they were tried and eventually released on time already served. Three years later, when they got wind of government prosecutors' plans to rearrest them, the pair fled to Malaysia. There they continued to raise funds and recruit members to their network, focusing much of their effort on Malaysia's large expatriate Indonesian community (ICG 2002, 12). In the 1980s, some activists in the Jakartan wing of the movement were linked to acts of criminal violence, including bank robberies and murder, but these actions were condemned by Sungkar and Ba'asyir.

In the final years of the Soeharto regime, Sungkar and Ba‘asyir are said to have come under the influence of the Egyptian al-Jama‘a al-Islamiyya, a breakaway faction of the Egyptian Islamic Brotherhood committed to armed struggle (Sullivan and Abed-Kotob 1999, 82–86). Not everyone in the Indonesian JI network agreed with the leadership’s more militant tack. However, in the mid-1990s, as hardline groupings like KISDI and the DDII, to which Sungkar and Ba‘asyir had once been close, reconciled with President Soeharto, the two men remained unreconstructed critics of the president. Together with the prominence of veterans of the Darul Islam rebellion in the organization’s leadership, this legacy explains why Ba‘asyir and the MMI have always been regarded with suspicion in military and old regime circles.

Another consequence of the hardening of Sungkar and Ba‘asyir’s position, however, was that during the late 1990s, several hundred Jema‘ah Islamiyah militants traveled to camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan to receive guerrilla training with internationalist jihadis supporting the Afghan mujahidin. In his study of al-Qa‘ida networks in Southeast Asia, Zachary Abuza makes the prescient observation that these years happened to coincide with the expansion of the al-Qa‘ida into Southeast Asia. Al-Qa‘ida agents had first appeared in the region in the early 1990s. By 1995, they were participating in secret preparations to bomb U.S. airliners over the Pacific (the attack was thwarted). Al-Qa‘ida operatives also traveled to and fought in Maluku and the southern Philippines in the late 1990s and 2000s (Abuza 2003; ICG 2002, 12).

One issue that came to divide JI activists centered on whether the state to which the movement aspires is to coincide with Indonesia’s present territorial boundaries, or will include Malaysia, the southern Philippines, and southern Thailand as well. The dispute split the organization in two, but the factions are said to have reconciled shortly after Ba‘asyir and Sungkar returned to Indonesia in 1999. Both groups participated in the Mujahidin Congress in Yogyakarta on August 5–7, 2000, at which the Indonesian Mujahidin Council was formed (see Awwas 2001). Both also endorsed the formation of a Laskar Mujahidin to fight Christians in Maluku and Central Sulawesi.

Although their electronic media facilities are not as sophisticated as those of the Laskar Jihad, the MMI and Laskar Mujahidin have nonetheless demonstrated an aptitude for print and electronic media. Most of their media activities have been concentrated in Yogyakarta, at the Wih- dah Press. The Wihdah Press was founded and is today still directed by Irfan S. Awwas (born Irfan Suryahardi in 1960), whose brother has been identified as a major JI operative. An intelligent and fiercely independent militant who served nine years in prison for opposing Soeharto policies, Awwas was the prime force behind the convening of the August 2000 congress that led to the establishment of the Majelis Mujahidin Indonesia. During the first three years of the post-Soeharto period, Awwas's press published some of Indonesia's most influential radical tracts. Wih- dah Press was the publisher, for example, of one of the most influential hardline accounts of the Maluku violence, Rustam Kastor's The Political Conspiracy of the South Maluku Republic and Christians to Destroy the Muslim Community in Ambon Maluku (Kastor 2000). This work and two sequels make the case that the violence in Maluku was instigated not just by Maluku Christians, but by Israel and the United States. This, of course, was an Indonesian variant of the conspiracy theories common in jihadi circles around the Muslim world since the 1980s. Equally telling, while laying blame for the Maluku violence on Christians, Kastor—him- self a former army officer—also accuses the democracy movement of having prepared the ground for the conflict by weakening the army.

Although after its founding in August 2000 the MMI established branches across Indonesia, Jema'ah Islamiyah cadre tied to the organization fell into factional infighting shortly thereafter. A faction led by Rid- uan Isamuddin, alias Hambali, pressed for armed struggle against the United States in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, bombings. In February 2002, Hambali was identified by Singapore authorities as one of the masterminds of a plot to attack Western embassies and U.S. naval ships in the Singapore region. Malaysian authorities have also identified Hambali as the person who, in January 2000, arranged accommodations in Malaysia for two of the hijackers of the American Airlines Flight 77 that crashed into the Pentagon on September 11. Philippine authorities have also alleged that Hambali was involved in the 1995 plot to bomb U.S. passenger jets. Finally, the International Crisis Group also implicated the Hambali wing of the Jamaah Islamiyah in a series of bombings of Christian churches across Indonesia on Christmas eve 2000, in which some nineteen people died (ICG 2002, 12). In February of 2003, Indonesian authorities brought formal charges against Ba‘asyir and his colleagues for these actions (Ba‘asyir was eventually cleared of the charges).

It was the bombings in Kuta, Bali, on October 12, 2002, however, that finally brought the JI into glaring public scrutiny. Individuals linked to the JI confessed to the attacks, explaining the action was designed to kill Americans and American allies. Police interrogations confirmed that after Abdullah Sungkar passed away in November 1999, many of the organization’s younger militants were unhappy with the selection of Abu Bakar Ba‘asyir as the JI leader. Although Ba‘asyir agrees with the long-term necessity of armed struggle and was alleged to have approved the Christmas 2000 church bombings, he is said to have disagreed with the plan for escalated violence after September 11, 2001. The disagreement was one of tactics, not principle. Ba‘asyir worried that an escalation of the violence would only invite a government crackdown and push the Megawati government toward closer cooperation with the United States.

In retrospect, if these were Ba‘asyir’s fears, they appear well founded. Three days after the Bali bombings, the Laskar Jihad announced its dissolution. Although several Western analysts claimed the organization’s dissolution was caused by financial problems, sources close to the organization told me in October 2002 that the organization had come under “intensive pressure” from former supporters in the armed forces. Two weeks later, the Islamic Defenders’ Front suspended its activities as well.

Abu Bakar Ba‘asyir’s Laskar Mujahidin, however, remained defiant, rejecting government demands that it dissolve. Press coverage of JI involvement in the Bali violence, however, shocked and angered the mainstream Muslim public. Until the Bali bombings, the Indonesian public had been skeptical of Western, Malaysian, Singaporean, and Philippine claims of the Jema‘ah Islamiyah’s existence and its alleged campaign of violence. The Bali bombing dispelled some of that skepticism and galvanized Indonesia’s two large mainstream organizations, the Nahdlatul Ulama and the Muhammadiyah, into a concerted campaign against extremist violence. The violence also shifted the balance of opinion among political leaders in Jakarta. Prior to Bali, they too had been skeptical of charges that the Jema‘ah Islamiyah was planning acts of violence.

By early 2003, then, the Islamist paramilitaries' fortunes had declined drastically, and Muslim moderates were reasserting themselves with a new vigor, hopeful that the paramilitaries' backers had deserted the organizations once and for all. Nonetheless, militants in the national Islamic leadership, including a few well-placed figures with ties to Golkar, continued to speak of an international conspiracy of Jews and Christians against Islam and against Muslim Indonesia. The U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003 was universally condemned by Muslim moderates, not least of all because they feared the American campaign would put new wind in extremist sails. Moderates in the NU and Muhammadiyah moved quickly to take control of the antiwar movement, however, and the success of their efforts insured that the impact of the war proved less destabilizing than many had feared.

 Conclusion

The Indonesian example reminds us that for a transition from authoritarianism to take hold, it is not enough that there be a tolerant and participatory civil society. For the transition to succeed, democratic actors in society need partners in the state to work with rather than against society's civil currents. It is this positive synergy across the state-society divide that has proved so elusive in post-Soeharto Indonesia. Rather than building on resources in the Muslim community for moderation and participation, political bosses in the state and local society engaged in sectarian trawling that provided Islamist paramilitaries with an influence greatly out of proportion with their numbers in society.

In light of the top-heavy and state-centric analyses long popular in Indonesian studies, it is important to emphasize that this failure was not just a matter of an all-controlling and ne'er-do-well state. State-based actors may have played a central role in some of the worst trawling, such as that which fueled the street battles in the capital in the months just after Soeharto's resignation. But these elite-sponsored intrigues were soon followed by equally bitter trawling expeditions by "civil-societal" actors in the provinces.

There is a larger political lesson here. Contrary to the romanticized characterizations commonplace in the 1990s, civil society in Indonesia and elsewhere has long been crosscut by ethnoreligious divides. In Indonesia during the 1980s and 1990s, economic growth and migration reshaped the social landscape, and pushed ethnoreligious tensions in some provinces to heights that would have strained the capacities of even the most democratic state. The Soeharto regime's habit of playing ethnoreligious groupings against each other compounded these social tensions considerably. However, the regime did not invent societal tensions where otherwise there would have been none. On the contrary, "civil" society itself was torn by sectarian resentments and divisions. Even worse, in the aftermath of Soeharto's resignation, aspiring bosses in state and society did not hesitate to exploit these uncivil divides for their own ends.

There were, however, other vulnerabilities in Indonesian society more specifically related to features of Muslim politics. One was that, during the 1980s and 1990s, the Muslim community's great mass organizations, the Nahdlatul Ulama and the Muhammadiyah, had protected themselves from Soeharto manipulation by distancing themselves from formal politics and deepening their commitment to civic and educational tasks. When, a few month's after Soeharto's fall, radical paramilitaries arose on the fringes of the Muslim community, the NU and the Muhammadiyah moved quickly to call for peace, the rule of law, and civic moderation. However, neither of these organizations was organized in such a way as to allow it to act as a centrally coordinated political machine. Neither, then, was able to fill the vacuum created by, so to speak, the regime's desertion of its civil functions.

There was another aspect of the Indonesian crisis also related to the peculiarities of Muslim politics. Like most of the Muslim world, Indonesia had been swept by an Islamic resurgence in the 1970s and 1980s. The resurgence took place in the aftermath of growing popular disillusionment with a long-dominant secular nationalism. It also occurred, however, after programs of mass education made ordinary Muslims eager to assume responsibility for their religion (Eickelman 1992). As discussed in the introduction and several other essays in this book, one consequence of the resurgence was a great pluralization in popular understandings and social professions of Islam. In most countries, the majority of resurgent Muslims were moderate or apolitical in their views. However, often there was also an ultraconservative minority eager to respond to the competitive pluralism of public life by playing up divisions between Muslims and non-Muslims, as well as Muslims regarded as less than pious in their profession of the faith. Among other things, the conservatives demanded that Muslims turn their back on citizenship ideals and avoid all contact with “infidels.” Fueled in part by publications and predication programs sponsored by Salafiyah organizations in Saudi Arabia (see Abuza 2003), this conservative stream also insisted that Islam is a total and “complete” system, alone capable of resolving the modern world’s problems. This claim effectively denies the relevance of other forms of knowledge for dealing with social problems. Not coincidentally, the claim also legitimates patriarchal and authoritarian arrangements antithetical to democratic citizenship.

During the early years of the Soeharto regime, the Indonesian Council for Islamic Predication (DDII, Dewan Dakwah Islamiyah Indonesia) was the main conduit for Saudi-Salafiyah ideas. Soon after its establishment in 1967, the DDII forged close ties with the Saudi-sponsored Islamic World League (Rabitat al-‘Alam al-Islami). Already in the 1970s, the DDII had begun to translate and publish Saudi-Salafiyah tracts, some of which were notable for their anti-Christian and anti-Jewish diatribes (Bruinessen 2002; Hefner 2000). With the jihadi mobilization against the Soviets in Afghanistan, and with the growing irritation in many Arab capitals with U.S. policies in the Middle East, this propaganda took on an even more militantly jihadist tone. With the end of the Afghanistan campaign and the outbreak of violence in Bosnia, Kashmir, Chechnya, and other Muslim lands, the literature escalated its critique into a full-blown attack on alleged “Jewish and Christian” conspiracies against Islam. Although for most of the Soeharto era proponents of these theories remained marginal to the mainstream Muslim community, they nonetheless survived. More serious, their theories came to play a central role in the ideological training of the secretive usrah cells that sprang up in cities and on campuses across Indonesia in the 1990s.

For Indonesia’s moderate and democratic Muslims, then, a central challenge of postresurgence politics was the effort to pacify the sectarian and authoritarian fervors of the jihadi fringe so as to channel the energies of the resurgence in a pluralist and democratic direction. Whether in contemporary Turkey, post-Khomeini Iran, or elsewhere, one of the most common instruments for resolving this problem involves efforts by members of the educated new Muslim middle class to demonstrate the compatibility of Islam with modern democracy and pluralism. In other words, a key feature of modern Muslim politics involves moderates' efforts to constrain and "civilize" the patriarchal and authoritarian tendencies of conservatives unconvinced of the benefits of modern pluralism.

Unfortunately, in the case of Indonesia, the economic crisis of 1997–98 converged with the collapse of state authority and the outbreak of ethnoreligious violence to make this civic-pluralist project deeply problematic. With the country facing a dual political and economic crisis, the jihadis' claim that the country's plight was the result of an international Jewish and Christian conspiracy began to resonate with some angry urban youth. In a nation of almost 200 million Muslims, the total number of jihadis remained minuscule. But antidemocratic violence is not a matter of majority rule. The jihadis' militancy and secretive usrah organization gave them an enormous advantage over their civic pluralist rivals. Worse yet, the jihadis' willingness to collaborate with provincial bosses and old regime conservatives provided them with access to a social and political capital with which they could scale up their influence and strike at their moderate rivals.

What went wrong in post-Soeharto Indonesia had some Islamist colors, then, but its driving force also showed something all too familiar from other troubled settings: a transition from authoritarian rule staggering under the weight of economic crisis, a corrupted political culture, and, finally, rampant violence stoked by unscrupulous political bosses. There was indeed a measure of international terrorism laced into this potent brew, and it helped to provoke some of the most awful acts of recent terrorist violence. It may yet again. But any analysis that sees Indonesia's crisis as primarily the result of al-Qa'ida or other internationalist machinations will have missed the more serious lesson to be learned from the Indonesian example. It is that the seeds for Indonesia's difficulties, and, in particular, the seeds for the jihadis' post-Soeharto ascent, were sown by thirty-two years of divide-and-conquer authoritarianism. This politics wreaked havoc with Indonesia's tradition of moderate Islam, and destroyed public trust and pluralist collaborations at a time when, as a result of the changes sweeping Indonesia, the country needed new avenues of participation and citizenship more than ever.

Despite the violence of the past few years, the social resources for a culture and practice of citizenship have not been exhausted. Although each faces opposition from a hardline minority within, the Muhammadiyah and Nahdlatul Ulama remain pillars of Islamic moderation and civic-pluralism. In parliamentary debates that raged in the National Assembly in 2001 and 2002, both of these organizations took principled and courageous stands against proposals that would have obliged the state to implement Islamic law. The two organizations did so on the ground that such a measure would damage the country's pluralist heritage.

As this example shows, Indonesia still commands significant resources for democratic citizenship and pluralist participation. The main challenge in the years to come—and it is a serious one—will be whether actors in civil society can at last find democratic partners in the state and among the country's fractious political parties. If such a coalition across the state-society divide can be devised, then this troubled nation may yet make good on its civil-Islamic promise.

[44] I carried out interviews on and with the membership of the Laskar Jihad and Majelis Mujahidin Indonesia in Yogyakarta Indonesia during July-Auguss 2000 and 2001, and again during June-July 2003. My Indonesian research assistant conducted an additional forty interviews from October 2001 to June 2003. The information I present here on the Islamic Defenders Front is based on press reports, interviews with Muslim activists (none of whom were members of the FPI), and an important report by the Research Bureau of the Center for Language and Culture at the National Islamic University in Jakarta (Tim Peneliti 2000).

[45] The Laskar Jihad had also planned to send troops to the province of Aceh, where separatists were gaining ground against the government. With the clear backing of elements in the armed forces command, in January 2002

Jafar Umar Thalib traveled to the troubled province to establish his forces. His presence was denounced by the Acehnese fighters, who accused him of being a stooge of the armed forces command.

[46] Although its meanings have changed over time, “salafiyah” in the Indonesian context refers to a variant of puritanical Islamic reform ostensibly modeled on the first generations of Muslims. On the term’s varied meanings see Shahin 1995.

 References Cited

Abdillah, Masykuri. 1997. Responses of Indonesian Muslim Intellectuals to the Concept of Democracy (1966–1993). Hamburg: Abera Verlag Meyer and Co.

Abuza, Zachary. 2002. “Al-Qaeda’s Asian Web of Terror.” Time (Asia) 160, no. 22 38–40.

———. 2003. Militant Islam in Southeast Asia: Crucible of Terror. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner.

Aragon, Lorraine V. 2000. Fields of the Lord: Animism, Christian Minorities, and State Development in Indonesia. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

———. 2001. “Communal Violence in Poso, Central Sulawesi: Where People Eat Fish and Fish Eat People.” Indonesia 72 (October): 44–79.

Awwas, Irfan S. 2001. Risalah Kongres Mujahidin I dan Penegakan Syari’ah Islam (Proceedings of the First Congress of Mujahidin and for the implementation of Islamic law). Yogyakarta, Indonesia: Wihdah Press.

Barton, Greg. 2002. Gus Dur: The Authorized Biography of Abdurrahman Wahid. Singapore: Equinox Publishing.

Bowen, John R. 1993. Muslims through Discourse: Religion and Ritual in Gayo Society. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Bruinessen, Martin van. 2002. “Genealogies of Islamic Radicalism in postSuharto Indonesia.” South East Asia Research 10, no. 2:117–54.

Chalk, Peter. 2002. “Militant Islamic Extremism in the Southern Philippines.” In Islam in Asia: Changing Political Realities, edited by Jason F. Isaacson and Colin Rubenstein, pp. 187–222. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transactions Publishers.

Cribb, Robert, ed. 1990. The Indonesia Killings, 1965–1966: Studies from Java and Bali. Clayton, Australia: Monash Papers on Southeast Asia no. 21, Centre of Southeast Asian Studies, Monash University.

———. 2000. “From Petrus to Ninja: Death Squads in Indonesia.” In Death Squads in Global Perspective: Murder with Deniability, edited by Bruce B. Campbell and Arthur D. Brenner, pp. 181–202. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Dijk, C. van. 1981. Rebellion under the Banner of Islam: The Darul Islam in Indonesia. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff.

———. 2001. A Country in Despair: Indonesia between 1997 and 2000. Leiden: KITLV Press.

Doorn-Harder, Nelly Van. 2002. “The Indonesian Islamic Debate on a Woman President.” Sojourn 17, no. 2 (October): 164–90.

Effendy, Bahtiar. 1994. “Islam and the State: The Transformation of Islamic Political Ideas and Practices in Indonesia.” Ph.D. dissertation, Department of Political Science, Ohio State University.

Eickelman, Dale F. 1992. “Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies.” American Ethnologist 19, no. 4 (November): 643–55.

Eickelman, Dale F., and James Piscatori. 1996. Muslim Politics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F., and Jon W. Anderson. 1999. New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Elson, R. E. 2001. Suharto: A Political Biography. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Emmerson, Donald K. 1978. “The Bureaucracy in Political Context: Weakness in Strength.” In Political Power and Communications in Indonesia, edited by Karl D. Jackson and Lucian W. Pye, pp. 82–136. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Fe’ıi\arA^ndî:e.1995.L’ı-S:ametaTwıâedaııs:’ııdoıiâsiecoıitem{)OTaıie. Paris-. Cahier d’Archipel 28, Editions LHarmattan.

Feith, Herbert. 1957. The Indonesian Elections of 1955. Interim Report Series, Modern Indonesia Project. Ithaca, N.Y.: Southeast Asia Program, Cornell University.

Forrester, Geoff, and R. J. May, eds. 1999. The Fall of Soeharto. Singapore: Select Books.

Geertz, Clifford. 1960. The Religion of Java. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press.

Hall, John A. 1995. “In Search of Civil Society.” In Civil Society: Theory, History, Comparison, edited by John A. Hall, pp. 1–31. Cambridge: Polity Press.

Hansen, Thomas Blom. 1999. The Saffron Wave: Democracy and Hindu Nationalism in Modern India. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Hefner, Robert W. 1987. “Islamizing Java? Religion and Politics in Rural East Java.” Journal of Asian Studies 46, no. 3: 533–54.

———. 1990. Political Economy of Mountain Java: An Interpretive History. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

———. 1998. “On the History and Cross-Cultural Possibility of a Democratic Ideal.” In Democratic Civility: The History and Cross-Cultural Possibility of a Modern Political Ideal, edited by Robert W. Hefner, pp. 3–49. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers.

———. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

———. 2001. “Introduction: Multiculturalism and Citizenship in Malaysia, Singapore, and Indonesia.” In The Politics of Multiculturalism: Pluralism and Citizenship in Malaysia, Singapore, and Indonesia, edited by Robert W. Hefner, pp. 3–58. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

Human Rights Watch. 2002. “Breakdown: Four Years of Communal Violence in Central Sulawesi.” New York: Human Rights Watch Papers, vol. 14, no. 9C.

ICG. 2001. “Communal Violence in Indonesia: Lessons from Kalimantan.” Brussels: ICG Asia Report no. 19.

———. 2002. “Al-Qaeda in Southeast Asia: The Case of the ‘Ngruki Network’ in Indonesia.” Brussels: ICG Asia Briefing, August 8.

Jay, Robert T. 1963. Religion and Politics in Rural Central Java. New Haven, Conn.: Cultural Report Series no. 12, Program in Southeast Asian Studies, Yale University.

Kastor, Rustam. 2000. Konspirasi politik RMS dan Kristen menghancurkan ummat Islam di Ambon-Maluku (The political conspiracy of the RMS and Christians to destroy the Muslim community in Ambon-Maluku). Yogyakarta: Wihdah Press.

Keane, John. 1996. Reflections on Violence. London: Verso.

Kipp, Rita Smith. 1990. Dissociated Identities: Ethnicity, Religion, and Class in an Indonesian Society. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Klinken, Gerry van. 2001. “The Maluku Wars: Bringing Society Back In.” Indonesia 71 (April): 1–26.

Liddle, R. William, and Saiful Mujani. 2000. “The Triumph of Leadership: Explaining the 1999 Indonesian Vote.” Department of Political Science, Ohio State University, manuscript.

Mitchell, Richard P. 1969. The Society of the Muslim Brothers. New York: Oxford University Press.

O’Donnell, Guillermo, and Philippe C. Schmitter. 1986. Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Tentative Conclusions about Uncertain Democracies. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Pemberton, John. 1994. On the Subject of “Java.” Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

Robinson, Geoffrey. 1995. The Dark Side of Paradise: Political Violence in Bali. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

Ryter, Loren. 1998. “Pemuda Pancasila: The Last Loyalist Free Men of Suharto’s Order.” Indonesia 66 (October): 45–73

Schiller, Anne. 1997. Small Sacrifices: Religious Change and Cultural Identity among the Ngaju of Indonesia. New York: Oxford University Press.

Schrauwers, Albert. 2000. Colonial “Reformation” in the Highlands of Central Sulawesi, Indonesia, 1892–1995. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

Schwarz, Adam. 2000. A Nation in Waiting: Indonesia’s Search for Stability. 2nd edition. Boulder, Colo.: Westview.

Shahin, Emad Eldin. 1995. “Salafiyah.” In The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, edited by John L. Esposito, 3: 463–69. New York: Oxford University Press.

Sullivan, Denis J., and Sana Abed-Kotob. 1999. Islam In Contemporary Egypt: Civil Society versus the State. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner.

Tambiah, Stanley J. 1996. Leveling Crowds: Ethnonationalist Conflicts and Collective Violence in South Asia. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

TGPF. 1998. “The Final Report of the Joint Fact Finding Team (TGPF) on the May 13–15, 1998, Riot.” Jakarta: TGPF.

Tim Peneliti. 2000. Radikalisme Agama dan Perubahan Sosial di DKI Jakarta (Religious radicalism and social change in Jakarta). Jakarta: Pusat Bahasa dan Budaya, IAIN Syarif Hidayatullah.

Wickham, Carrie Rosefsky. 2002. Mobilizing Islam: Religion, Activism, and Political Change in Egypt. New York: Columbia University Press.

Woodward, Mark R. 1989. Islam in Java: Normative Piety and Mysticism in the Sultanate of Yogyakarta. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.

Yunanto, S. 2003. Gerakan Militan Islam di Indonesia dan di Asia Tenggara (Militant Islamic movements in Indonesia and Southeast Asia). Jakarta: Ridep Institute.

 Chapter 12: Sufis and Salafis: the Political Discourse of Transnational Islam

Peter Mandaville

The nature and character of contemporary transnational Islam defy easy description. Recent coverage of this topic in both the popular media and in academic discourse has tended to emphasize the prevalence of highly radical and militant tendencies at the core of those Islamic movements whose activities cross national borders. Some of the more alarmist voices today go so far as to claim the existence of something like an “Islamic Comintern” set on the destruction of Western society and its allies in the Muslim world. In the wake of September 11, the rush to identify enemies and targets—particularly among policy makers and media pundits in the United States—has produced an image of transnational Islam as inherently malignant. Occasionally accurate in their analyses, such depictions of transnational Islam are, however, highly partial and often presented outside of context and in a worryingly dehistoricized manner. We are sometimes given to believe, it seems, that a highly coordinated global network of militant fanatics sprang up fully formed in diverse locales across the Muslim world on September 10, 2001.

Such accounts do much to obscure the complex realities of Muslim transnationalism. It is certainly fact that there exist today Islamic movements—and, moreover, lines of communication and coordination between them—with the willingness and capacity to use violence in the name of religion. It is also the case, however, that the vast majority of transnational connections between individuals and groups in the Muslim world have nothing whatsoever to do with militancy and revolution. Indeed, in global communications forums on the Internet, and in the activities of a growing number of Muslim NGOs, we find evidence of a transnational Islam whose agenda is organized instead around themes such as education, human rights, and gender equality. Even more perplexing it would seem is the fact that the boundaries between these two categories of Muslim transnationalism are not always clearly delineated. Funds from otherwise legitimate charities, for example, can through the exigencies of global exchange find their way into nefarious hands. In short, to understand transnational Islam is, by necessity, also to be comfortable with manifold shades of gray.

This chapter will provide a comparative overview of several manifestations of contemporary transnational Islam. By examining the history, ideology, and practices of several movements—including both “radicals” and “moderates”—I will engage the widely held assumption that transnational Islam is not conducive to discourses of political civility, pluralism, and democracy. In contrast to many of the other contributions in this volume, I will be covering groups who reject religious and political pluralism as it has been defined for the purposes of this project. My aim in doing so stems from the assumption that calculating the most effective way to “scale up” moderate discourses in the absence of an understanding of why more radical tendencies find significant transnational appeal will never produce a comprehensive analysis. Indeed, the ability of radical groups to articulate themes that resonate at times with large portions of worldwide Muslim audiences needs to be regarded as one of the chief obstacles to the wider dissemination of civil, pluralist Islam. In this regard it becomes vital to understand the complex interplay between various groups and movements of sometimes quite different dispositions—or, more properly, to understand that these dispositions, always contingent and subject to rapidly changing and fluid circumstances, often escape easy characterization. The approach I adopt must also therefore reject easy categorizations of “good” and “bad” variants of Islam and, moving away from an exclusively geopolitical orientation, it will seek instead to provide something closer to a discursive analysis of the intellectual and social dimensions of Muslim transnationalism in a globalizing world.

The general plan and structure of the chapter is as follows. I begin by identifying some of the major trends in transnational Islam today. Developing a specific focus on European-based sociopolitical movements, I offer a description and analysis of three of the more radical groups— Hizb ut-Tahrir, al-Muhajiroun, and the Supporters of Shari’ah—who claim significant transnational support for their political agendas, all of which are organized around the principle of reestablishing a global Islamic polity. While these groups are only tangentially linked to networks such as al-Qaeda, there is a large degree of intellectual and ideological overlap between the former and latter. They are hence worth studying in order to better understand the “precursor” social sources of support for transnational militant Islam.

The chapter next moves on to an examination of social movements that represent trends in transnational Islam far more compatible with civil, pluralist norms—and, as I will argue, better socially positioned to scale up their influence over the next generation. This section describes and analyzes social and educational movements, such as the Gülen and Nur groups organized out of Turkey, whose religious orientation draws heavily on modernist neo-Sufi (mystical) sources. I also examine Tariq Ramadan’s discourse on European Islam and the jurisprudential bases for communal pluralism and coexistence with non-Muslim others.

I conclude by, to some extent, deliberately disrupting the ideal type categories of “radical” and “moderate” Islam developed in preceding sections in order to make the point that the reality of contemporary transnational Islam is such that it resists the analyst’s and policy maker’s desire for straightforward typologies. The program of scaling up transnational civil Islam, I argue in the end, is one that cannot be definitively located. It is a quite literally movable feast, and one that requires a sensitivity to rapidly changing contingencies within and across numerous layers of Muslim society. In this regard, also, we are required to rethink the conventional notions and boundaries of what constitutes democratic politics.

 Contemporary Muslim Transnationalism

The scope and diversity of the Muslim world, combined with technologies of communication and travel, produce enormous variety in transnational Islam today. This runs the gamut from highly personalized intellectual linkages between individuals to the high diplomacy of Islamic intergovernmentalism in the OIC and state-sponsored da’wa (Arab, “call,” religious propagation) work via organs such as the Muslim World League (Schulze 1990, 213–65). When it comes to the question of transnational social movements, there is not only a wide range to contend with, but considerable variation in scale, style, and activities. We can think, for example, of the enormous Tablighi Jama’at, a largely apolitical faith movement whose annual conferences in India represent the second largest world gathering of Muslims after the hajj. Transnational da’wa work is one of the group’s main pursuits, and to this end it maintains coordination centers in South Asia, the Middle East, Europe and North America (Masud 2000). Other groups are oriented toward social and economic development issues. Women Living under Muslim Law and Sisters in Islam (see Peletz, this volume), for example, style themselves as international solidarity networks. MuslimAid is a leading global charity. Far-flung diasporas, such as the Chinese Uygar community in Turkey, organize on behalf of Muslim kin and brethren back home (Shi- chor 2003), while new media spaces provide opportunities for discussion and debate among Muslim youth groups in the European Union and the United States (Mandaville 2001; Allievi 2003).

The political forms of contemporary Muslim transnationalism—that is, those groups whose explicit aim is the establishment of Islamic polities— are somewhat less diverse. Olivier Roy identifies two major networks that encompass many of the nationally oriented Islamist movements: one affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood and covering mainly the Arab Middle East (e.g., HAMAS in Palestine, al-Nahda in Tunisia) and the other organized around Pakistan's Jama'at-i Islami (Roy 1994). It is more accurate, however, to say that these connections, for the most part, are ones of general ideological orientation and intellectual lineage rather than active, coordinated sponsorship and coordination. It should be emphasized again that these groups are, in the main, working locally to establish Islamic states in particular countries. Their political aspirations do not extend beyond national borders, and in this sense I do not regard them as transnational movements per se. However, this does not mean that certain of these groups —particularly the more radical among them—are not at times implicated in the agendas and activities of actors whose political aspirations extend beyond the state. Ayman al-Zuwaihari, for example, former leader of Egypt's Islamic Jihad, effectively folded his group into Usama bin Laden's al-Qaeda in the mid-1990s. The Brotherhood and Ja- ma'at both also have a history of ties to and sponsorship of groups abroad.

When we move on to deal with transnational political movements whose goals are more global in scope, things become murkier still. Linkages and relationships can be highly informal, nebulous, and rather ad hoc, contributing to an aura of uncertainty in terms of scale and breadth of geographic coverage. That groups such as al-Qaeda appear to be constituted by cells on virtually every continent, cropping up in such seemingly unlikely locales as South America (Whitbeck and Arneson 2001), lends their activities an aura of omnipresence. By cultivating this image of ubiquity, and through a careful public relations strategy involving media sound bites that seemingly appear out of the ether, a relatively small number of such groups have managed to catapult themselves to the forefront of transnational Islam in the eyes of the public. The spectacle of September 11 and a series of smaller-scale attacks in multiple countries have all served to reinforce this image in recent months. Since these events, the public discourse on transnational Islam has focused almost exclusively on shadowy militant networks, many of which are described as inspired by Wahhabism, a hardline variant of Islam usually seen to emanate from Saudi Arabia. In the wake of the October 2002 bombing in Bali, Indonesia, for example, significant attention focused on Jemaah Islamiah, described as an al-Qaeda “franchise” seeking to establish a Pan-Islamic state encompassing Muslims in Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Brunei (Abuza 2003; Wain and McBeth 2002; see also Hefner and Peletz in this volume). Much is made of the fact that ideologues associated with the group had studied Islam in Saudi Arabia or other parts of the Middle East, supposedly confirming the transnational Wahhabi agenda.

While speculation about transnational Islamic militancy has reached a fevered pitch, our understanding of these groups and the individuals (often only tangentially) affiliated with them has progressed very little. While it should be clear by now that radical groups with violent agendas constitute the marginal fringes of transnational Islam, this does not mean that they should be dismissed as insignificant. It is in part their willingness to adopt extreme methods that compensates for their relatively small numbers. Likewise, skillful use of rhetoric and symbols that resonate with Muslims worldwide affords them a constituency that, while not always supportive of their militant tactics, identifies with many of the issues that constitute their discourse of resistance. While groups such as al-Qaeda have been analyzed extensively from strategic, security, and geopolitical perspectives (Alexander and Swetman 2001; Gunaratna 2002; Paz 2003), relatively little attention has been paid to them or their affiliates as social phenomenan (cf. Bruinessen 2002). At the outset of this chapter I sought to argue that before moving to an analysis of how civil, pluralist Islam might be more effectively scaled up, we need first to understand how the discursive landscape of political Islam—particularly in its transnational aspect—has seemingly come to be so dominated by radical tendencies. In the next section of this chapter, therefore, I will undertake to describe and analyze a complex of sociopolitical movements based largely in the United Kingdom whose goals for the establishment of Islamic polity are more global in scope, and which represent a hardline, conservative approach to religion. Because these groups are peripheral to the activities of an organization such as al-Qaeda—while still sharing many of the same general ideological orientations—they represent interesting examples of the “intermediate milieu” of radical Islam. Their activities constitute a space in which antiplu- ralist agendas can be organized and propagated, while stopping short (for the most part) of adopting coercive methods. These groups vary greatly in terms of the support they command (rarely, it would seem, nearly as much as they claim) and the extent to which they are able to coordinate transnational activities, yet they are certainly qualitatively, in terms of their ideological appeal, if not necessarily always quantitatively, significant.

 Diasporas of Radical Islam

Over the last decade several social movements espousing radical political agendas have emerged as a small but vocal camp within the British Muslim community. These groups are similar enough in their general aims and in the tenor of their discourse to be commonly lumped together as a single tendency. While elements of a shared agenda can indeed be identified, a closer examination soon reveals considerable differences in emphasis and method. Furthermore, some among their leaderships go to considerable lengths to differentiate themselves from each other—partic- ularly insofar as in one case at least, a group was founded as an offshoot of one of the others following a significant disagreement over matters of theology. Shared between them in terms of political vision, however, is an emphasis on the need to eventually reestablish the Islamic caliphate (khi- lafah), the original Muslim polity that existed in one form or another until its abolition at the hands of Mustapha Kemal Ataturk in 1924. In other words—and this is in part why I treat them as transnationally oriented groups—these groups seek to achieve not isolated Islamic states, but rather a global Muslim polity under a single caliph (khalifah) charged with the duty of ensuring the practice and enforcement of shari’ah (religious law). All three have, or claim to have, branches and followers in multiple countries and their U.K.-based leaderships have all been involved in political activism in the Middle East, South Asia, and elsewhere. Because their programs depart from a different aqeedah (tenets of belief or “creed”), the location and importance of the caliphate varies between their respective discourses. In seeking to identify an emphasis on the caliphate as the distinguishing aspect of their political agendas, however, I use the generic label khilafist to set these groups apart from those Islamists, such as the Muslim Brotherhood or Jama’at-i Islami, seeking to establish individual Islamic states. In what follows I shall provide a description account of the background, intellectual orientation, political program, and transnational reach of each group, followed by an analysis of why and how their political discourses have selective appeal today.

* Hizb ut-Tahrir

Hizb ut-Tahrir (Party of Liberation—hereafter HT) is the oldest and probably the most widespread in its transnational activities of the three groups under examination in this section. Founded in Jerusalem in 1952 by Taqi ud-Din al-Nabhani, HT emphasized from the beginning the importance of establishing a single party (hizb) through which Muslims could work for the reestablishment of khilafah. In the eyes of Nabhani and his followers, it was only through revolutionary action in concert that the world’s Muslims could restore themselves to a position of global power. In this sense, the founding of Nabhani’s movement marks a reincarnation of certain elements found in earlier discourses on Pan-Islam, yet with a stronger emphasis on the importance of a single Muslim polity. Nabhani faced considerable opposition from the Jordanian state (which still controlled Jerusalem at that time), and also found it difficult to develop a mass following for his party. With Arab nationalism gathering strength as the dominant political ideology of the day, appeals for a new caliphate fell largely on deaf ears. HT found itself moving underground at the same time as it began to establish small footholds in other Arab countries. Noted to be particularly strong in Turkey, where memory of the Ottoman caliphate still endures to some extent, the group’s activities in the Middle East and Asia (outside the reach of anti-HT propaganda in the Arab world) have been well documented during the first decades of its existence (Taji-Farouki 1996).

The structure of HT, while highly fluid in practice, is organized around a series of hierarchical committees. The party maintains a worldwide central leadership committee headed by an amir (leader), currently Abdul Qadeem Zalloon. The group does not disclose the location of the central committee, but it is widely believed to reside in Lebanon. Each nation (or “province” since the party does not recognize the validity of the nation-state model) in which HT operates possesses a five-to-ten-member committee headed by a mu’tamad. These national leadership councils subspeciate into smaller local (usually urban) committees under a naqib and neighborhood study circles guided by a mushrif. In countries where it has been subject to persecution by authorities, HT has been known to adopt a rigorously enforced cell structure.

Sporadic references to crackdowns on HT branches in North Africa and Turkey can be found throughout the 1970s and 1980s, and the group resurfaced to a torrent of negative publicity in Britain in the early- to mid-1990s. Having engaged in a heavy recruiting drive at U.K. universities, HT found itself banned from British higher education campuses by the National Union of Students following accusations of anti-Semitic activities. The group’s mu’tamad in the United Kingdom, Shaykh Omar Bakri Muhammad, emerged during this time as a controversial public figure, challenging all Muslims in the United Kingdom to adopt the pursuit of khilafah as the only possible authentic course of political action available to Muslims. Although its beliefs and program remained a minority tendency, the radical political position adopted by the group managed to effectively polarize the British Muslim community for a short period (Mandaville 2001). Seeking to label all who rejected the caliphate as Western collaborators—or in Bakri’s terms, “chocolate Muslims”—HT prompted a vigorous debate about the political imperatives of Islam as a minority community. In 1996, after significant disagreements arose within the U.K. leadership of HT as to the theological basis for the group’s political activities and the scope of its work, Bakri left the group to found al-Muhajiroun (see below). Severely discredited in the eyes of Muslims and non-Muslims alike, HT retreated from the public eye for several years, leaving the limelight in the United Kingdom to groups such as Al-Muhajiroun. Attention to HT’s activities increased again in the summer of 2001, but this time centered on Central Asia, where reports had emerged of active cells organized out of Uzbekistan that authorities were trying to link with al-Qaeda (Rashid 2002: 135). Although London remains an important site of fund-raising, recruitment, and coordination for the group, HT’s political activism seems increasingly to be focused elsewhere, with Pakistan, Jordan, and Palestine claimed as major areas of focus at the present time.

Sources of support for HT vary considerably from context to context, and in this sense it is difficult to produce something like a profile of a “typical” party member. It has proven itself skillful in adapting its discourse to local conditions and at appealing to particular grievances. In the early 1990s, for example, it was particularly successful in recruiting among second- and third-generation South Asian immigrants in the United Kingdom, many of whom had been raised with a form of Islam they regarded as disengaged from worldly issues and political imperatives. Alienated by their parents’ “village Islam” (i.e., oriented toward the sectarian idiosyncrasies of the villages in Pakistan and Bangladesh from which they had migrated) and socially adrift in a society into which mainstream integration proved difficult, the discourse of radical resistance offered by HT appeared highly attractive. By placing khilafah—a marginal ideal at best in mainstream Muslim political thought—firmly at the center of its religious discourse, HT was able to take advantage of a relative lack of religious knowledge on the part of its young recruits. When asked about the extent of desire in the ummah for a new caliphate, group members often give a general answer about Muslims desiring greater unity. When it is put to them that such a desire does not necessarily translate into support for khilafah, and that those seeking a political order based on Islam might prefer groups such as the Muslim Brotherhood (the most popular Islamist tendency in the Arab world), HT supporters tend to explain that Muslims will eventually realize that the correct political implementation of Islam must necessarily lead to khilafah.

So how, in HT’s view, will this new caliphate come about? The party’s political discourse begins by recognizing the lack of any “executive structure” in the Muslim world as a major problem and one that must, according to a shari’ah obligation impingent upon all Muslims, be rectified. In terms of its methods, it seeks to style itself as nonderivative in the sense that it does not study and emulate the approaches taken by previous Islamist movements. Instead, it seeks to go back to the basic legislative sources of the religion—the Qur’an, hadith, and usul al-fiqh. The correct method for establishing khilafah is fixed and can, it claims, be found in the shari’ah, but this should be distinguished from “means and style,” which are necessarily specific to place and time. HT, at least in the United Kingdom, explains that its work is intellectual and political, and in this regard they reject militant methods. Realizing the close relationship between force and power, however, HT does speak of actively seeking nussrah— support from the armed forces or those responsible for the security of citizens—in countries where it operates, but claims that this is a form of activity controlled exclusively by the party's central leadership. While appealing to a young and generally well educated audience, the group finds support for its program by simultaneously adopting a populist rhetoric designed to link socioeconomic disenfranchisement to religiosity. For example, HT's publicity literature in the United Kingdom defines capitalism as "the detachment of religion from life." Regarding the geographic scope of its activities, the group expresses a willingness to work anywhere and everywhere, but suggests that the caliphate has the best chance of being reestablished in those lands where a precedent already exists (i.e., the Middle East and former Ottoman territories). While global khilafah remains the party's ultimate goal, it espouses a gradualist approach.

* Al-Muhajiroun

Al-Muhajiroun emerged publicly in Britain 1996 after its founder, Omar Bakri Muhammad, split with HT. A Syrian by birth, Bakri gained his qualifications as an 'alim in Damascus and Beirut, where he was affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood and several other Islamist tendencies before joining HT. Bakri spent several years in Saudi Arabia in the 1980s, until his ties with HT landed him in trouble with the kingdom's authorities.

Many broad aspects of HT's program are duplicated in al-Muhajiroun's political discourse, including the emphasis on khilafah and the movement's general organizational structure (not to mention several key HT texts, which Bakri presumably authored during his time with the party). There are, however, also several significant points of divergence. First, Bakri cites HT as following a fundamentally different aqeedah—in other words, of subscribing to separate tenets of religious belief. Al-Muhajiroun, he claims, is a salafi group, meaning that it orients itself with the traditional teachings associated with the first few generations of Muslims after Muhammad. Developments in theology and jurisprudence that came later are regarded by this school of thought as dangerous innovation (bid'a). Bakri's teaching identifies salafiyya as a methodology or way of thought rather than a tendency associated with any particular group or movement. Central to salafi thought is an emphasis on tawhid, the unity of God, a trait shared by the revivalist project of Muhammad Ibn Abdul Wahhab in eighteenth century—hence the tendency for many contemporary salafi groups, particularly those advocating the strict application of shari'ah, to be labeled Wahhabi. Bakri accuses HT, by contrast, of following an "Asha'ri" creed, meaning that they subscribe to latter theological innovations that allow for a modicum of human reason to enter into matters of religion. In Bakri's view, what passes for reason is usually nothing more than selfish desire, and hence inherently dangerous. A literal application of jurisprudential knowledge produced by the earliest generations of Muslims is therefore the only safe method by which to conduct human affairs. For the salafiyyun, in Bakri's view, Islam was not a text or culture that can be objectified (as Muslims try to do today); rather, theirs was a living, active knowledge. The doctrinal orientation of HT, according to Bakri, means that they have developed an incorrect obsession with khilafah and have lost sight of tawhid as the central duty of all Muslims.

The second major difference between HT and al-Muhajiroun concerns the geographic scope of their activities. Bakri criticizes the gradualist tendencies of HT that permit it to focus on one particular country or mijaal ("area of work") at a time. By contrast, al-Muhajiroun, he claims, works throughout the ummah, seeking nussrah at all times. Bakri's group, he claims, does not actively pursue jihad (religious struggle—which for Bakri carries a militant connotation in this context), although he be- lieves—unlike HT—that Muslims have a duty to support jihadi groups wherever they may be fighting. He criticizes HT's claim that jihad is an activity that can only be legitimately promulgated by a caliph and hence cannot be supported until such time as khilafah is reestablished. That said, Bakri is careful to distance himself from some of the contemporary jihadi-salafi groups. He argues that some among them do not have sufficient regard for the sanctity of all human life and are wrong to regard the entire world, including non-salafi Muslim regimes, as dar al-harb (i.e., the abode of war—lands in which Muslims are engaged in violent struggle with unbelievers). Regarding its global support, al-Muhajiroun claims to have members and affiliated groups in Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Yemen, Lebanon, Sudan, Pakistan, South Africa, Mauritius, Central Asia, and the United States. Da'wa links to Southeast Asia are also cited. The group declines to put any numerical figure on the level of its support, claiming only that it is "growing significantly." Bakri has actively sought to forge alliances with other movements in the United Kingdom and abroad, another point of disagreement between him and the leadership of HT at the time of their separation. On its publicity literature, for example, the group lists twenty-seven "organs" of al-Muhajiroun. It actively seizes opportunities to appear with other Islamist groups, even those that do not share a strictly salafi orientation. In this regard there is a sense in which al-Muhajiroun can also be thought of as an umbrella group.

The political discourse of al-Muhajiroun shares much with HT, although Bakri goes to considerable lengths to articulate a salafi basis for the khilafah. Invoking the notion of tawhid al-hakimiyyah (oneness of the law) as the link between the unity of God and governance on earth, he outlines various forms of authority (sultah) which translate, according to his interpretations, into legislative, executive, and judicial functions. Democracy, however, is identified as the opposite of that for which Al-Muhajiroun (and, incidentally, HT) strives. Asserting that the notion of rule by the people contradicts the Islamic dictum that sovereignty is reserved for God alone (Qur'an 6:57, 12:40), Bakri emphasizes that ultimate authority must always lie within the divine alone—or, on this earth, within the shari'ah that represents divine will. Al-Muhajiroun, like many contemporary Islamist—and particularly khilafist—movements, is subject to considerable criticism that suggests their program consists of nothing beyond vague appeals to a rather utopian vision of the caliphate. What would this look like in institutional form? How would it be structured? How would issues of economic regulation, taxation, and international relations be dealt with? Realizing that a lack of specifics has been a shortcoming of Islamist groups in the eyes of many, Bakri has sought to answer some of these questions in a recent pamphlet that tries to outline in greater detail the structure of a khilafah-style government (Bakri Muhammad 2002).

As with many salafi scholars, Bakri is exhaustive in terms of laying out the concepts, categories of analysis, and textual evidence in which he finds support for the positions he advocates. Indeed, this sort of rigorous taxonomy is a hallmark characteristic of salafi discourse, and one of the many points of criticism leveled at it by opponents. Salafis, in the eyes of many, are obsessed with establishing hard-and-fast categories and labels that differentiate in stark terms between “good” and “bad” beliefs and practices. There seems to be little gray area, in Bakri’s discourse, for example, between heaven’s eternal reward and the damnation of hellfire. While this rigidity—and, at times, obscurantism—is alienating to most Muslims, leaving as it does little room for ambiguity, reflection, or creative interpretation, its moral clarity nevertheless proves appealing to others.

* The Jihadis: Abu Hamza al-Masri and the Supporters of Shari’ah

The third and final group to be examined, the Supporters of Shari’ah (SOS) is also the most highly personalized of the movements. It centers almost exclusively around Shaykh Abu Hamza al-Masri, imam, until recently, of the North London Central Mosque in Finsbury Park—widely held to be the leading center of radical Islam in Britain. A group described by its leader as “deliberately diffuse and loosely organized,” SOS is the U.K.-based public relations face for a wider transnational network with connections to Algeria’s Groupe Islamique Arme (GIA) and other jihadi movements. Abu Hamza, born in Alexandria, Egypt, fought alongside the Afghan mujahideen against the Soviet occupation. He came to the United Kingdom in 1979 and took British citizenship. Along with Abu Qatada, another jihadi shaykh recently arrested by the U.K. authorities, Abu Hamza is generally regarded as the figure most likely to be involved in active recruitment for militant groups abroad. September 11 suspects Zacharias Moussaoui and James Ujaama as well as attempted shoe-bomber Richard Reid are all said to have been under his tutelage at some point in recent years.

Insofar as the move from Hizb ut-Tahrir to al-Muhajiroun contained elements of both continuity and rupture, we find the same dynamic at work in the shift from Bakri’s group to Abu Hamza’s SOS. Where HT emphasizes a gradualist approach to establishing khilafah via persuasion before jihad can be legitimately enjoined, Abu Hamza represents the opposite end of the spectrum. Khilafah per se is not so much his concern; rather, the active propagation of shari'ah—by jihad if necessary—is the political imperative. The caliphate, in Abu Hamza's view, will flow naturally from correct implementation of the shari'ah. In this regard he is more concerned with general religious orientation than any one specific institution, bringing his approach closer to that of al-Muhajiroun. The triumph of righteous Muslims, in other words, will naturally bring about righteous governance.

That is not to say, however, that Abu Hamza and Omar Bakri Muhammad see entirely eye to eye. Although the two appear together frequently at rallies and press conferences, one also gets the sense that they position themselves with respect to each other somewhat tactically. An association with SOS allows Bakri to emphasize his transnational activist credentials, while al-Muhajiroun provides Abu Hamza the opportunity to articulate his agenda alongside an umbrella of social movements with a predominantly intellectual orientation. Bakri has at times criticized aspects of the jihadi agenda, while Abu Hamza has let it be known that he has not always been satisfied with the aqeeda of al-Muhajiroun's leader. That said, cooperation between the two groups and joint public appearances have increased significantly of late, and they are increasingly identified as advocating the same general political program.

It is difficult to make any definite determination as to the extent of any linkages between these movements and the more actively militant networks such as al-Qaeda. Accusations of recruiting for terrorist training camps in Afghanistan have been leveled at both groups at various times, and some reports have their leaderships boasting of sending thousands of eager volunteers to jihad in Chechnya, the Philippines, and elsewhere (see also Robert Hefner's discussion of jihadi groups in Indonesia in this volume). Omar Bakri and Abu Hamza, for their part, deny being involved in any such activities. When asked about this topic, they emphasize their role as religious scholars, saying that they offer nothing more than opinions as to whether jihad in a particular country or situation is justified. The choice to enjoin jihad is, in their claims, left entirely up to the individual in question. Regardless of whether or not SOS and al-Muhajiroun function as active recruiters, it is undoubtedly the case that the forums and spaces they occupy are known as places people can go to find likeminded individuals and to become affiliated with figures whose public persona is not so prominent as Bakri's or Abu Hamza's. It is in the sense of a legitimizing intellectual discourse, then, that the activities of the more active khilafist groups become most interesting. They provide ideologues and an intermediate social milieu—an interstitial space of sorts— that seeks to organize Muslim consciousness toward, in their view, "higher" (and often transnational) purposes.

Several points emerge out of this overview of the main tendencies within the U.K.-based radical movements. While all three share a broadly khilafist orientation, and have at various times been described as "Wahhabi," there exist significant differences between them in terms of the relative importance of the caliphate in their discourses and the correct means of achieving it. Hizb ut-Tahrir might be seen as the advocates of "khilafah in one country" in contrast to the Trotskyite al-Muhajiroun and SOS, who favor something closer to a permanent worldwide revolution. Some among the leadership of these movements have also traveled ideologically over the course of their careers. Omar Bakri Muhammad, for example, has been fairly comfortably associated—it would seem— with a diverse range of political movements and doctrinal orientations. Looking at their overall political goals, however, certain common themes certainly arise. It can be said that all three groups seek to render the worldviews of local Muslims more global, but not in a cosmopolitan, tolerant sense. Promulgating Islam as a higher order identity, would-be supporters are asked to deemphasize national affiliations in the name of the ummah and to understand the suffering of Muslims in other lands as their own—and as circumstances into which they are obliged by their religion to intervene. In this sense, the khilafist-jihadi agenda might be said to hold the greatest appeal for those whose sense of belonging is already in flux—those disjunct from mainstream society and somehow adrift. Radical Islamist discourses structured around a strong antagonism to prevailing social orders hence serve to crystallize political identities and affiliations. The clarity of vision and moral certainty of salafi Islam becomes more attractive to some than the indeterminacy and relativism of more moderate, pluralist approaches.

The political discourse of all three groups also makes frequent use of the notion of kuffar (unbelievers, infidels) as a technique of moral other- ing. This is where the obsession with normative categories begins to take on a social reality. Non-Muslim others are figured as those beyond the pale of social responsibility. Although, contrary to popular belief, salafi discourse does not require Muslims to engage in armed conflict with kuf- far wherever they may be found (unless they are themselves laying siege to Muslims—which, today, in the view of many salafi groups they are), unbelievers are understood to be located outside the normative remit of social relations. By placing the unbeliever in a category of radical difference, the possibility of coexistence premised on cultural pluralism and political civility is precluded.

 Toward Islamic Cosmopolitanism

When we move on to deal with the moderate discourses of Muslim transnationalism, our task becomes considerably more difficult due to the sheer volume of linkages that exist. It is not at all difficult today to identify an enormous number of Muslim intellectuals engaged in an assertion of pluralism and sensitivity to the other as the bases of an Islamic social ethics. From the hermeneutics of tolerance and gender characterizing the work of Khaled Abou El Fadl (2002) and Amina Wadud (1999) to the democratic pluralism of Abdolkarim Soroush (2002) and the Islamic liberation theology of Farid Esack (1997) to the cosmopolitan human rights of Chandra Muzaffar (2002), Islam is rife with discourses that seek to protect spaces of alterity. It also gives renewed credence to the notion of the ummah that a mapping of the names just mentioned would trace a line from Los Angeles to Virginia in the United States across to Iran down to South Africa and over to Malaysia. It is also interesting to note that the bulk of these intellectuals are operating in environments that are highly multicultural and transnational in nature—the problem of difference is hence necessarily one of their primary concerns.

In order to limit my discussion for purposes of a meaningful comparison, I will focus in this section on several social and intellectual networks that might be understood to represent the contours of an Islamic cosmopolitanism. These groups can be differentiated from the salafis in three important respects. First, their discourse is characterized by an inherently pluralist orientation to religious sources and their interpretation. In contrast to the salafi emphasis on hard-and-fast categories, these moderate tendencies are much more eclectic in their reading and understanding of textual sources—a fact that also permits enormous latitude in the social dimensions of their work. Second, the discourse of the pluralist groups is characterized by a rather different conception of “politics.” Rather than locating the correct and necessary practice of the political within a Muslim state of universal jurisdiction (khilafah), these moderate groups seek to foreground Islam’s emphasis on individual morality and responsibility toward others—the idea being that good governance, regardless of what institutional form it takes, will naturally emerge from such an orientation. Finally, and in another direct contrast to the salafi groups, the non-Muslim other occupies a fundamentally different place in pluralist discourse. Rather than serving to disrupt the moral order, the non-Muslim in pluralist Islam figures as an invitation to responsible social (and political) engagement. Coexistence within a civil society premised upon notions of tolerance becomes the sociopolitical imperative.

* Fethullah Gülen’s Transnational Education Network

The best example today of a successful transnational effort to “scale up” moderate Islam is probably to be found in the network of educational institutions associated with Fethullah Gülen’s movement in Turkey. Gülen’s work, in the eyes of one observer, is tantamount to a replacement of political Islamism with an “educational Islamism” (Agai 2002, 29). The overall orientation of Gülen and his groups draws heavily on the thought and teachings of Said Nursi (1876–1960), a reformer and pan-Islamist who stressed the compatibility of modernity and religion. Contrary to many of his contemporary Islamists who sought to reject the West, Nursi taught that there was much of value to be learned from Europe. Stressing individual piety in the context of reaching toward others, pluralist interpretations of the Qur’an, religious knowledge as “light,” and an understanding of nature and materiality as evidence of the presence of God, Nursi can be seen to draw strongly on the mystical tradition within Islam. According to Hakan Yavuz (2000a, 7), “Nursi’s teachings have helped to create a neo-Sufism in Turkey.

His books have freed Islamic knowledge from the hegemony of the ulema and have thus democratized this knowledge."

Gülen's movement has placed Nursi's emphasis on education and knowledge firmly at the center of its discourse on Islam. Having established a series of private schools and colleges throughout Turkey starting in the 1970s, Gülen began reaching overseas during the last decade. There are now close to three hundred educational institutions affiliated with the movement operating across the world, with particular strength in the Middle East, Central Asia, the Caucuses, and many areas of Central and Eastern Europe. Particularly notable about these schools is the fact that they are not primarily —and some not even at all—in the business of religious education. Rather, they stress a modern curriculum and the notion that all knowledge, whether religious or otherwise, brings one closer to God. The teachers in these schools are normally pious followers of Gülen, seeking to set an example through their relatively socially conservative lifestyles. The model that Gülen adopted for these schools in the 1970s was deliberately designed to carve out a new space for religion in Turkish society. By adopting the official state curriculum, Gülen's movement managed to avoid invoking the wrath of the heavily secular state. His goal was to produce a generation of highly educated (according to modern norms) young Turks who were also religiously oriented and who would be able to go on and constitute a new professional class. In this sense, Gülen is commonly seen to have succeeded in creating a middle path between the more overt political Islamism of the Refah party (and its successors) and the official secular orientation of the Turkish state. Gülen's sights seemed more set on gaining influence among the "businessmen, teachers, students and journalists" (Yavuz 2000b) of Turkish society rather than on occupying the organs of state power.

Indeed, it was an emphasis on transnational philanthropy that first allowed him to expand operations beyond the confines of Anatolia. By deemphasizing the nationalist dimensions of his early discourse, Gülen has become an effective global operator over the past decade. He has always stressed the importance of reaching out toward and exchanging ideas with other faith systems and non-Muslim peoples. For him knowledge serves as an intermediary space in which disparate communities are able to coexist—even if one is simultaneously grounded as a Turk and a Muslim. "The movement argued," according to Bekim Agai, "that one who has a firm sense of identity based on knowledge does not fear contact with others. Thus, a solid national and religious identity was not seen as being in contradiction to participation in the process of globalization" (Agai 2002, 34).

In recent years, Gülen has sought to duplicate his Turkish successes elsewhere. These efforts, combined with a significantly higher profile in Turkey itself, have made him a rather controversial and polarizing figure. Not only the Turkish authorities, but a number of other governments have investigated his network, looking mainly for evidence of attempts by Gülen to "infiltrate" the state (Semyonov 2002). Yet there is also a sense in which his movement has been embraced both at home and abroad as a positive force working for Turkish Islam. Former Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit has praised Gülen for his efforts in raising the profile of Turkish Islam as tolerant and moderate, and the governments in a number of countries in which his schools operate have, after an initial period of suspicion, realized that his schools provide a high quality education and important social services. In Central Asia, for example, the schools enjoy widespread support among parents due to their success rates in preparing students for the entrance exams required to gain entrance to prestigious universities (Balci 2002, 21).

One of the most successful aspects of Gülen's approach in terms of scaling up the propagation and influence of his movement has been the extent to which sharp divisions between Muslims and non-Muslims are absent from his discourse (cf. the salafi approach, discussed above). While firmly grounded in Islam and with religiosity as a major animating impulse, the Gülen movement's emphasis on education as a global space of interfaith ecumenicism has allowed its appeal to extend not only to Muslims outside of Turkey, but even to non-Muslims, many of whom are enrolled in its schools. The group's immediate prospects in Turkey seem promising given the recent success of religiously oriented (but, again, not necessarily politically Islamist) parties in recent elections. There have been a few observers, including some whose voices figure in policy-making circles in Washington D.C., claiming that Gülen and the Nurcu movement (i.e., those based on the teachings of Said Nursi) more generally represent the future of a moderate social Islam (Fuller 2002). If able to allay the fears it sometimes prompts abroad as insidious "Turkish religious radicals," the Gülen movement also has good transnational prospects—particularly in postsocialist countries seeking to complete the transition to fully functioning civil societies.

* Tariq Ramadan’s Europe as Dar ash-Shahadah

A somewhat different trend, yet with a similar emphasis on the need for coexistence and social integration alongside non-Muslims, is to be found in the work of the Swiss-based philosopher Tariq Ramadan (see Bowen, this volume). Called at times a “Muslim Martin Luther” (Donnelly 2002), he has been at the forefront in recent years of an emerging, deeply hybridized idiom of European Islam. Ramadan’s work, best typified by his To Be a European Muslim (Ramadan 1999) calls for a new pragmatism in Muslim thought and jurisprudence, particularly among Muslims living as minorities in the West. He encourages young Muslims, in particular, to regard their position in non-Muslim homelands not as one of weakness, but rather as a source of strength. He observes that in many Muslim majority countries (e.g., Turkey and Iraq), the state is actually more militantly secular than in the West—hence the position of diaspora becomes one that allows for greater freedom in the practice of religion. This point of view is certainly to some extent a product of Ramadan’s own background and upbringing. He is the grandson of Hassan Al-Banna, founder in 1928 of the Muslim Brotherhood —one of the Islamic world’s largest and most influential sociopolitical movements. Ramadan’s parents had to leave Egypt precisely because of the idea, so dominant in Nasser’s Egypt of the late 1950s, that religion should have no place in public discourse.

Yet Ramadan’s emphasis on the European Muslim is not an invocation to insularity and “ghettoization.” Rather he suggests that as a minority community, Muslims possess a set of responsibilities and duties as regards their relations with non-Muslim others. Through what amounts to a radical reinterpretation of the traditional Islamic dichotomous cosmology that divides the world into dar al-Islam (lands where Muslim rulers and shari’ah law are in place) and dar al-harb (those lands in which Muslims struggle to achieve the former), Ramadan refigures the political and ethical geography of minority Islam. If Islam in Europe is seen instead, he would argue, as an example of dar ad-da’wa (the abode of call)—or, better yet, as dar ash-shahada (the space of testimony)—then we have a situation in which Muslims are required to interact responsibly and equitably with non-Muslims

(cf. Bowen’s discussion of Ramadan elsewhere in this volume). Withdrawal and introspection are not options; rather, civic participation, coexistence, and outreach all become imperative. As Ramadan puts it:

[This] approach ... therefore enables us to define the European environment as a space of responsibility for Muslims ... Muslims now attain, in the space of testimony, the meaning of an essential duty and of an exacting responsibility: to contribute, wherever they are, to promoting good and equity within and through human brotherhood. (Ramadan, 1999, 150, emphasis added)

Accompanying this call for political engagement is an emphasis in Ramadan’s work on the need to reinvigorate and reinterpret the classical sources of Islamic jurisprudence such that the emphasis is not on blind adherence to dogmatic tradition, but rather on a pragmatic search, above all, for the achievement of maslaha—“public good.” In this scheme, one or another interpretation of Islamic textual sources is not correct simply because it accords with the classical tradition, but rather is only correct if it speaks to the issues and problems of the present time (cf. the salafi emphasis on jurisprudential immutability). The good of the community— and this community must be understood to encompass not only Muslims, but also non-Muslims—is, in the end, of paramount importance. As Ramadan writes:

Muslims will henceforth have to ask questions, not alone, not against the whole society, but now with their fellow citizens through a sincere and genuine shared preoccupation The Muslims’ religion commands them to strive for more justice, but this certainly does not mean that they should be concerned only with themselves and not collaborate with all those who try to reform society for the better, in the name of human dignity and respect.

(Ramadan 1999, 230–32)

This trend in Ramadan’s work represents what I have elsewhere termed “critical Islam” (Mandaville 2003), a dual connotation that suggests a need for historicism with regard to Islamic tradition but which also presents the possibility of regarding Islam as a form of critique (vis- â-vis, for example, Western neoliberalism). Ramadan’s idiom of Islam, I think, helps us to transcend the impasse between critique and solidarity, where the former is figured as a threat to the latter. Rather, he demonstrates that a new hermeneutics of the other in Islam—necessarily, at times, entailing critique—can actually produce a variant of solidarity premised upon coexistence and testimony to core ethical values: the actuality of dar ash-shahada.

It is important to note, then, that Ramadan’s is not an ethics based on sameness. It is quite insistent on the fact that Islam is different, and in some cases, critical of the norms of mainstream Western society. Although cognizant of the fact that proximity breeds responsibility, it nevertheless seeks to pose Islam as an alternative vision. This ability to engage in a spirit of civility while maintaining a critical distance from certain Western norms is perhaps the greatest strength of Ramadan’s approach. Where Gülen is perceived by some to be insufficiently critical of the West and too strongly influenced by the relative heterodoxy (by traditional Sunni standards) of Nurcu thought, Ramadan’s work—solidly based in mainstream sources of jurisprudence (and hence more difficult for traditionalists to dismiss outright)—represents the possibility of recovering from the usul al-fiqh the contours of a pluralist, democratic Islam.

Taken together, Gülen and Ramadan offer us the intellectual and social foundations for a new form of Islamic cosmopolitanism—and, moreover, one that has the potential to be attractive to a wide range of religiopoliti- cal orientations in the Muslim world. Pluralism and social civility figure prominently in the religious discourses they embrace, and both have found a growing audience in recent years. The approach they represent, however, takes root and blossoms most effectively in those contexts where the religious landscape is less developed or already significantly pluralized. The greatest challenge these discourses face is to supplant ingrained orthodoxies and the vested interests of the religious establishment in those Muslim majority countries dominated by other varieties of Islamism.

 Conclusion: Neither SALAFI nor Sufi

What I have really done in this chapter is to describe something closer to two ideal types of transnational Islam: one seeking the establishment of a global Muslim polity through a strict interpretation and implementation of jurisprudential sources, the other promulgating a pluralist discourse that emphasizes dialogue and coexistence with the non-Muslim other through a tradition of intellectual reformism. While each of these two poles certainly has its adherents within the ummah today, the future of transnational Islam actually lies in the far more ambiguous religiopoliti- cal landscape occupied by the Muslim masses. In this regard our attention returns very quickly to the question not only of what kind of Islam “travels” best, but the need to (re)contextualize even the more cosmopolitan orientations as we see they take hold within specific societies. Teachers in conservative Deobandi madrasas in Pakistan, while they may share certain of his views, do not disseminate the fatwas of Omar Bakri Muhammad from London. Student reading groups at universities in Indonesia, while they may share Tariq Ramadan’s emphasis on the democratic, multicultural possibilities of Islam, have never read his books. We are, in other words, reminded that it is important not to overstate the case when it comes to transnational Islam. While we can identify tendencies and general varieties of discourse, it becomes much more difficult to establish direct causal linkages.

When we want to understand, for example, why the salafi project that commonly goes by the name of “Wahhabism” seems so successful in reproducing itself internationally, I would argue that it is much more important to concentrate on the conditions of its reception in a particular setting rather than on the supposedly intrinsic qualities of its discourse. This means that we need to spend as much time studying the local circumstances that allow violent discourses of antihegemonic resistance to gain a foothold in distance climes. While Wahhabism can certainly be seen to contain the intellectual resources, we need to ask how it is—by particular actors in particular social locations—that this orientation becomes articulated to specific political projects. What I am arguing for, then, is an approach to transnational Islam that is highly sensitive to the interplay of global and local: one that understands the mechanisms through which universal normative discourses are rendered meaningful to the predicaments of a particular social milieu.

The temptation to comprehend the transnational Muslim world according to sharply delineated notions of “good Islam” and “bad Islam” must also be resisted. In so politically charged a climate, such strict divisions can produce dangerous polarizations and create an environment in which it becomes even more difficult for moderate, pluralist discourses to find a voice. Even the seemingly quite specific themes of transnational salafism and sufism that structure this chapter are, in reality, far messier than my easy categories would suggest. Sufi movements have certainly figured historically in violent political struggles (Kemper 2002), while in some cases social movements of a generally salafi orientation represent the only available form of democratic resistance to highly authoritarian governments in the Middle East (as is the case in Saudi Arabia; see Okruhlik, this volume) and elsewhere. Muslims themselves tend not to define each other in such stark terms, and in this sense the ethos of the ummah can be said to have some meaning today. The crosscurrents of transnational Islam mean that these various tendencies sometimes flow through each other, with radical agendas transmitted via moderate circuits. Islam teaches one to aid and assist a fellow Muslim rather than to evaluate and categorize—particularly among the more moderate tendencies, and hence the ease with which they can be exploited by those with more sinister agendas.

This intermingling or hybridity even finds an intellectual expression in particular religious figures today. Indeed, there is a sense in which the most successful contemporary transnational Islamic discourse might be identified with Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi, an Egyptian religious scholar based in Qatar. His work is to be found, literally, everywhere in the Muslim world. Through popular religious programs on al-Jazeera and via the translation of his books into languages such as Bahasa Indonesia and Urdu, Qaradawi has found a truly global audience. What appeals, it would seem, is the way he brings traditional methods of Islamic scholarship to bear on the complex issues of global life (e.g., multicultural marriages, medical ethics, the Internet). Qaradawi produces a discourse that seems modern and moderate at the same time as its formal dimensions (utilizing traditional fatwa methodology) retain the authenticity of Islamic traditionalism, winning him admirers from the banlieus of Paris to the pesantren of Southeast Asia (see John Bowen on Qaradawi elsewhere in this volume).

What emerges from this chapter, then, is the importance of a sense of caution when dealing with transnational Islam. By placing radical and moderate discourses side by side, I have sought to make the point that it is not and will never be possible to identify a single form of civil, pluralist Islam that can be promoted globally. While there do exist important moderate discourses that produce the kind of social capital that Putnam and others have identified as a cornerstone of civil societies (Putnam 1993), other individuals have found it equally expedient to invest themselves in groups for whom democratic pluralism represents the greatest of dangers. In short, even as we discuss the grander contexts of transnational networking and global communications, attendance to local circumstances becomes all the more important. This is why it becomes important to understand how it is that the more radical Islamist groups manage to exploit some Muslims' desire for resistance against corrupt governments, foreign hegemony, and socioeconomic deprivation. The transnational propagation of a civil democratic Islam will hence depend upon having spaces into which it can flow. This means understanding and extinguishing the conditions that feed support for radical militancy while simultaneously encouraging the spread of a religious pluralism and a "civil Islam" (Hefner 2000) that speaks directly to the pragmatic concerns of daily life in the increasingly global ummah.

As regards the future of radical and moderate tendencies, particularly among Muslims in the West, much will depend on the changing circumstances of both local and global contexts. The comments and pronouncements of public officials and other opinion makers are carefully monitored by Muslims in the West, and these contribute significantly to the discursive environments in which social movements and political groups of all persuasions operate. September 11 polarized Muslim communities in the United States and Europe —an effect rendered even more extreme, perhaps unconsciously, by the official rhetoric emanating from policy makers in Washington, D.C. While the Bush administration went to considerable lengths to emphasize that a “War on Terrorism” should not be understood as a war on Islam, it simultaneously recast the world in Manichaean terms, seeking unequivocal statements of support for the United States (“with us or against us”). Such worldviews leave no room for the shades of gray that characterize Muslim transnationalism. It becomes difficult for Muslims—or anyone, for that matter—to criticize aspects of U.S. foreign policy without appearing suspicious to newly hyperactive security regimes in Washington. In short, if one does not leave space for Muslim opponents of Usama bin Laden to voice complaint (and to be heard rather than dismissed as “unpatriotic”) about other aspects of American conduct abroad, one creates an environment that favors recruitment by the radicals. Likewise, short-sighted and ignorant comments by American right-wing religious leaders, such as Pat Robertson, Franklin Graham, and Jerry Falwell (Barisic 2002), about the violent nature of Islam serve only to confirm the suspicions of Muslims in the West that they are a misunderstood and alienated segment of society.

As had been made clear in the latter half of this chapter and by other contributors to this volume, there exists significant scope for the scaling up and propagation of civil pluralist variants of Islam in the West and in the wider Muslim world. There is also good reason to argue that the moderate orientation represents Islam’s “natural” course. Yet this process proceeds relationally within wider global contexts. In this sense, then, we are not charged only with seeking to shift Islam toward a more progressive orientation, but rather—and perhaps more importantly—we are also seeking to create the conditions that allow Islam’s rich history of pluralist tolerance to flood into the present. This task requires us to be attentive to the paths that enable the spread of civil Islam, but also to recognize that public and policy discourses can simultaneously serve to hinder pluralism.

 Notes

The author would like to thank Fatima Ayub and Allen McDuffee for their invaluable research assistance during the preparation of this chapter.

 References Cited

Abou El Fadl, Khaled. 2002. The Place of Tolerance in Islam. Boston: Beacon Press.

Abuza, Zachary. 2003. Radical Islam and Terrorism in Southeast Asia. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner.

Agai, Bekim. 2002. “Fethullah Gülen and His Movement’s Islamic Ethic of Education.” Critique: Critical Middle Eastern Studies 11, no. 1 (Spring): 27–44.

Alexander, Yonah, and Michael S. Swetnam. 2001. Usama bin Laden’s al-Qaida: Profile of a Terrorist Network. Ardsley, N.Y.: Transnational Publishers.

Allievi, Stefano. 2003. “Islam in the Public Space: Social Networks, Media and Neo-communities.” In Muslim Networks and Transnational Communities in and across Europe, edited by Stefano Allievi and J0rgen Nielsen, pp. 1--2. Leiden: Brill.

Bakri Muhammad, Omar. 2002. “24 Hours after the Khilafah.” London: Al-Muhajiroun Publications.

———. N.d. Jihad and the Method to Establish the Khilafah. London: Al-Muhajiroun Publications.

———. N.d. “Sharing Power with Kufr Regimes or Voting for Man-Made Law Is Prohibited Haram.” London: al-Muhajiroun Publications.

Balci, Bayram. 2002. “Fethullah Gülen’s Missionary Schools in Central Asia and Their Role in the Spreading of Turkism and Islam.” Manuscript.

Barisic, Sonja. 2002. “Pat Robertson Describes Islam as Violent Religion That Wants to Dominate,” Associated Press, February 22, 2002.

Bruinessen, Martin van. 2002. “Genealogies of Islamic Radicalism in PostSuharto Indonesia.” South East Asia Research 10, no. 2: 117–54.

Donnelly, Paul. 2002. “Tariq Ramadan: The Muslim Martin Luther?” Salon. com, February 15.

Esack, Farid. 1997. Qur’an, Liberation, and Pluralism. Oxford: Oneworld.

Fuller, Graham. 2002. “The Future of Political Islam.” Foreign Affairs 81, no. 2 (March/April): 48–60.

Gibb, H.A.R., and J. H. Kramers eds. 1991. Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam. Leiden: Brill.

Gunaratna, Rohan. 2002. Inside al-Qaeda. New York: Columbia University Press.

Hefner, Robert. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Husain, Mir Zohair. 2002. Global Islamic Politics. 2nd ed. New York: Longman.

Kemper, Michael. 2002. “Khalidiyya Networks in Daghestan and the Question of Jihad.” Die Welt des Islams 42, no. 1: 41–71.

Mandaville, Peter. 2001. Transnational Muslim Politics: Reimagining the Umma. London: Routledge.

———. 2003. “Towards a Critical Islam: European Muslims and the Changing Boundaries of Transnational Religious Discourse.” In Muslim Networks and Transnational Communities in and across Europe, edited by Stefano Allievi and J0rgen Nielsen, pp. 127–44. Leiden: Brill.

Masud, Muhammad Khalid, ed. 2000. Travellers in Faith: Studies of the Tablighi Jama’at as a Transnational Islamic Movement for Faith Renewal. Leiden: Brill.

Muzaffar, Chandra. 2002. Rights, Religion, and Reform: Enhancing Human Dignity through Spiritual and Moral Transformation. London: Curzon Press.

Paz, Reuven. 2003. Tangled Web: International Networking of the Islamist Struggle. Washington, D.C.: Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Putnam, Robert. 1993. “The Prosperous Community: Social Capital and Public Life.” American Prospect 4, no. 13 (Spring): 34–42.

The Holy Qu’ran. Translated by A. Yusuf Ali. Leicester: Islamic Foundation.

Ramadan, Tariq. 1999. To Be a European Muslim. Leicester: Islamic Foundation.

Rashid, Ahmed. 2002. Jihad: The Rise of Militant Islam in Central Asia. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

Roy, Olivier. 1994. The Failure of Political Islam. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

Schulze, Reinhard. 1990. Islamischer Internationalismus im 20. Jahrhundert: Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Islamischen Weltliga (Rabitat al-‘Alam Al-Islami) Mekka. Leiden: Brill.

Semyonov, Vladimir. 2002. “Islamic Extremist Lyceum Closed in Karachai-Cherkessia.” ITAR-TASS Newswire, May 28.

Shichor, Yitzhak. 2003. “Virtual Transnationalism: Uygur Communities in Europe and the Quest for Eastern Turkestan independence.” In Muslim Networks and Transnational Communities in and across Europe, edited by Stefano Al-lievi and J0rgen Nielsen, pp. 281–311. Leiden: Brill.

Soroush, Abdolkarim. 2002. Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Taji-Farouki, Suha. 1996. A Fundamental Quest: Hizb al-Tahrir and the Search for the Islamic Caliphate. London: Grey Seal.

Wadud, Amina. 1999. Qur’an and Woman: Rereading the Sacred Text from a Woman’s Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press.

Wain, Barry, and John McBeth. 2002. “A Perilous Choice for the Presidents.” Far Eastern Economic Review, October 3, 17–19.

Whitbeck, Harris, and Ingrid Arneson. 2001. “Terrorists Find Haven in South America.” CNN International, November 7.

Yavuz, Hakan. 2000a. “Being Modern in the Nurçu Way.” ISIM Newsletter 6 (October): 7, 14.

———. 2000b. “Cleansing Islam from the Public Sphere.” Journal of International Affairs 44, no. 1 (Fall): 21–42.

 Chapter 13: Pluralism and Normativity in French Islamic Reasoning

John R. Bowen

As Muslims create new, stable communities in Europe and North America, they have asked how best to adapt their normative and legal traditions to their new settings. These traditions are central to Islam. The root meaning of islâm is “submission” to the will of God, and scriptures communicate to humans the norms and forms for that submission. These norms have multiple sources, from the Qur’ân (the revealed word of God), to the collections of hadîth (the reports of statements and actions of the Prophet), to the decisions of qualified jurists and judges. In Muslim-majority countries they have been the basis for creating political, legal, and social institutions: councils of jurists, courts of law, mosques for worship, places for ritual sacrifice. Muslims living in countries without such institutions have begun to reconsider these norms. Should there be new sets of norms for Muslims living as minorities? Is Islam a matter of general principles that one might find to be common across Muslim and non-Muslim societies? Or is Islam perhaps best understood as a matter of individual, ethical behavior rather than compliance with legal traditions?

I consider a range of Muslim responses to these questions in France, a country of relatively new Muslim immigration. I focus on the ways in which the social and political structures of that country have shaped the direction of Islamic reasoning, and to underscore this shaping effect I consider the contrast between British and French experiences. In each country certain directions of reasoning are, I argue, more likely to be adopted and accepted by Muslims. I also emphasize that Islam has faced issues of pluralism from its beginning. Early Muslim authorities acknowledged the legitimacy of multiple traditions or schools of normative reasoning (madhhab)—before Christian jurists did so, one might well add. Muslim jurists see normative or legal reasoning, fiqh, as a human, fallible practice, an inevitably partial effort to comprehend God's plan for humans, the sharî'a. Judges took into account local values and practices to the extent that these did not violate God's commands. It is thus perfectly within the historical legacy of Islamic reasoning to develop norms that would accord with life in new social situations.[47]

 Contrasting Conditions for Muslims in Europe

That said, the sudden growth of resident populations of Muslims in Europe has presented new challenges for Muslim scholars. Since the 1960s, considerable numbers of Muslims have immigrated to countries in Western Europe.[48] Most of these Muslims have come from the countries of northern and western Africa, Turkey, and southern Asia. During the 1950s and 1960s, European governments encouraged the immigration of workers to serve the expanding industrial sector as inexpensive laborers. Many of these early immigrants were single men or married men whose families remained behind. Both the immigrants and the host countries thought that the stay was temporary. Some governments built large housing projects, both in city suburbs and in relatively isolated areas, to encourage the eventual repatriation of the immigrant workers and, indeed, to encourage their isolation from the cultural mainstream. France, for example, offered instruction in languages of origin for immigrant children in order to facilitate their expected "return" to their countries of origin.

Two things went wrong with this policy. First, the host economies suffered recession in the 1970s, and the immigrants quickly went from being useful instruments in national growth to hostile competitors for low- paying jobs. Political parties of the far right played on these sentiments. Secondly, and notwithstanding the economic reversals, many immigrants stayed on in their new countries and either brought their families to Europe or created new families in Europe. The children were Europeans in culture and language, whether or not they were granted citizenship. They began to demand rights of citizenship, including their right to practice their religion unimpeded: to build mosques, to carry out public rituals, and to dress in an Islamic way. These demands were not always welcomed by other residents, and the resentment over economic competition that fueled the far right in the 1970s and early 1980s had become, by the late 1980s and 1990s, resentment over cultural difference, an unalterable newness on the part of the Muslim families.

This economic, cultural, and political conflict was increasing in intensity at the moment when “political Islam” took world center stage. The Islamic Revolution in Iran and the rise and repression of Islamic parties in North Africa and Turkey led to a worldwide excitement among younger Muslims about the possibilities for constructing new kinds of nations, ones in which Islam would play an important public role. These same possibilities frightened ruling parties in these same countries, and they found sympathetic listeners among political leaders in Europe and the United States. Violence increased in the 1990s, carried out by Muslims and non-Muslims. In France, the military wing of the Algerian Islamist movement planted bombs in public places; in Germany, neo-Nazi groups attacked Turks. After the attacks of September 11, 2001, popular fears of Islam focused on the network of al-Qaeda supporters that extended through Asia, North America, and Europe, and on the growing problems of violence in poor areas of the larger cities.

Less noticed during this period have been the creative efforts by European Muslims to adapt religious practices to their new social conditions. These conditions include distinct political cultures: laws regarding who may form what sort of association, policies about state recognition of and aid to religious groups, and norms about where and when one may publicly express religious beliefs (Rath et al. 1999).

The contrast of France and Britain serves to illustrate the relevant differences. In France, a long struggle between the Catholic Church and partisans of a secularist and revolutionary heritage eventuated, early in the twentieth century, in the regime of laicite. The political culture of licite requires the elimination of religion from public forums: from schools, state enterprises, and government. This culture also suffuses teacher education, creating not only a heritage of militant anticlericism, but also a militant antireligious stance that often goes well beyond the strict requirement of French law. Parallel to the history of laicite is that of francite, “Frenchness,” the idea that full citizenship requires cultural assimilation to a French model of comportment: European dress, good command of French, and socialization with French people (Bowen 2003a). The close association of laicite and Frenchness helps explain the strong support in France for laws banning girls from wearing head scarves in public schools, despite the equally strong French political support for freedom of religious expressions (Bowen 2004).

Laicite and francite in turn shape French ideas of citizenship. Despite the fact that commentators often emphasize the distinction of legal nationality (nationalite) and citizenship (citoyennete)—the former merely indicating the government to which one owes obedience, the latter indicating a willingness and capacity to participate in civic life—throughout French history the two have been intertwined. As a general rule, to be given nationality one has had to demonstrate citizenship, and, conversely, full rights of civic participation have been limited to French nationals.[49] Prior to 1981 and the ascension of François Mitterand to power, it was relatively difficult for noncitizens to form legally recognized associations and thus to gain legitimacy in the eyes of the state. Moreover, until 2003 no national Islamic body existed that could take part in the national-level decision making so critical to French affairs.[50]

On the dimensions signaled in France by licite and francite, Britain offers a marked distinction. Religion is present in public life; indeed, Tariq Modood (1993) has argued that maintaining the established Church of England keeps secularism from controlling public space (he might have had the negative example of France in mind). The demands made on residents or subjects are minimal, consistent with Hobbes’s ideas about the proper role of the state in guaranteeing order (Favell 2001). Indeed, to speak of “the state” makes much less sense in Britain than France; residents encounter myriad local agencies and boards. Immigrants from South Asia to Britain began forming diverse associations soon after their arrival, and some of these associations have worked with local school boards to press for changes in diet, religious education, and so forth, with little direct appeal to officials in London (Lewis 1993; Vertovec 2002; Werbner 2002).

In these and other countries, Muslims have correctly seen that they must forge collaborations with non-Muslim political leaders if they are to develop workable Islamic social and religious institutions: schools that need recognition and financial aid; Islamic chaplains to prisoners and soldiers who require state certification; the simultaneous sacrifice of thousands of animals on the Feast of Sacrifice that requires state health board approval. The relationships between Muslim public intellectuals and political leaders may be uneasy and unstable, but they shape the direction of Muslim social, political, religious, and intellectual life in each country. Muslims in France have become used to looking for a single, national resolution to a problem; Muslims in Britain value allowing local accommodations to resolve disputes. As Muslims develop more effective Europe- wide institutions, they probably will realize that they have become less “European” than they have become French, British, Danish, and so forth, and that they have adapted their religious and cultural institutions to these respective political cultures.[51]

 The Sociology of Islam in France

Although France keeps no statistics on the religious beliefs or practices of its inhabitants, estimates of the number of Muslims resident in France range from 4 to 5 million people, nearly all of them immigrants and their children.[52] About 60–70 percent of Muslim immigrants to France have come from three countries of North Africa, the Maghreb: Algerians and Moroccans have contributed the largest numbers, followed by Tunisians. Turks and West Africans form the next largest groups.[53] The dominance of North African Muslims in the public sphere is even greater than these numbers might suggest, for a number of reasons. The North African countries had historically close colonial ties to France, and Algeria was part of France until 1962. North African immigration in the 1960s and 1970s was massive and concentrated in industrial cities.[54]

Muslim men who came to France in the 1960s and 1970s found themselves living with Muslims from a variety of countries, often in large public housing units. In urban neighborhoods as well, or in the poorer suburbs of Paris or Lyon, one finds Moroccans, Malians, and poorer French families living together. Certain ties can reinforce country allegiances, as when an association or a mosque is predominantly associated with one country, or a Sufi order preserves ties to a particular saint. Algerians may vie with Moroccans for control of a mosque, or each, along with Comorians and others, may have their own mosque and associations. Foreign countries (in particular Morocco, Algeria, and Saudi Arabia) have financed mosques, reinforcing country-based rivalries. But even those mosques, religious schools, or associations sponsored by Muslims from a particular country rarely are exclusivist, because they usually do not seek to reproduce a particular theological or ritual tendency. Moreover, for many in the generation of Muslims born in France (the beurs), it is the experience of being discriminated against as “Maghrebin” or “Arab” that creates their sense of “ethnicity” (Cesari 1998, 56–57).

The common Arabic language has facilitated some degree of cooperation across the three North African communities, as has a relatively shared degree of religious jurisprudential reasoning (following the Mâliki madhhab) and religious practices. This cooperation exists both at the national level—for example, in the activities of the largest national organization, the Union des Organisations Islamiques de France (UOIF)— and in some cases at the local level in the forms of shared worship in mosques. In cities or neighborhoods where cross-ethnic cooperation is high, the shared Arabic language facilitates common participation by North Africans (but not others) in congregational prayers. Indeed, the growing distinction, and sometimes tension, is between the Arabic of the older generation and the French of the younger Muslims as the language of the sermon.

By contrast, Turks have not had the same historical ties to France, and the centers of Turkish diasporic activities are in Germany. Many of the Senegalese and Mali immigrants have distinct forms of religious practice and social organization, in particular the Sufi orders focused on specific teachers in West Africa. Other Muslims, from the West Indies or the Indian Ocean islands, for example, have organized into ethnically specific associations and formed a grab-bag national organization to represent their interests as “non-Maghrebis.”

Within the North African category, although Algerians are numerically dominant (one-half of North Africans, one-third of all Muslim immigrants), and they control the important Paris mosque, Tunisians and Moroccans play important leadership roles in a number of national organizations. Tunisians have taken on major roles as leaders of religious schools, particularly around Paris. Moroccans make up 40 percent of all imams (sermon givers at Friday prayers) in France.[55] Thus in France no one country group is predominant across categories, the way that Pakistanis dominate Muslim affairs in Britain and Turks play the predominant role in Germany.

Who are the authorities among these Muslims? Because the traditional Islamic institutions that defined the roles of specific authorities are virtually absent from Europe, it is difficult to use the Islamic vocabulary of muftis, ulamâ, or faqîhs. I prefer to speak of Muslim public intellectuals, each with specific claims to legitimacy and specific bases in social institutions. Teachers at religious schools, mosque officials, and leaders of Islamic associations all can claim some degree of legitimacy as Muslim public intellectuals because of their institutional roles—but ratification of those claims by ordinary Muslims depends on the religious knowledge these intellectuals can demonstrate. The public realm of Islamic knowledge in France is characterized both by the importance of these religious institutions and by the refusal of ordinary Muslims to assume that someone has Islamic credibility just because he (or she) occupies a leadership position in a religious institution.

Private Islamic schools or institutes offer classes on weekends and evenings for Muslims who wish to learn more about their heritage. Those who occupy the principal positions at these schools usually also contribute to public discussions about Islam, for example, by writing in magazines or speaking at gatherings. They may have training in Islamic jurisprudence, but they are evaluated by other Muslims more in terms of their abilities to plausibly represent themselves as learned in Islam matters than in terms of their formal training. In any case, none have the level of formal Islamic education that would earn them a position as a jurist or expert in a Muslim-majority country.[56] Some of these teachers also developed a second, advanced track within their schools that is intended to train future scholars, teachers, and religious officiants for mosques.[57]

Mosques may be directed by persons with or without a high degree of religious training. Some mosque officials occupy entirely administrative roles; such is the case with the heads (recteurs) of the Paris “great mosque” and the largest mosque in Lyon, both of whom have the ear of the state and the French media. Other mosque officials also act as imams, as ritual leaders for prayer and other ritual events, as in the case of the large mosque in Paris’s Nineteenth arrondisement, the Mosquee Ad-Dawa, and for major mosques in Marseille and Toulouse. These imam-officials often develop large and stable followings, and sponsor an array of associated activities, including religious courses, neighborhood associations, and women’s groups. In a third category are the vast majority of mosques, including the many small ones housed in nondescript settings, where imams come and go, subject to the support of a mosque committee and the will of the regular worshipers. In the smaller mosques something like a free market in imams prevails: someone may appear and give Friday sermons for several weeks or months, until he loses local support. It is the coming and going of these imams, particularly those who have received training in Saudi Arabia and have brought “radical” salafiste ideas to France that most concerns both the French state and the more established mosque leaders. Because mosques now have become the basic electoral unit for the national Islamic representative body, the control of mosques has taken on great political importance.

Finally, there are leaders of the many local and national organizations and federations claiming to represent the interests of Muslims. Their legitimacy in the eyes of the state rests on the numbers of followers or affiliated mosques they can claim; their legitimacy in the eyes of those followers has to do with their ability to show themselves as having a political voice in France and to present an attractive version of Islam. A few can claim nationwide standing; most important are the Union des Organisations Islamiques de France (UOIF), and the “great mosque” of Paris, which functions as an umbrella organization as well as a mosque. The Paris mosque is controlled by Algeria, although it also receives Saudi funds. The UOIF leadership comes from Morocco and to a lesser extent Tunisia and Algeria. The popular legitimacy of the UOIF lies less in its political role than in its success in sponsoring the annual “Islamic fair” north of Paris at which are displayed books, videos, and clothing, and at which speak religious authorities from throughout the world (Bowen 2004).

A very few Muslim public intellectuals operate in a free-floating way, seeking financial support where they can find it. The best known speaker on Islam in Europe, Tariq Ramadan, derives his authority from his personal gifts at speaking to the social concerns of everyday Muslims, while drawing on the intellectual and to some extent political legacy of his grandfather, Hassan al-Banna, a founder of the Muslim Brotherhood. Ramadan delights audiences by cutting to the chase: urging Muslims to get involved in schools, neighborhoods, and elections. In 2003, his argument that one can be completely Muslim and European also has earned him the suspicion of an increasingly secularist and unified French media. And yet even Ramadan's success proves the rule concerning the importance of religious and social institutions to the new Muslim public intellectuals, in that he has benefited from the wide promulgation of his audio- and videocassettes through the Tawhid publishing network and the local organizing activities of his several support groups, especially Presence Musulmane in the Paris region.

The ordinary Muslims who attend lectures, listen to cassettes, or ask advice of these public intellectuals are preoccupied by the question with which I began this chapter, reformulated for the individual Muslim: How should I live my life in France so as to not violate Islamic norms? Must I wear a head scarf in school? How should I find a spouse? Is it accepted to work at a bank, to eat in a non-Muslim home, to perform the sacrifice by sending money to Algeria? Precisely because the norms of Islam can no longer be taken for granted, because each individual both can and must make choices, ordinary Muslims are demanding that public intellectuals give them guidance. In order to offer that individual guidance, however, Muslim intellectuals in France are themselves searching, and debating, about the directions and limits of Islamic normativity in a secular, pluralist society.

 Reworking Fiqh to Fit France

In their writings and public discussions on normative questions, Muslim intellectuals in France have followed one of two broad two types of reasoning: one that starts from the traditions of practical jurisprudence (fiqh), and another that seeks to ground Islam on general principles. As I will discuss below, this division is not specific to France or to Europe; indeed, parallel discussions are to be found throughout the Islamic world. However, these lines of reasoning take on socially specific values in the French context, as the example below illustrates.

One of the more pressing questions for Muslims who are planning to reside permanently in Europe is whether they may take out loans at interest to purchase homes. The Islamic prohibition against lending or borrowing at interest would seem to prevent them from so doing, but in the late 1990s some Muslims living in Europe put the question to the European Council for Fatwa and Research, a collection of jurists of various nationalities who now reside in Europe.[58] The council is led by the highly influential Egyptian jurist Sheikh Yûsuf al-Qardâwî, who lives in Qatar. In 1999, the council responded to the question in the form of a fatwâ, a nonbinding legal opinion issued by a qualified person or group. The jurists stressed that the prohibition on usury does mean that Muslims everywhere should take steps to avoid borrowing from banks that charge interest, and should devise alternative ways of financing homes, such as paying more than the stated price but in installments. However, if Muslims in Europe could not practice such alternatives, then they could take out a mortgage for a first house.

In their argument the jurists cited two considerations. First, the doctrine of extreme necessity (darurat) allows Muslims to do what otherwise is forbidden under compulsion or necessity. Why is it a necessity to own a house? Renting keeps the Muslim in a state of uncertainty and financial insecurity, stated the council. Owning a house allows Muslims to settle in close proximity to a mosque, and to modify their house to accommodate religious needs. Moreover, Muslims living in Europe had reported to the council that mortgage payments were equal to or lower than rents. The jurists also referred to the idea that while in non-Muslim countries, Muslims may make contracts that violate Islamic law. In support of this argument they cited the opinions of past jurists who belonged to two of the traditional schools of Sunni legal interpretation, the Hanafî and the Han- balî.[59] Muslims cannot change the institutions that dominate life in their host countries, stated the council members, and thus Muslims are not responsible for the existence of an interest-based financial system. If they were forbidden to benefit from banking institutions, then Islam would have weakened them, a result that would contradict the principle that Islam should benefit Muslims.

The ruling did not change the traditional prohibition of lending at interest, but exempted Muslims living in Europe from the prohibition because of a combination of empirical circumstances: the importance of owning a house, the high level of rents, and the absence of viable alternatives. These circumstances allow the jurists to apply the principles that necessity allows for exemption, and that Muslims may use otherwise invalid financial instruments when they live in “non-Islamic countries.” The ruling generated considerable interest among Muslims living in Paris, even though many of them either were not in a financial position to apply for a bank loan or, because they were in Europe only for a brief period of study, would probably return to their home country to seek work and raise a family. Muslims found the ruling important because it implied that Muslims in Europe could legitimately create a new set of Islamic rules, valid only in Europe. This heady possibility excited some and disconcerted others.

In 2001 and 2002 I sought the opinions of Islamic scholars in France on the ruling. I began with one of the jurists making up the European Council, Dr. Ahmed Jaballah, who now is recognized as the chief jurist for the UOIF. Jaballah explained that the council decided that Muslims could best provide for their children by moving out of poor neighborhoods and buying houses. “The only way to improve family life is to move out, and the loan helps them do that. But many in the Muslim world objected to the fatwa because it approved interest. They do not understand what social life is like here.” Later the same day, I attended Ja- ballah’s evening class on fiqh. He directs and teaches at the Paris branch of the Institut Europeen des Sciences Humaines, an evening school for Muslim men and women sponsored by the UOIF. The school is located in Saint Denis, an easy train ride from Paris. That evening, Jaballah emphasized the flexibility of the sharî’a. Islam is “valid for all places and times,” he explained (writing out the phrase in Arabic), but it is also adaptable to all contexts. There are universal elements and those which we change. Most things are neither prescribed nor proscribed, thus they are in the large domain of le licite, the permitted, which in his model constituted a legal vacuum. He drew a circle, with a shaded portion being those acts for which there are texts, and the much larger remainder being that vast area of “le licite.”

This general approach to understanding Islamic norms emphasizes the place within Islam for creativity. However, other Muslim scholars were opposed to the ruling precisely because it stifled creativity among Muslims. Hichem El Arafa is the director of another school in the Paris region, CERI, the Centre d’Etudes et de Recherches sur l’Islam (formerly the Institut des Etudes Islamique de Paris), also located in Saint Denis. He was asked frequently to speak about the council’s ruling. “Everyone had heard about it; if you played ‘micro on the sidewalk’ and asked people coming out of a mosque if they had heard of it [the fatwa] they would have. So they asked me about it.” [JB: And were you opposed?] “I am not entirely against it, but I wanted to consider other arguments. I think that it does not lead to creativity in thinking about these issues. For example, the few experiments we do have in Islamic banking, we would not have had them if Muhammad ‘Abduh [the important late-nineteenth-century reformer] had said that you did not need to come up with something new. And the experimentation is good, many fail and some succeed and we have new institutions” (interview 2001). In his classes on fiqh (which I have attended beginning in 2001), El Arafa stresses the importance of looking for the consensus of Islamic scholars, ulamâ, in deciding on a difficult question, an approach that in this case leads him to remain on the side of the majority of Muslim scholars in the world who oppose these concessions to banks and mortgages.

Echoing El Arafa’s pragmatic arguments were those proposed by Dhaou Meskine, a scholar who also runs an evening and weekend school, “La Reussite,” in Aubervilliers, north of Paris and east of Saint Denis. “There are too many families in France who live in debt,” he said, “and four million who have been unable to repay their debts.” He went on to explain that there are other, creative ways of obtaining money, such as repaying the seller of the house gradually, perhaps at a higher price, and that he had successfully experimented with such arrangements. Meskine also objected to the very idea of different laws for different places: “Syeikh Qardâwî says that interest in Europe is acceptable because Europe is not a Muslim land. But laws must be universal: if it is forbidden to steal, or lie, or falsify papers, or to make illegal marriages in Muslim lands, then it is also the case for Muslims living in Europe, in the “dâr al-‘ahd,” land of treaty. That is the nature of religion; it is intended to apply everywhere” (interview 2001).

Although they all agreed that statements about Islamic norms should be based on jurisprudential reasoning, these scholars emphasized not the legal arguments but the socially pragmatic ones. What would be the social consequences of permitting mortgages or forbidding them? Some hold that bank mortgage gives Muslims the ability to realize their duties to their families, a positive value in Islam. Others counter that retaining the prohibition leads to fruitful experimentation and maintains the moral power of the law. For someone such as Dhaou Meskine, who has lived through years of difficult negotiations with a left-wing local government, many of the problems faced by Muslims come from their not following the rules that are common to Islamic law and French state law.

The claim that there could be distinct Islamic norms for Europeans draws on an old debate in Islamic jurisprudence as to whether differing social conditions justify creating new or different Islamic rules. In the early centuries of Islam scholars developed a distinction between two realms, the dâr al-islâm, or abode of Islam, versus the dâr al-harb, or abode of war. The former included the countries ruled under Islamic principles; the latter referred to all other places, where, presumably, Muslims would not be free to worship. Today, many Muslims find discomfort in this way of viewing the world. How is one to define “Muslim societies,” the dâr Al-islam? Does one look to the correctness of the government, the piety of the people, or simply the fact that most people living in the country profess Islam as their religion? Is a majority-Muslim country whose government represses its people and prevents the free expression of religious ideas to be considered part of dâr al-islâm? Conversely, why should countries not governed by Islamic laws but where Muslims are free to worship be considered as belonging to an “abode of war?”

Some Muslims have proposed alternatives. Referring to the protection given to religious minorities by international law, some scholars have proposed dâr al-‘ahd, “abode of treaty,” as a better way of designating non-Islamic states that offer religious freedom. Others have proposed dâr al-da‘wa, “abode of predication,” or dâr ash-shahâda, “abode of witness,” emphasizing the possibilities open to Muslims in these lands (Ramadan 2002).

 Reasoning from Islamic Principles

The range of alternative interpretations discussed above remains quite narrow, and the accommodations made to European social conditions remain negative ones, under which one does (or does not) allow an exemption to an otherwise universally valid rule. A second, quite different way of adapting Islamic norms to European social life is to shift focus from rules to principles or general ethical values. This shift leads some Muslim scholars to ask whether a positive Islamic value can be accorded features of French, and more broadly European, social life. Should Muslims consider certain French institutions to be valuable in Islamic terms, to provide legitimate answers to problems of social life? Perhaps these institutions provide moral and legal equivalents of Islamic institutions. So arguing would require emphasizing the general meaning or intent of an Islamic rule rather than the social form that a rule has taken in what are considered as “Muslim countries.”

Approaching Islamic norms in this way is hardly unique to Europe; throughout the Muslim world, scholars interested in reforming Islamic law often have based their arguments on claims about the principles or general intentions behind Islamic rules. Of continuing importance to modern debates is the work of the fourteenth-century scholar al-Shatibi, who distinguished between the timeless principles, maqâsid, found in the Qur’ân, and the historically changing products of jurisprudence (Masud 1977).[60] In Indonesia, generations of legal scholars and historians have argued that one must separate the Arab cultural content of Islamic law from the universal principles contained in the Qur’ân and hadîth (Bowen 2003b).

In Europe, scholars who take this approach often criticize the approach taken by the Council of Qardâwî as too unimaginative, overly trapped in an old style of fiqh. Tariq Ramadan, for example, considers the council as engaging in a juristic bricolage, an effort to lighten fiqh without rethinking it in European terms. Ramadan agrees with Meskine that fiqh should be universal, but he would locate the universal dimension at the level of general principles.[61] Consider, for example, Ramadan’s approach to the question of marriages performed according to European law. Many Muslims in Europe consider marriages to be religiously valid only if performed in a private, “Muslim” context, after the legal marriage has been performed at city hall. For Ramadan, thinking in this way is to preserve the traditional forms of marriage without examining the nature of marriage itself, which is a contract. “A civil marriage already is a Muslim marriage, I think, because it is a contract, and that is what a Muslim marriage is.” More generally, the European law of contracts corresponds to the Islamic law of contracts, and Muslims are just as obliged to respect contracts with non-Muslims as with Muslims; “that is a universal element of fiqh, valid anywhere. If we take this step then we can accept much of European law” (interview, 2001).

A similar approach, but with a slightly different conceptual base, is taken by the director of the Bordeaux mosque, Tareq Oubrou. In an innovative interpretation of the basic structure of Islamic normativity, Oubrou distinguishes between obligatory ritual (ibâdât) on the one hand, and social norms (mu‘âmalât) on the other. The former does not change, but the latter may be realized either as law (droit) or as ethics, depending on the political context within which one lives. In a country with Islamic law and social institutions, social norms are realized as law. In countries such as France, where such realization is impossible, Muslims must “ethi- cize” these norms. He offered an example: “If a woman comes to me and says, ‘My husband beats me; do I have the right to ask for a divorce,’ I say yes, divorce; and when the judge pronounces the divorce they are divorced, ethically speaking, religiously speaking. So we ‘ethicize’ the Islamic law on divorce, same values, but we choose the idea from one or another of the legal schools that is more subtle, for example from the Mâliki, or another, which ever can best respond to the spirit of the sharî’a and also to the society into which Muslims integrate sociologically and anthropologically in French citizenship” (interview, 2002).

This search for general principles as a bridge across cultural and legal divides sometimes is developed as the study of the “reasons, objectives, goals” of the sacred texts, the maqâsid of the Qur’ân. Scholars such as Oubrou suggest the idea of a hierarchy or priority of obligations and norms, and ask whether we may discard certain lower-order obligations in order to better accomplish higher-order ones. Oubrou has applied this approach to a range of questions. For example, he (2000) has argued that a Muslim may eat meat whether or not he or she knows that it was killed according to Islamic procedures, because the purpose of the dietary rules were those of health and hygiene. “Why does Islam refuse to eat meat that has not been cleansed of its blood? Precisely because the blood contains unhealthy germs” (2000, 43). If one is assured that a butcher is an honest person and follows health rules, then the meat is acceptable.

This second approach to norms is hotly contested by those urging continued reliance on the traditions of fiqh. For example, from their positions at the University of Damascus, Sheikh Ramadân al-Boutî and his son, Tawfik al-Boutî, condemn roundly the idea of an Islamic law based either on the special conditions confronting Muslim minorities in Europe or on the principles of the Qur’ân, which they call “this new Islamic ‘jurisprudence’ that has never been a part of Islamic law.”[62]

 The Future of Islamic Normative Reasoning in France

The development of one or more distinctive French, or European, approaches to normativity is at its beginning. I believe that the particular form of political culture in each country will continue to shape Muslims’ responses to specific social problems. For example, in France the taken-for- granted importance of the central state in regulating social life has led Muslims to automatically turn to Paris to demand assistance in obtaining halâl food, ensuring safe travel to Mecca, creating religious schools, and so forth.

Despite the strong mutual suspicions professed by the many associations and public figures in France, most have supported, in principle, the efforts to create a national Islamic body. That the state would have the right and the obligation to “organize Muslims” is accepted by most Muslim public intellectuals. This acceptance will continue to shape the way scholars carry out normative innovation, by exerting pressure for nationwide, uniform decisions to be taken about issues affecting Muslims, and pressure for these decisions to conform to French social norms. Such pressures are less felt in, say, Britain, and a greater range of normative positions are publicly promoted. (One cannot imagine a French Hizb ut- Tahrîr publicly urging all Muslims in France to refuse all participation in politics, as their British counterpart did at the 2002 assembly I attended.) Put another way, Muslims living in France experience more political and social pressure to “scale up” their institutions to a national level than do Muslims living in Britain (or, probably, Muslims living in any other European country).

The pressure for national uniformity makes it quite difficult to propose that Muslims in France should follow a particular Islamic legal school, or even that a subgroup should do so. It also lends support to those scholars who urge Muslims to draw on several legal schools or to employ an approach to normativity that is not confined to the traditional methods of jurisprudence. If there is a consensus among the new generation of teachers, it is on this point. Dhaou Meskine, who was trained in Tunisia where the Mâliki legal school is followed, described the situation: “In fiqh there are legal schools, and in the Muslim world each country follows one, but there is none for France, so you have to teach all of them, even though that is not a very good solution. You cannot just choose one. So, we leave it up to the teacher. He can either choose one school and then also teach some of the comparisons, or teach fiqh based on the hadith. Last year we had a Hanbalî teacher, this year we had a Mâliki one” (interview, 2002).

In his plans to create a new institute to train religious scholars, Tareq Oubrou proposes a similar approach: “We will teach them law as well as the other topics; law will include French law. It is eclectic, with sociology, theology, law, with the hope that the imam will have some classical knowledge, but that he will have a very specific orientation. We have no specific books or references; we work on the texts, practical work, looking at all the possible sources, Hanafî, Hanbalî, etc., and also knowing French law.”

But how does a jurist or other scholar then choose among the several legal schools? Oubrou’s answer to this question reveals the particular effects of the pluralism in social institutions on normative reasoning. This pluralism introduces new constraints, in this case those of French social norms and law, and possibilities, into jurisprudence. Oubrou reasons by beginning with the norms of French culture and requirements of French law, and then looks for the Islamic legal alternative that offers the best fit with these parameters. In many cases it is the Hanafî or Mâliki school that meets this conditions, and the Hanbalî legal school that is the strictest (the Saudi Arabian jurists follow that school), but Oubrou pointed out that sometimes this is not the case: “Sometimes there are zones in Hanbalî law that are more supple than in Hanafî or Mâliki law, for example on polygamy. Mâliki law says the husband has to receive the permission of the first wife [to take a second], but the Hanbalî position is by way of the needs of society (maslahat), that if the culture is monogamous, then so is the sharî’a on this point. I always say, if the first wife accepts the second, then why should I interfere? We accept homosexuality, polyandry, why not a man and a woman? It is scandalous.”

Oubrou’s argument on this point exemplifies what we might call the bidirectional reasoning pursued by many of these scholars. He and others seek to develop an Islamic normative base for a way of life that would be in accord with French social norms and French law. Thus, if the broad society is monogamous, then Islamic norms also point toward monogamy as the appropriate marital form. But he also insists that Islamic norms might on some counts improve on French ones. If French men can have mistresses as well as wives, as do many prominent public figures, then would it not be better to legalize these relationships by permitting polygamy?

Within what might become a consensus there are, however, some important tensions. One lies between those scholars who identify with North African legal traditions and those who advocate looking directly at the Qur’ân and hadîth. This tension is not as sharp as that which, in some majority Muslim countries, has opposed advocates of taqlîd, following a specific madhhab, to advocates of a direct reinterpretation, an ijtihâd, based on Qur’ân and hadîth. In contemporary France, none of the public scholars and teachers can advocate taqlîd, for the reasons pointed out by Me- skine. Nor is it possible to reject legal schools per se, because those schools have become part of the background heritage of many immigrants, because the foreign states that provide financial assistance would not look kindly upon such rejection, and because those French scholars who did have training in jurisprudence generally were trained within a madhhab.[63] The difference among scholars is more one of relative emphasis, as I will try to convey with some excerpts from interviews.

Dhaou Meskine, for example, prefers to remain within a madhhab, and complains that those teachers who teach only from Qur'ân and hadîth, and those who teach the stricter Hanbalî madhhab, are less likely to be criticized by younger Muslims than are those who teach from within the more "flexible" Hanafî or Mâliki schools (the fourth, the Shâfi'î, is not taught by North African Muslims): "The problem is that if you teach Hanbalî or salafite [meaning strict, approximately Hanbalî] approaches to fiqh, it is all right, but if you teach Mâliki or Hanafî, people object. There is a wind from the Orient bringing texts and television programs from Saudi Arabia, all of which promote Hanbalî or worse, all of which is quite different from Maghrebin fiqh. The Medina and Meccan scholars are dominant, even in the style of reading the Qur'ân. The worst approach is in the book of fiqh by aljazari, who was born in Algeria but then moved to Saudi Arabia. [JB: Is he a Hanbalî?] He is worse than Han- balî, because he has to show that he is even more strict than the Arabian scholars, as he is from elsewhere."

His former co-teacher of fiqh classes (until the early 1990s) and fellow Tunisian, Hichem El Arafa, criticized Meskine's preference for Mâliki texts, and preferred the fiqh book by aljazai'ri, as "not good but better than Meskine's preferred text." El Arafa's method of teaching fiqh (as I have followed it in his courses in Saint Denis) is to base instruction directly on Qur'ân and hadîth, as do al-Qardâwî and aljazari. He studied in Saudi Arabia, and although he describes ways of thought there as very rigid, this experience may have made teachings "from the Orient" more palatable to him than to Meskine.

And yet others find that these disagreements ignore the larger context of Islamic thought. "We cannot just work with fatwâ," argues Tareq Oubrou, "because we have to think not just normatively but in terms of theology, tolerance, the person, the society, liberty and determinism, and ethics. We are required in emergencies to respond to questions about what is harâm and halâl, but we have to carry out a long term effort to rethink what Islam should be in a very secularized society, as France, which is not like in the US. The normative has to respond to what I call the maqâsid, the broad vision of Islam, design, objectives; this goes beyond the normative. Ethics are central to Islam. We did not have to undergo what Christianity did to overthrow the power of the Church; it was already people who developed Islam; it is Protestant" (interview 2002). Although in print (Babes and Oubrou 2002) he has been more cautious, insisting on the continued importance of Islamic norms for all Muslims against a more secularized, one could say Kantian, view, Oubrou's position could lead to a more rationalized and internalized version of Islam than most European Muslim scholars would publicly favor.

In this review of some of the more prominent scholars and teachers active in France today, I have emphasized the positions taken with respect to two distinct, but related, questions. The first question concerns whether different norms should apply either ethically or in some sense legally in different countries. This question is an old one, but it has renewed immediacy as Muslims set out to rethink the proper form of social life in countries of new immigration. It admits of a wide array of responses. Some of these responses, such as those given by Dhaou Meskine, Hichem El-Arafa, and Yûsuf al-Qardâwî on the issue of mortgages, fit into longstanding ways of thinking about Islamic normativity in terms of jurisprudence. One may argue that norms ought to differ in Europe, or that they ought to be the same as in, say, Qatar, but in either case the argument is based on principles of jurisprudential reasoning.

And it is here that the second question arises: Should normative reasoning be carried out in that manner or should it be based entirely on the general values or objectives of the Qur'ân? Tariq Ramadan argues that general principles contained in scripture or in the traditions of fiqh often find their equivalents in European social norms or law, and that this equivalence should be the starting point for rethinking normativity. Tareq Oubrou emphasizes the ethical dimension of norms, but his conclusions resemble Ramadan's. Other scholars, especially those based outside Europe, find this way of thinking to be too radical a departure from the traditions of Islamic jurisprudence; the Syrian scholars Ramadan and Tawfik al-Boutî, for example, explicitly take the emphasis on "objectives" to task.

I find that it is the answers to this second question that most fundamentally divide Muslim scholars in Europe—and not only in Europe. Those scholars who emphasize their roots in the traditions of jurisprudential reasoning argue that Muslims, and not only Muslims, have a lot to learn from the traditions of Islamic normative thought. Those scholars who emphasize the points of convergence between European and Islamic traditions argue that Muslims need to creatively and continually adapt their religion to their conditions of social life. These positions inevitably orient their advocates differently: in the first case, toward the classical sources of authoritative Islamic jurisprudence; in the second case, toward other public intellectuals, Muslim and non-Muslim, in Europe and North America. In France, at least, it is this choice of starting point—fiqh or France—that provokes the loudest cries of approval or suspicion from Muslims and non-Muslims. For some Muslims, at least, the greatest challenge is to find a way of doing both at the same time, to rhetorically as well as substantively root reasoning in both the traditions of fiqh and those of Europe.

[47] On the development of the theory of jurisprudence in Islam, see Hallaq 1997, 2001; on the practice of rendering judgments in early modern Muslim societies, see Johansen 1999 and Powers 2002.]]

[48] Many recent works provide overviews of Muslims in Europe. Among the most interesting in English, see the following: Vertovec and Peach 1997, for a collection of studies on processes of adaptation; Nielsen 1999, for an analysis of issues facing Muslims in Europe, with a focus on Britain; Kasto-ryano 2002, for a comparative study of immigration to France and Germany; and (in French) Roy 1999, for a French view on what Muslims ought to do to become European.

[49] See Brubaker 1992 and Kastoryano 2002; this close association has impeded efforts to give nonnational residents the right to vote in local elections.

[50] In April 2003, a new body, the Conseil Français du Culte Musulman (CFCM), was organized and charged with coordinating policy regarding the training of imams, the certification of halal food, the provisions for Muslims in cemeteries, and other matters.

[51] For an extended contrast of Britain and France see Bowen 2003c.

[52] On Islam in France see Cesari 1998; Souilamas 2001; and Venel 1999 for interviews with younger Muslims, and Cesari 2002 for a brief English-language article. The somewhat older work by Kepel (1991) retains a great deal of interest for its fine attention to sociological detail.

[53] Haut Conseil 2001, 36–39 follows earlier scholars in estimating the number of Muslims at slightly over 4 million but insists that the number of people “of Muslim religion” would be closer to 1 million the rest being “of Muslim culture.” They base their estimate of religious Muslims on surveys concerning how often Muslims pray in mosques. Because the census is not allowed to gather data on “faith,” figures in France always have to do with immigration history and various religious practices as determined by surveys.

[54] Contrast the pioneering and thus socially salient role played by “black” West Indian immigrants to Britain (Modood et al. 1997).

[55] It is very difficult to generalize about these three populations, since in fact there have been distinct migrations, each involving different socioeconomic segments, from these countries. A group at INED (Institut National des Etudes Demographiques) is currently developing the relevant analyses. Also shaping these histories are the very different orientations of the three governments. Both Algeria and Morocco have strong, direct presences in France, through local “amicales,” through funding of mosque projects, and through direct negotiations with the French government. Algeria’s relationship is particularly direct because of its role in directing the Paris mosque.

[56] Tunisians play a preponderant role as teachers for reasons not yet well analyzed, but which probably have to do with the suppression by the Tunisian government of Islamic education, and the fact that far more Moroccans and Algerians came as unskilled workers to France.

[57] Examples of teachers developing this dual track are Tareq Oubrou in Bordeaux, Ahmed Jaballah and Hichem El Arafa in Saint Denis, and Dhaou Meskine in Aubervilliers, all mentioned below.

[58] A French-language collection of the council's fatwâs recently was published (Conseil 2002); the fatwa discussed here appears on the council's Web site in the list of resolutions taken at the 1999 session: [[http://www.fioe.org/ask_the_scholar/fourth%20statement.htm][http://www.fioe.org/ask_the_]] [[http://www.fioe.org/ask_the_scholar/fourth%20statement.htm][scholar/fourth%20statement.htm]].

[59] On the early modern Hanaf position, see Abou El Fadl 1994, 173–74.

[60] As a rough and ready indication of continued importance, the Web site islamonline.net has nine fatwas in its current fatwa bank that refer to Al-Shatibi as an authority.

[61] See Ramadan 1998 for his most extensive analysis of the heritage of Islam.

[62] Al-Bouti 2001; I have seen the two al-Boutîs, at different times, make this argument in conferences at a major Paris mosque; see Bowen 2004.

[63] It is thus not accidental that the teachers in France who place more emphasis on questioning the assumptions behind jurisprudence, such as Tareq Oubrou and Tariq Ramadan, were not themselves trained as jurists, whereas teachers who emphasize working within legal schools to the extent possible, such as Dhaou Meskine and Ahmad Jaballah, did have such training.

 References Cited

Abou El Fadl, Khaled. 1994. “Islamic law and Muslim minorities: The Juristic Discourse on Muslim Minorities from the Second/Eighth to the Eleventh/Seventeenth Centuries.” Islamic Law and Society 1, no. 2: 143–87.

Babes, Leila, and Tareq Oubrou. 2002. Loi d’Allah, loi des hommes: Liberte, egalite et femmes en islam. Paris: Albin Michel.

Al-Bouti, Sheikh Mohammad Sa‘îd Ramadân Al-Boutî. 2001. “La confluence de la ‘jurisprudence des minorites’ et le fractionnnement de l’islam n’est nullement une coincidence,” at [[http://www.islamophile.org/spip/article.php3?id_article=107][http://www.islamophile.org/spip/article.php3?id_article=107]]

Bowen, John R. 2001. “Shari‘a, State, and Social Norms in France and Indonesia”. ISIM Papers no. 3. Leiden: Institute for the Study of Islam in the Modern World.

———. 2003a. “Two Approaches to Rights and Religion in Contemporary France,” in Rights in Global Perspective, edited by Jon Mitchell and Richard Wilson, pp. 33–53. London: Routledge.

———. 2003b. Islam, Law, and Equality in Indonesia: An Anthropology of Public Reasoning. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 2003c. “The Articulation of Religion, Culture, and Ethnicity for Muslims in Europe” Social Science Research Council Working Paper.

———, 2004. “Does French Islam Have Borders? Dilemmas of Domestication in a Global Religious Field.” American Anthropologist 106, no. 1. (March 2004): pp. 44–55.

Brubaker, Rogers. 1992. Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

Cesari-, Joeeiyne. 1998.]^LWissMlwians et republicans Les J6:M116:S, l’islam et la France. Brussels: Editions Complexe.

———. 2002. “Islam in France: The Shaping of a Religious Minority.” In Mus--ns, edited by Yvonne Yazbetk Hadɾrs to Citizɾst: From Sojournɾ W ɾiims in th dad, pp. 36–51. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Conseil europeen des fatwas et de la recherche. 2002. Receuil de fatwas. Lyon: Tawhid.

Favell, Adrian. 2001. Philosophies of Integration: Immigration and the Idea of Citizenship in France and Britain. 2nd edition. Houndmills, U.K.: Palgrave.

Hallaq, Wael B. 1997. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunnî usûl al-fiqh. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 2001. Authority, continuity, and change in Islamic law. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Haut Conseil a Integration. 2001. :’Islam dans la Republique. Paris: Documentation Française.

Aljazalri, Abubaker Jaber. 2001. La Voie du Musulman (trans. of Minhaj Al-Muslîm). Paris: Maison d’Ennour.

Johansen, Baber. 1999. Contingency in a Sacred Law: Legal and Ethical Norms in the Muslim fiqh. Leiden: Brill.

Kastoryano, Riva. 2002. Negotiating Identities: States and Immigrants in France and Germany. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Kepel, Gilles. 1991. Les banlieues de l’Islam: Naissance d’une religion en France. Paris: Seuil.

Lewis, Philip. 1993. Islamic Britain: Religion, Politics and Identity among British Muslims. London: I. B. Tauris.

Masud, Muhammad Khalid. 1977. Islamic Legal Philosophy: A Study of Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi’s Life and Thought. Islamabad: Islamic Research Institute.

Masud, Muhammad Khalid, Brinkley Messick, and David S. Powers. 1996. “Muftis, Fatwas, and Islamic Legal Interpretation.” In Islamic Legal Interpretation: Muftis and their Fatwas, edited by Muhammad Khalid Masud, Brinkley Messick, and David S. Powers, pp. 3–32. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

Modood, Tariq. 1993. “Establishment, Multiculturalism, and British Citizenship.” Political Quarterly.

Modood, Tariq, et al. 1997. Ethnic Minorities in Britain: Diversity and Disadvantage. London: Policy Studies Institute.

Nielsen, Jorgen S. 1999. Towards a European Islam. London: Macmillan.

Oubrou, Tareq. 2000 “Le ‘minimum islamique’ pour l’abbatage ritual en France.” La Medina 5:42–43.

Powters, DavidS>.200١. Law, Society, and Culture in the Maghrib,, 1300–1500. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Qardâwî, Yûsuf. 1997. Le Licite et l’Illicite en Islam (trans. of Al-halâl wa Al-harâm fi Islam). Paris: Al-Qalam.

Ramadan, Tariq. 1998 Aux Sources du Renouveau Musulman. Paris: Bayard Editions.

———. 2002. Dâr ash-shahâda: L’Occident, espace du temoignage. Lyon: Tawhid.

Rath, Jan, Rinus Penninx, Kees Groenendijk, and Astrid Meyer. 1999. “The Politics of Recognizing Religious Diversity in Europe: Social Reactions to the Institutionalization of Islam in the Netherlands, Belgium and Great Britain.” Netherlands lournalofSoc alSc ences 35, no. 1 :.53–68 .

Roy, Olivier. 1999. Vers un Islam Europeen. Paris: Editions Esprit.

Sonlama Na a Gun. 2001. Dejs “bejurejtt ،lux descendant d’mmı grants nord-africains. Paris: Grasset.

Ternisien, Xavier. 2001. La France des Mosquees. Paris: Albin Michel.

Venel, Nan.1999. Musulmanesfnçaises:Despratiquan1esvoilesal’unweî- site. Paris:L’Harmattan.

Vertovec, Steven. 2002. “Islamophobia and Muslim Recognition in Britain.” In Muslims in 1he Wes1: From Sojourners 1o Ci1izens, edited by Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad, pp. 19–35. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Vertovec, Steven, and Ceri Peach, eds. 1997. Islam in Europe: The Poli1ics of Religion and Communi1y. Houndmills, U.K.: Macmillan.

Werbner, Pnina. 2001. Imagined Diasporas among Manches1er Muslims. Oxford: James Currey.

 Index

<biblio>

[[Abant meetings (Turkey), 91–92]]

Abant model (Turkey), 91–92, 108, 109

Abdel-Sattar, Fawziyya, 176

Abdulaziz (founder of Saudi Arabia), 194 Abdullah, Crown Prince (Saudi Arabia), 190–91, 192, 201, 202, 207

ABIM (Islamic Youth Movement of Malaysia), 261, 265, 269

Abu Hamza al-Masri, Shaykh, 312, 313, 314

Abuza, Zachary, 292

Adelkhah, Fariba, 40

ADEWS (Association for the Development and Enhancement of Women) [Egypt], 180

Afghanistan: cultural, religious, and ethnic factors of, 214–18; geography and economy of, 214; impact and aftermath of Soviet invasion of, 221–26; modernists vs. Islamists in, 218–21; paradoxes and uniqueness of, 213–14; PDPA (People’s Democratic Party of Afghanistan) of, 221, 222–23, 224–25, 227; rebuilding of, 236–37; U.S. bombing campaign following September 11th, 233, 235–36, 240. See also Taliban

Afghanistan invasion: aftermath of, 22126, jihad response to, 222–23, 229; refugee populations created by, 228–30; religious model of warfare used in, 21718; response to, defeat of Soviets

Agai, Bekim, 317

Ahmadi community (Pakistan), 66–67, 72

Ahmad, Mirza Ghulam, 66

Akdemir, Salih, 97, 100

AKP (Justice and Development Party) [Turkey]: development and success of, 95, 110; founding of, 3; Muslimhood model used by, 109; Reformists' influence on, 101–2; voter support of, 2–3, 88; warnings regarding veiling of members made to, 102–3

"Alevi Manifesto" (1989), 93

Alevi sect (Turkey), 91, 92, 93–95

Algeria: democratization process in, 50;

Islamist movement in, 328

All-India Muslim League, 64

Amanullah, King (Afghanistan), 219–20

Anderson, Benedict, 46, 50

Ankara University's School of Theology

[Turkey], 96, 97

Arab Human Development Report 2003, 27

Arab-Israeli war of 1948–49, 134

El Arafa, Hichem, 335–36, 341, 342

Arinç, Bülent, 102

al-Ashmawi, Sheikh Hassan, 142–43

Ataturk, Mustafa Kemal, 18–19, 87

al-Attas, Syed Muhammad Naquib, 261, 262–64, 265 al-Awdah, Sheikh Salman, 196, 204–5

Awwas, Irfan S., 293

Aydin, Mehmet, 87, 91, 93, 96–97, 99

100, 101, 104, 105

Ayodhya temple-mosque dispute (India, 1992), 46

Aytug, Yüksel, 90

al-Azhar, Shaykh, 177, 178

Ba’asyir, Abu Bakar, 291–92, 294

Bakri Muhammad, Shaykh Omar, 308, 311, 312, 313, 314, 321

Bakri, Mustafa, 134

Baktiari, Bahman, 3, 112

Bali bombings (2002), 275, 287, 293–94, 305

al-Banna, Atif, 145

al-Banna, Gamal, 144

al-Banna, Hassan, 91, 318, 332

Barfield, Thomas, 213

Bashir, Abu Bakar, 241–42

Bateson, Gregory, 247

Baykal, Deniz, 101

al-Baz, Osama, 154–56

Baz, Shaykh Ibn, 48

Beki, Akif, 87, 90

Ben Ali, Zine el-Abidine, 42

Bennis, Mohammed, 43

Bhutto, Benazir, 70, 75

Bhutto, Zulfiqar ‘Ali, 72

Bilgrami, Akeel, 78, 79–80, 81

Binsa‘id, Sa‘id, 44

“blasphemy law” (Pakistan), 72–73

Böhürler, Ayse, 107

Bourdieu, Pierre, 16

al-Boutî, Sheikh Ramadân, 338

al-Boutî, Tawfik, 338

Bowen, John R., 6, 13, 326 ‘braa‘divorce, 173

Brahimi, Mohamed, 53

British Muslim community:

commonalities among radical movements of, 314–15; contrasting conditions for French and, 327–29;

Hizb ut-Tahrir (HT) and, 307–10, 311–12, 313; khilafist label for, 307, 309–10, 311, 312, 314; al-Muhajiroun and, 310–12; religion as present in public life of, 329; social movements within, 306–7; SOS (Supporters of Shari‘ah), 312–14

Bulaç, Ali, 98–99

Bush, George W., 87, 157

CEDAW (U.N. Convention on Eliminating Discrimination Against Women), 174

Chinese Uygar community (Turkey), 304 civic pluralism: definition of, 28n.1; positions of Deobandi ulama on, 65–70; positions regarding compatibility of Islam with democracy and, 2–4; possibilities for Saudi Arabian, 199–201; PSL (Personal Status Law) [Egypt] reform and, 179–82; al-Wasat program (Egypt) on, 144–45

civic pluralist Islam: conditions of modern possibility of, 13–17; crossroads and moving toward, 22–25; intellectual roots of, 29n.7; positions of Deobandi ulama on, 65–70; Qur‘an as supportive of, 60, 78; remaking Muslim politics into, 1113; resurgence/democratization movements leading to, 18–22; role of Pakistani madrasas in creating “good,” 7682; Saudi Arabian opponents/structural obstacles to, 201–3; Saudi Arabian supports of, 204–8; separation of state and religious authority theme of, 23–24; shar‘ah as contributing to, 62. See also Islam civil society: Indonesian divisions within, 295; moral and political authority sustaining, 56; prospects/social contract for Saudi Arabian, 203–4, 208–10; role of Pakistani madrasas in creating “good,” 76–82; Skocpol’s synergistic approach to, 10, 29n.6

The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order (Huntington), 15

Cold War: Afghanistan invasion during, 223–26; political freedom experiments discouraged during, 56

Coleman, James, 16

Concepts and Orders of Our Times (Bulaç), 98

Council of Qardâwî, 337

dakway movement (Malaysia), 245–47 Dar al-‘Ulum Haqqaniyya (Pakistan), 74 dar ash-shahada (core ethical values), 320 da‘wa (call, religious propagation), 304 DDII (Indonesian Council for Islamic Predication), 287, 296 democracy: civil pluralist, 28n.1;

Fukuyama formula on markets-and- elections model, 14–15; Judeo-Christian values of, 15; positions regarding compatibility of Islam with civic pluralism and, 2–4; potential reformation of Muslim politics into, 9–11; voluntary “horizontal” networks required for, 16

Democracy in America (Tocqueville), 16 “democracy in the vernacular”: contrast between Egyptian/Turkish, 10–11; described, 7 democratic pluralism. See civic pluralism democratization: comparing path of Pakistan and India toward, 62–63; “democracy in the vernacular” study of, 7; process of Algeria and Morocco’s approach to, 50–53; “third wave” of, 15

Deobandis ulama (India and Pakistan): minority pluralistic society position of some, 65; positions on civic plurality by, 64–70; training of, 63

DI (Darul Islam) movement [Indonesia], 291

din wa dawla concept, 144

din wa ‘ummah (religion and community), 144 divorce: ‘braa‘, 173; coalition supporting Egyptian PSL “no-fault,” 161–65; Egyptian context of, 165–66; khul‘, 161–62, 168, 173, 178, 179, 181; Shah Bano Controversy (mid-1980s) regarding, 80; Sisters of Islam concerns regarding, 252. See also marriage; PSL (Personal Status Law) [Egypt]

East Timor violence (1999), 285

Ecevit, Bulent, 317

“educational Islamism” movement

(Turkey), 92–93, 316–18

education. See mass higher education Egypt: April 1987 elections of, 136–37; context of divorce in, 165–66; contrast between democratizing participation of Turkey and, 10–11; Hizb al-Wasat’s reform attempts in, 133–58; inqilab (coup) of 1952, 134–35; Islamic inroads in professional syndicates (niqabat) of, 138–40; Law 40/1977 regarding new political parties, 142; NGO (nongovernmental organization) establishment in, 145. See also Muslim Brotherhood (Egypt); PSL (Personal Status Law) [Egypt]

Eickelman, Dale F., 8, 9, 12, 37

Erbakan, Necmettin, 91, 95

Erdogan, Recep Tayyip, 95, 102, 104 Esack, Farid, 315

European Council for Fatwa and Research, 333

European Muslim approach, 318–20 European Muslims. See British Muslim community; French Muslims

Evans, Peter, 10, 70

Fadel, Mohammad, 61

Fahd, King (Saudi Arabia), 194, 197, 201

Falwell, Jerry, 323

Farish Noor, 258–59

Farouk, King (Egypt), 45

Fathali, Mahmaud, 122

Fatih Book Fair (Turkey), 89

fatwas (religious opinions): issued during Gulf War in Saudi Arabia, 196, 199; multiple sources of, 8; on taking out loans to purchase homes, 333–35

“faxed criticisms,” 39

Faysal, Toujan, 48

Fethullahcilar sect (Turkey), 92–93

Fikhi, Mustafa, 134

fiqh reasoning: future of Islamic reasoning in France and, 339–42; reworking to fit French Muslims, 333–36

FKAWJ (Sunna Communication Forum) [Indonesia], 287

FPI (Islamic Defenders Front) [Indonesia], 274, 284–86

French Muslim reasoning: future of Islamic reasoning in context of, 339–42; from Islamic principles, 337–38; reworking fiqh reasoning to fit, 333–36

French Muslims: contrasting conditions for British and, 327–29; economic, cultural, political conflict faced by, 327–28;

fatwas on taking out loans to purchase homes by, 333–35; leadership of Tunisians and Moroccans among, 331; mosques attended by, 331–32; political culture of la’1’cite and, 328–29; private Islamic schools attended by, 331; sociology of Islam in France and, 329–33

Fukuyama, Francis, 14, 15

Gamila (wife of Thaabit ibn Qais), 168

Gandhi, Rajiv, 80

El-Gebali, Tehani, 180–81

Gender Equality Committee (ICPD), 174 Ghannouchi, Rachid, 23 “God’s rights,” 60–61

Golkar (Indonesia), 278, 294

Gonzalez-Quijano, Yves, 43

GPK (Movement of Ka‘abah Youth) [Indonesia], 289

Graham, Franklin, 323

Great Mosque takeover (Saudi Arabia, 1979), 193, 194

Group of Seven (Egypt), 170

Gül, Abdullah, 93

Gülen, Fethullah, 91, 316–18

Gulf War, 196–97, 198, 199, 204–5, 210

Habib, Rafiq, 149–51

Habibullah, King (Afghanistan), 220 hadith (sayings of Muhammad), 97, 167, 168, 326

hajj pilgrimage (Saudi Arabia), 192

Halboush, Yehya, 179

Halperin, Manfred, 41

Hambali (Riduan Isamuddin), 293 Hambastegi (Iranian newspaper), 124 Hanafî legal school, 340–41 al-Haqq, Muhammad Zia, 71

Hardy, Peter, 66

Hassan II (Algeria), 50, 52

Hebron/al-Khalil killings (1994), 46 Hefner, Robert W., 1, 71, 273, 314 Hewad (Afghan newspaper), 233 Hizb al-Wasat (Egypt): “civic compact” embraces by, 140; historical background of, 134–38; implications and significance of, 156–58; interview vignettes regarding, 145–56; NGO (nongovernmental organization) establishment and, 145; origins and attempts to legalize, 140–45; remarkable reform attempts of, 133–34; reorganized as Hizb al-Wasat al-Masri, 143; two versions of reform program published by, 143–45

HT (Hizb ut-Tahrir): compared to SOS, 313; comparison with al-Muhajiroun, 311–12; overview of, 307–10

Hudeibi, Muhammad Ma‘amoun, 151–54 hudud laws. See Malaysian hudud laws Huntington, Samuel P., 15, 41, 243 Husam Musa, 257, 258

Hussein, Saddam, 38, 49

Ibn Khaldun, ‘Abd al-Rahman b. Muhammad, 227

Ibrahim, Anwar, 249

Ibrahim, Saad Eddin, 178

ICPD (U.N. Conference on Population and Development), 174, 175

IIPP (Islamic Iran Participation Party) [Iran], 118

Ikhwan al-Muslimun (the Muslim Brethren). See Muslim Brotherhood

Ikhwan rebellion (1929) [Saudi Arabia], 193

India: comparing democratization of Pakistan and, 62–63; Deobandis ulama of Pakistan and, 63, 64–70

Indonesia: Bali bombings (2002) by JI individuals, 275, 287, 293–94, 305; civil society divisions experienced in, 295; dealing with elite factionalism/communal tensions in, 276–78; democratization coalition of, 273; evidence of support for democratic pluralism in, 278–81; lessons learned about transition from authoritarianism from, 295–98; Maluku conflict in, 282, 283, 288, 289–90; Musliim politics in, 4; New Order government of, 276–77, 280; preman (organized gangsters) of, 281; “renewal” (pembaruan) movement of, 23; rise of paramilitaries in post-Soeharto, 284–94; sectarian violence (1999–2002) in, 274, 275–76; sources of civil unrest in, 281–83; state persecution of Chinese Indonesians, 278;

tensions between Christian-Muslim in, 281–82; ties between al-Qa‘ida and extremist groups in, 4, 274, 275–76, 292

Indonesian paramilitaries: FPI (Islamic Defenders Front), 274, 284–86; jihad (holy war) conducted by, 284–94, 29698; Laskar Jihad, 284, 287–90; Laskar Mujahidin, 284, 290–94; plans for increased violence following September 11th by, 293–94; rise of, 284

Inglehart, Ronald, 2

Institute on Religion, Culture, and World Affairs (Boston University), 4–5

Institut Europeen des Sciences Humaines (UOIF), 335

International Crisis Group’s report (2002), 289

Iran: conceptualizing state-society relations in, 113–14; future of political reform in, 129–30; IIPP (Islamic Iran Participation Party) of, 118; Jonbesh-e Dovom-e Khordad reformist movement in, 112, 113; Khatami’s presidency/critical thinking on, 112, 113, 116–19, 120, 123, 124–25, 126–27, 128–29, 130; political consciousness of under-thirty generation in, 125–29; political metamorphosis of, 3–4; “post-Islamism” era since 1997 elections in, 40; relationship between religion and political authority in, 11525; religious intellectuals (Roshanfekraneh Dini) of, 115; requests to publish by publications in, 123–24; sovereignty in the Islamic Republic of, 114–15; Supreme Leader cleric in, 114; velayat-e faquih (rule by the religiously learned) institution in, 3, 114

Iran-e Farda (Iranian weekly), 124

Iranian Press Supervision Council, 124 Islam: contextualizing in Saudi Arabia, 193–94; Hanafî and Mâliki legal schools of, 340–41; impact of Gulf War on Saudi Arabian, 196–97; Khatami’s vision of, 116–17; mass education’s treatment of, 45–46; multiple schools of religious law recognized in, 7–8; Muslim transnationalism of, 92–93, 302–23; new Muslim intellectuals’ pluralistic interpretation of, 120–22; Pakistan state policies regarding state and, 70–73; Pew Forum surveys on American beliefs about, 1; positions regarding compatibility of democracy/civic pluralism with, 2–4; separation of state and religious authority theme of civil, 23–24; sociology of Islam in France, 329–33; submission norms/forms in, 326; Taliban view of shari‘a (“the path or way”) and, 23133; Turkish Muslimhood model and, 90–92, 102–5. See also civic pluralist Islam; religious authority

“Islamic” books, 44–45

Islamic Jihad (Egypt), 305

Islamic law. See shari‘a (“the path or way”)

Islamic Reformists (Yenilikçiler) [Turkey], 96–102

Islamic state: demands for unitary fusion religion and, 22–23; Iranian conceptualization of relations between society and, 113–14; Mahathir’s Malaysian version of, 265–67; “organize Muslims” obligation of, 339; recent experiments denying modern pluralism by, 27; Turkish Mus- limhood model separating religion from, 87–110

The Islamist Marriage Contract in Egypt (Zulficar), 161

Islamiyat (journal), 99, 100

Islam Left, 98, 99

Jaballah, Ahmed, 334–35

Jakarta bombing (Indonesia), 275 Jalalipour, Hamid Reza, 129 Jama‘at-i Islami (Pakistan), 69–70, 305, 307

Jam‘iyyat al-‘Ulama-i Islam (Pakistan), 69 al-Jazeera Satellite Television, 37, 47–49 Jemaah Islamiyah (Indonesia), 241, 242, 305

Jema‘ah Islamiyah (Indonesia), 275–76 jihad (holy war): Afghanistan response to Soviet invasion, 222–23, 229; called against United States, 240; conducted by Indonesian paramilitaries, 284–94, 29698; contemporary discussions on, 67–69; Taliban use of, 231; Taqi ‘Uthmani’s views on, 68–69; transnationalism groups regarding, 314

Johansen, Baber, 60

Jonbesh-e Dovom-e Khordad (Iran), 112, 113

Judeo-Christian values, 15

Kadivar, Mohsen, 120, 121

Kamel, Fayda, 178

Kanal (Islamist TV station), 87

al-Kassim, Faisal, 47, 48

Kastor, Rustam, 293

Kazim, Safinaz, 48

Kemalist model of government (Turkey),

87–88, 89, 105–6

Kemal, Mustafa, 18–19, 87

Khan, Muhammad Zafrullah, 72

Khan, Wahid al-din, 65, 66

Kharrazi, Kamal, 127

Khatami, Mohammad, 112, 113, 116–19,

120, 123, 124–25, 126–27, 128–29, 130

Khatami, Mohammad-Reza, 128

khilafist (universal jurisdiction) movement,

307, 309–10, 311, 312, 314

Khomeini, Ayatollah Ruhollah, 114, 115,

116, 118–19, 122

khul‘divorce, 161–62, 168, 173, 178, 179, 181

Kirbasoglu, M. Hayri, 97, 99

Ksikes, ‘Abd al-Hamid, 57

Laden, Osama bin, 213, 241, 287

laicism practice (Turkey), 102–5

laicite political culture (France), 328–29

Laskar Jihad (Indonesia), 284, 287–90

Layne, Linda, 55

Left Islam, 98, 99

“Legal Rights of Egyptian Women in Theory and Practice” (Egyptian pamphlet, 1988), 172

Lerner, Daniel, 41

Lerner, Gerda, 163

Lewis, Bernard, 2

Liddle, R. William, 279

LIPIA (Institute for Islamic and Arabic Studies), 287

Lipset, Artin, 41, 56

Madani, Husayn Ahmad, 64, 66

Madi, Abu al-‘Ala, 147–49

Madjid, Nurcholish, 23

madrasa of Deoband, 63

Mahathir, Prime Minister, 242, 244, 247, 248–49, 250, 251, 265–67, 268, 270

Makbruk, Layla, 44

Making Democracy Work: Civic Institutions in Modern Italy (Putnam), 15–16

Malaysia: aftermath of September 11 in, 242, 248–67; background and context of, 243–48; contrasting impressions of, 242–43; dakway movement of, 245–47; future political and religious developments of, 268–70; hudud laws of, 242, 254–65; Mahathir’s Islamic state of, 265–67; Muslim feminists and PUM controversy, 242–43, 251–54; NEP (New Economic Policy) [1971–90] of, 245, 246; three main traditions of law in, 244; U.S. concerns with terrorism from, 240–42

Malaysian hudud laws: cultural politics of legitimacy and debate over, 260–65; described, 242, 254–55; Farish essay on, 258–59; interviews with different individuals regarding, 256–58; moral reasoning and, 254–60

Malek, Reda, 48

Mâliki legal school, 340–41

Maluku conflict (Indonesia), 282, 283, 288, 289–90

Mandaville, Peter, 12, 13, 302

“Manifesto” by “High Ranking ‘Ulama from Al-Azhar” (Egypt), 178–79 markets-and-elections model, 14–15 marriage: Ramadan’s approach to Euro pean law and Muslim, 337–38; Sisters of Islam concerns regarding, 252. See also divorce marriage contracts: PSL (Personal Status Law) reform strategy using, 171–74; of Sakina (daughter of Hussein ibn ‘Ali Talib), 173; similarities between European and Islamic law of, 337–38

Mashur, Mustafa, 141–42 maslaha (public good), 319–20

mass higher education: development of nationalism and, 39; emergence of new media and, 39, 41–46; history of Middle East, 42–45; implications of new media and, 45–46; treatment of Islam by, 4546

Mawdudi, Mawlana Sayyid Abu‘l-A‘la, 22, 65, 91

media. See new media

Meeker, Michael, 98, 105, 106

Megawati Sukarnoputri, 279, 280 “memorandum of advice” petition (Saudi Arabia, 1992), 197

Mesbah-Yazdi, Ayatollah Taqi, 122 Meskine, Dhaou, 339, 341, 342

Milliyet (Turkish newspaper), 90 Mitterand, François, 328

MMI (Majelis Mujahidin Indonesia), 291, 292, 293

Modood, Tariq, 329

Moerdani, Benny, 277

Moertopo, Ali, 291

Mohamad, Mahathir, 240

Moors, Annelies, 166

Morocco: democratization process in, 5053; mass higher education in, 43; “scaling up” of elections in, 54–55; September 2002 elections in, 57; shifts in religious/political imagination in, 46

Moussaoui, Zacharias, 313

Mubarak, Husni, 136, 137, 179

Mubarak, Suzanne, 175, 180 al-Muhajiroun, 310–12

Muhammad: hadith sayings of, 97, 167, 168, 326; story about companion (Omar) of, 104; story of Gamila and, 168

Muhammadiyah (Indonesia), 294, 295–96, 298

mujahidin (holy warriors), 195

Mujani, Saiful, 279

Musharraf, Pervez, 69, 73, 74, 75, 80

Muslim Brotherhood (Egypt): building base in professional syndicates, 138–39; differentiating khilafist groups from, 307; early history of, 134–36; founded by Hassan al-Banna, 318, 332; Muslim transnationalism networks affiliated with, 305; opposition to Hizb al-Wasat by, 133, 141–43. See also Egypt

Muslim intellectuals. See new Muslim intellectuals

Muslim politics: conditions of modern possibility for, 13–22; crossroads of, 2225; “democracy in the vernacular” focus of, 7, 10–11; as diffusely cultural, 6; efforts of rival groupings to “scale up” influence, 9–11; lack of monolithic, 11; long-term outcome of struggles of, 2528; new Muslim intellectuals influence on, 8–9, 119–25; organizational features of efforts to combine public culture and, 4–11; potential democratic reformation of, 9–11; religious writers’ on ethical model for, 22–23; remaking of, 11–13

Muslim societies: disagreements over religious authority in, 6, 7–8; maslaha (public good) achievement by individuals and, 319–20; new media and emergence of open, 37–57; religious writers’ on ethical model for, 22–23; resurgence of piety and public religious activities in, 17–22; “War on Terrorism” by U.S. and response by, 323

Muslim transnationalism: British Muslim community involvement in, 306–15; complex realities of, 302–4; contemporary, 304–6; diasporas of radical Islam and, 306–15; Fethullah Gülen’s educational Islamism movement (Turkey), 9293, 316–18; ideal as neither Salafi nor Sufi, 320–23; image following September 11th, 302; moving toward Islamic cosmopolitanism/moderate discourses of, 315–20; regarding jihad (holy war), 314; Tariq Ramadan’s European Muslim approach to, 318–20; ties between Al-Qa‘ida and groups of, 305, 309, 313–14

Muslim transnationalism groups: HT (Hizb ut-Tahrir), 307–10, 311–12, 313; al-Muhajiroun, 310–12; SOS (Supporters of Shari‘ah), 312–14

Muslim women: Afghan tribal customs regarding, 218; disqualified from running in Iranian elections, 122–23; increasing number of Egyptian lawyers among, 180–81; much needed legal reform involving, 80; Muslimhood model (Turkey) and veiling of, 102–4, 107; passage of Egyptian PSL granting “no-fault” divorce by, 161–65; Saudi Arabian, 194–95, 202, 206; Shah Bano Controversy (mid-1980s) regarding divorced, 80; Sisters in Islam (Malaysia) reform efforts for, 242–43, 251–54, 304; al-Wasat program (Egypt) on role of, 144–45; Women Living under Muslim Law efforts for, 304. See also PSL (Personal Status Law) [Egypt]

Muslim World League, 304

mutawwa (Saudi Arabian public virtue police), 194, 195, 201

Muzaffar, Chandra, 315

Nadwi, Sayyid AbulHasan ‘Ali, 64–65 Naguib, Fathi, 172, 174, 181

Naguib, Muhammad, 135

Nahdlatul Ulama (Indonesia), 279–80, 294, 295, 298

Nasr, Ali, 178

Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 135, 136 Navaro-Yashin, Yael, 89

NEP (New Economic Policy) [Malaysia, 1971–90], 245, 246

new media: Ayodhya temple-mosque dispute (India, 1992) coverage by, 46; emergence of new books/markets as part of, 43–44; impact on public discussion by, 40–41; implications of mass education and, 45–46; increasing popularity of “Islamic” books, 44–45; mass education and emergence of, 39, 41–46;

power to challenge/fragment religious and political authority, 39; requests to publish by Iranian publications, 123–24; support for Saudi Arabian civic Islam by, 207–8; “war in Iraq” coverage by, 3738, 46

new Muslim intellectuals: counter sloganeering argument against, 121–22; described, 8–9; influence on Iranian political reform by, 119–25; “organize Muslims” obligation by state accepted by, 339; pluralistic interpretation of Islam by, 120–22; sociology of Islam in France and, 332–33; support for Saudi Arabian civic Islam by, 207–8

New York Times, 81, 240

NGOs (nongovernmental organizations): Egyptian laws governing establishment of, 145; Egyptian PSL coalition including, 164, 179–80; relationships between Sisters in Islam and, 252

Norris, Pippa, 2

Norton, Augustus Richard, 11, 133

Nouri, Ali Reza, 129

Nowruz (Iranian newspaper), 127–28

NSP (National Salvation Party) [Turkey], 106

Nurcu movement, 92

Nursi, Said, 92, 216, 318

Objectives Resolution (Pakistan, 1949), 71

O’Connor, Karen, 170

O’Donnell, Guillermo, 273, 276

Office to Foster Unity (Iran), 125

Okruhlik, Gwenn, 12, 189

Omar, Mullah (later Amir), 226, 232, 235

Omar story, 104

open societies: discovering the experience of, 39–41; impact of media, authority, and elections on Moroccan, 50–54; increasing awareness of benefits of more, 38; new media, mass higher education and emergence of, 41–46; satellite television content and, 47–50; “scaling up” for more, 54–57

“the Opposite Direction” (Al-Jazeera weekly program), 47–48

Ottoman Empire, 106, 167, 219

Oubrou, Tareq, 338, 339–40, 341

Özel, Ismet, 98, 99

Özsoy, Ömer, 97, 100, 101, 102, 104, 105, 108

Öztürk, Yasar Nuri, 98, 101

Pakistan: Ahmadi community of, 66–67, 72; antidemocratic and antipluralist trends scaled up by, 71–73; backing of new Taliban movement by, 227, 231; “blasphemy law” of, 72–73; comparing democratization of India and, 62–63; conflicts between Shia and the Sunnis in, 67, 69–70, 72; Deobandis ulama of India and, 63, 64–70; “Islamization” campaign (1977–88) in government of, 71–72; Jama‘at-i Islami of, 69–70, 305, 307; Objectives Resolution (1949) adopted by, 71; Punjab riots of 1953 in, 72; role in Afghanistan resistance to Soviets by, 223, 224; Shi‘i and Sunni organizations of, 69–70, 72

Pakistani madrasas: government efforts to reform, 74–76; limited government regulation of, 74; role in creating “good” civil society, 76–82; Taliban educated in, 73–74; terrorist ties with, 73–75, 76

Pashtuns (Afghanistan), 215, 217–18, 226–22

PAS (Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party), 24647, 252, 253, 254, 255, 265, 267, 268

PDPA (People’s Democratic Party of Afghanistan), 221, 222–23, 224–25, 227

Peletz, Michael G., 240

Pew Charitable Trusts, 4, 5

Pew Forum surveys, 1

Piscatori, James, 8, 9

PJD (Justice and Democracy) [Islamist group], 53, 54 pluralism. See civic pluralism political authority: Arab notions of, 41; debating relationship of Iranian religious and, 115–25; mass education and perceptions of legitimate, 42; power of new media to challenge/fragment, 39; public discussion on appropriate, 40; recognizing cultural notions of, 56–57; satellite television exposure of religious and, 49; sources of moral and, 53–54

The Political Conspiracy of the South Maluku Republic and Christians to Destroy the Muslim Community in Ambon Maluku (Kastor), 293 politics of silence, 42 preman (organized gangsters) [Indonesia], 281 professional syndicates (niqabat) [Egypt], 138–40

“Professor al-Banna: Fifty Years after His Martyrdom What Remains of His Call?” (seminar), 145

PSL (Personal Status Law) [Egypt]: bill presented to/debated by parliament, 176–79; civic Islam movement and role in reform of, 179–82; coalition supporting passage of, 161–65; codified (1929) and reforms (1979 and 1985) of original, 166; formation of coalition for reform of 2000 of, 167–69; legal activism used for passage of, 169–71; marriage contract project strategy for reform of, 171–74; use of religion to pass, 167–69; role of NGOs in reform of, 164, 179–80; strategies regarding legislative/executive branches, 174–76. See also divorce; Egypt; Muslim women public discussion: on appropriate governance and role of religion, 40; impact of mass higher education/new media on, 41–46; new media and increasing, 4041; promoted through satellite television, 47–50

PUM controversy (Malaysia), 253–54 Punjab riots of 1953 (Pakistan), 72 Putnam, Robert, 15, 16, 322

al-Qa‘ida: Afghanistan site for training camps of, 213; association between Taliban and, 24, 233, 235–36; Indonesian extremist groups with ties to, 4, 274, 275–76, 292; lack of analysis as social phenomenon, 306; postSeptember 11 fears of Islam focused on, 328; targets of violence by, 24–25; ties between transnationalism groups and, 305, 309, 313–14

al-Qaradawi, Shaikh Yusif, 142 al-Qaradawi, Shaykh Yusuf, 322

al-Qaradawi, Yusuf, 65, 69

al-Qardâwî, Sheikh Yûsuf, 333, 336, 342

Qur‘an: Egyptian PSL coalition use of, 167–68; future of French Islamic normative reasoning of the, 339–42; Reformers’ focus on the, 97; Shah Bano

Controversy (mid-1980s) and interpretation of, 80; as supportive of civic pluralist Islam, 60, 78

Qutb, Sayyid, 22, 45, 91, 135

Rahman, Amir Abdur, 217

Rahman, Fazlur, 99

Ramadan, Tariq, 318–20, 321, 332–33, 337, 342

Raouf, Abdul Monein Abdul, 135

Rateb, Aisha, 177–78

Redwan, Zainab, 168

Reformists (Yenilikçiler) [Turkey], 96–102 religious authority: civil Islam’s theme of separation of state and, 23–24; debating relationship of Iranian political and, 115–25; disagreements over who is qualified as Muslim, 6, 7–8; Muslim disagreements over, 6, 7–8; power of new media to challenge/fragment, 39; satellite television exposure of political and, 49; supporting Marriage Contract initiative (Egypt), 174. See also Islam religious intellectuals (Roshanfekraneh Dini) [Iran], 115

“renewal” (pembaruan) movement [Indonesia], 23

“rights of God,” 60–61

Robertson, Pat, 323

Roy, Olivier, 305

RPP (Republican Peoples’ Party) [Turkey], 98, 101

Rumsfeld, Donald H., 81

Sabah (Turkish newspaper), 90

Sabra/Shatila refugee camps massacres (Beirut, 1982), 46

Sadat, Anwar, 135–36

Sakina (daughter of Hussein ibn ‘Ali Talib), 173

Salafi: ideal transnationalism as neither Sufi or, 320–23; moderate discourses of transnationalism compared to, 315–16; transnationalism groups articulation of, 310–11, 312 satellite television: open societies and content of, 47–50; public discussion promoted by, 47–50

al-Saud family (Saudi Arabia), 193–94, 208, 210

Saudi Arabia: contextualizing Islam in, 193–94; convergence of dissent in, 200201; empowerment of the religious right in, 194–96; ethnic distinctions among population of, 192; “faxed criticisms” of, 39; Great Mosque takeover (1979) in, 193, 194; Gulf War impact on Islam in, 196–97; increasing activities by radical Islamists (1990s) in, 197–99; myth of homogeneity in, 191–93; national conversation about identity and citizenship in, 210–11; new class distinctions in, 192–93; officially based on shari‘a (“the path or way”), 18; opponents/ structural obstacles to civil Islam in, 201–3; possibilities for pluralism in, 199–201; promoting reform without backlash, 190–91; public carriers/ sociopolitical supports of civil Islam in, 204–8; September 11 and hopes for domestic reforms in, 190; social and economic distress (1990s) in, 200; Sunni Muslim majority in, 191; time of serious ferment in, 189; trend toward multiple clergies in, 199–200; Wahhabi resurgence in, 198, 212n.3, 305, 306

Saudi Arabian civic Islam: business opportunities and, 206–7; clergy reformists supporting, 204–5; educators supporting, 205–6; intellectuals and media support for, 207–8; negotiating a social contract for, 208–10; prospects for a civil society and, 203–4; public carriers/ sociopolitical supports of civil society and, 204–8; social opponents and structural obstacles to, 201–3; women’s rights movement and, 206

Saud, Muhammad ibn, 193

“scaling up/down,” 54–57

Schmitter, Philippe, 273, 276

September 11, 2001: Aydin’s explanation on causes of, 97; challenge face by civil Islamic efforts since, 24–25; fears of Islam focused on al-Qaeda following, 328; hopes for Saudi Arabian domestic reforms following, 190; image of transnational Islam following, 302; impact and aftermath in Malaysia, 242, 248–67; Indonesian paramilitaries’ plans for increased violence following, 293–94; mainstream narrative following, 189; public reactions to, 1–2; Taliban driven from power by U.S. following, 233, 235–36; terrorist acts associated with Pakistani madrasas following, 7375, 76; well-educated militants who carried out, 26. See also United States

Seufert, Günter, 88–89

Sezer, Ahmet, 102

Shabestari, Ayatollah Mohammad Mojta- hed, 120–21

Shah Bano Controversy (India, mid- 1980s), 80

Shah, Husn, 167

Shahrudi, Ayatollah Hashemi, 123, 124, 126

Shamsolvaezin, Mashallah, 124

shari‘a (“the path or way”): Afghan tribal customs violating, 218; described, 6; different schools of, 8; Hanafî and Mâliki legal schools of, 340–41; lack of consensus regarding, 97; mass education and perception of, 46; new Afghanistan government and, 236–37; possibility of contributing to civic Islam, 62; premodern history of, 60–61; revision of Moroccan version of, 52; Saudi Arabia state officially based on, 18; Shah Bano Controversy (mid-1980s) and interpretation of, 80; Taliban view of Islam and, 23133; al-Wasat reform program regarding, 143–44

Shari‘ati, Ali, 120

Al-Sharq al-Awsat (London newspaper), 37, 38

Shi‘a Reform Movement (Saudi Arabia), 197

Shi‘i Hazaras (Afghanistan), 216

Shi‘i Muslims: challenges regarding new Muslim intellectuals faced by, 119; Pakistan organizations of, 69–70, 72 silence (politics of), 42

Singerman, Diane, 12, 161

Sipah-i Sahaba (Pakistan), 69, 72

Sisters in Islam (Malaysia), 242–43, 251–54, 304

Skocpol, Theda, 10, 29n.9

social capital: definition of, 29n.9; identities and reciprocity generated by, 17 social contract triad (Saudi Arabia), 208–10

Social Justice in Islam (Qutb), 45

Soeharto, President (Indonesia), 273, 274, 276, 277, 278, 292

Soroush, Abdolkarim, 23–24, 28 Soroush, Abdol Karim, 119–20 SOS (Supporters of Shari‘ah), 312–14 Soviet Union: Afghanistan response to invasion by, 221–26; Afghanistan use of religious model of warfare against, 217–18; jihad response to invasion by, 222–23, 229 state. See Islamic state

Suleiman Abdullah, 250, 257, 258 Sungkar, Abdullah, 291–92

Sunnis Muslims: calls for reform by Saudi Arabian, 196–97; challenges regarding new Muslim intellectuals faced by, 119; conflicts in Pakistan between Shia and, 67; madrasa of Deoband association with, 63; as majority of Saudi population, 191

Supreme Leader cleric (Iran), 114

Surour, Fathi, 178

Tablighi Jama‘at movement, 304 Taheri, Ayatollah Jalaleddin, 128 Tajiks (Afghanistan), 216

Taliban: association between al-Qa‘ida and, 24, 233, 234–36; breaks with Afghan past by, 228–30; continuities with Afghan past by, 230–31; destruction of standing Buddhas ordered by, 232; driven from power by United States, 233, 235–36, 240; educated in Pakistani madrasas, 73–74; historical perspective of, 228; use of jihad by, 231; regarding non-Muslims and other religions, 233; religious radicals of, 27; rise and demise of, 226–28; view of shari‘a (“the path or way”) and Islam by, 23133. See also Afghanistan

Tambiah, Stanley J., 282–83

Taqi‘Uthmani, Mawlana Muhammad, 6869

tawhid (unity of God), 310

tesettür fashion movement (Turkey), 89 Thalib, Jafar Umar, 287, 288, 290 Three Problems: Technique, Civilization,

Alienation (Özel), 98

To Be a European Muslim (Ramadan), 318 Tocqueville, Alexis de, 16

Transitions from Authoritarian Rule

(O’Donnell and Schmitter), 276

Turkey: Abant meetings of, 91–92; Abant model of reconciliation in, 91–92, 108, 109; AKP (Justice and Development Party) of, 2–3, 88, 95, 101–2, 109, 110; Alevi sect in, 91, 92, 93–95; contrast between democratizing participation of Egypt and, 10–11; evolution of public culture of, 105–7; Fethullahcilar educational Islamism movement in, 92–93, 316–18; future of Islamist politics in, 108; Kemalist model of government in, 87–88, 89, 105–6; laicism practice in modern, 102–5; Muslimization of the public in, 107; NSP (National Salvation Party) of, 106; public reaction to terrorist attacks (2003) in, 3; RPP (Republican Peoples’ Party) of, 98, 101; Turkish Islamic philosophy of Reformists of, 96102; Turkish Islamic synthesis model (1980s) of, 93

Turkish Contribution to Philosophy (Aydin), 96

Turkish Muslimhood model: assertions regarding believing Muslims in government, 88; future of Islamist politics under, 108; overlapping of public and private spheres under, 102–5; participants in, 92–96; personalization of Islam under, 88–90; practice of Islamism and, 90–92, 102–5; Reformists' exploration of, 100–102; transferability of, 109–10

Turkish National Security Council, 91 Turkmen (Afghanistan), 216

Ujaama, James, 313

ulama: Afghan policies designed to control autonomy of, 218–19; counter sloganeering argument against religious intellectuals by, 121–22; emerging from Deobandis, 63, 64–70; informal hierarchy in, 7; as Iranian state-society issue, 114; legal reforms and role of, 79–81; modern adaptation of, 61–62; new class of teachers different from, 20; opposition to Egyptian divorce reform by, 171, 178–79; public ethical discussion and role of, 8

Ulama, Nahdatul, 117

UMNO (United Malays National Organization) [Malaysia], 247, 249–50, 252, 256–57, 268, 269

U.N. Conference on Population and Development (ICPD), 174, 175

U.N. Convention on Eliminating Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), 174

United States: concerns with terrorism from Malaysia against, 240–42; jihad called against, 240; role in Afghanistan resistance to Soviets by, 223, 224; Taliban driven from power by, 233, 23536, 240; "War on Terrorism" by, 323. See also September 11, 2001

UOIF (Union des Organisations Islamiques de France), 332, 335

Uridu Halan (film), 167

al-‘Usbu‘ (Egyptian weekly), 134

U.S. Patriot Act, 250

al-Utaibi, Juhaiman, 194

Uzbeks (Afghanistan), 216

veiling issue (Turkey), 102–4, 107 velayat-e faquih (rule by the religiously learned), 3, 114

Wadud, Amina, 315

al-Wahhab, Ibn Abd, 22, 193

Wahhabi resurgence (Saudi Arabia), 198, 212n.3, 305, 306

Wahid, Abdurrahman, 117, 279, 280, 285, 286, 288

waqf (property used for religious institutions), 29n.4

“war in Iraq” media coverage, 37–38, 46

Warren, Kay, 7

“War on Terrorism” (U.S.), 323

Wassef, Nadia, 179

Weller, Robert, 7

“What the University expects from the Hawzeb” (Soroush lecture), 119–20

What Went Wrong? (Lewis), 2

White, Jenny B., 3, 10, 87

Why? (Aydin), 97

Wickham, Carrie Rosefsky, 10

Wihdah Press (Indonesia), 293

Women Living under Muslim Law, 304 women. See Muslim women “Working Group on Civic-Pluralist Islam” project, 5

World Values Survey, 2

Yassine, Abdesslam, 53

Yavuz, Hakan, 316

Yemen political authority, 56

Yussefi-Eshkevari, Hassan, 124

Zahir Shah (Afghanistan), 220, 221

Zainah Anwar, 253–54

zakat-tax (Pakistan enforcement of), 71–72

Zalloon, Abdul Qadeem, 308

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim, 6, 8, 60,

179

Zaman (Turkish newspaper), 89, 90, 93

Zam, Mohammad-Ali, 126

Zhegal, Malika, 171

Zulficar, Mona, 161, 162, 171, 177, 180

al-Zuwaihari, Ayman, 305

</biblio>

#title Iran, Iraq, and the Arab Gulf States

#author Dr. Joseph A. Kechichian

#date

#source

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-23T18:07:10

#topics

#DELETED temporarily

#cover d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-1.jpg

 [Front Matter]

* [Title Page]

Iran, Iraq, and the Arab Gulf States

Edited by Joseph A. Kechichian

palgrave

* [Copyright]

IRAN, IRAQ, AND THE ARAB GULF STATES

©JosephA. Kechichian,2001

Softcover reprint of the hardcover 1st edition 2001 978-0-312-29388-8

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles or reviews.

First published 2001 by PALGRAVE™, 175 Fifth Avenue, New York,N.Y.1OO1O and Houndmihs, Basingstoke, Hampshire RG21 6XS. Companies and representatives throughout the world.

PALGRAVE is the new global publishing imprint of St. Martin’s Press LLC Scholarly and Reference Division and Palgrave Publishers Ltd (formerly Macmillan Press Ltd).

ISBN 978-1-349-63445-3 ISBN 978-1-349-63443-9 (eBook)

DOI 10.1007/978-1-349-63443-9

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Iran, Iraq, and the Arab Gulf States / edited by Joseph A. Kechichian. p. cm.

Papers presented at an international conference coordinated and hosted by Gustave E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, University of California, Los Angeles, 3–4 May, 2000.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

1. Persian Gulf Region—Politics and government—Congresses. 2. Persian Gulf Region—Foreign relations—Congresses. I. Kechichian, Joseph A. II. Gustave E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies.

DS326 .168 2001

953.05’3—dc21 2001032756

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Design by Westchester Book Composition.

First edition: December 2001

10987654321

Transferred to Digital Printing 2014

* Contents

Acknowledgments vii

A Note on Transliteration ix

List of Tables, Figures and Maps X

Contributors xii

Preface xxi

List of Abbreviations xxiii

PART I—INTERNAL CONCERNS

THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF IRAN

1. Tensions and Options among the Iranian Clerical Establishment, Olivier Roy 3

2. Reformists, Conservatives and Iran’s Parliamentary Elections, Shaul Bakhash 13

3. Civil-Military Relations in the Islamic Republic of Iran, Ahmed s. Hashim 31

THE REPUBLIC OF IRAQ

4. The Position of the Iraqi Clergy, Joyce N. Wiley 55

5. Domestic Politics in A Post-Saddam Iraq, Laith Kubba 65

6. The Military in Iraqi Politics, Andrew Parasiliti 83

THE KINGDOM OF SAUDI ARABIA

7. Assessing Saudi Susceptibility to Revolution, Mark N. Katz 95

8. Image, Imagination And Place: The Political Economy Of Tourism In

Saudi Arabia, Gwenn Okruhlik 111

9. Saudi Arabia: Measures Of Transition From A Rentier State, Robert E. Looney 131

THE ARAB GULF STATES

10. Domestic Politics in the United Arab Emirates: Social and Economic Policies, 1990–2000, Fatma AlSayegh 161

11. Kuwait and Bahrain: The Appeal of Globalization and Internal Constraints, May Seikaly 177

12. Kings And People: Information and Authority in Oman, Qatar, and the Persian Gulf, Dale F. Eickelman 193

PART II—REGIONAL CONCERNS

BORDER DISPUTES

13. Down to the Usual Suspects: Border and Territorial Disputes in the Arabian Peninsula and Persian Gulf at the Millennium, Richard Schofield 213

14. The Kuwait-Iraq Border Problem, Hussein Hassouna 237

15. Yemeni-Saudi Relations Gone Awry, Mohammed A. Zabarah 263

RELATIONS BETWEEN GCC STATES

16. Unity on the Arabian Peninsula, Joseph A. Kechichian 281

17. Forging Institutions in the Gulf Arab States, R. Hrair Dekmejian 303

18. The GCC States: Internal Dynamics and Foreign Policies, Muhammed Saleh Al-Musfir 313

THE GULF STATES AND WESTERN POWERS

19. Constants and Variations in Gulf-British Relations, Gerd Nonneman 325

20. The Impact of US. Policy on the Stability of the Gulf States: A Historian’s View, Rosemarie Said Zahlan 351

21. Gulf States’ Links with Their Post-Soviet Northern Neighbors, Theodore Karasik 367

PART III—TRENDS FOR THE FUTURE

22. The UAE Vision for Gulf Security, Sultan bin Zayed bin

Sultan Al Nahyan 383

23. The Gulf Cooperation Council: Future Trends, Saif bin HashilAl-Maskery 393

24. The Arabian GulfAt The New Millennium: Security Challenges, Hassan Hamdan Al-Alkim 407

25. Outlook for Iranian-Gulf Relations: Greater Cooperation or Renewed Risk of Conflict?, Shireen T. Hunter 427

26. What Makes the Gulf States Endure?, J.E. Peterson 451

Bibliography 461

Index 464

* Acknowledgments

On 3–4 May 2000, the Gustav E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies at the University of California in Los Angeles hosted an international conference on “Iran, Iraq, and the Arab Gulf States,” which formed the basis of this volume. The gathering assembled 25 Middle Eastern, European, and American analysts to provide appraisals of the situation in the Gulf region in early 2000 and identify trends for the next decade.

Both the conference and this book were made possible through the generous support of His Highness Shaykh Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, the president of the United Arab Emirates. Much like his contribution on “Gulf Security: The View from Abu Dhabi,” which was published in A Century in Thirty Years: Shaykh Zayed and the United Arab Emirates و (Washington, D.C.: Middle East Policy Council, 2000), that of his son, Shaykh Sultan bin Zayed Al Nahyan, the deputy prime minister of the UAE, adds value to it by contributing yet another comprehensive essay on the critical subject of Gulf security. To my knowledge, these two essays are the only ones written by high-ranking Gulf officials, to clarify evolving perspectives on regional security affairs. I thank His Highness for his sustained efforts and foresight.

His Excellency Shaykh Saif bin Hashil Al-Maskery, the former assistant secretary-general of the Gulf Cooperation Council, graciously agreed to travel from Muscat to Los Angeles to participate in the conference and write a paper that highlights the genuine search for peaceful resolution of conflicts within the region. By doing so, he joins several Gulf diplomats and scholars who seek to reverse the complacency trend by sharing their unique perspectives with a wider audience.

Several individuals at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in Abu Dhabi, including His Excellency Sultan bin OmeirAl Mashgouni and his assistant office director, Khalifah bin SabhaAl Qubaisi, were gracious with their time and hospitality. Mr. Muhammad Khalifah, the multitalented executive director of the Zayed Center for Coordination and Follow-Up, was equally cordial. To them, and many others, I owe a special debt of gratitude.

At UCLA, Professors Irene A. Bierman and Afaf Lutfi Al-Sayyid Marsot, respectively the director and the assistant director of the Center for Near Eastern Studies, welcomed and supported me at the university between the fall of 1998 and the spring of 2001. Both recognized the conference’s value when I first discussed it with them in the fall of 1999. The Center team, including Jonathan Friedlander, Lisette Hurtado Mora, and Diane James, coordinated the conference and assisted in hosting 25 scholars from 14 countries. I thank all of them for their assistance in what was truly a gargantuan task.

To Angelica—my inspiration—I owe deep gratitude for accepting her father’s many absences from home.

The Palgrave team performed in its usual professional practice. Editors Karen Wolny and Ella Pearce shepherded the manuscript through an excessively long “blind referee” process. Donna Cherry, Rick Delaney, Sabahat Chaudhary, Meredith Howard, Alan Bradshaw, and Sonia Wilson proved to be devoted to this project as they did their level best to make-up some of the lost time. Rodney Williams copy-edited our text—with its multi-cultural and multi-linguistic twists—with his usual skill. These are true professionals and it is a pleasure to work with such a team.

Last, but not least, I thank my colleagues who first accepted the invitation to participate in the conference, wrote superb original papers, answered my repeated queries, and considered many of my emendations. This collective book is testament that each and every one has added value.

* A Note on Transliteration

A modified version of the Library of Congress transliteration system has been adopted throughout the book. In rendering Arabic words and names, however, and because several authors use various spellings, I relied on the style used by the International Journal of Middle East Studies. Thus a name that is commonly rendered in English, for example Mohammed, becomes Muhammad, and Mecca becomes Makkah. Whenever known, I used the common English spellings for proper names, as well as for names of countries. Thus Fahd rather than Fahad (although the latter is used if the individual writes his name with that spelling) and Oman rather than ‘Uman. Although special care was devoted to standardize the spellings of as many transliterated words as possible, there are—inevitably—a few inconsistencies which, I trust, readers will understand. For practical purposes, all diacritical marks for long vowels and velarized consonants have been eliminated. Arabic and Persian speakers will know the correct reference for the transliterated words throughout the text.

* List of Tables, Figures and Maps

9.1 Saudi Arabia: Rates of Growth, 1964–1998.

9.2 Saudi Arabia: Economic Structure, 1970–1998.

9.3 Saudi Arabia: Public Sector Budget, 1979–1998.

9.4 Saudi Arabia: Influence of Public Expenditure on the Private Sector Economy.

9.5 Saudi Arabia: Summary of Results.

19.1 UK Imports from the Gulf States, 1991—1999 (in مم Million).

19.2 UK Visible Non-Defense Exports to the Gulf States, 1991–1999, (in مم Million).

19.3 UK Visible Non-Arms Exports to the Gulf States, by Broad Commodity Group, 1998 (in مم Million).

19.4 Recent And Current Arms Contracts UK—GCC.

25.1 Persian Gulf: Size of Countries.

25.2 Persian Gulf: Population of Countries.

25.3 Persian Gulf: Ethnic Composition of Non-Nationals in Percentages.

25.4 Persian Gulf: Proven Oil Reserves.

Figures

9.1 Saudi Arabia: Evolution of the Non-Oil Economy, 1964-.

9.2 Development Model 1: Saudi Arabian Development during the Oil Boom Years.

9.3 Development during the Post—Oil Boom Years: Pessimistic Assessment.

9.4 Development during the Post—Oil Boom Years: optimistic Assessment.

9.5 Saudi Arabia: Future Virtuous Cycle.

12.1 Faisal al-Kassim Broadcasting from Al-Jazeera.

12.2 Palestinian News Reporting.

Maps

13.1 Territorial and Maritime Boundaries in the Gulf Region.

13.2 Saudi-Yemeni Boundary.

13.3 Bahrain Boundary Issues.

14.1 Kuwait-Iraq Border.

* Contributors

Dr. Hassan Hamdan AL-ALKIM is professor of political science at the UAE University in Al-Ain, where he has taught since 1986. He spent 1991 as a visiting professor at the University of California at Los Angeles (on a Fulbright scholarship) and 1992–93 at the University of London. He earned his B.A. from Seattle University and an M.A. and Ph.D. in political science from the University of Exeter. Dr. Al-Alkim is a member of numerous editorial boards as well as academic associations such as the Royal Institute for International Affairs and the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. His books in English ١٠ةاتجهل The GCC States in an Unstable World’. Foreign Policy Dilemmas of Small States, (London: Saqi Books, 1994) and The Foreign Policy of the United Arab Emirates (London: Saqi Books, 1989).

Dr. Shaul BAKHASH is Clarence Robinson Professor of History at George Mason University, where he teaches Iranian and modern Middle Eastern history. Currently he is a Public Policy Scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center in Washington DC. He is the author of Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution, Iran: Monarchy, Bureaucracy and Reform under the Qajars, 1858–1896, and other publications. He writes frequently for The New York Review of Books and has published numerous articles in scholarly books and journals, most recently in Foreign Policy and The Journal of Democracy. His op-ed pieces have appeared in The New York Times, The Washington Post, The Los Angeles Times, and other publications. Until 1979, he worked as a journalist in Iran writing for Kayhan International and reporting from Iran, at various times, for The Economist, The Times, ةاألها The FinancialTimes.

Dr. R. Hrair DEKMEJIAN teaches political science at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles. Earlier, he taught at the State University of New York at Binghamton; Columbia; and the University of Pennsylvania. He is the author of several books, most recently Troubled Waters: Geopolitics of the Caspian Region (co-authored with Hovann I. Simonian, I. B. Tauris, 2001), Islam in Revolution (Syracuse University Press, 1995), Patterns of Political Leadership (SUNY Press, 1975), and Egypt Under Nasser: A Study in Political Dynamics (SUNY Press, 1971).

Dr. Dale F. EICKELMAN is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations and chair of the Department of Anthropology at Dartmouth College. Since 1968 he has worked extensively in the Middle East, including long-term field research in Morocco and the Sultanate of Oman. His publications include Moroccan Islam (1976): The Middle East and Central Asia; an Anthropological Approach (1981:3[8 ed., 1998); Knowledge and Power in Morocco الم tו·, MuslimTravdlers: Pilgrimage, Migration and the Religious Imagination (coedited with James Piscatori, 1990); RussiTs Muslim Frontiers: New Directions in Cross-Cultural Analysis (edited, 1993); Muslim Politics, co-authored with James P·Ht'·(%9الم ך, New Media in the Muslim WorldךThe Emerging Public Sphere (coedited with Jon Anderson, 1999); and numerous scholarly articles and contributions to edited books. He was a 1976–1977 member of the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, 1991 President of the Middle East Studies Association of North America, a 1992 Guggenheim Fellow, a 1996–1997 fellow at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, and a 20002001 fellow at the Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin.

Dr. Ahmed s. HASHIM is a defense analyst at the Center for Naval Analyses in Washington, D.c. He earned a doctorate in political science from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1991, and was a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, as well as a research analyst at the International Institute for Strategic Studies. In 1997, he co-authored (with Anthony Cordesman) Iraq: Sanctions and Beyond, and Iran: Beyond Dual Containment, both published by Westview Press. While at the IISS, he published, among others, The Crisis of the Iranian State: Domestic, Foreign and Security? Policies in Post-Khomeini Iran (Adelphi Paper number 296, 1995).

Ambassador Hussein HASSOUNA is the permanent representative of the League of Arab States to the United Nations. Before assuming his current post in 1997, he was assistant minister of foreign affairs of Egypt for international legal affairs and treaties (1996–1997) and ambassador of Egypt to Morocco (1992–1996) and to Yugoslavia (1989–1992). Over the years, he filled a variety of diplomatic posts in Cairo, Paris, Washington, DC., and New York. Ambassador Hassouna earned a doctorate in international law from Cambridge University in the United Kingdom, where he wrote a dissertation on the Iraq-Kuwait border dispute, and published, among others, The League ofArab States and Regional Disputes:A Study of Middle East Conflicts (Oceana, 1975).

Dr. Shireen T. HUNTER is the director of the Islamic Studies program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington, DC. She previously served as director of the Mediterranean Studies program with the Centre for European Policy Studies in Brussels. Dr. Hunter is the author of sev-

The Future of Islam and the West: Clash of Civilization OY <آلاة١لةلا٢ا؟ ١٥ooks_١عاًح ١

Peaceful Coexistence? 1أ١١ Central Asia Since Independence

-The Transcaucasus in Transition: Nation-Building and Con ؟>عاًا ١ ا9%١,ةلاًة عةاًؤآ/ةلآحبا flict (CSIS, 1994). Her articles have appeared in leading journals such as Foreign Affairs, Foreign Policy Current History

١علأئ Middle East journal. Security Dialogue, the International Spectator, Relazioni Internazionali, Third World Quarterly, and the SAIS Review, as well as prominent newspapers including the Los Angeles Times and the Christian Science Monitor. She holds a Ph.D. in political science from the Institut des Hautes Etudes Internationales in Geneva and an M.A. from the London School of Economics and Political Science.

Dr. Mark N. KATZ is professor of government and politics at George Mason University in Fairfax, Virginia. He received a Ph.D. in political science from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1982. His books include Russia and Arabia: Soviet Foreign Policy toward theArabian Peninsula (Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986), Revolutions and Revolutionary Waves (St. Martin’s Press, 1997), and Revolution: International Dimensions, editor, (Palgrave, 2001). During 1999–2000, he was president of the National Capital Area Political Science Association.

Dr. Theodore w. KARASIK is a resident consultant at RAND in Santa Monica and is Editor, Russia and Eurasia Armed Forces Review, Gulf Breeze: Academic International Press. He received a doctorate in history from the University of California, Los Angeles. He is a frequent contributor to the Central Asia-Caucasus Monitor, Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Karasik has thirteen years work experience in Russian, Caucasian and Middle Eastern affairs for the RAND Corporation. His RAND publications include “Foreign and Security Policy Decision-making Under Yeltsin,” RAND, MR-831-OSD, 1997 (co-authored with F. Stephen Larrabee). Dr. Karasik has also worked on Air Force and Army projects exploring air power and MOUT including “Organizing, Training and Equipping the Air Force for Crises and Lesser Conflicts,” MR-626-AF, 1995 (co-authored with Carl H. Builder). Other publications include “Chechnya: A Glimpse of Future Conflict?,” Studies in Conflict E Terrorism, with John Arquilla, “Putin and Shoigu: Reversing Russia’s Decline, Demokratizatsiia, Summer 2000, and “The Crisis in Azerbaijan: How Clans Influence the Politics of an Emerging Republic,” Middle Eastjournal, Summer 1995 (with Joseph Kechichian).

Dr. Joseph A. KECHICHIAN is a fellow at UCLA’s Gustav E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, and the CEO of Kechichian & Associates, LLC, a consulting partnership that provides analysis on the Arabian/Persian Gulf region, specializing in the domestic and regional concerns of Bahrain, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Yemen. He received a doctorate in Foreign Affairs from the University ofVirginia in 1985, where he also taught (1986–1988), and assumed the assistant deanship in international studies (1988–1989). In the summer of 1989, Dr. Kechichian was a Hoover Fellow at Stanford University (under the U.S. State Department Title VIII program). Between 1990 and 1996, he was an associate political scientist at the Santa Monica-based RAND Corporation and a lecturer at the University of California, Los Angeles. He published Succession in SaudiArabia (New York: Palgrave, 2001) and Oman and the World :The Emergence of an Independent Foreign Policy (RAND, 1995), and edited A Century in ThirtyYears: Shaykh Zayed and the United Arab Emirates (Middle East Policy Council, 2000). He is currently completing a study tentatively titled The UAE and the World. Dr. Kechichian received a RAND President’s Award for Research Excellence in January 1995. A frequent traveler to the Gulf region, he is fluent in Arabic, Armenian, English, French, Italian, and Turkish, and is learning Persian.

Dr. Laith KUBBA was born and raised in Baghdad, Iraq. He had his bachelor’s degree from the University of Baghdad (1976) and his Ph.D. from the University of Wales, in the United Kingdom (1982). Dr Kubba was an active participant in a number of Iraqi organizations. He served on the Iraqi Joint Action Committee, the first broad alliance of the Iraqi opposition. He coordinated the INC meeting in Vienna and was a spokesman for the organization in 1992. Following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, Dr. Kubba took a high public profile and participated in numerous debates and media shows on Iraq. Also, he was a columnist for two Arabic weekly magazines and served on the boards of regional institutions including the Iraq Foundation, the Arab Organization for Human Rights, and the International Forum for Islamic Dialogue. For the period 1995–1998, he worked for Al Khoei Foundation in London as their director of international relations. At present, he is the senior program officer for the Middle East at the National Endowment for Democracy, in Washington D.c.

Dr. Robert E. LOONEY is a professor of national security studies at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, California. He is the author of several studies ·lÃlاةذاهة١ The Economic Development oj Iran: A Recent Survey With Predictions to 1981 ÇPi2k.e؟>eıl9٦ذ١ ١, Iran at the End of the Century: An Hegelian Forecast (Lexington Books, 1977), A Development Strategy for Iran (Praeger, 1977), Saudi Arabia’s Growth Potential (Lexington Books, 1981), Economic Origins of the Iranian Revolution (Pergamon, 1982), Third World Military Expenditures and Arms Production ١f١. Economic Development in Saudi Arabia: Consequences of the Oil Price Decline l١غا Press, ١١د99٥ The Economic Causes and Consequences of Defense Expenditures in the Middle East and South Asia (with David Winterford, Westivew Press, 1994), Manpower Policies and Development in the Arab GulfRegion (Praeger, 1994), Industrialization in the Arabian Gulf (JAI Press, 1994), The Economics of Third World Defense Expenditures (JAI Press, 1995), and The Pakistani Economy: Economic Growth and Structural Reform (Praeger, 1997).

His Excellency Saif bin Hashil AL-MASKERY is the head of the Oman Consultancy Group in Muscat, Sultanate of Oman. From 1987 to 1993, he was assistant secretary-general for political affairs of the Riyadh-based Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), when the Persian Gulf region was mired in two major wars. Earlier, he served as ambassador and permanent representative of the Sultanate of Oman to the United Nations in Geneva, Switzerland.

Dr. Muhammed Saleh AL-MUSFIR is a senior associate at the ministry of foreign affairs in the State of Qatar. He started his diplomatic career as acting council general in Pakistan (1975–1976), and acting cultural attache in London (1976–1978), before becoming chancellor (1978–1983) and deputy to the permanent representative (1984–1986), of the United Arab Emirates delegation at the United Nations in New York. Between 1999 and 2001, he was a visiting professor at Yarmouk University in Jordan and, from 1986 to 1999, professor of political science at the University of Qatar in Doha. In 1995, he assumed the editorship of the Doha daily Al-Rayah, for a period of two years. A frequent participant on television programs throughout the Arab world, Dr. Al-Musfir writes a regular political column in various Gulf and Arab newspapers, and has published Regional Organizations: Backgrounds of origins and principles (National Press, 1987), United Nations Organization: origins and principles (Ali BinAli Press, 1996), The Arabs, the West and Globalization (Ali Bin Ali Press, 1999 [all in Arabic]). He earned his doctorate in political science from the State University of New York at Binghamton in 1984.

His Highness Shaykh Sultan Bin Zayed AL NAHYAN is the deputy prime minister of the United Arab Emirates, a position he has held since November 1990. His primary responsibilities include the day-to-day operations of the federal government. In addition, as the third-highest-ranking member of the ruling family, His Highness conducts special assignments on behalf of the state—he represented the UAE at the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations in New York in 1995. Shaykh Sultan graduated from Sandhurst Academy in the United Kingdom in 1972 and served in both the Abu Dhabi (1973–78) and UAE armed forces. After a distinguished career that spanned a decade, His Highness was appointed general commander of the armed forces (1978–82). In addition to his federal position, Shaykh Sultan is the chairman of the Abu Dhabi Public Works Department, responsible for the Emirate’s infrastructure, as well as the vice-chairman of the Abu Dhabi Executive Council, the highest governing body in the Emirate. His Highness also serves on the Supreme Petroleum Council and is the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Abu Dhabi Fund for Arab Economic Development, of the Zayed Center for Coordination and Follow-Up, and of the UAE National Heritage Council. A frequent participant in various cultural festivities in the UAE, Shaykh Sultan is interested in world history and Arab civilization.

Dr. Gerd NONNEMAN is Reader in International Relations and Middle East Politics at Lancaster University. He is also the Executive Director of the British Society for Middle Eastern Studies (BRISMES). Born in Flanders and educated at Ghent University, Belgium, in oriental philology (Arabic) as well as development studies, he worked in Iraq for a number of years during the 19805, before returning to academia teaching Middle East politics and political economy at Manchester and Exeter universities. After a spell as visiting professor at the International University ofjapan, he joined the faculty at Lancaster in 1993. His publications include: Political and Economic Liberalisation: Dynamics and Linkages in Comparative Perspective (editor, Lynne Rienner, 1996), Muslim Communities in the New Europe (editor, Ithaca Press, 1997), Development, Administration and Aid in the Middle East 1l\\ War and Peace in the Gulf:

Domestic Politics and Regional Relations into the 1990s (with A. Ehteshami, Ithaca Press, 1ل\\ Yemen'.The SearchJor development, Stability and Unity 196Os-199Os (Hurst Publishers, 2000), and The Political Economy of Iraqi-Kuwaiti Relations (forthcoming).

Dr. Gwenn OKRUHLIK is an Assistant Professor of political science at the University ofArkansas. She earned a doctorate in government from the University of Texas at Austin in 1992 and was the first female political scientist to do fieldwork in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in 1989–1990 on a Fulbright doctoral grant. Her publications include "Rentier Wealth, Unruly Law and the Rise of Opposition: The Political Economy of Oil States" (Comparative Politics); "Excluded Essentials: Ethnicity, Oil and Citizenship in Saudi Arabia" (in The Global Color Une: Racial and Ethnic Inequality and Struggle From a Global Perspective), "The Politics of Border Disputes in the Arabian Peninsula" (.International Journal), "National Autonomy, Labor Migration and Political Crisis: Yemen and Saudi Arabia (.Middle East journal) and "From Imagined Scholarship to Gendered Discourse: Bringing the Peninsula in from the Periphery" (.Middle East Report). Her current research projects focus on gender and civic mythology; Islamist social movements; meanings of citizenship in Saudi Arabia, alternative historic narratives, and migrant labor in the Peninsula.

Dr. Andrew PARASILITI is director of the Middle East Initiative at the John F. Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University, and a specialist on Iraq and Gulf security issues. From 1996–1999, he was director of programs at the Middle East Institute in Washington, DC., where he directed the institute's programs and research projects dealing with Gulf energy security, Iraq, and Iran. Dr. Parasiliti has conducted field research and interviews in Iraq, Iran, Syria, and Jordan, as well as other countries throughout the Middle East. He is a regular contributor to scholarly publications and the popular press about developments in Iraq. Recent publications include (5ءلآ Policy on Iraq: A Dangerous Drift?" (with Jon B. Alterman), in Middle East Economic Survey (18 October 1999): and "Political Risk in Iraq," in Middle East Economic Survey (24 May 1999). He received a Ph.D. from the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, Johns Hopkins University.

Dr. John E. PETERSON is a historian and author based in Tucson, Arizona. After receiving his doctorate from Johns Hopkins SAIS, he was a research analyst at the Library of Congress and then taught at Bowdoin, William and Mary, the University of Pennsylvania, and Portland State before joining the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister for Security and Defense of the Sultanate of Oman. His principal publications include Oman in the Twentieth Century, 1978; Yemen: The Search jor a Modern State, n٠١ Defending Arabia, Lt٠١ The Arab Gulf" States: Steps Toward Political Participation, Lt ٠, Historical Dictionary oj Saudi Arabia, أ99ل هلآةاذ Defending OmanzA History of the Sultan'sArmed Forces (forthcoming).

Dr. Olivier ROY studied philosophy and oriental languages (Persian), obtained an agregation de philosophic as well as a Ph.D. in political science. He is presently a senior researcher at CNRS (French National Center for Scientific Research) and a consultant for the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Olivier Roy was also a consultant for UNOCA (United Nations Office of the Coordinator for Afghanistan) in 1988, and special envoy for the OSCE in Tajikistan (August-December 1993), then head of OSCE's Mission for Tajikistan (February--November 1994). He completed fieldwork throughout the Middle East and Central Asia. His main publications are Islam and Resistance in Afghanistan (Cambridge University Press, second ed., 1990 [translated from the French]), The Faillire of Political Islam (Harvard University Press, 1994, [translation of UEchec de lTslam politique, Le Seuil, 1992]), Genealogie de Vislamisme (Hachette, 1995), Iran: comment sortir dune revolution religieuse (with Farhad Khosrokhavar, Le Seuil, 1999), Vers un islam europeen (Editions Esprit, 1999), and The New Central Asia: The Fabrication of Nations (I. B. Tauris, 2000).

Dr. Fatma AL-SAYEGH is an associate professor in the Department of History at the UAE University at Al-Ain, where she joined the faculty as an assistant professor in 1990. Her areas of specialization are the history of the UAE, the societies of the Gulf countries, and women's studies. She earned her bachelor's degree in modern history from Kuwait University, her M.A. from the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee, and her Ph.D. from Essex University (1989). She was the recipient of a Fulbright research grant for the 1993–94 academic year. Dr. Al-Sayegh received the Shaykh Rashid bin Said Award for Educational and Scientific Achievement in 1991 and the al-Owais Award for the best book about the UAE in 1996: The United Arab Emirates and the British Air Route to the East [in Arabic]. She is also the author of The United Arab Emiratesfrom Tribalism to Statehood (1997) [in Arabic].

Dr. Richard SCHOFIELD is convenor of the MA in International Boundary Studies and deputy director of the Geopolitics and International Boundaries Research Centre at the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS), University of London. He is also a senior officer of the British Society of Middle Eastern Studies and a founding editor of Geopolitics (formerly Geopolitics and International Boundaries), the triannual journal published by Frank Cass. He is the author of several publications, including Evolution of the Shatt al-Arab Boundary Dispute, Lt ٠١ Kuwait and Iraq: Historical Claims and Territorial Disputes, L99L د99ذ\١٠ةاآلة سآ ةع٠١ Unwished Business: Abu Musa, theTunbs, Iran and the UAE لمألاآدكأ- coming). He was editor of Territorial Foundations of the Gulf States, 1994, as well as of numerous documentary collections on Arabian/Persian Gulf boundaries and associated territorial questions. In addition, he has penned numerous articles on these subjects in academic journals and edited collections. He is currently working on three major research projects: writing a commissioned work on the political economy of territory and resources in the Middle East, compiling an atlas of Arabian boundary disputes, and constructing a bibliographical database on Iran's northern borderlands with the Caucasus and Central Asia.

Dr. May SEIKALY is associate professor of history at Wayne State University in Detroit, Michigan. She earned a doctorate in modern Middle East socioeconomic history from Oxford University in 1983. Her publications include.' HAIFA: Transformation of an Arab Society: 1918–1939 (I. B. Tauris, 1995, 2000, [with an Arabic translation in 19971), "Women and Socio-Political Change in Bahrain," International Journal of Middle East Studies (1994), "Women and Religion in Bahrain: An Emerging Identity," in John Esposito and Yvonne Haddad (eds .),Islam, Gender and Social Change (Oxford University Press, 1997), "Bahraini Women in Formal and Informal Groups: The Politics of Identification," in Dawn Chatty and Annika Rabo (eds.), Organizing Women: Formal and Informal Women's Groups in the Middle East (Berg, 1997), "Living with the Memory: Legitimacy, Justice and Nationhood," in Naim Ateek and Michael Prior (eds.). Holy Land-Hallow Jubilee (Fox Publishers, 1999), "Attachment and Identity: The Palestinian Community of Detroit," in Michael Suleiman (ed .),Arabs inAmerica: Building a New Future, (Temple University Press, 1999), and "Haifa at the Crossroads: An outpost of the new World Order," in Leila Fawaz (ed.), European Modernity and Cultural Difference From the Mediterranean Sea to the Indian Ocean 1890—1920 (Columbia University Press, 2001).

Dr. Joyce N. WILEY is an associate professor of government and international studies at the University of South Carolina, Spartanburg. She earned a doctorate in international studies from the University of South Carolina at Columbia in 1988. She has taught in Iraq and Saudi Arabia and traveled extensively throughout the Middle East. Her research interests are Islamic political movements and Iraqi politics. In 1992, she published The Islamic Movement of Iraqi Shi'as (Lynne Rienner Publishers) and contributed, among others, various essays to the Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (on Ayatollah Hakim and Ayatollah Khoi in particular). Her chapter on the ‘alima Bint al-Huda was published in The Most Learned of the Shi‘a (2001).

Dr. Mohammed A. ZABARAH is a professor of political science at the University of Yemen in Sanaa. He was the Dean of the Faculty of Commerce and Economics (1991–1993), and chairman of the political science department on two occasions. Before going to Sanaa University, he taught at King Abdul Aziz University in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. He is the author of Yemen: Traditionalism vs. Modernity (Praeger, 1992).

Dr. Rosemarie Said ZAHLAN is a historian, author, and consultant. Her first publication on the Gulf was in 1970, examining the 1938 Reform Movement in Dubai. Her books include The Origins of the United Arab Emirates: A Political and Social History of the Trucial States (Macmillan and St. Martin’s Press, 1978), The Creation of Qatar (Croom Helm and Barnes and Noble, 1979), and The Making of the Modern Gulf States: Kuwait) Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Oman (Unwin Hyman, 1989, 1998). As an academic and consultant, she has also contributed to the Financial Times, the Wall Street journal, Oxford Analytica, Middie East Economic Digest, Middie East Review, South Magazine, لأج BBC World Service, and others.

* Preface

Two decades after the epoch-making 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran and an eight-year-long (1980–1988) protracted war between Iran and Iraq, and a decade after the historic War for Kuwait (1991), the Persian Gulf region remains mired in conflict and uncertainty. Few doubt the importance of the area to its inhabitants as well as to the economic welfare of industrialized societies. Yet, despite momentous—even cataclysmic—events and unabated concerns, few can forecast that the area will be free of additional convulsions.

For decades, the entire region was pigeonholed in terms of how “vital” it was and, within the East-West contest for world hegemony, how critical to the survival of a certain “way of life.” In the event, and despite the Christmas Eve 1979 invasion—and decade-long occupation—ofAfghanistan, the Soviet Union failed to gain a foothold in the area. Moscow’s lukewarm relations with Iraq and the People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) did not get the Soviets what earlier tsarist intentions had long craved. Both Iraq and the PDRY fared poorly too. Western powers, led first by the United Kingdom and later by the United States, emerged as the dominant outside forces that shaped the course of events. Washington weathered the repercussions of the Iranian Revolution—especially the humiliating 444-day-long hostage crisis—strengthened its presence on the Arabian Peninsula, and fought a regional hegemon under a United Nations— sanctioned intervention. It deployed more than halfa million troops and a unique armada to ensure, inter aha, the territorial integrity of Kuwait and the sovereignty of the conservative Arab Gulf monarchies. Although the United States neutralized putative Iranian and Iraqi capabilities, it failed to accelerate political changes—especially of the regime variety—in both countries and, in early 2001, was still confronted by political forces deemed too hostile for comfort.

To be sure, Iran and Iraq opposed the perceived American hegemony throughout the Persian Gulf region, even if Teheran longed for improved relations and Baghdad yearned for a speedy departure. Many Iranians remained apprehensive of American intentions notwithstanding limited but positive contacts. Many Arabs, including in the Gulf Cooperation Council states, harbored uneasiness as well. A majority rejected the strangulation of the Iraqi population but failed to persuade their Western allies to lift UN-imposed economic sanctions on Baghdad. Most aimed to find a balance among internal, regional, and international commitments, to ensure their survival. Both Iranians and Arabs aimed to regain the upper hand in determining their respective destinies even if more powerful forces shaped them. In the end, all feared the spillover effects of regional instability, a burgeoning arms race, and dramatic economic and social changes. Indeed, they were all confronted by new paradigms that challenged traditional interpretations and threatened to alter the body politic of each regime.

Against this background, what are the political, military, religious, and socioeconomic trends for Bahrain, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Yemen? Will internal, regional, and international tensions threaten existing regimes, or will the latter survive growing pressure points? Will Gulf states' incredible endurance capabilities be altered? Will the next decade witness fundamental changes that could destabilize the Persian Gulf, or will new institutions equip each state with the wherewithal to function and grow more effectively?

These are the fundamental questions and issues that the following 26 contributions attempt to answer and analyze. They articulate American, European, and Middle Eastern perspectives to widen the ongoing debate among scholars and decision makers. Indeed, by discussing issues from several perspectives, these essays aim to elucidate rather than sermonize.

The integrated papers that follow are divided into three parts. Part One provides an overview of Gulf states' internal concerns—focusing on political, military, economic, religious, and social matters. While the focus of the first papers are on Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and the smaller Gulf states, these are not intended as country profiles. Rather, they purport to analyze currents and trends, to alert the reader to fundamental changes. Part Two offers detailed examinations of three of the most significant issues that presently affect the area. Despite recent progress on several fronts, including a significant accord between Bahrain and Qatar as well as intense negotiations between Saudi Arabia and Yemen, thorny border disputes are analyzed to identify significant trends for future political behavior. Regional issues, including institution-building measures, are also analyzed to identify groundbreaking sociopolitical changes throughout the region. Finally, key relations with Britain, the United States, and Russia are assessed, to weigh their repercussions both for indigenous leaders as well as for their Western counterparts. Part Three consists of overview essays of the Gulf region in terms of the changing foreign policy environment. They provide fresh appraisals of Gulf security and conflict resolution.

As the bulk of these essays were written almost a year before the book appeared in print, what follows may well have been overtaken by time. Nevertheless, it is fully expected that the underlying analyses and interpretations will continue to serve useful purposes, to encourage debate among scholars, and to provide policymakers with concrete reference points.

* List of Abbreviations

| ACC | Arab Cooperation Council |

| APIA | Abu Phabi Investment Authority |

| AIPAC | American Israel Public Affairs Committee |

| AMU | Arab Maghreb Union |

| APC | Armored Personnel Carrier |

| APOC | Anglo-Persian Oil Company |

| ASEAN | Association of South East Asian Nations |

| BPP | Barrels Per Pay |

| CPLR | Committee for the Pefense of Legitimate Rights |

| PRY | Pemocratic Republic of Yemen |

| ECO | Economic Cooperation Organization |

| ESPI | European Security and Pefense Identity |

| EU | European Union |

| FLOSY | Front for the Liberation of South Yemen |

| FNC | Federal National Council [UAE] |

| GCC | Gulf Cooperation Council |

| GPP | Gross Pomestic Product |

| GNP | Gross National Product |

| GPC | General People’s Congress [Yemen] |

| IAEA | International Atomic Energy Agency |

| ICJ | International Court ofjustice |

| ICP | Iraqi Communist Party |

| ILSA | Iran-Libya Sanctions Act |

| IMF | International Monetary Fund |

| INC | Iraqi National Congress |

| IRGC | Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps [Pasdaran-e Engelabe-e-Islami |

| IRNA | Islamic Republic News Agency [Iran] |

| ISA | Internal Security Agreement [of GCC] |

| LAS | League ofArab States |

| LNG | Liquefied Natural Gas |

| LSY | League of the Sons of Yemen |

| MBPD | Million Barrels Per Day |

| MBT | Main Battle Tanks |

| ITO | North Atlantic Treaty Organization |

| NDF | National Democratic Front [Yemen] |

| NIS | New Independent States [former Soviet Union] |

| NLF | National Liberation Front [Yemen] |

| NPT | Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty |

| OIC | Organization of Islamic Conference |

| OPEC | Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries |

| PDRY | People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen |

| PLO | Palestine Liberation Organization |

| RCC | Revolutionary Command Council [Iraq] |

| RUSI | Royal United Services Institute |

| SAVAK | National Organization of Information and Security [Sazeman-e Amniyat-e va Ettela’at Keshvar] |

| see | State Consultative Council [Oman] |

| SCIRI | Supreme Council of the Islamic Resistance in Iran |

| UAE | United Arab Emirates |

| UNDP | United Nations Development Program |

| UNIKBDC | United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission |

| UNMOVIC | United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission |

| UNSCOM | United Nations special Commission [for Iraq] |

| USSR | Union of Soviet Socialist Republics |

| WEU | Western European Union |

| WMD | Weapons of Mass Destruction |

| WTO | World Trade Organization |

| YAR | Yemen Arab Republic |

| YSP | Yemen Socialist Party |

* Part I: Internal Concerns

 The Islamic Republic of Iran

 Chapter 1: Tensions and Options Among the Iranian Clerical Establishment

Olivier Roy

It may be argued that the Iranian revolution is the only “religious revolution” in the modern world. Whether a religious revolution is even possible, however, is an entirely different question. Still, it is clear that any transition in post-revolutionary Iran, as embodied by the spring 2000 elections, will have to deal with the religious legacy and legitimacy of the regime.[1] What to do with the clergy and how to interpret Islam in Iran are two of the most critical questions facing any analysis of the Islamic republic.

Given the country’s recent history, it is clear that the two issues are intermingled, as any form of secularization has to find some support among clerical circles. And the clerics, whatever their political positions, have to express these positions in terms of Islam. Inasmuch as these questions are critical, it is equally important to ask why the debate among clerics is vital for the future of the Iranian Islamic republic. Without a doubt, it is not so much because the clergy rules. In fact, the Iranian revolution has been far less clerical than many assume. Rather, the real stake is the role played by the Guide, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, based on the concept of Velayat-e Faqih (or “rule of the jurisconsult”).[2] To be sure, this is not an abstract theological debate, but a key issue for the future of democracy in Iran. Any political evolution depends on the Guide, which in large part explains why the debaters are divided between those who would limit the principle of Velayat-e Faqih (liberals as well as some traditionalists) and those conservatives who see in the Velayat-e Faqih the last vestige of the Islamic regime.

* Defining the Issues

Instead of empowering the clergy, the Islamic Revolution has in fact limited the traditional autonomy of the high clergy, in favor of the state. During his tenure, Ayatollah Khomeini bypassed the traditional clerical institutions and eliminated or sidelined all of the Great Ayatollahs of his generation, including Ayatollahs Mohammed Qazem Shariat-Madari, Mohammed Reza Golpaygani, Mohammed Qomi, and Abol-Qazem Khoi, among others. Khomeini established his rule through a body of lay intellectuals, figures like Ali Akbar Velayati and Mir Hossein Musavi, and mid-level clerics like Hojjat-ol Islam Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and Ali Hossein Khamenei. The real hierarchy was political, even for the clerics, which meant that religion was subordinated to politics. In fact, the clergy lost its financial autonomy, as religious taxes were collected through the state. Ayatollah Khomeini also balanced the clergy’s academic freedom, as censorship on religious seminaries became common, while clerical courts were established to control dissident clerics.

Ironically, traditional rules of succession and the devolution of authority among Great Ayatollahs were ignored by the state when appointing the new Guide. Moreover, the “clericalization” of the state apparatus promoted middlelevel clerics (Hojjat-ol Islam), to the detriment of the Great Ayatollahs. Today, the Guide holds a political and ideological position, more than a religious one, as it is explicitly stated in the constitution amended in 1989. Thus, the Guide is not necessarily the highest religious authority, although he should be “politically conscious” and “aware of his time” (agah be zaman). It must be noticed that this contradiction has been unraveling after the death of Ayatollah Khomeini, and particularly since the election of President Mohammed Khatami.[3] These emendations indicated that ideological considerations, and sheer political debate, were more relevant than the strict theological debate. Consequently, the crisis of religious legitimacy in the Islamic Republic led to a growing discrepancy between “religion” and “religious ideology” In turn, the crisis meant a reshuffling of political alignments, in which clerics were found on all sides.

* The Role of the Clergy

In the years since, it has become amply clear that the clergy does not control the state apparatus. To be sure, they dominate the Council of Guardians and the judiciary (whose current head, Mahmud Hashemi-Shahrudi is appointed by the Guide), and control family courts. Still, their position within the state apparatus is defined by the state itself. The Guide appoints clerics, who are not necessarily entrusted to their influential posts by their peers. Simply stated, there is no autonomy for the clergy in the political field, as most institutions that are strongholds of conservative elements are not headed by clerics, including the Guardians of the Revolution, the various foundations, and the political Motalefe coalition that supports conservative candidates. Interestingly, the number of clerics elected as members of parliament has regularly decreased since the first elections in the mid-1980s. Of course, state mollahs, who occupy key positions in the judiciary and the Council of Guardians, and who sit in parliament, or who are appointed by the state—-as are most of the Friday preachers (.Imam-ejome)— are members of conservative factions. Yet, even if they defend the ideological nature of the regime, they act more as members of an interest group rather than as a clerical faction.

In addition to state mollahs, two other categories of clerics fall outside the state apparatus: first, the bulk of the clergy—many of whom are apolitical—and,

Tensions AND Options Among THE Iranian Clerical Establishment 5 second, all of the remaining Great Ayatollahs, who keep aloof of daily politics but are preoccupied with their religious duties. Usually very traditionalist on social issues, they are increasingly in favor of a full rehabilitation of the clergy's autonomy, some voicing their criticism of Ayatollah Khamenei's position as Guide. Many do not have a political movement of their own, and the more vocal among them are now under pressure from the state.

If senior clerics are mildly engaged, a new school of thought has emerged among younger clergymen, including Mohsen Kadivar, Hassan Yusuf Eshkevari, and Mohsen Said Zadeh, who advocate a rethinking of Islamic law and a revival of Islamic philosophy. Several younger clerics have publicly discussed secularism (Kadivar), but they do not hold institutional positions within the clerical hierarchy—by having a specific affiliation with a specific mosque, for example. Most are preoccupied with their writings and are closer to secular/liberal intellectuals than to the traditional clergy.

Under these circumstances, if the clergy is no longer as important as a corporate institution in Iranian politics, to what extent is the internal debate relevant? For some time now, any reform in Iran has necessitated a formulation in terms of fidelity to the legacy of Imam Khomeini. A reformist leader needs to find vocal support among clerical circles and cannot risk a confrontation with the clerical coalition. The alliance of traditional ayatollahs and liberal clerics with the reformist coalition is a prerequisite for a smooth transition toward a more democratic system. But such a transition would require—at the very least—the neutrality of the Guide to withstand a conservative backlash. The key for the transition is the attitude of the Guide, Ayatollah Khamenei, whose position embodies the prevalence of religious ideology over religion.

An important feature of Shia Islam—which clarifies the role of the clergy—requires attention. There is a well-known specificity of the Twelver-Imami Shia clergy that looks like a corporate institution, with unified aims and a hierarchy centered on a collegial leadership embodied by the Great Ayatollahs. But this corporatism in fact failed to translate itself into politics because the clergy was not instrumental in controlling the state. Moreover, and despite this structural cohesion, the Shia clergy is far from being homogeneous in terms of political alignments and philosophical conceptions. Thus, the conflict between liberals and conservatives—which divides the Iranian political establishment—does not translate into a conflict between laymen and clerics. On the contrary, the conflict is to be found within the clergy itself. This anxiety between the ideal of a corporate institution and existing tensions is anecdotally expressed in the names of various factions, as they all bear almost similar appellations. For example, the Jame-ye Ruhaniyyat-e Mobarez-e Teheran (Teheran Militant Clergy) gathered clerics who were pro-revolution. Yet, a leftist—and now liberal—breakaway adopted the name Majma-ye Ruhaniyyun-e Mobarez (Militant Clerics Association) in the late 19805.

As this example illustrates, the situation is rather complex, because existing political alignments do not necessarily reflect religious and ideological ones. In support of President Mohammed Khatami, for example, one finds “liberal” clerics favoring a rethinking of Shariah (Mohsen Kadivar, Mohsen Mojtahed Shabestari, Hassan Yusuf Eshkevari); “traditionalists,” many of whom are unhappy about the extreme politicization of the clergy and the decline of the traditional spiritual leadership (Fazel Lankarani, for example, who refused to endorse the candidacy of the conservative Ayatollah Nateq Nouri against Mohammed Khatami in the 1997 presidential race); and, finally, “Islamic leftists," who, on the contrary, stress the social and anti-imperialist dimension of the revolution and its purely political message (Ali Akbar Mohtashemi, Mohammed Sadeq Khalkhali, Youssof Sana'y). These three groupings disagree on various issues, including the "fatwa" against Salman Rushdie, the role of Shariah, the meaning of democracy, the need for privatization or for support of a state-controlled economy, among others. Traditionalists, for example, maintain that Shariah should be implemented and are rather reluctant supporters of the concept of democracy. Leftists, on the other hand, favor elections, because the "peopie's will" is far more important than a strict interpretation of the Shariah. Liberals, for their part, have accepted the concept of secularization. Other complications exist as well, including the fact that several leading figures, after 20 years of militancy, have almost crossed the whole political spectrum, usually from radicalism to liberalism (Hossein Ali Montazeri, Mohammed Khoeiniha).

Thus, the division is both religious and political, as the role of the Guide, or more exactly the nature of the Velayat-e Faqih, is increasingly questioned. This unique institution embodies the complex relationships between religion and politics that, in the end, subordinates religion to politics through the ideologization of the former. As long as all the institutions of the Islamic Republic were held by individuals sharing similar views, that is, until the end of President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani's term in 1997, the Velayat-e Faqih was not an issue as such. Since the 1997 election of President Mohammed Khatami, and the parliamentary election of 2000, liberal elements have come to power, which in turn have propelled conservatives to rally around the Velayat-e Faqih. Conservatives, then, perceived the Velayat-e Faqih as their last leverage to prevent a drastic evolution toward liberalization. Without a doubt, the importance of the conceptual debate on the Velayat-e Faqih is now directly linked to the political stakes of the day. The conservatives can oppose the democratic evolution of the republic only by calling for the predominance of a strong Velayat. What is even clearer is that the intellectual debate is linked to very concrete and short-term political issues. Simply stated, conservative elements cannot wage a coup—-either military or constitutional—against President Khatami without the full approval ofAyatollah Khamenei. This fact leads to an ambiguous situation. The Guide can act as an arbiter and protect Mohammed Khatami against a coup. On the other hand, and because he heads the military and appoints senior members of the judiciary, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei can legally dismiss the president and dissolve parliament.

What this means is that the position of the Guide is the cornerstone of the institutions of the Islamic Republic. Yet, as the constitution of Iran explicitly mentions two sources of sovereignty, namely God's will, expressed by the Guide, and the people's will, any process of democratization will of course tend to assert the second. This would occur not necessarily against God's will, but by voiding the power of the Guide and relegating him to a more symbolic position. If the Velayat-e Faqih is thus weakened, the present constitution could provide an institutional framework for full democracy, and a de facto secularization. Conservative forces cannot, naturally, manage a coup against President Khatami without the explicit approval of the Guide.

This centrality of the Guide explains why the debate in Iran today is centered on the concept of the Velayat-e Faqih. Paradoxically, it is rarely addressed as such, because that debate would be labeled an open assault against the Islamic Republic, and would be immediately treated as political rebellion if not treason. Therefore, many clerics avoid the issue of the Velayat-e Faqih either because they do not want to be branded as opponents of the regime or because they fear the consequences. One of the few to speak on the subject has been Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, the former heir to Imam Khomeini.

Although critics of the Velayat-e Faqih underlined most of the debate among clerics, two other issues are openly debated, that of the redefinition of the Shariah and that of secularization, understood not as separation of church and state, but as a separation between politics and religious activities.

* The Velayat-e Faqih

The concept of Velayat-e Faqih is not really new in Shia thought, even if it was never considered as being a very practical theory. Of course, it has been established as the cornerstone of the Iranian political system, immediately following the 1979 revolution. It took on a political and ideological position, as enunciated in the constitution, and was no longer a purely religious reference.[4] In the previous religious literature, the Faqih was no less than the hidden Imam, or His representative on earth, that is, the most learned alim. Yet, according to the 1980 constitution, the Faqih is not necessarily the highest religious authority, although he is above that learned scholar. Such a concept, by definition, has met from the very beginning a strong opposition among many high-level clerics, including those who favored the concept of an Islamic State. The reason for this opposition was the undeniable fact that it introduced a competing hierarchy to the clerical one. Traditionally, the Iranian clergy was led by a college of Great Ayatollahs, known as the marja'e taqlid (sources of imitation). Ayatollah Khomeini was both a marja' and the Guide, and his proclamation as Guide did not contradict the traditional hierarchy, even if it introduced another hierarchy among the marja'. At his death in June 1989, however, the question as to which was prevalent arose: the religious legitimacy or the political one? The appointment of the then Hojjat-ol Islam Ali Khamenei, who not only was not a marja' but not even an ayatollah, highlighted inherent contradictions. The discrepancy unraveled in 1993, at the death of the last marja' of the time,Ayatoilah Araki. Of course, the only way to reconciliate both would have been to declare Hojjat-ol Islam Khamenei a marja', but the majority of the ayatollahs reacted negatively to such a proposal discreetly advanced by Khamenei's allies. The proposal was quietly withdrawn. Today, and although the marja'iyya has not been abolished, and some Great Ayatollahs are said to be marja's, the institution itself does not seem to function as originally intended.

It must be recalled that several leading ayatollahs were reluctant, even at the time of the revolution, to endorse the Velayat-e Faqih. This list included such major learned clergymen as Ayatollahs Shariat-Madari, Mahmud Taleqani, Mohammed Tabatabai Qomi, and others. In addition, alims like Nasir Makarem Shirazi preferred to limit the power of the Vali.[5] This reluctance became more vocal after the appointment of Hojjat-ol Islam Khamenei and was shared both by liberal clerics, like Ayatollah Montazeri, and by some very conservative clerics, like Ayatollah Azeri-Qomi (d. 1998). In fact, the Velayat-e Faqih came under attack both from liberals, who pushed for more democracy, a greater role for parliament, and a rethinking of the Shariah, and by traditionalist clerics, who advocated the implementation of Shariah under clerical supervision, even if they preferred to see the restoration of the traditional marja’iyya system, that is, the appointments of the supreme religious authority by a college of equals with no meddling of politics and ideology. Fazel Lankarani and Makarem Shirazi regularly criticized Abdul-Karim Soroush, and leading liberal clerics, about their conception of Fiqh (jurisprudence) and Shariah, but at the same time, they opposed Ali Khamenei. Ayatollah Taqi Bahjat, another leading traditionalist, protested in 1997 to the closure ofAyatollah Montazeri’s seminar.

The parallel evolution of Montazeri and Azeri-Qomi is interesting and must be discussed in detail to highlight the crisis within the ma a iyya. Both were staunch supporters of the revolution, Montazeri more “leftist” and Azeri-Qomi more “conservative.” Azeri-Qomi, who published a very traditionalist newspaper, Resalatو approved the eviction of Montazeri in 1989, and supported the then Hojjat-ol Islam Ali Khamenei to succeed Ayatollah Khomeini, arguing that the leader need not be a Great Ayatollah, or even a marja’. At the time, he was the theoretician of the “absolute rule of the jurist,” or Velayat-e Motlaq-e Faqih, which was inserted into the revised 1989 constitution. But, in the early 199015, Ayatollah Azeri-Qomi distanced himself from Ali Khamenei. The gap that emerged between the two men’s views grew so wide that Azeri-Qomi even questioned the concept of absolute Velayat-e Faqih in 1997, which promptly earned him house arrest. In 1994 he supported Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Bahjat rather than Ali Khamenei for the marja’iyya. Three years later, Azeri-Qomi published an open letter in which he blamed Ayatollah Khamenei for accepting the position of Guide.

Ayatollah Montazeri, who was a supporter of the Velayat-e Faqih, changed his mind as well, not about the function of the institution, but about its role. He publicly opposed the concept of “absolute” Velayat-e Faqih and proposed, instead, a “supervisory” role for the Faqih (Nazarat).[6] This concept is also developed by the young Hojjat-ol Islam Mohsen Kadivar, recently jailed by a clerical court.[7] Under this interpretation, the role of the Faqih should only be to check the conformity of the laws with Islam. Kadivar even shows that Khomeini himself was in favor, before the revolution, of Nazarat and not Velayat, which was probably his worst crime in the eyes of conservatives. To buttress his claims, Kadivar provided critical inquiries about key references on the Velayat-e Faqih in Shia thought, and illustrated how none of them could establish the present definition.[8]

Thus, what emerges is a convergence of the critics, against the Velayat-e Faqih. Yet, to abolish it would trigger a political conflict and entail a severe backlash from the Guide and his supporters. Consequently, what seems to be developing is a gradual amalgamation of views between traditionalists and liberals, to slowly void the position of most of its power and confer upon the Guide a role of “moral consciousness.” In other words, the Guide is evolving into the guarantor of the institutions that have limited his role, as the British and Scandinavian monarchies did some time ago. The result might be a kind of“constitutional theocracy.” Opponents of the Velayat-e Faqih rely on the fact that the concept, as established by the constitution, stresses more than ever the political nature of the Islamic Revolution. They claim that if politics were to prevail, then democracy would be the best regime.

Faced with this growing criticism, the conservative faction has adopted a clear strategy to counter-attack. To concentrate the debate on the defense of the Velayat-e Faqih, and to establish its prevalence against all other institutions, namely the presidency and the parliament, conservative leaders have adopted new strategies. In short, their aim is to dissociate “God’s sovereignty” from the people’s sovereignty, whereas the constitution is based on the idea that there can be no real rift between the two. A call for the restoration of the absolute Velayate Faqih is a convenient way for them to dismiss or ignore the massive electoral support for liberal forces and to openly call the Guide to dismiss the president and dissolve parliament. Thus, defense of the Velayat-e Faqih is the only way to play on constitutional tools to defeat liberal arguments. Conservatives would favor a “constitutional coup d’etat,” because the Guide—presumably accepting this strategy—has the constitutional right to dismiss both president and parliament. Indeed, Ayatollahs Emami Kashani and Misbahi Yazdi are leading a vocal campaign in support of the Velayat-e Faqih, precisely to achieve such an outcome. Ayatollah All Akbar Meshkhani went so far as to declare that the Guide had the same powers that the Prophet and the imams enjoyed,[9] whereas Ayatollah Javadi Amoli claimed that people needed a tutor cqayyem) and that democracy was not in Islam.[10]

* The Debate on Islam, Fiqh, and Secularization

Another issue of concern to the current debate is the one around various interpretations of Fiqh. Ayatollah Mojtahed Shabestari, Hojjat-ol Islam Mohsen Kadivar, Hassan Yusuf Eshkevari, and Mohsen Said Zadeh, in particular, have initiated a debate about the need to “modernize” Fiqh. To buttress their arguments, they rely on an already classical feature, namely the distinction between the “message” of Islam and the sociopolitical conditions of its expression. The present Fiqh, they argue, has largely been inherited from an Arab Bedu (tribal and patriarchal) society and should be rationalized through ijtihad, taking into account sociocultural changes. Said Zadeh, for example, has concentrated on laws pertaining to women, and insists on the absolute equality between the sexes.[11]

Interestingly, enough of these “new theologians” (.Kalam-e Nd) are close to a fundamental principle of the Iranian revolution, namely the historicization of Islam. Still, the Guide, who should be conscious of his time (agah he zaman), and even Imam Khomeini—who stressed the prevalence of politics over the pillars of religion—seem to have been overtaken by the new theologians.[12] Importantly, the new theologians rely on the intellectual tools familiar to Shia religious thinking, namely reason, ijtihad, maslahah, to further strengthen their various interpretations.

But they also go further than advocating a mere reformation of Fiqh. Without a doubt, they argue that secularization is not contradictory to Islam, but good for it. By advancing such arguments, they clearly cut whatever ties they may have had with the Islamic Revolution. Mojtahed Shabestari claims the sacred should be spared from involvement in daily politics. For him, the mundane is the realm of imperfection, fmitude, errors, and approximation, and since all prophets tried to disentangle the sacred from the customs and institutions of a given society, so must the Iranian. Moreover, the relation to God is a purely spiritual one, and it is a matter of faith—even of individual faith. It is based on a personal choice, and its values are solid because it is a personal choice, a selfconscious choice (entekhab-e agahane).[13] It is clear that this theological vision of religion, as a personal and free choice, is congruent with the political choice of democracy and elections. In this connection, President Mohammed Khatami’s reference to “puritans” stresses what is common between democracy and religion: that a religious civil society, which agrees that politics and religion should be separated, but where everybody is supposed to a believer, is the preferred option.

Against this strong argument, conservative elements within Iranian society could not tolerate such a blatant attack, not only against the concept of an Islamic State, but also against the traditional perception of Fiqh. A clerical court quickly sentenced both Kadivar and Said Zadeh to jail terms after they publicized their “heretical” views—as was Abdollah Nouri, the former minister of the interior, in October 1999. The fact that Nouri was a cleric did not spare him from the wrath of religious puritans.

Nevertheless, the reliance on clerical courts has also drawn criticism from traditional circles, even if few endorse the ideas of the “new theologians.” Ayatollahs Youssof Sana’y and Abdol Karim Musavi Ardebili, for example, condemned the sentencing ofAbdollah Nouri. Perhaps this was due to the tradition of intellectual debates among Shia clergymen, but it was also a sign of the excesses many perceived. In this instance, as well, it is easy to identify a rapprochement between traditionalists and liberals, to resist conservative encroachments on civil liberties.

* Conclusion

As a consequence of the overlapping debate between the Velayat-e Faqih and Fiqh, conservatives appear effectively conservative in terms of religious thinking, although they themselves refer to a new concept, that of the Velayat-e Faqih. Without explicitly declaring it, conservative arguments differ from Ayatollah Khomeini’s well-known views, with Shariah being subordinate to the political context. Hence the difficult position of the conservatives who tend to fall back on perennial arguments, or who stress the fidelity to a historical event, the Islamic Revolution, to buttress meager claims. What they engage in, however, is a pure oscillation between political ideology and mere neo-fundamentalism.

During the course of the past few years, the debate between so-called liberals and conservatives in Iran has been sharper because of the input that lay philosophers, like Abdul-Karim Soroush, have introduced. Today, religious thinking is encroaching on the clergy's monopoly of religious discourse. The "corporate" identity of the clergy is again at stake, given that the religious debate is no longer a monopoly of learned—and not so learned—clerics. The fact that some clerics express their views in the dozens ofjournals and magazines that flourish in Iran has also contributed to "de-specialization" of the religious debate. It has also opened it for public discussion. Even if liberal clerics are sometimes ambivalent about such a level of openness—Mohsen Kadivar rarely misses the opportunity to stress his religious credentials against the lay Abdul-Karim Soroush, for exampie, even when their views are not dissimilar—it is clear that the religious debate is linked to the political one, not only because of the conceptual issues involved, including the thorny Velayat-e Faqih, but also because it has now spread outside traditional religious schools. It must be emphasized that secularization and democracy have permanently changed the patterns of religious debates.

In this context, the conservatives, by definition, lack a popular and secular audience. Many tend to entrench themselves in their religious institutions. An ultra-conservative cleric, like Misbahi Yazdi in his "rah-e haqq" religious school, for example, advocates violence against the new enemies of Islam (mahareb). Importantly, Misbahi Yazdi has been challenged by the minister of culture—and was invited to face a televised public debate with him on the topic—which, in and of itself, is another break with the traditional pattern of dispute settlement among clerics.

Thus, and although the Iranian context is very different from currents in the rest of the Muslim world, it is clear that the debate among fundamentalists, traditionalists, and liberals in the Islamic Republic touches on the same issues: the evolving roles of the Shariah, women, individualization, the crisis of religious education, and self-proclamation of religious competence, among others. Nevertheless, the Iranian debate is not reflected in the rest of the Muslim world. While the revolutionary writings of Imam Khomeini and Ayatollah Morteza Mottahari, for example, have been largely translated and published (by the Iranian state itself, specifically in Arabic), nothing has actually happened—as far as the liberals are concerned—to encourage change. No translations of Mohsen Kadi-var or Abdul-Karim Soroush seem to be available in Arabic as of today, thereby limiting the exposure of non-Persian-speaking Muslims to this lively debate. Still, the revolution in Iran is too embedded in the political discourses to appear as a reflection on Islam, but it is clear that the ongoing intellectual contentions have a more general meaning for the whole Muslim world.

[1] Scholars like Said Arjomand would probably refuse to call “revolutionary” what they see as a conservative movement. See Said Amir Arjomand, The Turban and the Crown: The Islamic Revolution in Iran, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988. But for others, and me, the Islamic Revolution is much more. It is the heir to Third World progressive movements of the mid-nineteenth century rather than a mere product of a clerical movement.

[2] For a thorough discussion of the Velayat-e Faqih, as well as the bases for the present discussion, see Shahrough Akhavi, “Contending Discourses on Shi’i Law on the Doctrine of Velayat-e Faqih,” Iranian Studies 29:3–4, summer-fall 1996, pp. 262–65.

[3] Olivier Roy, “The Crisis of Religious Legitimacy in Iran,” The Middle East journal 53:2, spring 1999, pp. 201–16. See also Akhavi, op. cit., pp. 262–65.

[4] Roy, op. cit., pp. 201–16.

[5] On the published proceedings of the committee in charge of drafting the constitution and on its internal debates, see Asghar Shirazi, “The Constitution of Iran,” Politics and the State in the Islamic Republic, London: I. B. Tauris, 1998, chapters 2 and 3. On Makarem Shirazi’s views, see page 46 in ibid.

[6] Hossein Ali Montazeri, Derasat fi Velayat-e Faqih va Fiqh-ol Dowlat-ol Eslamiya [Lectures on the Velayat-e Faqih and Islamic State Law], published in Qom, and summarized in “Nazarat-e Faqih” [Supervision of the Jurisconsult], Rahe Now, number 18,31/5/1377 (1998).

[7] Mohsen Kadivar, Nazarieha-ye Dowlat Dar Fiqh-e Shie [The Views on the State in Shia Law], Ney Publishers, 1376 (1996–97). See also Mohsen Kadivar, “Hokoumat-e Valai,” Rahe Now, number 15,10/5/1377 (1997–98).

[8] Mohsen Kadivar, “Hokoumat-e Valai, Barrasi-e Maghbouley-e Omar Ibn-e Hanzale,” Rahe Now, number 18,31/5/1377 (July 1998).

[9] Resalat, 16/10/1376 (January 1998).

[10] Keyhan, 24/8/1376 (November 1997).

[11] For a summary of his views, see Seyyed Mohsen Said-Zadeh, “Man-az Moddaiyane Eslam Vahame Daram” [I Am Afraid of Those Who Claim (to Know) Islam], Jame-ye Salem, 8/1376. See also “Beja-ye Tamdid, Dar Qanoun-e (Diyeh) Tajdid-e Nazar Konid” [Do Not Extend but Reconsider the Law of Diyeh (blood-price)], Zanan, 5/1376 (1996).

[12] A famous case is that of the prohibition of the pilgrimage in 1987, to protest the alleged killings of Iranian pilgrims by the Saudi police.

[13] In this instance, entekhab means “election.” See Mohammad Mojtahed Shabestari, “Shera Bayad Andishey-e Dini ra Naghd Kard?” [Why Should One Apply Critical Analysis to Religious Thinking?], Kian, number 18,1-2/1373 (1994).

 Chapter 2: Reformists, Conservatives, and Iran’s 2000 Parliamentary Elections

Shaul Bakhash

In February 2000, a reformist coalition supporting President Mohammad Khatami won a sweeping victory in Iran’s Majlis, or parliamentary, elections. The reformists in the incoming Majlis seemed strategically poised to carry out an ambitious agenda to expand political freedoms, strengthen oversight of governmental organizations, and break the monopoly exercised by a small faction in the ruling group over power and the economy. But within weeks of the election, and even before the new Majlis convened, the country experienced a powerful conservative backlash. Virtually the entire reformist press was closed down, reformist journalists were arrested, and institutions such as the judiciary, the Council of Guardians, and the authority of the Leader himself were brought into play to block the reformist agenda. The Majlis election thus proved to be a key moment in the contest between reformers and conservatives that had been triggered by Khatami’s election as president in 1997. The election and its aftermath, in addition, proved a revealing moment in the history of the Islamic Republic. Political factions articulated their ideologies, programs, and visions for Iran’s future. In voting, Iranians expressed their preferences among these competing visions. In both the election and the fierce political tug of war that followed it, political factions and the institutions of the state tested their relative strengths and political acumen. The post-election political struggle exposed the political and constitutional fault lines in the Islamic Republic.

* The Khatami Presidency

The issues at stake in the Majlis election are best understood against the background of developments during the first three years of Khatami’s presidency. Khatami was elected president in 1997 with a substantial majority. He galvanized voters by stressing the rule of law, protection of the rights and privacy of Iranians, tolerance for a variety of views, and openness to the outside world. As president, he eased restrictions on the print media, while his minister of culture, Ataollah Mohajerani, issued dozens of licenses for new newspapers and magazines, giving rise to a flourishing and vibrant press in which major political issues were debated. Book publishing and cultural activity received a new lease on life. Greater freedom of association allowed older political and professional associations to renew activity and new ones to be established. In 1999, for the first time in the history of the Islamic Republic, elections were held for village, town, and city councils, creating thousands of representative bodies at the local level, although it remained to be seen how effective these councils would prove in practice. Khatami insisted on the removal of the notorious minister of intelligence (state security), Ali Fallahian, who had been implicated in the assassination of Iranian dissidents abroad and intellectuals and opposition figures at home.

Khatami also brought about significant change in foreign policy. He improved relations with the Arab states of the Persian Gulf. Saudi Arabia’s Heir Apparent Abdallah became the highest Saudi official to visit Iran since the Islamic Revolution when he attended the Organization of Islamic Conference summit in Teheran in December 1997—an indication Khatami was able to generate much greater trust in Iran’s intentions among the Gulf states. In September 1979, Khatami paved the way for improved relations with European countries by giving the EU written assurances that Iran had no intention of enforcing the death sentence that Iran’s late leader, Ayatollah Khomeini, had pronounced in 1989 against the British writer Salman Rushdie. Rushdie’s novel, The Satanic Verses, contained passages Khomeini had deemed insulting to Islam. The “death edict,” which no previous Iranian leader had dared explain away, had bedeviled Iran-EU relations for nearly a decade. In a television interview with CNN in January 1998, Khatami invited Americans to join Iranians in a “thoughtful dialogue,” clearly an attempt to begin the process of repairing an 18 ear estrangement between the two countries.

Except for improvement of relations with Europe and the Persian Gulf states, these measures met with stiff resistance from the clerical conservatives and their allies. Khatami faced opposition in the Majlis, where conservatives could usually muster a majority. Although Khatami named the cabinet, the principal levers of power, including the judiciary, the intelligence agencies, national radio and television, and the military and security services—the ministry of intelligence, the police, the Revolutionary Guards, the army and the Basijو a paramilitary force used for crowd control and internal security—came under the purview of the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Khamenei tended to side with the conservatives.

Teheran’s powerful and popular mayor, Gholam Hosain Karbaschi, who had helped engineer Khatami’s electoral victory, was put on trial in 1998 on specious corruption charges, sentenced to five years in jail, and barred from holding public office for 20 years. In June 1998, the Majlis by a no-confidence vote secured the dismissal of Khatami’s interior minister, Abdollah Nouri. The conservatives considered him too lenient in issuing permits for public meetings and the formation of political and professional associations. When Nuri went on to publish a new and outspoken newspaper, Khordadو he was tried and sentenced to five years imprisonment for violating Islamic sanctities. The Majlis also attempted but failed to oust Khatami’s minister of culture, Mohajerani. The clerical thinker Mohsen Kadivar was tried and sentenced to 18 months in jail for articles that questioned the extensive powers and prerogatives claimed for the Leader in the Islamic Republic.

The judiciary closed down several of the new reform-minded papers supportive of Khatami, although the clampdown initially proved ineffective due to Mohajerani’s liberality in granting newspaper publishing licenses. For example, when the first of the popular reformist papers, Jameeh, was closed down in summer 1998, it reappeared in two days with an identical format, editorial staff, and reporters but under a different name, Tus. When Tus was shut down, it reappeared under yet a third name. (The newspaper was to undergo five name transformations before the judicial authorities shut it down for good in the year 2000.) The conservatives deployed a club- and chain-wielding vigilante group, the Ansar-e Hezbollah, or the Helpers of the Party of God, to break up reformist meetings and lectures. Nouri and Mohajerani were assaulted and insulted by Ansar operatives in September 1998, after leaving Friday prayers on the Teheran University campus.

In winter 1998 a number of intellectuals and opposition leaders were mysteriously killed, some in their own homes. However, the press persisted in pursuing the issue of the “serial killings,” as they came to be called, and Khatami insisted on an investigation. The intelligence ministry was finally forced to admit its own agents were responsible for the murders, although it claimed these operatives were acting without authorization. The principal intelligence agent accused in the case, Said Emami, was in jail awaiting trial when the authorities announced he had committed suicide by drinking a bottle of hair removal preparation. The secret killings stopped, but in March 2000 there was a nearly successful assassination attempt against Said Hajjarian, a key adviser to Khatami and one of the leading thinkers of the reform movement. Earlier, in July 1999, when students protested the closure of another reformist newspaper, Salaamو police forces and Ansar club-wielders joined in an attack on Teheran University dormitories. The dormitories were trashed and several students injured. Meantime, Leader Khamenei largely aborted Khatami’s initiative toward the U.S. by ruling out negotiations or relations with America.

The conservatives also used the pulpit, Friday sermons, and newspapers to denounce Khatami’s policies, although the president was rarely mentioned by name. One leading cleric suggested that those defending freedom really wanted a passport for sexual license. “In legislation, Islam and democracy cannot in any way be reconciled,” he asserted. Another cleric accused the supporters of the president of pursuing “Satanic” goals. In remarks made to a closed meeting of Revolutionary Guards officers and leaked to the press, the Guards commander, General Rahim Safavi, said liberals were in control of the universities, clerics had become agents of deceit, and the liberal press was undermining national security. “Our tongue is our sword,” he said, and warned that the Guards would have to “cut the throats and tongues” of those who were undermining the regime.[14]

The country prepared for the election to the sixth Majlis against this background of intense rivalry between elements supporting and opposing Khatami and his reforms.

* The 2000 Majlis Election

The 2000 election was mainly a contest between two loose coalitions. Some 18 political parties and groups came together as the 2nd Khordad Front, taking their name from the date in May, 1997 when Khatami was elected president. Some 15 conservative organizations came together as the Followers of the Line of the Imam and the Leader, indicating by their choice of name their devotion to both the founder of the Islamic Republic, Imam Khomeini, and the current leader, Khamenei. The 2nd Khordad Front was led by the Islamic Iran Participation Front (IIPF), headed by Reza Khatami, the president's brother. It included the Executives of Construction, a centrist political group of high-level civil servants and technocrats with close ties to former president Rafsanjani.

The Executives of Construction had come together to contest the 1996 Majlis elections and supported Khatami's 1997 presidential bid. Although they joined hands with other Khatami supporters for the 2000 election, there were differences between the Khatami camp and the Rafsanjani "Executives." Unlike those closest to Khatami, the Executives of Construction emphasized economic rather than political reform. Rafsanjani and a number of other prominent figures supported by the Executives were not popular with the Khatami reformers. Khatami's Islamic Iran Participation Front and the Servants of Construction agreed to support common lists of candidates in the provinces; but they went their separate ways on candidate lists in Teheran. The 2nd Khordad Front also included the Society of Militant Clerics, one of the two principal clerical organizations in the country, and the Mujahedin of the Islamic Revolution. In the past, both these groups had been identified with the left, were hostile to the private sector, and favored strong state control of the economy and wealth-distribution measures in favor of the poor. But both groups claimed they had moved to center in their political and economic views.

The Followers of the Line of the Imam and the Leader were led by the country's principal clerical organization, the Association of Combatant Clerics of Teheran (not to be confused with the Society of Militant Clerics), which had dominated the Majlis and the principal offices of state for a decade and more and included various Islamic associations. The coalition also included other groups and organizations: the Mo'talefah group, the Moderation and Unity Party, Ckekad-e Azad-Aniskan, 6-اهلالاس۱ھل Isafran-e Enqelab-e Islami.

A third group, calling itself the “nationalist-religious union” and composed primarily of centrist intellectuals and professionals who were not at home (or not accepted in) either of these two large coalitions, also contested the election. The group included many prominent figures, including those associated with the Iran Liberation Movement. But its candidates did not make a strong showing in the subsequent balloting. A number of independents also ran for seats.

Each of the two large coalitions represented a spectrum of political views, and neither coalition issued a detailed platform. Nevertheless, for the voters, the choices were, in a general way, clear. The 2nd Khordad reformists ran as the agents of change, the conservatives as the defenders of the status quo. The reformists promised an expansion of press and political freedoms; the conservatives opposed such a policy. The reformists emphasized the primacy of the Majlis, political parties, and civic associations; the conservatives emphasized the authority of the Leader and institutions under conservative control, such as the Revolutionary Guards, the Council of Guardians, and the judiciary. The reformers wished to curb, the conservatives to maintain, the power of the Council of Guardians to bar “unqualified” candidates from running for elected office. The reformers appeared to desire an official dialogue with America; the conservatives opposed such talks.

On voting day, the voter turnout, at around 70 percent, was high; voters by a large majority supported the Khatami reformists.

* The Conservatives Feel Threatened

The conservatives had good reason to feel disquiet at the election results. They reflected an almost wholesale rejection of the conservatives and the status quo and an embrace of the idea of change and reform. Of 290 Majlis seats, 224 were decided in the first round. (Candidates need 25 percent of the vote to win in the first round; if there is no clear winner, the two top vote-getters for each seat go on to a second round.) The 2nd Khordad coalition and the centrist Executives secured a majority of seats and were expected to solidify this majority in second-round elections in the 66 constituencies where there was no clear winner.[15] The Islamic Iran Participation Front, the political group headed by Khatami's brother, and its allies secured the largest single bloc of votes in the new Majlis. In the all-important Teheran constituency, the reformist coalition won 29 of 30 seats. It made almost a clean sweep of other large cities, including Isfahan, Mashad, and Shiraz. The protest nature of the vote was unmistakable, at least in Teheran. The candidate with the highest number of votes in the capital, with over 60 percent of the total votes cast, was President Khatami's brother, a political unknown until the election campaign. The second highest number of votes in Teheran went to another political novice, All Reza Nouri, brother of former interior minister Abdollah Nouri, who had lost his ministerial post and subsequently went to prison for his liberal policies and views. Jamileh Kadivar, who secured the third highest number of votes, was the sister of the dissident cleric Mohsen Kadivar.

Even more striking was the rout of the conservatives and the rejection of the status quo. Only 70 incumbents were reelected. Fewer than 35 of those elected were clerics. Some of the most prominent conservatives, including Mohammad Reza Bahonar, Hasan Ruhani, and Mohammad Ali Movahedi-Kermani, all three- and four-term Majlis deputies, failed to be reelected. Bahonar was deputy Speaker and a majority leader in the fourth and the outgoing fifth Majlis. Ruhani was an influential member of parliament's foreign affairs committee and secretary-general of the powerful National Security Council. Generally respected, he too fell victim to the anti-establishment sentiments of the electorate. Movahedi-Kermani, the Leader's personal representative to the Revolutionary Guards, was defeated, as were several other multi-term deputies, singled out because they had led the opposition to Khatami's policies and ministers.

Former intelligence minister Fallahian and former Revolutionary Guards commander Mohsen Rezai culled few votes.

Particularly striking was the fate of Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani. The two-term former president (1989–97) and former speaker of the Majlis (1980–89) was until 1997 regarded as the second most powerful man in Iran. As president, he had nurtured a reputation as a pragmatist and a centrist; and in his first term as president, he liberalized economic policy and eased up on social (but not political) controls. He helped keep out of parliament and eventually neutralize the radicals on the left. But his policies were not always popular with the hardliners in the Majlis. Rafsanjani's lieutenants formed the Executives of Construetion to contest the 1996 Majlis elections because the conservative and politically dominant Association of Combatant Clerics of Teheran refused to allow Rafsanjani to include a few of his own choices on a common list of candidates for Teheran. As already noted, the Executives, headed by Teheran mayor Karbaschi, had helped ensure Khatami's electoral victory in 1997.

However, Rafsanjani's standing among reformists and Iranians hungry for change deteriorated during his second term as president, when he failed to stand up to the conservatives as they tightened political and social controls. His family was believed to be involved in lucrative business enterprises. He had done nothing in 1994–96, when several prominent writers were found dead in mysterious circumstances. He grew critical of the reformers, and identified increasingly with the conservatives, as the reformist movement gained breadth and depth under Khatami and reformists began to talk of fundamental change in the political system. When he announced his candidacy for the 2000 parliament, he claimed to be above factional politics. But reformers saw him as the conservatives' secret weapon. They believed he would be elected speaker of the new Majlis and rein in the reform movement. The identification with the conservatives badly hurt Rafsanjani. He barely squeaked into the Majlis, coming in 27th among Teheran's 30 deputies. Widespread rumors suggested that only tampering with the vote count allowed him to be elected at all. His daughter, Faezeh Hashemi, who in 1996 secured the second highest number of votes in Teheran, failed to get elected at all, finishing a humiliating 54th, primarily because during the campaign, she had supported her father and attacked her father's critics in the reformist camp.

* The Reformist Agenda

Two other sources of concern for the conservatives were the reformist agenda and the role of the reformist press. Members of the reformist majority in the incoming Majlis announced an agenda that threatened to consolidate the political opening made possible under Khatami and to challenge the centers of power still controlled by the conservatives, including the judiciary, the intelligence agencies, the Council of Guardians, the Revolutionary Guards, and the bonyads, the parastatal foundations that own hundreds of expropriated industries and enterprises. The bonyads played a significant role in the economy. Reluctant to give up their own lucrative holdings, they acted as a barrier to privatization. They were suspected of siphoning off funds to leading clerics, which were then used for patronage purposes. Yet they gave no public accounting of their operations.

Reports in the reformist press and statements by incoming reformist deputies suggested that the new Majlis would pass laws to guarantee greater freedom of the press, assembly, and association and to ease the formation of political parties; exercise Majlis oversight of the ministry of intelligence and national radio and television, whose news coverage was one-sided and favored the conservatives; look into the sources of wealth of high officials (many of whom were clerics); insist on transparency and accountability in the bonyads; and end involvement of the security agencies, the Revolutionary Guards, and other organizations in business and profitmaking operations. Deputies suggested the Majlis would conduct its own investigations into the “serial killings” of 1998, the attack on Student dormitories in the summer of 1999, and the March 2000 attempt on the life of Said Hajjarian.

The new Majlis was also expected to attempt to de-politicize the judiciary and to reform or do away with the special press and clerical courts—institutions used by the conservatives to shut down newspapers, jail dissidents, and stifle criticism; to eliminate what they described as “multiple centers of power,” a clear reference to the tendency of official and quasi-official organizations and individual clerics to pursue private agendas not approved by the cabinet; and to restrict the authority of the Council of Guardians to disqualify candidates running for public office.[16]

* Role of the Press

The reformist press had become a powerful instrument in the reformers' arsenal. True, several newspapers, including Resalat و Jomhuri-ye Islami, Kayhan و and Abrar, spoke for the conservative cause. But the new reformist papers dominated the political discourse and captured the readers' imagination. Despite bans and closures, the circulation enjoyed by a succession of reformist newspapers— jameek, Neshat, Kbrdad, Bahar, Entekkab, Gunagun, Sobh-e Emruz, 'Asr-e Azadegan, Fath, Mosharekat, and others—far exceeded the circulation of the conservative dailies. A group of articulate and talented commentators wrote for the reformist press. These commentators helped popularize ideas regarding civil society, individual rights, judicial reform, accountability of officials and state institutions, transparency of government operations, and a degree of separation of state and religion. They called for an end to the clerical monopoly of power. They played an important watchdog role, drawing attention to excesses of the security agencies or what they regarded as the politicized nature of the courts. For example, unlike the conservative newspapers, the reformist press gave wide publicity to Nouri's spirited defense during his trial, and they extensively reported the wreckage caused by security forces at Teheran University student dormitories during the summer 1999 attack. When the police commander and 17 officers charged and tried for the dormitory attack were acquitted, the reformist press expressed astonishment and outrage.

These newspapers served as quasi-official party organs (as did those on the right), publicizing the reformist cause and helping bring about the reformist victory. Broadly speaking, the reformist press, along with the reformist parties, offered an alternative to the ruling conservative clerics and their system of rule. Articles by the well-known commentator Akbar Ganji, in Sobh-e Emruz and Asr-eAzadegan, appeared to have particularly grave implications for the regime and some of its most prominent figures. Ganji indirectly implicated shadowy elements in the ministry of intelligence, other security agencies, and the Revolutionary Guards, as well as unnamed senior officials and clerics, in the 1998 "serial killings," the attempt on Hajjarian's life, and earlier murders of intellectuals and political dissidents. Ganji hinted at clerics who issued fatwas, or religious decrees, sanctioning killings and wrote of “grey eminences” and “shadowy figures” who met in dark rooms to agree on eliminating intellectuals and political figures. Ganji seemed specifically to target Rafsanjani, during whose presideney, unresolved killings had taken place.[17]

After the Majlis election, several other journalists took up this issue. The well-known columnist Emad ad-Din Baqi extensively echoed Ganji’s charges in Fath. Hamid-Reza Jala’ipur, criticizing the judiciary for lack of objectivity in trials of journalists and dissidents, referred to attempts of a “secret government” and “a government within a government” to stifle reform.[18] Addressing Rafsanjani, Sadeq Zibakalam wrote in another article: “The nation wants to hear from you [as to] what happened to 70–80 [killed] writers and political opponents over the last ten years. On the command of which person or official were they murdered?”[19] Such charges found their way into the provincial press.[20] Even an adviser to President Khatami talked of “forces unknown to the president” who, he said, were carrying out actions that damaged the government at home and abroad.[21]

Finally, a freer press posed the danger that the extensive powers and prerogatives of the Leader himself would become a subject for discussion, giving rise to demands to circumscribe them. Early in the Khatami presidency, student leaders and columnists had spoken of the desirability of curtailing, or defining more clearly, the powers of the Leader, limiting his tenure (he is now selected for life), and subjecting his conduct in office to greater scrutiny. Although public discussions of this highly sensitive and explosive issue had practically ended by 1999, nevertheless the question of the Leader’s virtually unlimited powers loomed in the background; and there was fear in the Leader’s and the conservative camp that it would be raised again. In 1997, for example, Rahe Now published an essay by Ayatollah Qasem Khoi that seemed to question the need for a supreme religious guide. In 1998, the reformist press carried a statement by Ayatollah Hossein-Ali Montazeri, a cleric prominent in the first decade of the revolution but now out of favor and under house arrest, criticizing the extent to which the Leader interfered in state affairs. In February 2000, in an interview with an Arabic-language newspaper, Sharq al-Awsat, Montazeri condemned “dictatorship by a certain faction that has monopolized Islam and taken to describing its opponents as heretics and infidels," and said the people have a right to elect, depose, limit the term of, and restrict the power of the Leader.[22]

* The Conservative Response

Initially, the conservatives appeared to be licking their wounds, disoriented by the sheer size of their electoral defeat. The conservative parliamentary leader, Bahonar, said he and his colleagues needed to take stock of the election results, review the mistakes they had made, and prepare for the next elections. In a Friday sermon on March 3, Ayatollah Jannati, the secretary of the Council of Guardians, urged all Iranians to accept the election verdict: "Some will be satisfied ... and some will be unhappy," he said, "but everybody should accept the results without 'ifs' and 'buts'."[23]

But hardliners in the conservative camp appear to have concluded that the threat posed by the reformist victory and its implications was too serious to be ignored and to have succeeded in shaping the conservative response. The sharp conservative backlash that began in the spring took several forms. The conservatives used the judiciary to close down reformist newspapers and to jail, harass, and silence reformist journalists, intellectuals, and lawyers. The outgoing Majlis put in place supportive legislation. The Council of Guardians attempted to alter the election results and weaken the reformist control of the new Majlis. Conservative clerics and newspapers launched a propaganda campaign designed to depict the most outspoken reformers as a threat to Islam, the revolution, and the security of the state. Finally, the Council of Guardians and the Leader came up with constitutional interpretations and claims designed severely to curtail parliament's authority.

Aware that Khatami and the reformers were very popular among the younger generation, the outgoing Majlis had already raised the voting age from 16 to 17 in the lead-up to the election. In its dying days, in early April, the Majlis approved a new and highly restrictive press law. The judiciary then used this law to move against the reformist press. On April 23, the judicial authorities closed down eight dailies, four weeklies, and one monthly, including Sobh-e Emruzو Fathو and Iran-e Farda. On April 27, they shut down Asr-e Azadegan and Mosharekat, followed by Bayan in June and Bahar in August. A number of provincial papers were closed as well. In a period of ten weeks, over 20 publications, virtually the entire reformist press, were suppressed. On June 18, over 150 deputies, a majority, in the new Majhs, signed a letter to the chief of thejudiciary asking him to end the newspaper closures, to reverse orders of closure, and to respect the right of journalists to freely express their opinion (by now several journalists had been arrested or faced charges). But the judiciary chief rejected their demands.

In addition to closing down publications, the judiciary tried and jailed several of the most outspoken journalists and editors, including Mashallah Shams ol-Va’ezain, editor of ‘هرSH Azadegan; Latif-Safari, the editor of the banned newspaper Neshat; and Emad ad-Din Baqi of Fath. Shams ol-Va’ezain was sentenced to 30 months, Latif-Safari to 27 months, Baqi to five and a half years. Ganji was jailed in June, pending trial. These journalists generally faced a clutch of charges for writing or publishing articles that allegedly violated Islamic sanctities, undermined state security, incited readers against the institutions of the state, and “confused” public opinion. Often, a complaint by another (conservative) newspaper, or an institution like the Revolutionary Guards, claiming it had been misrepresented or defamed, was enough to trigger charges, arrest, and trial. Between March and August, several other editors and journalists were summoned by the judicial authorities to answer charges or questions in the preliminary stages of an investigation.[24] Although these preliminary interrogations did not necessarily lead to formal charges and trial, they were clearly intended to intimidate the journalists and warn off others.

In April, judicial officials also cracked down on ten or more Iranian intellectuals, lawyers, and journalists and one cleric who attended an academic conference on Iran at the Heinrich Boll Institute in Berlin. At the conference, several of the participants made remarks mildly critical of aspects of the Islamic Republie or conservative policies. For example, Mehrangiz Kar, a lawyer and women’s rights activist, spoke of legal discrimination against women in Iran. Hassan Yusef Eshkevari, the cleric, argued for the possibility of an Islam compatible with pluralism, democracy, and religious tolerance. Ganji spoke of the agenda and prospects of the reform movement in Iran. All had expressed similar views, orally or in writing, in Iran. But the judiciary now found their views grounds for possible prosecution. In addition, Iranian exiles and dissident groups in Europe had crashed the conference, attempted to disrupt it with verbal interruptions and displays of nudity, and expressing strong opposition to the Islamic Republic. (They also condemned the Iranian participants as collaborators in a reprehensible regime.) Film footage of these activities was widely disseminated on Iranian television; and the participants were condemned by clerics and the conservative press for attending a conference featuring “immoral” activity and attacks on the Islamic Republic. All this served as grounds for additional charges. Almost all the participants were interrogated upon return. Several spent various periods in prison. Over ten of the participants were subsequently put on trial. Six were sentenced to prison terms of 4 to 10 years. Eshkevari was separately tried by the special clerics court and found guilty of “waging war against God” and insulting Islam, crimes that carry the death sentence. Ganji, tried separately by the press court, was sentenced to 10 years in prison and an additional 5 years in internal exile, although an appeals court reduced the prison term to 6 months and overturned the judgment on internal exile. Conservative clerics, politicians, and press used the conference for a broader attack on the whole reform movement.[25]

In June, two lawyers, Shirin Ebadi and Mohsen Rahami, were arrested on charges of taping and disseminating allegedly false allegations made by Farshad Ebrahimi, a self-confessed member ofAnsar-e Hezbollah. In the long and rambling tape (whose contents subsequently received wide publicity), Ebrahimi described his own participation and that of other Ansar elements in breaking up student and reformist meetings. He alleged that in the early 1990s, the Ansar received encouragement and financial assistance, variously, from senior clerics, nationally prominent leaders of hardline conservative political groups, and senior interior ministry officials. He claimed presence at meetings, or personal knowledge of meetings, at which senior clerics and police and security officials had discussed means of causing unrest to undermine Khatami and the 2nd Khordad movement and where the killing of reformists and dissidents was described as religiously permissible.[26]

None of the allegations could be independently confirmed; but the tape or its transcript, clandestinely and widely disseminated, caused a sensation. Ebrahimi appeared to corroborate the allegations made by Ganji, Baqi, and others of clandestine groups in the security agencies and government, or close to the centers of conservative power, who were plotting against the reform movement. Ebadi had agreed to serve as Ebrahimi's lawyer. Rahami (who had served as Nouri's lawyer) was acting on behalf students injured by the police during the summer 1999 Teheran University dormitory attack. Both lawyers cited duty to clients to explain why they taped Ebrahimi's remarks. By their own account, they had in any case immediately turned over Ebrahimi's tape to the authorities. But Ebadi and Rahami were tried behind closed doors in July on charges of disseminating falsehoods and endangering the security of the state, and were each barred for 5 years from practicing law.

The Council of Guardians meantime nullified the election results in nine constituencies, all seats won by reformists. In three other constituencies, it cancelled a number of ballot boxes, throwing the election to the conservative rather than the previously announced reformist candidate. These decisions led to disturbances in Gachsaran, Arak, Firuzkuh, Khalkhal, and other towns. The Council of Guardians also alleged improprieties in the Teheran elections, where the interior ministry had given the reformist list 29 of the 30 Teheran seats. It began a time-consuming and indecisive recount of the ballots, which it proved unable to complete, and repeatedly delayed announcing the Teheran results. Finally, on May 18, three months after the election and only a week before the new Majlis was to open, the Council of Guardians wrote the Leader that it was unable to validate the Teheran ballot due to irregularities. Khamenei, however, citing time constraints and other considerations, instructed the Guardians to announce the Teheran results on the basis of their best information to date. The Teheran results, finally endorsed by the Council of Guardians and based on the Guardians' own partial recount and investigation, differed only in two respects from the results originally announced by the interior ministry: A candidate of the "nationalist-religious union" who had been previously confirmed was dropped in favor of a conservative candidate, and Rafsanjani was bumped up from 29th to 20th on the Teheran list. Rafsanjani, unpopular with the reformists and certain he would not be elected speaker, resigned his seat before taking it up.

The interventions of the Council of Guardians reduced the reformist majority but did not materially affect the balance of forces in the new Majlis. In the runoffs, held in early May, the 2nd Khordad Front had won 47 of 66 seats, the conservatives 10, and independents 9, giving the reformers solidly in the Khatami camp a comfortable majority. Estimates differed as to the size of this majority. But when parliament convened at the end of May, with 248 deputies present, analysts generally agreed that the Islamic Iran Participation Front, the president's own party (and itself something of a coalition), had by itself won over 150 seats.[27] The reformers appeared in a position comfortably to shape the legislative agenda.

* The Ideological Counter-Offensive

In the months following the February election, conservative clerics and political figures also used the pulpit and the press to wage an extensive war of words against the reformers. This ideological counter-offensive preceded, then accompanied, the crackdown on the reformist press journalists, and intellectuals and was designed in part to set the stage and provide the rationale for it. The themes of sermons, newspaper articles, and statements by official spokesmen— for example, of the judiciary or the Revolutionary Guards—were similar: Internal enemies posed a threat to Islam, the revolution, and the country's independence. The reformist press was intentionally or inadvertently undermining the people's faith in religion, the institutions of the state, and the revolution itself. The ultimate aim was to divorce religion from governance, to destroy the revolution, and to open the door to foreign domination of the country. "Reform," however attractive in principle, was often a cover for these dangerous ends.

A number of clerics, newspapers, and political figures led this campaign. But the campaign was shaped primarily by Khamenei himself. As Leader, he spoke with the most authoritative voice. In a series of major statements between March and August 2000, he set the tone for the campaign, articulated its major themes, and elaborated its rationale. He clearly feared that the momentum and demand for reform would get out of hand, lead to unrest, or threaten the very essence of the Islamic Republic. Over a period of several months, he gradually elaborated an extensive argument against the drive for a freer press and a more open political system. His speeches and sermons often set the stage for direct action by the judicial authorities. He set down the red lines beyond which criticism would not be tolerated. He said he welcomed competition and reasonable rivalry between the two parliamentary factions. But he took the lead in emphasizing the distinction (common in conservative discourse) between khodi and or “US and them,” “insiders and outsiders,” and “supporters and وghayr-e khodi enemies” of the system. He endorsed the idea of freedom of the press and open debate, but he harshly condemned the reformist press and praised the judiciary that had crushed it. Khamenei initially appeared to support Khatami’s call for economic and administrative reform, but by the summer he was labeling the call for reform a foreign plot to dominate Iran.

In a Friday sermon in April, Khamenei drew a distinction between “legitimate” and “illegitimate” violence. He condemned lawlessness and thuggery as illegitimate uses of violence. But he said the state is justified in using “legitimate violence,” even in applying the death sentence, against lawbreakers and trouble-makers.[28] The sentiments he expressed appeared on the surface unexceptionable—a routine justification of the legal use of force by the state and perhaps even a condemnation of the vigilantism of the right. But Khamenei was also responding to critics of alleged police and judiciary brutality (and perhaps to critics of capital punishment) and laying the ground for the arrest ofjournalists, lawyers, and intellectuals that followed.

Ten days later, Khamenei launched a sharp attack on the press. A dozen or 15 Reformists, Conservatives ... Parliamentary Elections 25 papers, he said, had become the “bases of the enemy” and were “directed from one headquarters.” They were causing “discord and division, spreading disorder, and implanting confusion and pessimism among the people.” They were undermining Islamic sanctities. They were promoting the cause of “enemy agents” and “attempting to discredit faithful, loyal and useful persons” in the Revolutionary Guards, the army, and the Basij forces.[29] The crackdown on the reformist press followed hard on the heels of these remarks. In May, in a sermon devoted largely to the theme of “insiders” and “outsiders,” and in what appeared as an attempt to split the reformist ranks, Khamenei demanded that loyal political groups distance themselves from those he described as enemies of the Islamic Republic. “Dregs of the former regime,” secularists who hadjoined the revolution but never believed in Islamic government, and Iranians supported by “spy networks,” foreign radios, and foreign money, he said, were now “chanting reformist slogans” and talking about “freedom and the rule of the people and democracy.” Their real aim was to change the Islamic nature of the regime and allow “the American masters to take control of our economy, our culture and our social affairs.” Political factions loyal to the regime, he said, “must make their stance clear ... define their borders.”[30]

In other statements, Khamenei defended Council of Guardians’ rulings invalidating elections in certain districts; and he defended the judiciary against critics who questioned its neutrality. These critics, he said, “intend to weaken the judiciary in order to ensure it will not have the power to act.”[31]

In his various statements, Khamenei remained careful to appear supportive of the president, describing him as a pious Muslim, a disciple of Ayatollah Khomeini, and a cleric dedicated to the principles of the Islamic Republic. In the spring, he endorsed the principles of Khatami’s reform program. Although he said nothing of expanding the political space, he underlined the need for administrative and economic rationalization and for dealing with red tape, the over-staffed bureaucracy, and official corruption. However, returning to the reform theme in July, his tone was far less supportive. He cast doubt on the purpose of reforms that, he alleged, were being enthusiastically supported by outside powers, including the United States and England. “What is the enemy’s objective when he expresses support for Iranian reforms?” he asked. The answer: Foreign enemies sought to destabilize and destroy the Islamic Republic, just as they had helped destroy the Soviet Union through Gorbachev’s reforms. Khatami and other officials, he noted, “have repeatedly said our reforms are Islamic and revolutionary. Very well, that is fine. But we need more precise explanations and a clearer picture.”[32]

These themes were reiterated by conservative spokesmen. Rafsanjani defended the newspaper closures. “They are putting freedom before Islam, freedom before faith,” he said. By belittling the regime’s accomplishments, journalists “pave the way for those who want to come in and take over the country.”[33] The Association of the Seminary Teachers ofQom described the reformist press as “mouthpieces and stooges of foreign powers.” In a Friday sermon, Ayatollah Ebrahim Amini asserted, “these newspapers call the Islamic system into question. They call the guardianship of the supreme jurisconsult into question. They sometimes even call Islam into question.”[34] Another senior cleric invited believers to kill unnamed reformers.[35] After Khamenei’s remarks on “legitimate violence,” the Revolutionary Guards issued an official statement calling for unity and warning unnamed “enemies” opposing the regime that they “will feel the reverberating impact of the hammer of the Islamic revolution in their skull ... they will never [again] be able to engage in hatching plots.”[36] The declaration caused considerable alarm. Rumors that the Guards intended to overthrow Khatami grew so widespread that the Guards had to issue a second statement denying they were planning a coup. Clerics and the conservative press took up the distinction Khamenei had made between “Islamic-style” reform which was right for the country, and “American-style” reform which they condemned.

* A New Constitutional Theory

The Council of Guardians and Khamenei also advanced novel interpretations of the constitution. These were designed to curtail the authority of the new Majlis in the crucial areas of legislative powers and oversight. In April, in response to a move by some members of the outgoing Majlis to exercise oversight of the judiciary, the Council of Guardians ruled that the legislature had no authority to look into the affairs of institutions that came under the purview of the Leader. This meant that, in addition to the judiciary, the Majlis was barred from investigating or scrutinizing the operations of the armed forces and Revolutionary Guards, the broadcast media and the bonyads. The chief officers of all these organizations are appointed by the Leader. When members of the Majlis demurred, the Expediency Council, a body that adjudicates differences between the Council of Guardians and the Majlis, upheld the Council of Guardians in its novel interpretation of the constitution.

On August 6, Khamenei himself intervened to bar the new Majlis from overturning or revising the repressive press law that the judiciary had used in its press crackdown. Revision of the press law was the first order of business on the agenda of the Majlis when it opened for formal business. In asking the Majlis to drop the matter in a letter he addressed to the Majlis speaker, Khamenei cited a danger that the print media would fall under foreign influence or control and the threat this posed to Islam and to national security.[37] Khamenei did not cite any constitutional grounds for this almost unprecedented attempt at extension of the Leader's authority. Nor did he explicitly instruct the Majlis to drop the press law. But his language pointed in that direction and was so interpreted by Kar-rubi and Khamenei's other clerical supporters. By citing a threat to Islam and state, Khamenei was implicitly invoking his duty to protect both. Moreover, the Speaker made the constitutional argument for Khamenei that Khamenei did not explicitly make for himself. He described Khamenei's letter as a hukm-e huku-mati, a term applied to rulings by the Leader involving matters of high state interest. Karrubi also reiterated a claim advanced, but also challenged, in the past, that the Leader has absolute power and is owed absolute obedience. He admonished deputies unhappy with Khamenei's directive that they owed the Leader such obedience.

These two rulings were fraught with implications for the Majlis and the constitutional order. The idea that the Majlis lacked authority to scrutinize organizations that came under the Leader's purview was entirely novel and bound to prove problematic. In the 1990s, the Majlis had in fact investigated the largest of the bonyads, the Foundation for the Disinherited, and the operations of national radio and television. The report resulting from the latter inquiry led to the dismissal of the broadcast media chief. The Majlis enacted the laws that governed each of these organizations. The bonyads aside, each year it voted the budgets of the institutions coming under the Leader's purview. Even the bonyads received various forms of assistance by the acts of the Majlis. Article 76 of the constitution empowers the Majlis "to investigate and examine all the affairs of the country." To place a group of state institutions beyond the scrutiny of the Majlis was bound to raise practical and constitutional issues.

The expanded claim implicitly made for the Leader's prerogatives in the press law case was likely to prove equally controversial. The constitution empowers the Leader to set the broad policies of the Islamic Republic. But the authority of the Leader to dictate to the Majlis even on major legislation was by no means an established principle. The constitution lays down a procedure for dealing with “problematic” legislation. The Council of Guardians can veto legislation it considers in violation of the constitution or Islam; and if the Majlis disagrees with the ruling, the Expediency Council has authority to adjudicate differences between the Guardians and the deputies. It remained unclear why Khamenei chose to bypass this process. Khamenei’s intervention left the Majlis with two unpalatable choices. The majority could pursue the press law and invite a confrontation with the Leader or cause the Leader to lose face; or the Majlis could abandon the press law and implicitly concede that the Leader had the power to dictate to the Majlis the issues it could discuss and the bills it could enact into law. Such a concession could gravely diminish, if not emasculate, the Majlis’s powers.

In February 2000, the reformist coalition, riding the wave of an impressive electoral victory, seemed poised to change in significant ways the political landscape in Iran. At the very least, the reformers and their supporters expected greatly to expand the political space that Khatami’s election three years earlier had made possible. By August, a bare six months later, the balance of forces seemed dramatically altered. The reformist press was shut down, reformist journalists and intellectuals were in jail, Khamenei had sided decisively with the antireform forces, and new interpretations of the constitution, if allowed to stand, threatened greatly to diminish the role and authority of the Majlis.

The reform movement itself was at a critical crossroads and faced difficult choices. In addition, the confrontation between reformers and conservatives had raised fundamental constitutional issues regarding the extent and limits of the authority of the Leader, the Majlis, the Council of Guardians, and other state institutions. To whom, Iranians were bound to ask themselves, was the government ultimately accountable? If not in the immediate future, then in the longer term, these unresolved issues threatened to plunge the country into a serious constitutional crisis.

[14] For these citations and further details, see Shaul Bakhash, “Iran’s Unlikely President,” The New York Review of Books, 5 November 1998, p. 50.

[15] Estimates of the exact breakdown of seats among the reformists, conservatives, and independents differed, depending on whether the Executives of Construction and smaller groups believed sympathetic to but not directly affiliated with the 2nd Khordad Front are included in the reformist totals. However, there was general agreement that the reformers had a comfortable majority in the first round, although this was no guarantee they would vote as a bloc on every issue. For a more detailed breakdown of final figures, see further in the contribution and note 14.

[16] The agenda of the reformists can be culled partly from statements made during the election campaign, numerous scattered statements made by reformist leaders and individual deputies after the election, and commentary by newspaper editors and columnists associated with the reformist cause. For a reference to some of the issues on the reformist agenda, see “Ideology is Dead: Now the Rule of Law Will Prevail,” an interview with Hamid Reza Jala‘ipur, editor of ‘Asr-e Azade-gan, in La Republica, 22 February 2000, cited in Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Near East and South Asia (hereafter FBIS/NESA), 22 February 2000. Also interview with Majlis deputy Karbalai, “We Will Definitely Not Vote for Hashemi-Rafsanjani as Majlis Speaker,” Asr-e Azadegan, 4 March 2000, cited in FBIS/NESA, 4 June 2000ː and Howard Schneider, “New Parliament Readies Changes in Iran,” Washington Post, 8 July 2000.

[17] See, for example, Ganji’s interview, “Serial Murders, Elections and Threats,” with Sobh-e Ernruz, 21 February 2000; “Akbar Ganji: Assassination Attempts Cannot Be Prevented as Long as Naqdi Is Head of the Intelligence and Security Branch,” Sobh-e Ernruz, 2 April 2000, as cited in FBIS/NESA, 2 April 2000. In addition to his articles, Ganji published a collection of his essays in a book, Tarik-khaneh-ye Ashbah [The Dark House of Ghosts] (Teheran: Tarh-e Now, 1378/1999), elaborating on these charges. For a summary and an interview with Ganji, see Robert Fisk, “The Untold Story of President Rafsanjani of Iran and the Killing of Intellectuals” and “Revealed: Role of a President in the Murder of His People,” The Independent, 8 March 2000. In addition to Ganji, at least two other journalists wrote books in a similar vein. See Shahram Rafi’zadeh, Shilik be Eslahat [Firing (a Bullet) at Reform], (Teheran: Aknun Publications, 1379/2000), and Hamid ٦ ﻻً ؟>ﺟﺔﻷ\ Dat jostekju-ye Mahjel-e jenayat-karan: Baz-khani-ye Patvandeh-ye Qatl-ka ١ﺋﺔﺎﺔﺔ لـ keza of the Society of Criminals: A Review of the File of Political Murders] (Teheran: Negah-e Emruz, 1378/1990).

[18] Baqi was arrested and tried for these allegations. Forjala‘ipur, see his article, “A Secret Government,” in Gunagun, 13 July 2000, cited in FBIS/NESA, 21 July 2000.

[19] Sadeq Zibakalam, “Hashemi Rafsanjani and Another Look at 29 Bahman,” Asr-e Azadegan, 28 February 2000, cited in FBIS/NESA, 6 April 2000.

[20] For the provincial press, see, for example, ﺉﺀﺀ Final Curtain’ for ‘Gray Cardinals’,” Otnid-e Zanjan, 10 May 2000, cited in FBIS/NESA, 20 June 2000.

[21] Susan Sachs, “As Ballots are Counted, Iran’s Moderates Fear Backlash,” an interview with presidential adviser Hosain Valeh, NewYork Times, 22 February 2000.

[22] Cited in FBIS/NESA, 25 May 2000.

[23] FBIS/NESA, 3 March, 2000

[24] These included the president’s brother, Mohammad Reza Khatami, of Mosharekat; the Leader’s brother, Hadi Khamenei, of Hayat-e Now; Jala’ipur of Asr-e Azadegan; Ali-Akbar Mohtashami of Bayan; Morteza Alviri of Hamshahri; and Fereydun Valinejad, the managing director of the Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA). Unlike the state-controlled broadcast media, IRNA did not slant its reporting in favor of the conservatives. At least two provincial journalists were also jailed, but reporting on provincial newspaper closures and arrests were not always comprehensive.

[25] In addition to Mehrangiz Kar, Eshkevari, and Ganji, the Iranian participants who subsequently got into trouble with the authorities (as far as could be determined from published reports) included Shahla Lahiji, a publisher; Ali Afshari, a student leader; Ezzatollah Sahabi, publisher of the subsequently banned Iran-e Farda and a member of the Iran Liberation Movement, a centrist political movement barely tolerated by the authorities; journalist Jala’ipur; writer Ali-RezaAlavi-Tabar; and Changiz Pahlavan, an academic, sociologist, and writer. Kar, Eshkevari, Ganji, Lahiji, Afshari, and Sahabi all spent various periods in jail. At the time of writing, Alavi-Tabar and Jala’ipur had both been summoned for questioning. Pahlavan did not immediately return to Iran.

[26] Two versions of the transcript of the tape appeared to be in circulation, although differences between them were not major. One version, translated from AlSharq al-Awsat, 4 June 2000, appeared in FBIS/NESA, 6 July 2000.

[27] Behzad Nabavi, a leader of the Mujahedin of the Islamic Revolution and one of the architects of the 2nd Khordad Front, calculated after the runoffs in May that the 2nd Khordad coalition, its affiliates, and supporters held 200 seats, the conservatives 58, and independents 18. (The religious minorities accounted for 5 seats, while 9 additional seats, in constituencies where the vote had been invalidated by the Council of Guardians, remained to be filled.) See FBIS/NESA 7 May 2000, quoting Nabavi’s remarks published in Iranو and FBIS/NESA, 8 May 2000, citing the same Nabavi interview as reported by IRNA. According to other reports, seats in 11 constituencies had been invalidated and remained to be filled in runoffs. Nabavi suggested that some 150 deputies were members of the Islamic Iran Participation Front (IIPF), the party run by Khatami's brother, which constitutes the core Khatami group in parliament. I have added the results of the Teheran vote (not finalized when Nabavi spoke) to Nabavi's figures to get the above totals.

But Nabavi's figures appear inflated. The votes cast in the House in elections for the officers of the new Majlis seemed to provide a better gauge of the distribution of forces in the new parliament. Mehdi Karrubi of the Militant Clerics Society, a compromise and supposedly centrist candidate that the Khatami camp was persuaded to accept even though he was not their first choice, became Speaker, with 186 out of 249 votes cast. Karrubi could count on conservative votes but probably lost some reformist ones. Behzad Nabavi and Mohammad Reza Khatami were elected first and second deputy Speakers, with, respectively, 155 and 135 votes, which suggests that, the conservatives aside, the substantial bloc of some 50–60 votes of deputies affiliated with the Militant Clerics Society, the small bloc of about 15 deputies belonging to the Executives of Construction, and some independents would not always vote with the Khatami people. The usually reliable Payam-e Emruz (Tir/Mordad 1379, p. 40) reported that 150) of the deputies were fully committed to the 2nd Khordad agenda. This is very close to the number that Nabavi, in the remarks cited above, described as members of Khatami's own party, the IIPF. In a May 31 despatch to Agence France-Presse, Kianouche Dorrani also gave the IIPF 150 seats in the new Majlis. Even 150 votes would give the pro-Khatami faction a solid majority, with likely additional votes coming from affiliates and supporters.

[28] Voice of the Islamic Republic of Iran, cited in FBIS/NESA, 14 April 2000.

[29] Voice of the Islamic Republic of Iran, cited in FBIS/NESA, 20 April 2000.

[30] “Khamenei Sermon Stresses Islam, Unity,” FBIS/NESA, 12 May 2000.

[31] “Khamenei Addresses Judicial Officials,” FBIS/NESA, 27 June 2000. I have slightly corrected the translation.

[32] “Khameiei’s 9 July Address to Scholars, Senior Officials,” FBIS/NESA, 11 July 2000.

[33] Susan Sachs, “Top Iranian Cleric Defends Closing of Reformist Publications,” New York Times, 29 April, 2000.

[34] Seminary teachers, in ‘Asr-e Azadegan, 8 April 2000, cited in FBIS/NESA, 13 April 2000. Ayatollah Amini, in FBIS/NESA, 8 May 2000.

[35] See reference in Susan Sachs, “Iran Reformers Feeling Pressed by Hardliners,” New York Times, 25 April 2000.

[36] “IRGC Issues Statement Supporting Khamenei,” FBIS/NESA, 16 April 2000.

[37] The text of the letter appears in both Hamshahri andjomhuri-ye Islami of 7 August 2000.

 Chapter 3: Civil-Military Relations in the Islamic Republic of Iran

Ahmed s. Hashim

The role of the military in Iranian politics seems essentially unexplored when examined against the backdrop of the enormous output of literature on civil-military relations generated in the past four decades on societies as disparate as Argentina and Zimbabwe. Studies of Iran have consumed a great deal of scholarly energies. Historians, sociologists, and political scientists have applied their diverse skills to reach some sort of reasonable understanding concerning the origins and consequences of the Pahlavi dynasty for Iran; the 1979 Iranian revolution; and the evolution of the Islamic Republic since then. Over the past decade and a half, there has been a proliferation of works dealing with the performance of the Iranian military during the Iran-Iraq War, the post-war modernization programs of the Iranian armed forces, and Iran's attempts to acquire weapons of mass destruction.

However, the actual link between politics and the military appears to have been generally neglected in the literature. Iran has never of course enjoyed the dubious distinction of constant military intervention or rule along the lines of so many post-WWII "developing" states. Indeed, it stands in stark contrast to its immediate neighbors, such as Pakistan, Iraq, and Turkey, where military establishments have repeatedly intervened in the political process over the course of the past several decades.

Few scholars in the field of comparative politics or of Iranian studies saw the necessity of studying the sociopolitical role of the Iranian military when they examined the monumental 1979 revolution.[38] The lack of attention given to the military dimensions of revolutions arises out of the tendency among most scholars to believe that once the underlying socioeconomic and political causes of revolution are in place, revolution is practically inevitable.[39] This is ahistorical. No one disputes that short-, medium-, and long-term causes of revolution are key to an understanding of why a revolution occurs. Indeed, revolutions have been one of the most fruitful areas of study in comparative politics. Scholars have constructed elaborate theories and then applied them to case studies.[40] Still, students of revolutions should pay closer attention to the fears of revolutionaries—often available in their writings after they have seized power—who have to deal with the potential backlash of military power as they set out on their endeavor. It was Lenin, the archetypal revolutionary, who stated: "No revolution of the masses can triumph without the help of a portion of the armed forces that sustained the old regime."[41] This help can range from actively siding with the revolutionaries to merely standing by and watching the ancien regime succumb to the revolutionary tide.

There is little that represents a consistent and analytical attempt to look at the Iranian military in its own political and social right. More broadly, there is little that attempts to link the Iranian military experience to the universal literature on military sociology and politics, with its emphasis on how and why soldiers are drawn into the political process and the way they act on this involvement. Finally, what little that exists on Iranian civil-military relations fails to compare or contrast the Iranian military experience with that of other Middle Eastern states and other developing countries.

There are, of course, many societies in which civil-military relations remain unexplored. In some societies, where the potential for serious domestic conflict is all too real, the neglected link between the military and politics is especially surprising. The Islamic Republic of Iran is currently in the midst of domestic turmoil; if the legitimacy of the state and its ideology were to witness a catastrophic collapse, much of politics would then be reduced to the exercise of coercion. All social structures are dependent to some degree on the use of force, but there is a difference between putative and applied force, and the distinction is eroded where the state faces a crisis of legitimacy. In these circumstances, individuals and institutions with access to the instruments and technologies of violence—the military being in the forefront—can, and often do, play a decisive role in the political process. As Alfred Stepan notes in his study of the Brazilian military, the response of soldiers to conflict in divided societies provides “a large part of the answer to the question of who wins and who loses, who has power and who has not.” He adds further:

When the armed forces prevent the winner of a presidential election from taking office, when they remove a government whose economic policies favor one class at the expense of another, or when they stage a coup to preserve the dominance of a racial, religious, tribal or linguistic group in a communally divided society, their actions clearly help determine which social groups will gain or lose some of their most important values. Even those coups that are unrelated to group conflicts, primarily involving the defense of corporate interests, are likely to affect political and economic outcomes.[42]

This chapter is an analytical history of civil-military relations in the Islamic Republic of Iran. However, the country's past history of civil-military relations is critical to an understanding of the more recent evolution of civil-military relations. In this context, the Iranian military has been key in the process by which power has been seized in the past (Reza Shah in 1921), and by which power has been retained (again, Reza Shah between 1921 and 1941, and Mohammed Reza Shah between 1941 and 1979). Its inability, or failure, to support the Shah in 1978–1979 proved to be a critical factor in the fall of the Pahlavi dynasty. If the Islamic Republic of Iran does not succeed in resolving its domestic problems, the military is likely to play an increasingly critical role in the political life of the country.

While space will prevent a lengthy theoretical analysis of civil-military relations, the most salient aspects of the voluminous literature need to be addressed to provide a framework for our analysis of civil-military relations in the Islamic Republic.[43] Civil-military relations represent an enduring problem in politics. Over the course of human history, states created military forces to protect them and their people, from both external and internal enemies. Yet, states have also grown to fear that very instrument of violence that they created, and on which they often spent vast resources.

The military does not have to intervene overtly in the political process (i.e. taking over power by means of a coup d'etat) for it to have an important behind-the-scenes role. For example, the mere expression of opinions by the senior officer corps on any topic of national import constitutes intervention in the political process. On the other hand, there may be situations in which the civilian authorities do their utmost to prevent the military from intervening in the political process. Yet, these very same civilian authorities may ultimately rely on the military for much of their legitimacy or power. Shah Mohammed Reza, for example, totally muzzled his senior officer corps and forbade the officers from playing a role in the political process. Yet, the Imperial Iranian military was a key institution of the state, because the Shah relied on it so much.

Thus the Imperial Iranian military was always a political force. In this context, this chapter will posit that the military has played an important political role in Iran ever since the 1920s.[44] Moreover, the fact that the Iranian military has not yet mounted a coup attempt—at least in recent years—does not mean that it has not tried to do so in the past or that it may not try to do so in the near future. Furthermore, non-intervention in the political process, particularly during times of crisis—including revolution—is as meaningful a statement as actually taking direct political action either against or for the revolutionary forces. On the other hand, inaction on the part of the military during a revolutionary situation almost always by default favors revolutionary forces.

* Historical Background

Iran is an ancient state with a respectable and sophisticated military tradition that goes back many centuries.[45] In ancient times the military was under the control of a high-ranking official, the Iran-sepahbadh, who was the minister of war, the highest-ranking officer of the army, and a senior diplomat who could also negotiate peace treaties. He reported directly to the emperor and was part of the small circle of royal councilors.

Unlike several of its neighbors, however, neither ancient nor early modern Iran developed a unified military establishment under national control. The lack of a national army was particularly evident as Iran entered the early modern era. From the seventeenth century onward, Iranian rulers, particularly those of the Qajar dynasty, relied on tribal levies or small and ineffective quasi-regular forces that were haphazardly trained by European officers on loan. Both the tribes and the European officers intervened in the Iranian political process with depressing regularity. In the mid-nineteenth century, defeats at the hands of Ottoman and Russian forces persuaded the rulers of the Qajar dynasty that they needed to create a modern military institution that would not be dependent on the tribes or European powers.[46]

While the Qajari rulers managed to break their link with and dependence upon the tribes for military power, they were largely unsuccessful in their endeavors to create a single unified and modern national military force. Moreover, the attempts to create a modern military establishment merely increased the roles of foreign powers. By the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Iran witnessed the emergence of several quasi-national military forces that were trained, led, and influenced by different European countries. Among the most important were the Cossack Brigade, whose senior officers were Russian; the Gendarmerie, led by Swedes and Germans; and the South Persia Rifles, under the command of British officers.[47] These forces played significant roles in the political process, including the Constitutional Revolution, but always with mixed results. More often than not, these European-trained and officered forces placed the interests of their own respective countries above those of the Iranian monarch whom they ostensibly served.

By the end of the second decade of the twentieth century, many Iranian nationalists had become affronted by the precipitous decline in the political fortunes of their country. In particular they resented the influence of so many powers in the court at Teheran, an influence that was often exercised by means of their control of the quasi-independent military forces. Indeed, some of these forces were used by the Iranian monarch with the connivance of foreign powers to put down progressive forces seeking to do away with tyrannical and arbitrary government and establish some semblance of constitutional order in the country.[48] One such individual was a senior Iranian officer in the Cossack Brigade, Colonel Reza Khan, who ultimately rose to the rank of commander of the brigade.

Reza Khan used that position to stage the first modern coup in Iranian history, on 21 February 1921. This move was undertaken against the corrupt politicians in the capital, Teheran, and was not aimed at overthrowing the Shah. Reza Khan helped a reformist civilian, Sayyid Zia Tabatabai, come to power as prime minister. In turn, Sayyid Zia promised many reforms, but managed to alienate key people in the process, including the man who had brought him to power, Reza Khan himself. Following the elimination of Sayyid Zia in May 1921, Reza Khan was elevated to the position of minister of war. He used this position to cement his control over the various security forces in the country— by merging them into one force and removing foreign officers —and to put down various dissident and separatist movements throughout the country.

Over the years, Reza Khan steadily accumulated power, as he set about creating a unified national army out of the disparate military forces in the country. In the process, he quashed a serious threat from the Gendarmerie, whose officers resented the rise of Reza Khan.[49] Five years after his first coup, Reza Khan undertook the second coup in Iran's history when he overthrew the moribund Qajar dynasty and had himself crowned Reza Shah of the Pahlavi dynasty in late 1926. Without a doubt, the army constituted the key institution in the new Pahlavi dynasty, and the new ruler relied on it to maintain his power and enhance his legitimacy.[50] Yet, at the same time, Reza Shah tried to keep the army officers as far away from the political process as possible. This, of course, stands in marked contrast to the period when he merely headed the army and used it to promote his political agenda. By late 1926, he was the civilian authority, and the undue influence of the army in the political process was clearly unwelcome.[51]

In this context, to keep the army loyal and satisfied that its corporate interests were being taken care of, Reza Shah devoted considerable attention and resources to the army. He continued to enlarge and modernize it, so that, over time, it became quite professional. He paid particular attention to the senior officer corps, whom he kept loyal by means of promotions and lavish benefits. However, Reza Shah purged, dismissed, or rotated those who he thought were too independent or who constituted a potential threat to the dynasty. Last but not least, he kept the army preoccupied with putting down domestic threats to internal security.[52]

Despite its early successes, the new unified national army failed one key test: defense of the homeland against foreign invaders. During World War II, Iran adopted a pro-German neutrality that was opposed by both Britain and the Soviet Union. Furthermore, Iran was an important producer of oil and a supply route to the Soviet Union. In the event, Teheran's haphazard policies during the war placed the country on a collision course with the les. This was ultimately resolved by a joint Anglo-Soviet invasion in 1941. Following the defeat and utter collapse of his army, Reza Shah abdicated in favor of his shy and reserved son, Mohammed Reza, on 16 September 1941. The new Shah had to rebuild the legitimacy of the Pahlavi dynasty if he was to survive. To succeed, he needed to rebuild the armed forces and establish his and the monarchy's political ascendancy and control over them.

To his credit, Mohammed Reza Shah managed to persuade the Americans, not without some reluctance on their part, to rebuild and modernize the Iranian armed forces. However, as far as the issue of civilian or, more accurately, monarchical control over the armed forces, Mohammed Reza Shah was to face considerable difficulties for a long period of time. In this context, in the early 1950s, a "recalcitrant" nationalist prime minister, Mohammed Mossadeq, challenged the monarch for control over the armed forces, among other things. Mossadegh made plenty of promises to the armed forces, but he was never able to swing the officer corps to his side. Lacking an institutional power base, Mossadegh was removed from power by the Shah and his Western allies. Nonetheless, over the course of a decade, that is to say, between 1953 and 1963, the Shah's authority over the armed forces was challenged on three separate occasions, each time with serious implications for the stability of civil-military relations.[53]

These crises underscored to the Shah the centrality of the armed forces in Iranian political life. The Shah concluded that the military must remain under tight monarchical control, that it must not interfere in political life, and that it must be carefully monitored for unlawful political activities. Toward that end, he took his title of supreme military commander very seriously and, as he once put it: "In this country, if the king is not the commander-in-chief of the armed forces, anything can happen."[54] By the late 1960s, the Shah had succeeded in establishing full control over the armed forces. The process actually began with the creation of an internal security organization to monitor the military. In the event, an elaborate state security and intelligence organization (,Sazeman-e-Amniyat-e-va Ettela'at Keshvar, or SAVAK) was developed. Other organizations, such as military intelligence and the special Bureau of Intelligence, also kept close watch over the armed forces.

Neverthless, the Shah did not merely rely on security organs to control and maintain the loyalty of the armed forces, he also tightly involved himself in the most routine of military administrative matters, such as vetting the promotion of officers above the rank of major. He encouraged rivalry among senior officers and prevented the emergence of a cohesive officer corps. Officers from different branches of the armed forces rarely met one another except in the presence of the Shah. The monarch satisfied the corporate interests of the armed forces. No elite group in the political establishment was more favored than the officer corps. They were provided with special privileges that included augmented pay, subsidized housing, free education for offspring, and heavily subsidized military stores. Finally, the Shah engaged in a furious military build-up from the early 1970s onward that gave Iran one of the most impressive military forces in the developing world by 1979.

None of this mattered much when the Iranian revolution destroyed the Pahlavi dynasty in 1979. Many analysts have convincingly argued, on the basis of historical evidence, that if a beleaguered government manages to maintain the loyalty of the armed forces and uses it decisively, no revolution can succeed.[55] The Shah neither retained the loyalty of the armed forces—the senior officer corps remained immobile, proving to be incapable of action, and the rank and file fraternized with the revolutionaries—nor was himself able to act decisively to stem the tide of revolution. Furthermore, the revolutionaries, particularly the clerical establishment under the charismatic leadership of Ayatollah Khomeini, targeted the armed forces, imploring them not to support the tyrannical rule of the Pahlavis by shooting their fellow countrymen. Soldiers were also encouraged to desert and go home. They were even provided with cash and civilian clothes to do so. Finally, by the late 1970s the military had little experience in dealing with domestic discontent. This is ironic in light of the fact that the military had been an instrument of domestic control from 1945 to the early 1960s.

The Shah left Iran in January 1979 as his army collapsed around him. A care-taker government under Prime Minister Shahpour Bakhtiar was unable to retain the loyalty of the senior officers, many of whom followed the Shah into exile or began negotiating with the revolutionaries. On 1 February 1979 Ayatollah Khomeini returned to Iran to a tumultuous welcome. For a while the army remained precariously balanced between the revolutionaries and the disintegrating government of Shahpour Bakhtiar. On 11 February, the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces met one final time. After heated discussions between moderates (those who favored a deal with the revolutionary forces) and hawks (those who favored supporting Bakhtiar), leading senior officers decided to declare the military neutral in the struggle between the Shah’s last government and the revolutionaries. Perhaps realizing the futility of the struggle, Prime Minister Bakhtiar fled, and the revolution triumphed.

 Clvll-Mllitary Relations after 1919

The Islamic Republic has gone through three phases. The “first republic” (1979–1989) was a period characterized by extreme revolutionary turmoil, internal opposition, threats, and war. The military had ample opportunity to try and intervene in the political process, but it either could not or chose not to— notwithstanding a number of amateurish and poorly planned coup attempts. Nor did it choose to intervene in the political process at the height of the bloody war with neighboring Iraq. The “second republic” (1990–1997) under President Rafsanjani, was a more stable period in Iranian political history, but was characterized by some serious tensions in civil-military relations. Under the “third republic” (1997-present), Iran has been trying to move toward a postrevolutionary era of constitutionalism and normalcy with President Mohammed Khatami. These attempts have, however, met with strenuous opposition on the part of entrenched conservative forces who fear that liberalization could lead to the unraveling of the Islamic Republic. Conservative forces rely on a number of civilian institutions, and legal means, to stymie further efforts to bring about progressive change in the country. Ultimately, they may try to rely on sympathetic forces within the military establishment to eliminate any “breakdown in law and order.”

 Civil-Military Relations:The First Republic, 1979–1988

Once the victory against the Shah had been consummated, the various revolutionary parties fell out among themselves. They had very different agendas from one another. It was the clerics who emerged as the ultimate victors of the revolution. One of the reasons they succeeded in “hijacking” the revolution was because of better organizational skills, but also because they managed to gain control over the remnants of the armed forces. If there is one thing that Iran’s clerics do not suffer from, it is naivete, or idealism.

Iran’s revolutionary clerics recognized the importance of military power in Islamic history. Indeed, to a large extent Islamic history is military history, and no other religion has been so intricately tied with military endeavor. From the very outset of the revolution, the clerics understood the role of the military as a key instrument of the Pahlavi state. Not surprisingly, during the course of the revolution, they devoted considerable effort to detaching that instrument of state power from its moorings. Following their revolutionary victory, the task was to ensure control of the armed forces so that it would not succumb to “counterrevolutionary” tendencies (i.e., try to bring the Shah back) or become an instrument in the hands of other revolutionary parties with whom the clerics had differences.

In this context, the clerics set out to purge the armed forces. This has been extensively analyzed in various studies. Suffice it to state that the purges had three specific goals: (a) punish the military for its “sins” against the people during the course of the revolution; (b) remove all vestiges of Pahlavism and imperial culture; and (c) “Islamize” the military (i.e., create an ideological force). To consolidate their ideological control over the armed forces, the clerics also set up the Ideological-Political Directorate of the Armed Forces (IPD), or Modiriyat-e-Aghidat-e-va SiyasiArtesh. The IPD infiltrated its clerics and agents from the Joint Staff down to the platoon level. One of the more effective tactics of the IPD clerics was to promote officers from religious families or from those with familial ties to clerical families. The clerics also ensured that a wide variety of security and intelligence services maintained close watch on the armed forces.

Last but not least, the clerics created their own military force, the Pasdaran-e-Engelab-e-Islami, or the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps (IRGC), in early May 1979. The missions of the IRGC were to protect the revolution, maintain domestic law and order, fight dissident movements, and balance/watch the regular armed forces, of whom the clerics maintained a healthy suspicion. Recruits tended to be ethnic Persians or Azeris between the ages of 17 and 28 and generally hailed from poorer or religious families. Applicants had to undergo a rigorous test of their religious and spiritual credentials. Once an applicant was approved for membership in the IRGC, he was sent to a military installation for training in basic fieldcraft and small unit tactics.[56] To put down separatist movements in the various peripheral regions of the country, the revolutionary government used both the regular army and the IRGC extensively. Much like the Pahlavis before them, the clerics were a nationalistic elite that believed in a centralized government, and frowned extensively on the autonomist aspirations of the country's ethnic minorities. Consequently, both the regular army and the Revolutionary Guards were dominated by Persians and Azeris, the two dominant ethnic groups in the country, and thus did not object to their use as forces for centralization. Both groups cooperated to put down a Kurdish insurgency in Iranian Kurdistan.

Still, both regular army-Revolutionary Guards cooperation and civil-military relations were put to the test during the sanguinary Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988). Early in the war, Iran's response to the Iraqi invasion was haphazard and uncoordinated, which in turn added to the mistrust already existing between the military and the Pasdaran. Furthermore, attempts by revolutionary Iran's first president, Abol Hasan Bani-Sadr, to promote the regular military as the premier force in the struggle against Iraq roused the ire and suspicions of the clerical establishment and of Revolutionary Guards officers. Senior government officials concluded that Bani Sadr suffered from Bonapartist tendencies and was hoping to march back to Teheran at the head of a military column to claim political power for himself, after claiming success on the battlefield. For its part, the IRGC accused Bani Sadr of trying to make the regular army "a tool in his own hands, so that he could wield it as a powerful weapon against the Imam's Line."[57]

The demise of Bani Sadr in 1981 was followed by the creation of a unique military structure that was able to appeal to and mobilize different segments of the population in the struggle against Iraq. This three-tiered military structure was divided into the regular army, the Revolutionary Guards, and the Mobilization of the oppressed, or Basij. Middle-class nationalists found their place in the technologically developed regular army. For this group, the war was a national struggle to defend Iran's territorial integrity and honor against a despised enemy, the Arab. Islamic revolutionaries and religiously oriented youth from more humble backgrounds flocked to the Revolutionary Guards. Young and old from rural areas volunteered for the Basij. For members of these two latter organizations, the struggle against Iraq was a "holy war" in defense of Islam against the atheists of the Iraqi Baath Party.[58]

This three-tiered military structure represented the high point in the emergence of harmonious civil-military relations during wartime, and it was responsible for the Iranian victories in Khuzistan in the spring and summer of 1982. Once Iran sought to move into Iraq in its own counter-invasion, the threetiered military structure began to unravel and problems reappeared in civil-military relations. The regular army was not too enthusiastic about invading Iraq in 1982. However, it chose not to oppose the wishes of Ayatollah Khomeini. The Revolutionary Guards showed more enthusiasm for the crusade, but as Iranian offensives into Iraq failed in the teeth of Iraqi defenses, the Guards' leadership complained about lack of support from the regular army. The Basij proved unequal to the task of supporting an endeavor as complicated as the invasion of Iraq. Indeed, it ended up being a burden on the Revolutionary Guards, which was responsible for its training and logistical needs. As Iran's war effort faltered in 1987, the Revolutionary Guards Corps not only lost large numbers of well-trained soldiers but also its enthusiasm for the war. The complete unraveling of the three-tiered military structure into three uncoordinated forces fighting their own separate wars aggravated matters. Iran was decisively defeated on the battlefield in the summer of 1988 by superior Iraqi forces. Last-ditch efforts to create better and more effective coordination between Iran's forces failed to stem the tide of defeat. In early June 1988, Ayatollah Khomeini appointed Majlis Speaker Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani—a man heavily involved in Iran's war effort— acting commander-in-chief of the armed forces. His mission was to ensure full coordination among the various forces and to eliminate waste and inefficiency in the conduct of the war.[59]

Although armies returning home in defeat almost invariably pose a threat to the stability of civil-military relations, the Iranian case illustrated fundamental changes in this outlook. To their credit, the clerics managed to quickly and effectively thwart any threat to their power in the aftermath of defeat, by rapidly addressing and rectifying its causes.

 Civil-Military Relations:The Second Republic) 1989—1996

Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani was elected president of the Islamic Republic twice. His first term ran from 1989 to 1993, and the second from 1994 to 1997. Both terms were characterized by some very tense periods in civil-military relations. At one point the tension in civil-military relations stemmed from Revolutionary Guards fears that its corporate interests—embedded in its sense of identity as a separate entity from the regular army—were in the process of being threatened by civilian authorities. In the mid-1990s the tension in civil-military relations resulted from the state's request that the military establishment put down growing urban disturbances.

 Revolutionary Guards: Corporate Interests

The Iran-Iraq War ended in a catastrophe for the country's armed forces. In the aftermath of the war, Teheran had to allay the suspicions of the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps (IRGC) that they would bear the brunt of the blame for operational failures at the front, particularly those during 1988. While the regular army had always counseled caution, and had adopted a conservative and methodical approach to operations, the IRGC was always more confident of victory in the face of Iraq's growing technological superiority. Needless to say, this confidence proved misplaced in the wake of humiliating defeats suffered at the front between April and July 1988. Not surprisingly, much of the blame for Iran's precipitous collapse at the front in the final months of the war lay with the Revolutionary Guards. Indeed, at one stage, Revolutionary Guards commander Mohsen Rezai was publicly humiliated when he was forced to admit to certain mistakes at the front. Even the regular army was not spared the purging of some of its senior officers. Nonetheless, to their credit, the ruling clerics admitted that the government made mistakes over the course of the war as well. In this context, the ruling clerics did not go out of their way to blame the armed forces for the defeat.

In a speech to IRGC commanders in October 1988, then-President Rafsanjani tackled the issue—of the post-war Revolutionary Guards Corps—head on, as IRGC commanders were seriously worried that their prospects were injeopardy. Rafsanjani sought to allay such fears, assuming they existed, and praised the IRGC. He stressed that they were, indeed, an integral element in Iran's conception of national defense. He also emphasized their role in the defense of Iran's territories when the Iraqis invaded Iran in 1980. Rafsanjani went so far as to clarify that the IRGC excelled in its defensive activities against the invader, stating:

There is a time when the enemy comes to fight against us; when he brings about conditions like those in Afghanistan; when someone comes and occupies your land; occupies your homes; or like Palestine; or like in parts of Lebanon; or like ourselves at the beginning of the war when they attacked our homes and brought the war deep into our country. Under those conditions one may say that one should fight with Molotov cocktails or with stones or by strapping bombs around our waist and going under the tanks, as some people say. This is one kind of situation ... [60]

Still, Rafsanjani added—somewhat cautiously—that the IRGC has to change with the times. In the early stages of the Iran-Iraq War, the IRGC was characterized by a loose and informal structure, but developed into a more structured and better-disciplined force over the course of the years. The end result, Iranian leaders anticipated, would be the emergence of a formal military institution that was more disciplined, better trained, and able to handle heavy weapons. In Rafsanjani's own words:

The IRGC now is not as it was in the early days. Now it has organization; its units and departments are also organized. However, these organizations should be completely military organizations.... This is one of the responsibilities of the IRGC commanders, to think and to change their organization into a military one, a completely military organization. Training should be taken very seriously. I spoke earlier about the time when we were attacked. Well, with only a few hours preparation the least one could do was to equip oneself with G-3s or Kalashnikovs and to fire them. However, that is not sufficient for US now. We have gradually come to realize—the IRGC commanders have realized—that matters such as rank and hierarchy, salary —a just level of pay—and so on constitute the necessities for an armed force ... if we are to rely on the IRGC as an armed force, if the regime is to serve God, the IRGC must not think that when it is attacked it can fight with Molotov cocktails.[61]

Following Rafsanjani's election to the presidency, Teheran prudently decided that it would drop the idea of merging Iran's wartime forces into a single, large operation. Yet, it also became clear that Iran could never have efficient and organized forces if the three-tiered structure was maintained intact, without changes. As it stood, the structure fostered massive waste and unhealthy competition between regular troops and IRGC units, and brought about duplication of efforts in the defense industries.[62] Rafsanjani was determined to bring about greater efficiency to Iran's military forces, even if they were to remain divided into three separate organizations. The IRGC would become more efficient by becoming a professional force with ranks and a hierarchical structure similar to that of the regular armed forces. Most of the new IRGC ranks were equivalent to those of the regular army, a fact that may have generated some unease among both forces. Ayatollah Khomeini's designated successor, Ayatollah Khamenei, echoed and supported Rafsanjani's view that the Revolutionary Guards Corps must professionalize itself and pay attention to training and modern and scientific methods of warfare.[63] However, to allay putative fears of the Revolutionary Guards Corps concerning its future, Ayatollah Khamenei declared that the IRGC would remain in existence to "carry out its crucial responsibility of militarily defending the Revolution."[64]

Finally, in order to maintain the loyalty of the armed forces as well as to ensure the country's national security, the ruling clerics moved with surprising alacrity following the end of the war with Iraq to cater to the military's corporate interests, emphasizing benefits and modern weaponry. As the 1990's progressed, and the country suffered economic crises and isolation, it became clear that the Islamic Republic would have serious problems in meeting these rekin-died corporate interests. Given the fact that a major cause of dissatisfaction on the part of senior officers in any army is the lack of an adequate supply of weapons and resources, this could constitute a problem for the civilian authorities in Iran. Yet, it is not clear that the armed forces have blamed the civilian authorities for Iran's inability to arm itself properly, with sufficient sophisticated conventional weapons, over the past decade. Indeed, the civilian authorities have successfully managed to argue that too much reliance on foreign weapons is contrary to the national interest, and that such weapons do not add much to national security. Noticeably, and while one should be aware of propagandistic claims,

Iran has made tremendous strides in the development of its own domestic arms industries. This has been a source of considerable pride for Iranian officers, many of whom extol the virtues of domestically produced weapons quite openly.

 The Armed Forces and Law and Order

By the mid-1990s President Rafsanjani's position in the structure of the ruling elite had been weakened as a result of manifest failures in many areas. First, his socioeconomic programs that had managed to cause considerable distress to the lower classes—but did not manage to set Iran on the road to economic recovery—proved problematic. Moreover, many within the ruling hierarchy opposed the president and his technocratic, "Western-oriented" advisers. Second, Rafsanjani failed to significantly improve Iran's relations with the outside world. Third, he became embroiled in political infighting with conservative elements, at the expense of implementing his programs. The clearest symbol of his decline came in the June 1993 presidential elections when he was re-elected for his second and final term. Whereas Rafsanjani had received 95 percent of the votes in 1989, he managed a mere 63 percent in 1993.

To make matters worse, riots and demonstrations in shantytowns that crowded the major urban centers became regular occurrences during the course of 1994. To be sure, the worsening economic and social conditions during Rafsanjani's second term presented a situation that was fraught with potential dilemmas between the civilian authorities and the armed forces. A decline in law and order, especially in the volatile urban areas, constituted a dangerous situation for civilian authorities precisely because the armed forces could have stepped in. As military leaders frown on the task of putting down domestic grievances, the threat of a coup looms large.

In this context, both the IRGC and the regular army played critical roles during the August 1994 uprising in Qazvin, which alarmed the government. The refusal of the Qazvin garrison's IRGC commander to put down rioting by the city's population was endorsed by senior officers from both the regular army and the IRGC. Teheran airlifted a special internal rapid deployment security force to quell these disturbances, which they did rather brutally. Not long afterwards, a letter written by four senior officers representing the ground forces, the IRGC, the air force, and the paratroop/special Forces was sent to the political leadership. It called upon the leadership not to rely on or use the armed forces to quell popular manifestations of discontent.[65] The letter expressed the officers' deep concern over the "growing political, economic and social chaos in Iran."[66] Almost a month later, a respected former police-general, Azizollah Amir Rahimi warned the clerics that the continuation of their rule would lead to the "total annihilation of Iran and Islam." Furthermore, he called upon the Rafsanjani government to step down and organize free elections.[67]

While Teheran may have been alarmed by the reluctance of the armed forces to crush domestic discontent, it did not show it. Instead, it moved swiftly to ensure that the Basij would don the mantle of internal security force. In terms of size and commitment to the revolution, the Basij constitutes a formidable force. There are 300,000 full-time members, and in times of crisis, the government may be able to call upon another 1 million part-timers. The organization's budget was reportedly increased dramatically over the course of the mid-1990s.[68] Its members were provided with greater benefits and privileges to ensure their continued loyalty to the Islamic Republic.

In spite of severe socioeconomic and political problems that beset the country in the first half of the 1990s, the armed forces never directly intervened in the political process in the country, no doubt to the considerable relief of the ruling clerics. Under the circumstances, it was highly unlikely that the military ever thought of intervening to overthrow the political system. Senior officers probably sensed that any hasty actions would add to the country's political difficulties. Moreover, most probably realized that they had neither the political nor the administrative expertise—not to mention technical skills ranging from economic expertise to political savvy—to put Iran on the road to recovery and stability. Indeed, it was left to the existing civilian political system to find a way out of the impasse starting in the mid-1990s.

 Civil-Military Relations: The Third Republic, 1997–2000

In May 1997, Iranians elected a little-known cleric, Mohammed Khatami, to the presidency of the Islamic Republic. When Iranians went to the polls, citizens and foreign observers alike expected the conservative candidate, Majlis speaker Ali Akbar Nateq Nouri, to win the election hands down. Instead, the underdog, Khatami, overwhelmingly defeated his opponent, winning 70 percent of the 29 million votes cast. Khatami's victory was facilitated by the desire for change on the part of millions of Iranians. They were encouraged by Khatami's promises to change Iran peacefully, and by his calls for limiting the influences of various power centers throughout the country, institutionalizing the rule of law, and ending Iran's regional and international isolation.[69]

On a superficial level, the military played no role in this election, as the overall reaction was supportive of the assumptions made earlier, that military intervention in the political process need not be measured solely by displays of military might in the streets or, in extremis, by undertaking a coup. Nevertheless, disturbing signs of politicization within the armed forces, particularly in the Revolutionary Guards, were apparent during the presidential elections. Against a ban on the involvement of the armed forces in politics, Pasdaran chief Mohsen

Rezai, along with other senior Guards officers, sided with the conservative candidate. Inasmuch as the radical right or conservatives viewed the rise of reform-oriented moderates as paving the way for the revolution to deviate from its true path, this frightened senior Revolutionary Guards leaders, because of their extensive socioeconomic stake in the system. This political partisanship on the part of the Revolutionary Guards leadership led to criticism of the force in the pro-Khatami press. Moreover, it roused the fear of the ruling clerical establishment that any political partisanship on the part of the armed forces during the elections could open the floodgates to further armed forces politicization. What aggravated the situation further was that the Revolutionary Guards had developed, over the years, a strong tendency toward politicization. Ayatollah Khomeini and other senior members of the clerical regime from the early days of the creation of the Revolutionary Guards had noticed this tendency.[70] As the political situation in Iran took a direction that was less and less to its liking, the IRGC began to exhibit greater signs of involvement in the process.

In an effort ostensibly designed to soothe people's fears, Mohsen Rezai stated that the Revolutionary Guards should refrain from involvement in politics and from taking sides between political groups. Nonetheless, he felt compelled to issue a warning: "(But) if domestic political issues end up as threats against the Islamic Revolution, in that case the Basij and revolutionary forces will also carry out their task within the framework of the law."[71] It is not quite clear what Rezai meant by his statement. Did he mean that if the political situation between the reformers and the hardliners worsened, the Revolutionary Guards would step into the political arena? Under such circumstances, and if they were to be that involved, would that not constitute a partisan involvement on the side of conservative elements? Or, did he mean that the Revolutionary Guards would move to re-establish law and order, if there were a danger of political violence erupting in the urban centers? Finally, could he have meant that the Revolutionary Guards would step into the political arena if there were a threat to the corporate interests of the Revolutionary Guards?

 Khatami and the IRGC

President Khatami's political, socioeconomic, cultural, and foreign policy agenda, briefly discussed above, represented a threat to both the ideological and corporate interests of the Revolutionary Guards. It also endangered the Guards' conception of Iranian national security and its global orientation. To be sure, Khatami used the Guards' expressions of hostility to criticize what he perceived as a dangerous process of politicization. On 15 September 1997, for example, he exhorted the country's armed forces to stay out of politics, adding that the armed forces should abstain from factional politics. A few days later, Mohsen Rezai stepped down from his post, as a result of pressure exerted by the Supreme Leader, who—presumably—wished to avoid a potentially disruptive tug of war between hardliners and reformers.

Yet, on two separate occasions, the new commander of the Guards, General Rahim Safavi, issued some strongly worded comments against the policies of President Mohammed Khatami. In April 1998, at a meeting of IRGC navy commanders held in the holy city of Qom, Safavi was quoted as saying that the Islamic Republic should “cut off the heads” or “tongues” of its opponents. The meeting was supposed to be confidential and off the record. However, a journalist from the state-owned Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA) leaked its contents. In turn, this generated a storm of controversy in various political circles throughout the country. Some even feared that Safavi’s confidential statements were not just merely symbolic of the IRGC’s deep politicization, but indicated that hardliners in the organization were considering active intervention in the political process to reverse the reform tide.[72]

Safavi countered that his confidential statements concerning the threat to Iranian national security posed by Khatami’s policies were taken out of context and distorted by enemies and counterrevolutionaries. To clarify his position, Safavi gave a lengthy interview to the IRGC’s magazine, Payam-e-Enqelab (Message of Revolution), in which he emphatically stated that it was the business of the Guards to pay particular attention to all threats to the national security of Iran and to the security of the Islamic Republic, no matter where they may come from. As Safavi pointed out, the IRGC focused its attention on “ensuring and safeguarding the security and confronting the counter-revolution and internal threats.”[73]

Importantly, Safavi implicitly criticized the cultural aspects of Khatami’s policies, drawing—once again—sharp differences between the two agendas. Safavi believed that threats to Iran’s Islamic culture would come from opening up to the West in an indiscriminate manner as envisioned by Khatami supporters. This, he argued, would constitute a serious threat to “our national security”[74] because many Westerners—and he quoted several—believed that the Islamic Republic could be overthrown only by changing the cultural mores of the population.

As the interview illustrated, Safavi was not one to shy away from controversy. In early June 1998 he made additional inflammatory remarks in front of 2,000 Basij students, when he issued venomous statements against the pragmatists and reformers:

The nation must be vigilant. A third current [jaryan-esvvom] is lying in wait and is trying to pit forces loyal to the revolution against each other. This third current, which is sponsored by foreigners, intends to destroy the foundations of religion in this country.... The IRGC is keeping this third current under observation and will not allow soiled hands to steal the Islamic revolution from the Iranian nation.[75]

Not surprisingly, these comments created a stir in Iran, and not only among the pragmatists/moderates who were the intended target, but also among leftists and the ruling circles. The pragmatists called upon the government to dismiss General Safavi. Leftist commentators suggested that the general change his military uniform for civilian attire, arguing that this would enable him to enter the political arena. The Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, was profoundly disturbed by Safavi's verbal onslaught, not only because he supported the reformist policies of Khatami and his circle, but because of his deep fear of overt politicization of the armed forces. Khamenei called upon Safavi to desist from making any more political statements. The IRGC leadership issued its own warning that attacks on its commander should be halted.

Not only was the IRGC wary of Khatami's ideological platform, his calls for administrative and bureaucratic reforms to eliminate corruption and nepotism in the system of governance and from various government organizations could not have been viewed with anything but alarm by organizations like the IRGC. By the time Khatami had been elected to the presidency, the IRGC had added economic enterprise to its impressive credentials as a military and law enforcement force, as well as a civic organization that constructed railways and roads. The appointment of Mohsen Rafiqdoust, a former minister for the Revolutionary Guards Corps as head of the Bonyad-e-Mosta (azaJin, or Foundation of the Oppressed—a charitable organization that looked after the needs of the poor but also managed a large economic corporation—fostered close links between the two organizations. This enabled the IRGC to expand its economic activities beyond the defense industry and into shipping, commerce, agriculture, industrial manufacturing, banking, and cross-border trade.

 Khatami and the Regular Armed Forces

Very little data exists on the views of the regular armed forces toward the Khatami “phenomenon.” To be sure, President Khatami does not have control over the armed forces, whereas Ayatollah Khamenei, as Supreme Leader, does. It is interesting to note, in this context, that Major General Hasan Firuzabadi, until recently the Iranian Armed Forces chief of staff, expressed sympathy for Safavi’s ألام١١٥١لا only in the sense of saying that he believed that Safavi’s remarks in Qom were distorted by the media. Irrespective of who controls what institutions, Khatami has shown that he is very much worried by the politicization prospects of the armed forces. Clearly, an overt military involvement in the political process would make a mockery of Khatami’s plans for the establishment of the rule of law. In the president’s own words:

Our armed forces should refrain from political tendencies and preferences, and instead, engage in the daily improvement of their scientific, organizational, and operational capabilities. This has been the case up to now and will remain so, with the blessings of God, in the future.[76]

In the final analysis, however, it is unlikely that the senior echelons of the armed forces perceived Khatami as a threat to their corporate interests or as a threat to Iran’s national security. There were a number of reasons for this.

First, Khatami is unlikely to reduce the budget or fringe benefits of the armed forces, despite his many calls for economic reforms. In fact, members of the regular armed forces receive pitiful salaries. Interestingly, the regular army is so over-staffed and underpaid that it welcomes the $16,000 from those who choose to avoid the draft. Thus, Khatami does not control the purse strings of the armed forces—that means that he is not capable of treading on the army’s corporate interests in any major way.

Second, Khatami is a nationalist, and has come out in favor of enhancing Iran’s defensive capabilities on numerous occasions. This position is similar to that ofAyatollah Khamenei, the Supreme Leader and the man who commands Iran’s armed forces.

Third, notwithstanding the scare of war with the Taleban in Afghanistan, Khatami’s foreign and security policies have actually led to some enhancement of Iran’s security. Ironically, if Khatami were to succeed in ending the country’s isolation, such a result may not be perceived with a degree of equanimity by different sectors of the armed forces. We may, indeed, see a revival of the differences between a technically oriented regular army and a less technically oriented Revolutionary Guards Corps. Inasmuch as the regular armed forces are more likely to welcome the end of Iran’s isolation, they would most likely support a regime that would provide new access to high-tech conventional weapons. The situation may be further complicated by the existence of proponents of non-conventional weapons, who might see the reversal of the country’s quest for “weapons of mass destruction” as a condition for the re-integration of the country into the international arena.

* Future Scenarios

In February 1999 the Islamic Republic entered the third decade of its existence. A year has gone by since the thirtieth anniversary of the Islamic Republic. This is a critical period in the history of the Republic and, indeed, of Iran itself. Still, it remains an open question as to whether the Islamic Republic under Mohammed Khatami has the ability to draw up and implement domestic and foreign policies that would lead to the emergence of a flourishing and vibrant open society, worthy of emulation by the rest of the Islamic world.

A number of scenarios are offered in which the armed forces are likely to play an important role.

 Continuation of the Status Quo

Under this current scenario, Iran lurches from one political and socioeconomic “mini-crisis” to the next without either the pragmatists or the conservatives being able to consolidate power. Street violence and riots remain at a low and stable level that does not threaten public law and order or the security of the Islamic Republic. Furthermore, and as long as there is no further political polarization, there may be very little room for the armed forces—or Guards—to intervene politically in any meaningful way. If the Guards’ leadership were to weigh in on the side of the conservative faction, they could set off a chain of events that would be far worse than if they were to refrain from open political intervention. Any overt Guards intervention in the political process could invite warnings from the regular armed forces to heed the leadership’s calls for political neutrality on the part of all armed forces. Similarly, overt Guards intervention in the political process could ratchet up the level of political violence in the country, particularly in major urban centers. Simply stated, and in the long term, this scenario is simply unrealistic and it implies that Iran is going to continue indefinitely in a state of unresolved political and socioeconomic turmoil.

 Pragmatist Consolidation versus Conservative Backlash

Khatami and the reformers could slowly but surely consolidate their power and ultimately supplant the conservatives as the dominant political group. In this context, Iran would move further along toward the desired end-state of pragmatists. Several events seem to confirm the view that the pragmatists are entrenching themselves. Khatami and his supporters made significant advances with their victory in the local council elections of 26 February 1999. These elections proved to be a key stage in the realization of Khatami’s presidential aspirations to liberalize the political climate. These local elections gave reformers a strategic advantage for the 2000 parliamentary balloting. The pragmatists and reformist camp gained control of the Majlis in the parliamentary elections of February 2000.

Yet, this runaway success for the reformers is not necessarily a healthy sign, because political parties are non-existent and the climate is heavily polarized. In the past, the conservative faction was able to effectively use state judicial and revolutionary institutions to thwart any pragmatists' consolidation. If the pragmatists deprive them of those non-violent methods, there is the possibility of a dangerous right-wing backlash that could be initiated by the Hizbullahi youth. To restore law and order, conservative elements might then call upon the IRGC to intervene in the political process. To date, notwithstanding the overwhelming victory of the reformist camp in the parliamentary elections, the conservatives still have considerable resources at their beck and call. They have used these resources to intimidate prominent liberals, to shut down reformist newspapers. Furthermore, they have the resources to put obstacles in the way of the reformist Majlis. Ultimately, the conservatives have a long way to go before they openly call upon segments of the armed forces to step in and restore "law and order." They also realize that political intervention by the military, or at least elements sympathetic to the conservative agenda, should be the last resort.

 From Spontaneous Urban Uprisings to Revolutionary Outbreak: "It's the Economy, Stupid!"

The intense struggles between pragmatists and conservatives are struggles between elites and the politically aware segments of the population over the future direction of the country, indeed, over the heart and soul of the Iranian "nation." Both sides attempt to mobilize various socioeconomic strata within society. Increasingly, what motivates the lower classes into political action most is the status of their short-term economic position, not esoteric debates over the direction of the country. If the economic situation were to worsen and begin to look anything like the situation in the early 1990s, chances of a resurgence of spontaneous urban riots, demonstrations, and even small-scale uprisings cannot be ruled out. These have often been complemented by numerous assassination attempts against public officials and seemingly random acts of terror bombings. Ever since the emergence of the Islamic Republic in 1979, Iran has had its fair share of these acts.

Still, the 1990s witnessed the outbreak of serious disturbances in a number of urban areas that had the potential of spreading. These began in Shiraz in April 1992 when war veterans rioted against government corruption. A month later, citizens of Arak, protesting the treatment of destitute citizens, attacked various symbols of government power. These attacks were replicated in various other cities throughout Iran, including Teheran and Mashad. The year 1994 was a particularly troublesome one for Teheran, as serious riots and assaults on state property occurred in Zahedan, Mashad, Qazvin, Islamshahr, and Akbarabad.

Such incidents by themselves are spontaneous and cannot lead to the overthrow of the system. Outbreaks of urban violence, however, have potentially serious repercussions for any government. If regular police forces are unable to put urban disturbances down, the government is often forced to call upon the military establishment. In some of the incidents in 1994, rioters managed to disarm the police, thus forcing authorities to deploy Revolutionary Guards and regular army units. It is an undeniable fact, as noted earlier, that military establishments do not like to take on the role of policing domestic opposition. In the case of Iran, even the Revolutionary Guards—one of whose tasks is maintenance of domestic security—have questioned their use as a police force against the people.

If Iran succumbs to another series of urban outbreaks, the implications for the government could be more serious than in the past. It is unlikely that any future disturbances will be limited to the expression of pent-up social frustration and rage on the part of the lower classes over economic deprivation. More ominously, there has been considerable erosion in the scale and scope of social support for the regime among lower-class elements, whose expectations have not been met.[77] But as Leon Trotsky once observed: “The mere existence of privations is not enough to cause an insurrection; if it were, the masses would always be in revolt.”[78] One could be less charitable and quote Lenin’s famous statement that, left to themselves, the masses are capable of no more than “trade union consciousness,” that is to say, that they are incapable of concerted and sustained revolutionary action. In other words, the masses need to coordinate their actions with other social forces. These other social forces—the middle classes and the intellectuals—often provide the ideological justification for opposition to the existing state of affairs. Significant elements of Iran’s politically aware and literate population are increasingly expressing their discontent as the Islamic Republie struggles through its third decade. The debates over Iran’s future direction are no longer esoteric ones confined to a narrow group of the political elite, especially the ruling clergy.

The legitimacy of the system that Ayatollah Khomeini left in place is increasingly under threat. Indeed, if the declining political and religious legitimacy of the system is paralleled by the coordinated social action of opponents, then opposition may start expressing itself in seemingly spontaneous urban uprisings. Teheran may then be forced to deploy its armed forces to quell the threat to “law and order.” Initially, the armed forces may acquiesce in this role, but if the “disturbances” are not quelled in a timely manner, even the senior officer corps may begin to sense that something is wrong, particularly if civilian authorities have become increasingly dependent on the military for advice and formulation of crisis policies. This moment of recognition by senior officer leaders, that the situation is more serious than a law and order problem, also constitutes the recognition that their country is in an acute revolutionary phase. What the armed forces choose to do next will have a critical bearing on the continued existence of the political system and hence the success or failure of a revolution.

* Unraveling of the State and Re-emergence of Centrifugal Forces

Just as war expands the powers of the state over society, revolutions, as Alexis de Tocqueville put it, end up “augmenting the power and rights of the public authority.” In this context, the Islamic revolution was very much a centralizing phenomenon, just as was the Pahlavi dynasty in the 1920s. Indeed, one of the major reasons that Reza Khan marched on Teheran was due to his fear that Iran was about to disintegrate as a unitary state. From the early days of the Islamic Revolution, it rapidly became clear that the ultimate victors of the revolution, the clerical establishment, had no intention of presiding over the devolution or decentralization of the state. Rather, the 1979 constitution adopted the nationalist creed of the 1906–7 Basic Law, declaring Iran a united state. In fact, the 1979 Iranian constitution was more uniformly centralizing than its older model. In retrospect, it can be seen that the Iranian clerical establishment was as nationalistic as the dynasty that it replaced. Toward that end, maintaining intact the central state was fully endorsed and supported by the armed forces, from the earliest days of the revolution. Neither the regular army nor the Revolutionary Guards showed any compunction in putting down the various outbreaks of ethnic dissidence in peripheral provinces. Under the circumstances, and given this legacy, if the armed forces were to perceive that civilian authorities were incapable of maintaining intact the state, then a takeover by a military strongman in the mold of Nader Shah or Reza Khan would not be as remote a possibility as may be believed. In fact, one of the main reasons given by Reza Shah for his seizure of power with the help of a unit of the army, the Cossack Brigade, was to prevent the physical and moral collapse of Iran. Reportedly, Reza Shah opined:

There are two sorts of misfortunes either one of which, if not remedied, is able to destroy the national identity of any deteriorating race of people. These are domestic disorder and insecurity, and chaos of thoughts, ideas and morals.[79]

* Conclusion

Iran stands at a very critical stage in its political history. The Islamic Republic is undergoing considerable domestic turmoil. There is every indication that the vast Iranian military establishment may play a growing role in the future of the country. Yet, observers of the dynamic Iranian political scene will not be especially well positioned to provide analyses or interpretations of civil-military relations in that critical country. The reason is not difficult to fathom: There is little available literature on civil-military relations in Iran. While some excellent studies have been written about aspects or important periods in Iranian civil-military relations, very little has been written on the evolution of civil-military relations in Iran that can provide a guide to an understanding of possible changes in, or breakdowns within, stable civil-military relations as the country stumbles politically from crisis to crisis. This is not surprising given the fact that the Iranian military has not often or successfully intervened in the political process of the country.

This stands in stark contrast to its neighbors, where the overt intervention of the militaries in the political process by means of the classical instrument of the coup d’etat has generated a considerable body of work on each country. Consequently, a number of primary sources have been made available during the past two decades to undertake full studies of the nature of civil-military relations in Iran. This brief essay was never intended to be one of those studies. Rather, this chapter merely sought to present some of the highlights of a lengthier analysis. The major theme of this chapter is that there is a distinction between a politicized and a political military. While politicized militaries can enter the political arena by means of voicing opinions or preferences, their hallmark is to engage in overt interventions in the political process of their respective countries. In short, they engage in coups that replace a civilian government with a military one, or even an existing civilian one with another, more to their liking. Not surprisingly, the phenomenon of the coup has generated a large body of literature that has been applied to numerous case studies. Still, the Iranian military has been a political military for almost all of its modern existence, and has been one of the bulwarks—if not the main bulwark—of the political system. However, it has been effectively prevented from emerging as a political force that can play an independent role in the political system.

Mohammed Reza Shah’s system was not a military dictatorship, since the Shah ultimately relied on the military, even if he utterly controlled it. It is difficult to study the nature of civil-military relations in the so-called developing world, where the military is a political but not a politicized force. The question that now arises and that needs to be answered in any study of the evolution of civil-military relations in the Islamic Republic is whether the military will continue to be a governmental institution or will emerge as a politicized force.

[38] A number of well-known scholars who have addressed the Iranian Revolution have written small sections on civil-military relations in their studies, e.g., Said Amir Arjomand, TheTurbanfor the CrownzThe Islamic Revolution in Iran, New York: Oxford University Press, 1988, pp. 119–128.

[39] Mark Hagopian, The Phenomenon of Revolution, New York: Dodd, Mead, 1974, especially chapter 4.

[40] For an introduction to revolutions, see Chalmers Johnson, Revolutionary Change, 2nd edition, Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1982.

[41] Quoted in Anthony Joes, From the Barrel of a Gun: Armies and Revolutions, McLean, Virginia: Pergamon-Brassey’s, 1986, p. xi.

[42] Alfred Stepan, The Military in Politics: Changing Patterns in Brazil, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1971, p. 7.

[43] I have rehed in particular on the following works: Eric Nordlinger, Soldiers in Politics, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1977;Amos Perlmutter, The Military and Politics in Modern Times, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977; and Samuel Finer, The Man on Horseback.The Role of the Military in Politics, Harmondsworth: Peregrine, 1976.

[44] Mark Roberts, Khomeini’s Incorporation of the Iranian Military, McNair Paper number 48, Washington, D.C.: National Defense University, 1996, p. 5.

[45] Arthur Christensen, LTran sous les Sassanides, Copenhagen: Ejnar Munksgaard, 1944, pp. 130–32.

[46] For more details, see Robert McDaniel, The Shuster Mission and the Persian Constitutional Revolution, Minneapolis: Bibliotheca Islamica, 1974, p. 22.

[47] The South Persia Rifles played the least important role in the political process in Iran. In fact, it was raised, trained, and officered by the British to protect their investment in the lawless but oilrich semi-autonomous region of Arabistan (Khuzistan). The Gendarmerie and the Cossack Brigade competed with one another in their attempts to influence the political process at the center in Teheran.

[48] For more on the Constitutional Revolution of 1906 and on the role of military forces, see, inter alia, Djafar Shafiei-Nasab, Les Mouvements Revolutionnaires et la Constitution de 1906 en Iran, Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag, 1991, pp. 497–520.

[49] On 6 December 1921 Reza Khan issued Army Decree Number One, which called for the merger of the Cossack Brigade and the Gendarmerie, as the first step toward the creation of a unified national army.

[50] The following studies are important sources on the development of Reza Shah's military: لأ ةاًةٓةلكلأ!لأ اأأة١ Sunrise at Abadan: The British and Soviet Invasion of Iran, 1941, ةعجرحاذ١ٓاًآ New York, 1988; and General Hasan Arfa, Under Five Shahs, London: John Murray, 1964.

[51] For more details on the military under Reza Shah, see, inter alia, Ahmad Mahrad, Iran unter der Herrschaft Reza Schahs, Frankfurt: Campus Verlag, 1977, pp. 91–133.

[52] See Alvin Cottrell, "Iran's Armed Forces under the Pahlavi Dynasty," in George Lenczowski (ed.), Iran under the Pahlavis, Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, 1978.

[53] In 1954 the government discovered that the Iranian Communist Party, the Tudeh, had infiltrated the armed forces since 1942. It had created a formidable network of 600 officers. In 1960 the Shah was faced with opposition from a variety of secular political forces as a result of widespread economic discontent. In 1963 it was the turn of the religious right to voice its opposition to far-reaching changes proposed by the Shah. Each time, the Shah relied on his military for support.

[54] Quoted in Anselmo Avenido, The Role of the Iranian Armed Forces in the Fall of the Shah, Master of Military Art and Sciences, U.S. Army Command and General Staff College, 1984, p. 82.

[55] Hannah Arendt, On Revolution, New York: Viking, 1963; Katherine Chorley, Armies and theArt of Revolution, Boston: Beacon Press, 1973, p. 16.

[56] For more details on the IRGC, see James Dingeman and Richard Juppa, “Iranian Elite: The Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps,” Marine Corps Gazette, March 1988, p. 74.

[57] A Glance at Two Years of War, Political Office, Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps, Teheran, n.d., p. 33.

[58] For more details on the development of this military structure, see Arnold Hottinger, “Der Iranische Feldzug in Khusistan” [The Iranian Victory in Khuzistan], Neue Zurcher Zeitung, June 20–21,1982,0. 6.

[59] “Rafsanjani Kundigt Neordnung des Militars im Iran an,” Nahost Monitor Dienst, June 6, 1988, pp. 1–4.

[60] “Hashemi-Rafsanjani Speaks on Future of IRGC,” Foreign Broadcast Information Service-Near East/SouthAsia (henceforth FBIS-NES), October 7, 1988, p. 50.

[61] Ibid.,pp. 52—53.

[62] Andrew Gowers and Sheherazade Daneshku, “A war machine split into two camps,” Financial Times, June 28, 1988, p. 4.

[63] For Ayatollah Khamenei’s statements, see FBIS-NES, May 13,1991, p. 57.

[64] “Revolutionary Guard accepts new role,” Iran Focus, November 1991, p. 8.

[65] Rainer Hermann, “Von der Wirtschafts-zur Legitimationskrise: Die Ara Khamenei/Rafsanjani in der Islamischen Republik Iran,” Orient 35:4, 1994, p. 545.

[66] Ibid.

[67] Safa Haeri, “Iranian general calls for end of rule by clerics,” The Independent, September 28, I994,p. 11.

[68] Andrew Rathmell, “Khamenei Strengthens His Grip, Jane’s Intelligence Review, October 1995, p. 450.

[69] For more details, see Michel Naufal, “Iran: Khatami joue a quitte OU double,” Arabics, November 1997, pp. 20–24; Nairi Nahapetian, “Iran: Nouvelles Constantes Politiques en Gestation,” Ara-bies, March 1998, pp. 20–26.

[70] For more details, see the definitive work on the Pasdaran by Kenneth Katzman, The Warriors of Islam: Iran’s Revolutionary Guards, Boulder: WestviewPress, 1993.

[71] Kar-o-kargar, 30 April 1997.

[72] “Military Offensive in the Political Arena,” Mobin, 2 May 1998, p. 5.

[73] “General Safavi Chooses Dialogue,” Akhbar, June 1,1998.

[74] Ibid.

[75] “IRGC’s Safavi Urges Vigilance against ‘Third Current,’” Islamic Republic News Agency, June 2,1998.

[76] “Iran’s Khatami on Military Issues, Missiles,” speech by President Khatami, Tehran IRIB Television First Program Network in Persian 1709 Greenwich Meantime, MfX ١١ 399؟), in Foreran لآ٠أ٢١اذلآءهة Information Service-Near East/SouthAsia, on-line.

[77] Ahmed Ghoreishi and Dariush Zahedi, “Prospects for Regime Change in Iran,” Middle East Policy 5:1,January 1997,12. 86.

[78] Leon Trotsky, The History of the Russian Revolution, translated by Max Eastman, New York: Monad Press, 1961, p. 249.

[79] Quoted in Donald Wilber, Reza Shah Pahlavi: The Resurrection and Reconstruction of Iran, New York: Exposition Press, 1970, p. 73.

 The Republic of Iraq

 Chapter 4: The Position of the Iraqi Clergy

Joyce N. Wiley

The Iraqi Muslim clergy, or ulama, minister to a population that is about 60 percent Shia and 35 percent Sunni. Both Sunni and Shia clergy are in weakened positions, the Sunnis because of extreme government control, the Shias because of severe government oppression. Neither is able to exercise shura, i.e.,to advise the government on what is permitted and what is forbidden in Islam, which has traditionally been a major function of the Muslim clergy. Neither any longer controls pious endowments, which have traditionally provided financing for clerical disbursements to seminarians and the needy. There are no more Shariah courts, where the clergy have traditionally adjudicated family law. Neither can preach at will because Friday prayers, being public gatherings, are monitored by government agents to ensure clerical compliance with government policies.

The Sunni clergy take their salaries and their assignments from the government. As state employees, they follow government guidelines in their sermons and choose their sermon topics from a book of Friday speech themes issued by their non-clerical supervisors in the Ministry of Endowments and Religious Affairs. The Shia clergy still take their salaries and their assignments from the marja ‘iyya, the Shia religious authority in Najaf [80] —although at least since 1979 when Saddam Hussein assumed the presidency, Iraq’s Baath regime has been trying to get the same control over the Shia clergy that it has over the Sunni clergy. In the process it has killed an enormous number of them.

In response to the Shia clergy’s resistance to government control, the government has moved to curb contact between them and the public. Some mosques have been closed; publication of Shia books has been banned; processions to commemorate Shia holy days have often been prohibited. Attendance at mosques has been deterred through harassment and arrest of worshipers. Financial sponsors of mosques have been persecuted. The highest-ranking Shia clergyman in Iraq, Ayatollah Ali Sistani, is under house arrest in Najaf.

* Traditional Role of the Clergy in Iraq

The present circumstances of the Iraqi ulama are far removed from their traditional role in Iraqi society. Iraq has historically been governed by Sunnis, and a small number of Sunni clerical families were part of the ruling elite. The Shias were not part of the ruling class, but senior Shia clerics functioned as liaisons between the Shia community and successive Sunni-dominated governments. Religious elites in both communities maintained their positions through intermarriage and, when appropriate, by directing their sons into religious studies.

Starting in the late nineteenth century, the attraction of religious studies for elite Sunni families eroded as the Ottoman Turks enacted reforms aimed at modernizing their empire and increasing the power of the central government at the expense of regional elites.[81] With their authority and privileges being reduced, families in the Sunni religious elite began, with Ottoman cooperation, to send their most promising sons into the upper levels of the bureaucracy and the professions, in essence moving their families into the modern middle class.

In the subsequent period under Iraq's Hashemite monarchy (1921–1958), the government paid the salaries of Sunni ulama and supported religion. The ulama advised the government on what was permitted and forbidden in Islamic law and exercised authority in Shariah courts. In the 19505 there was some religionbased political opposition in Iraq's Sunni Arab community, but it was from the Muslim Brotherhood, a primarily lay organization, not from the clerical establishment.

The Shia clergy, under both the Ottomans and the Hashemite monarchy, were an important part of the political leadership of the Shia community. Their financial support came from the Shia community, and an individual clergyman's means of rising to prominence depended upon the number of his followers and the amount of religious taxes paid to him. This system gave Shia clerics a large degree of autonomy from the government and injected responsiveness into their relationship with influential members of the Shia community.

The relationship between the Shia ulama and the country’s political authorities was one of mutual sufferance. Religious studies continued to attract capable young Shia, both Iraqi and non-Iraqi. A decade before the Baathists came to power in 1968, there were nearly 2,000 students in Najafs seminaries.[82] In contrast, at the beginning of the year 2000, there were only about 300 Shia clerics, including non-Iraqi seminarians, in all Iraq, a number grossly inadequate to minister to the 12 million Iraqi Shia.[83]

* Political Activism by the Shia Clergy

Excluded from governmental power for most of their history, the Shias for centuries maintained a millenarian attitude toward government, waiting patiently for God to return the Hidden Imam to establish justice and ideal government for them. In the 1950s, however, the attitude of many Iraqi clerics toward non-involvement in politics changed, a consequence of their struggle to counter the appeal of secularism and Western ideologies to their flocks. Ayatollah Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (d. 1980) and other prominent clerics in Najaf came to believe that Muslims had an obligation to establish legitimate government themselves. The ideal form of government for the clerical activists became public knowledge in the late 1970s when Ayatollah al-Sadr issued his conception of a modern Islamic government.[84] The plan called for a government of three branches, with the executive and legislative branches elected via a system of universal suffrage. The judicial branch was to be appointed. The highest court was to consist of clerics, presumably including both Shias and Sunnis in Iraq, where the Muslim community consists of both sects. The court was to be charged with making sure that laws enacted by the legislature did not contravene Islam. This proposal was a much thought about attempt to create a modern system of Shura in which the governors consult with the governed via elections.

Two Quranic verses (Sura 3, verse 159, and Sura 42, verse 38) directed the Prophet Muhammad to Shura. In the past, Muslim governments were considered to have met this requirement by consulting with high-ranking clerics or other notable citizens. Ayatollah al-Sadr posited that such limited consultation with the people was no longer adequate, given the high level of education in the modern world and people's expectation of self-government. He believed that to be accepted, modern governments had to consult with their citizens through elections; hence the system of Islamized democracy that he proposed.

The political system outlined by Ayatollah al-Sadr was not inspired by Arab nationalism, an ideology that had the obeisance of many Iraqi Arabs but had no appeal, for obvious reasons, to Iraq's large Kurdish population. The Islamic activists expected a representative system of government to accommodate a variety of religious and political beliefs and to resonate favorably with the Muslim Kurds. Citing the Quran's warning against compulsion in religion, Ayatollah Al-Sadr stressed that government should not attempt to impose religion on individuals. Non-Muslims were to be free to practice their religion and to take part in political activities, rights guaranteed to them by Quranic injunctions. They were to be afforded the protection and services received by Muslims.[85]

Along with their plan for representative government, the activist ulama and their supporters formulated a strategy for achieving it, a way of moving the Iraqi people from the minority-dominated, authoritarian government that they had, to this modern system of Shura. The plan required political assertiveness on the part of the Shia laity, and the creation of an alliance with those Sunnis willing to work for a modern Islamic government. To this end, Shia Islamists formed several clandestine political groups, the largest and best known of which was Hizb alTawa (Party of the Call to Islam). They also joined forces with Iraq's Sunni Islamists, namely the Muslim Brotherhood, whose original leader, Muhammad Mahmud al-Sawaf, strongly supported cooperation between Sunnis and Shias.[86] The most important Shia supporter of the Shia-Sunni alliance was the Shia marja al-taqlid (supreme authority or source of imitation), Ayatollah Muhsin Al-Hakim. One manifestation of the alliance was the recruitment of Shias to membership in the Brotherhood. Likewise, an estimated 10 percent of the members of Hizb al-Da'wa were/are Sunni.[87] There was a geographical dimension to recruitment for most Islamic groups. Shia Islamists in Sunni areas would join the Brotherhood; Sunni Islamists in Shia areas would join Hizb al-Da’wa.

Iraq’s Sunnis and Shias have never fought each other on religious grounds, and this political cooperation between the two communities had precedents; for example, in opposition to British colonial domination, Sunni and Shia clerics and laymen from both communities allied in the 1920 revolt. To be sure, some Sunni tribes and leaders did not join that effort, a fact that greatly helped the British to prevail. Indeed, a similar division in the Sunni community manifested itself regarding the Islamist alliance of the 1950s. After Shaykh al-Sawafleft Iraq in 1959, the Iraqi Muslim Brotherhood stopped accepting Shia members.[88]

It should also be noted that there was division in the Shia community, although it was not over cooperation with the Sunnis. The Shia division was over whether or not they should be politically active at all. Quietist clergy, both in the 1920s and later, interpreted their clerical responsibility narrowly, believing that their obligation was only to say what was right, not to take action to try to achieve it. The foremost of the quietist clerics in the 19705 and thereafter was Ayatollah Abol-Qazem Khoi. Ayatollah Khoi, who became the marja ‘ al-taqlid after the death of Ayatollah Muhsin al-Hakim in 1970, upheld Shia political quiescence, which in Iraq meant leaving government to the Sunni Arab minority.

* Baath Policies toward the Clergy

The relationship of both Sunni and Shia clergy to the government changed substantially when the Baathists came to power in 1968. Within a year, Shaykh Abdul Aziz al-Badri, the Sunni alim (cleric) most associated with the Islamic movement, was arrested and killed in prison. Sunni mosques that had been independent of the government were closed. This early show of ruthlessness against the Muslim Brotherhood essentially eliminated religion-based opposition in the Arab Sunni community. The Sunni clergy confined themselves to carrying out their strictly religious duties of advising individual believers on Islamic law and comforting them with hope for life in the next world. The regime discouraged regular prayers by both Sunnis and Shias, but Sunnis fared better because they had family connections in the upper echelons of government.

The government targeted activist Shia ulama, but also endeavored to bring the entire clerical establishment to heel. In 1969 the government arrested and tortured two Shia clerics, Sayyid Mahdi al-Hakim and Sayyid Hassan Shirazi, who, like Shaykh al-Badri, were politically active Islamists.[89] At the same time, the Iranian seminarians in Najaf were arrested, and Shia endowment funds were confiscated. In the 19705 there were more arrests of Islamists. In 1980, the government arrested, tortured, and executed Ayatollah Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr and his sister, the ’alima (cleric [feminine]) Bint al-Huda. In 1983 over 100 members of the clerical al-Hakim family were arrested by the government. Six of them were executed immediately, and the fate of most of the rest remained unknown.

During the eight-year Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988), Kurdish Islamists, who were Sunni and associated with the Muslim Brotherhood, participated in the armed opposition to the Baathist government. One of the prominent Kurdish Islamists, Mullah Uthman Abdul Aziz, fled to Iran with some 5,000 of his supporters, then returned to confront government forces shortly before the government’s gassing of the Kurdish town of Halabja in March 1988.

The Shias were severely targeted again after the March 1991 intifada that occurred at the end of the Gulf War. Among the clergy arrested at that time were 16 members of the clerical Bahr al-’Ulum family, including Ayatollah ‘Ala’ al-Din, Ayatollah Izz al-Din, Ayatollah Jaafar, Hujja.[90] Hassan, Hujja Muhammad Hussein, Hujja Muhammad Rida, and a number of their sons.[91] No account of their fate after arrest was given.

The 93-year-old marja ‘, Ayatollah Khoi, despite his abjuration of politics, was also arrested at that time, along with 108 of his followers, most of whom were not heard of afterwards.[92] The ayatollah may have aroused government wrath through his commitment to maintaining clerical autonomy and advising believers on Islamic law. After Iraq’s 1991 invasion of Kuwait, Ayatollah Khoi declared it a sin for believers to buy goods brought back from Kuwait, a ruling based on his determination that the goods were stolen. Ayatollah Khoi died under house arrest in 1992, and his eldest son died in highly suspicious circumstances in 1994. The ayatollah's youngest son, Abdul Majid, escaped Iraq and now directs the Khoi Foundation, a large and active benevolent organization headquartered in London.

The most recent government campaign against the Shia clergy began in 1998 with the assassinations of Shaykh Mirza Ali al-Gharawi and Shaykh Murtada Al-Borujerdi. In January 1999 a grenade attack against Shaykh Bashir Hussein Al-Najafi and his seminary wounded the ayatollah and killed three others. In February, Ayatollah Sadiq al-Sadr and two of his sons were assassinated as they left Friday prayers, which the government had ordered the ayatollah not to lead. Ayatollah al-Sadr expected to be killed and was wearing a death shroud as he led his last prayers and at the time of his assassination. Another of the ayatollah's sons, along with a large number of seminarians who studied under the ayatollah, were arrested later in the year.

In the weeks preceding Ayatollah Sadiq al-Sadr's assassination, many of his aides were arrested and their houses demolished. The whereabouts and fate of most of the arrestees remained unknown.[93] In January, Shaykh Awas, imam of the Nasriyah city mosque, was arrested. When an unarmed crowd of his supporters demonstrated to demand his release, security forces killed 5 and arrested 300.[94] The imam of al-Thawrah mosque in Baghdad was reportedly killed in demonstrations protesting the death of Ayatollah al-Sadr, as was Shaykh Ali Al-Sahlani, imam of the main mosque in Amara. The chief Shia clerics in Basra and Nasriyah were arrested, apparently to prevent their leading religious gatherings.

When some pious Shias started attending prayers at Sunni mosques after their own mosques were closed, the government began checking food ration cards at mosque entrances and meting out severe penalties to people who attempted to pray at unauthorized locations.[95] Toward the end of 1999, 19 of Ayatollah Sadiq âl-Sadr's followers were executed, including Shaykh Muhammad al-Numani and Shaykh Abdul-Razzaq al-Rabi'i.[96]

As of 2000, there were almost no Shia ulama from the venerable clerical families left in Iraq. Some members of the prestigious Shia clerical families have survived by leaving Iraq. The Sunni clerical institution is not faring much better. Because religious studies are under government control, pious young Sunnis are avoiding religious careers.

Religious studies continue to attract Shia Arab students to the seminaries in Qom, Iran, and the small centers in Lebanon, but clearly the loss of senior clerics is problematic. Arab Shias have always sought to have at least one Arab among the Grand Ayatollahs in order to make sure their distinct interests are not over-looked by a totally Iranian leadership. To have an Arab among the Grand Ayatollahs, Arab Shias have had to give overwhelming support to one candidate— which has become very hard to achieve given the present paucity of Iraqi clerics and the circumstances in Iraq, where the majority of Arab Shias live. Shaykh Muhammad Hussein Fadlallah in Lebanon has considerable support, but only Iraq has an Arab Shia population large enough to provide the base for a marja ‘. Arab Shia clerics and Iraqi merchants have a strong interest in maintaining Najaf as the site of the marja‘iyya, given that most of the shrines that attract Shia pilgrims and therefore generate revenues are in Iraq.

* Surviving Religious Leaders

Although there is a ranking cleric inside Iraq for each religious community, neither man has any freedom of action. The ranking Shia, Ayatollah Ali Sistani, was born in Mashad, Iran, in 1930 and took his early studies there. He then enrolled in Qom for advanced jurisprudence courses. From Qom, he moved to Najaf to study in the seminaries there. At the age of 31 he received his ijaza (certification as a mujtahid) from both Ayatollah Khoi and Shaykh Hussein Al-Hilli. Sistani began teaching Islamic jurisprudence in Najaf and continued to do so until placed under house arrest by the Baathist government. Although Ayatollah Sistani is forbidden to lead prayers and is severely circumscribed in his activities, his liaison office in London undertakes religious and educational projects in his name.[97]

The ranking Sunni cleric inside Iraq is Abdul Karim al-Mudarris, the qadi (religious judge) of Baghdad. One expects a qadi to enforce Islamic law, but Shaykh Mudarris's authority is confined to pedestrian decisions such as declaring when Ramadan begins.

Outside Iraq, several Iraqi religious authorities are active and influential. One of them is Sayyid Muhammad Baqir al-Hakim, who was born in Najaf in 1939 into a prominent Iraqi clerical family, his father Ayatollah Muhsin Al-Hakim being the leading mujtahid from 1955 to 1970. Sayyid Muhammad Baqir was educated in the hawza (center of religious studies) at Najaf and became a leader in Iraq's Islamic movement, writing books and articles for the call to Islam. He was imprisoned and tortured by the Baath government in 1972 and 1977. When public pressure effected his release in 1979, he fled to Iran. He has been chairman of the Supreme Council of the Islamic Resistance in Iraq (SCIRI) since its establishment in 1982. During the Iran-Iraq War, he supervised the 15 Iraqi refugee camps in Iran and SCIRLs military forces.[98] Importantly, Sayyid al-Hakim has cooperated with Sunni Arab and Kurdish groups and has supported the election of a consultative assembly to write a new constitution for Iraq.

A second prominent Shia cleric is Dr. Muhammad Bahr al-'Ulum, who was born in Najaf in 1927 into a prominent Iraqi clerical family. His ancestor Ayatollah Mahdi Bahr al-'Ulum was the leading Shia mujtahid of the late eighteenth century. Dr. Bahr alUlum was educated in the hawza at Najaf and was among the first to graduate from Iraq's College of Theology after it was established in the early 19605. As one ofAyatollah Muhsin al-Hakim's staff, he was obliged to flee Iraq in 1969 after the Baath government accused the ayatollah's staff of conspiracy. Sayyid Bahr al-'U!um proceeded to obtain a master's degree from the University of Teheran and a Ph.D. from the College of Sciences at Cairo University.[99] Today he directs Ahl al-Bayt, a London-based organization ministering to Iraqi refugees.

Among Iraqi Sunni clerics outside Iraq, Dr. Taha Jaber al-Alwani, president of the Graduate School of Islamic and Social Sciences in Leesburg, Virginia, is highly respected. He is from Ramadi and took his early education in Iraq in the classical Islamic disciplines. His master's and doctoral degrees are from al-Azhar in Cairo, the foremost school for Sunni clerics. He is an authority on Shaffi law, and in his many books and articles, he addresses such varied subjects as the rights of the accused in Islam and the social implications of Islamic law.[100] Dr. al-Alwani has support from prominent Saudis and Jordanians and is not very involved with specifically Iraqi affairs.

Dr. Usama al-Tikriti, age 60, is another respected Sunni religious leader. He is not a clergyman but is president of the Iraqi Islamic Party, that is to say, of the Iraqi Muslim Brotherhood. He is a radiologist, practicing in Leeds, England. Dr. al-Tikriti completed secondary school in the town of Tikrit and medical school at the University of Baghdad. He joined the Muslim Brotherhood in the 19505 and was the leader of the Brotherhood in the United Kingdom from 1972 to 1978. From 1978 to 1991 he worked in the United Arab Emirates. On his return to England in 1991, he became president of a center for political studies and research and initiated publication of the Islamic Party's monthly magazine, Dar al-Salaam (House of Peace).[101]

Finally, it is important to note that the Kurdish population has its own clergy and two Islamic parties. The Islamic Unity Movement, Harakat Al-Wahda, is a union of several smaller parties and is headed by Salah al-Din Baha al-Din. The other party, the Revival Movement, Harakat al-Nahda, is headed by Mullah Ali Abdul Aziz. Both parties maintain a working relationship with the Arab Muslim Brotherhood.

* Conclusion

The activist Shia clergy have written and spoken fairly often about their vision for a future government in Iraq. They are committed to a democratic system with an Islamic sifa (flavor), to use their word. They stress that in the long term any non-democratic government in Iraq would have to stay in power through coercion, and that Iraq has had enough government by coercion. They contend that minority government is not feasible in the modern world with its educated masses and modern telecommunications. As for Sunni Islamists, some of Iraq's Muslim Brotherhood also advocate a democratic government for Iraq. They say that the religiosity of the Iraqi people will add the Islamic "flavor" they too hope to see in a future political system. Because of the Baath regime's brutal suppressions, the Brotherhood has no organization left in the Arab part of Iraq, although some individual members remain.

Iraq's quietist Shia clergy continue to acquiesce to minority Sunni government, but reject the totalitarian government they have had under Saddam Hussein and his clan. This also seems to be the position of Iraq's Sunni ulama. Recent visitors to Iraq report Sunnis want Saddam's government replaced by that of a Sunni military officer who is able to control the street and prevent retribution against Sunnis.

Inasmuch as some Sunnis may fear the Shias would dominate a democratic system, it is important to ask whether the Shia community is politically homogeneous. In fact, it is quite unlikely that the Shias would vote as a bloc. More likely they would divide in the way that Iranians are dividing. In the 20—odd years of elections in Iran's Islamic Republic, generational differences and other interests have created a nascent multi-party system. Since Iraqi Shias run the gamut from left to right, from urban sophisticate to rural traditionalist and from affluent to poor, it is very likely they would divide into parties with both Sunni and Shia members—as they actually did between the time the British set up a constitutional monarchy in Iraq and the Baathists took over the Iraqi government, ending Iraqis' right to join parties other than the Baath Party.

The position of the clergy will remain important because both Sunni and Shia clergy are valued by observant Muslims for their knowledge of Islamic law and their ability to interpret the Shariah. The Iraqi people are going through a time of severe trial, a time when human beings tend to turn to religion. As might be expected, visitors to Iraq report increasing religiosity, as well as fear and depression, in both the Sunni and Shia communities. In the first months of 2001, the numbers of Iraqis visiting the mosque/shrine in Karbala far exceeded previous numbers.

Because Islam has deep, validated roots in Iraq, the regime of Saddam Hussein has gone to great lengths to muzzle the clergy and to eliminate clerics it cannot manipulate. At tremendous cost to themselves, the Shia clergy have resisted being brought under government control. Through their sacrifices, they have retained their leadership function and their credibility with believers. The fact that democracy is the aspiration of many educated Iraqis and of activist Shia clerics means a democratic government would have major support in the Shia community. It would probably have some Sunni support as well.

Whatever form of replacement government Iraq gets, many of its exiled clergy will return to rejoin the clerics who have survived the brutality of the last few decades within the country. Although sorely reduced in numbers, the Iraqi ulama can be expected to serve a positive, reconciliatory role in their ravaged country.

[80] Najaf is the southern Iraqi city that has, since the eleventh century, often been the preeminent locus for Shia jurisprudence and theology.

[81] The clergy became subject to certain taxes and lost their control over education. In many cases, their landed estates became government property. For a detailed account of the late-nineteenth-century losses to Iraq’s clergy, see Hanna Batatu, The Old Social Classes and Revolutionary Movements of Iraq, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1978, chapter 7.

[82] Fadil Jamali, “The Theological Colleges of Najaf,” The Muslim World 50:3, 1960, p. 15.

[83] Written communication from Muhammad Sadiq Bahr aluium, February 2000.

[84] Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, Islamic Political System, translated by M. A. Ansari, Karachi, Pakistan: Islamic Seminary, 1982.

[85] Murtada Mottahari, Jihad, translated by Muhammad Salman Tawhidi, Teheran, Iran: Islamic Propagation Organization, 1985, p. 65. Although Iranian, Ayatollah Mottahari was closely associated with the activist Iraqi Shias.

[86] Tarik Hamdi al-Azami, “The Emergence of the Contemporary Islamic Revival in Iraq,” Middle East Affairs Journal, volume 3, number 1—2, winter/spring 1997, p. 132.

